TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTIE Prince IAMES, by the grace of God King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland; Defendor of the Faith, &c.

IT may of ſome, and not without iuſt cauſe (moſt gracious and dread Soueraigne) be imputed vnto me for no ſmall preſumption, to preſent vnto your royall Maieſtie (a prince of ſo great learning and judgement) theſe homely fruits of mine endeuors and paines, taken in the Generall Hiſtorie of the Turkes, and ſtrange ſucceſſe of their great and mightie Othoman Empire. Whereunto for all that I was the rather induced, not only by the rare and wonderfull clemencie ioyned vnto many other the great and moſt reſplendent vertues of your heroicall mind; the leaſt whereof is ſufficient to haue cheared vp my weake and feeble ſpirits; but alſo by the enconragement of the right Worſhipful my moſt eſpecial good friend Sir Peter Manwood knight of the Bath, the firſt mouer of mee to take this great worke in hand, and my continuall and only comfort, ſtay, and helper therein. Which to do, I was alſo the more deſirous, ſeeing diuers little volumes, and ſmall parts of the Hiſtorie preſented vnto the greateſt Princes: as the little Treatiſe of Paulus Iou. de Rebus Turcicis, dedicated vnto the great and mightie Emperour Charles the fiſt; and the ſmall Hiſtorie of Cœlius Secundus, de Bello Melitenſi, vnto her late ſacred Maieſtie, of moſt happie and bleſſed memorie, the rare Phœnix of her ſex, who now reſteth in glorie: with diuers others of like ſort by the learned Authors thereof ſtill commended, ſome to one great Prince of their times, ſome to others: all filling me with good hope that this whole and continuat Hiſtorie of that Northern and warlike Nation (which in ſhort time by God his appointment hath brought ſuch fatall mutations vpon a great part of the world, as former times haue ſeldome or neuer ſeene) drawne euen from the firſt beginning thereof (not together to my knowledge by any one before written) ſhould with your moſt noble Maieſtie find no leſſe grace and fauour, than hath almoſt euery part thereof with other the aforeſaid and ſuch like moſt mightie and famous Princes: and the rather, for that your Majeſtie hath not diſdained in your Lepanto or Heroicall Song, with your learned Muſe to adorne and ſet forth the greateſt & moſt glorious victory that euer was by any the Chriſtian confederate Princes obtained againſt theſe the Othoman Kings or Empeted the firſt founder of the mightie Empire of the Turkes: which continued by many diſcents directly in the line of himſelfe, euen vnto Achmat, who now reigneth, is from a ſmall beginning become the greateſt terrour of the world; and holding in ſubiection many great and mighty kingdoms in Aſia, Europe, and Africke, is growne to that height of pride, as that it threatneth deſtruction vnto the reſt of the Kingdomes of the earth; labouring with nothing more than with the weight of it ſelfe. In the greatneſſe whereof is ſwallowed vp both the name and Empire of the Saraſins, the glorious Empire of the Greekes, the renowned kingdomes of Macedonia, Peloponeſus, Epirus, Bulgaria, Seruia, Boſna, Armenia, Cyprus, Syria, Ægypt, Iudea, Tunes, Algiers, Media, Meſopotamia, with a great part of Hungarie, as alſo of the Perſian kingdom, & all thoſe churches and places ſo much ſpoken af in holy Scripture (the Romans only excepted;) and in briefe ſo much of Chriſtendome as far exceedeth that which is thereof at this day left. So that at this preſent if you conſider the beginning, progreſſe, and perpetuall felicitie of this the Othoman Empire, there is in this world nothing more admirable and ſtrange; if the greatneſſe and luſtre thereof, nothing more magnificent or glorious; if the power and ſtrength thereof, nothing more dreadfull or dangerous: which wondering at nothing but at the beauty of it ſelfe, and drunk with the pleaſant wine of perpetuall felicitie, holdeth all the reſt of the world in ſcorn, thundring out nothing but ſtill bloud and war, with a full perſuaſion in time to rule ouer all, preſining vnto it ſelfe no other limits than the vttermoſt bounds of the earth, from the riſing of the Sun vnto the going downe of the ſame. The cauſes whereof are many and right lamentable, but for the moſt part ſo ſhut vp in the counſels of the great, as that for me to ſeeke after them, were great folly: yet amongſt the reſt, ſome others there be, ſo pregnant and manifeſt, as that the blind world taketh thereof as it were a generall knowledge, and may therefore without offence of the wiſer ſort (as I hope) euen in theſe our nice dayes be lightly touched. Whereof the firſt and greateſt, is the iuſt and ſecret iudgement of the Almightie, who in iuſtice deliuereth into the hands of theſe mercileſſe miſcreants, nation after nation, and kingdome vpon kingdome, as vnto the moſt terrible executioners of his dreadfull wrath, to be puniſhed for their ſins: others in the mean while, no leſſe ſinful than they, in his mercie enioying the benefit of a longer time, calling them vnto repentance. Then, the vncertaintie of worldly things, which ſubiect to perpetuall change, cannot long ſtay in one ſtate, but as the ſea is with the wind, ſo are they in like ſort toſſed vp and down with the continual ſurges and waues of alteration and change; ſo that being once grown to their height, they there ſtay not long, but fall again as faſt as euer they riſe, and ſo in time come to nothing: as we ſee the greateſt monarchies that euer yet were vpon earth haue done, their courſe being run; ouer whom Time now triumpheth, as no doubt at length it ſhall ouer this ſo great a Monarchie alſo, when it ſhall but then liue by fame, as the others now do. Next to theſe cauſes from aboue (without offence be it ſaid) is the ſmal care the Chriſtian princes, eſpecially thoſe that dwelt further off, haue had of the common ſtate of the Chriſtian common weale, whereof euen the very greateſt are to account themſelues but as the principall members of one and the ſame bodie, and haue, or ought to haue, as ſharpe a feeling one of anothers harmes, as hath the head of the wrongs done vnto the feet, or rather as if it were done vnto themſelues: in ſtead of which Chriſtian compaſſion and vnitie, they haue euer, and euen yet at this time are ſo diuided among themſelues with endleſſe quarrels, partly for queſtions of religion (neuer by the ſword to be determined) partly for matters touching their own proper ſtate and ſoueraigntie, and that with ſuch diſtruſt and implacable hatred, that they neuer could as yet (although it haue bin long wiſhed) ioyne their common forces againſt the common enemie: but turning their weapons one vpon another (the more to be lamented) haue from time to time weakned themſelues, and opened a way for him to deuoure them one after another: whereas with their combined forces (the greedie enemies greateſt terror) they might long ſince not onely haue repreſſed his furie, and abated his pride, but with ſmall danger and much glorie (God fauoring their ſo honorable attempts) haue againe recouered from him moſt of thoſe famous Chriſtian kingdomes, which hee by force againſt all right holdeth at this day in moſt miſerable ſubiection and thraldome: many millions of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians in the meane time out of the furnace of tribulation, in the anguiſh of their ſoules crying in vaine vnto their Chriſtian brethren for reliefe. By ciuill diſcord the noble countrey of Græcia periſhed, when as the father riſing againſt the ſon, and the ſon againſt the father, and brother againſt brother, they to the mutuall deſtruction of themſelues called in the Turke, who like a greedie Lyon lurking in his den, lay in wait for them all. So periſhed the kingdomes of Bulgaria, Seruia, Boſna, and Epirus, with the famous Iſland of the Rhodes and Cyprus, betraied as it were by the Chriſtian princes their neighbors, by whom they might haue eaſily beene relieued. So the moſt flouriſhing and ſtrong kingdome of Hungarie (in the reliques whereof the fortune of the Turkiſh empire hath longer ſtucke, than in the conqueſt of any other kingdome, by it attempted whatſoeuer) diuided in it ſelfe by the ambition of princes, and ciuile diſcord, the weaker ſtill calling vnto

his aid the mighty power of the Turke, is long ſince for the moſt part become unto him a prey; the poore remainders thereof being at this day hardly defended by the forces of the Chriſtian Emperor, and of the Princes his Confederates, ſeldome times meeting together with ſuch cheerefulneſſe or expedition as the neceſsitie of ſo great a matter requireth. Vnto which ſo great a cauſe of the common decay, may be added the euill choice of our ſouldiers employed in thoſe warres, who taken vp hand ouer head, out of the promiſcuous vulgar people, are for moſt part vntrained men, ſeruing rather for ſhew, and the filling vp of number, than for vſe; and in no reſpect to be compared with the Turkes IaniZaries, and other his moſt expert ſouldiers, continually euen from their youth exerciſed in feats of armes. Not to ſpeake in the meane time of the want of the antient martiall diſcipline, the wholeſome preſeruatiue of moſt puiſſant armies, which breedeth in the proud Enemie a contempt of the Chriſtian forces, with a full perſuaſion of himſelfe, that he is not by ſuch diſordered and weake means to be withſtood. But to come neerer vnto the cauſes of the Turks greatneſſe, and more proper vnto themſelues, as not depending of the improuident careleſneſſe, weakeneſſe, diſcord, and imperfections of others: firſt, in them is to be noted an ardent and infinite deſire of ſoueraigntie, wherewith they haue long ſince promiſed vnto themſelues the Monarchie of the whole world, a quick motiue to their ſo haughty deſignes: Then, ſuch a rare vnitie and agreement amongſt them, as well in the manner of their Religion (if it be ſo to be called) as in matters concerning their State (eſpecially in all their enterpriſes to be taken in hand for the augmenting of their Empire) as that thereof they call themſelues Iſlami, that is to ſay, men of one mind, or at peace among themſelues; ſo as it is not to be maruelled, if thereby they grow ſtrong themſelues, and dreadfull to others: ioyne vnto this their courage, conceiued by the wonderfull ſucceſſe of their perpetuall fortune, their notable vigilancie in taking the aduantage of euery occaſion for the inlarging of their Monarchie; their frugalitie and temperateneſſe in their dyet and other manner of liuing, their ſtraight obſeruing of their antient militarie diſcipline, their cheerefull and almoſt incredible obedience vnto their Princes and Sultans; ſuch, as in that point no Nation in the world was to be worthily compared vnto them: all great cauſes why their Empire hath ſo mightily encreaſed, and ſo long continued. Whereunto may be added the two ſtrongeſt ſinewes of euery well gouerned Commonweale; Reward propounded to the good, and Puniſhment threatened vnto the offendor; where the priZe is for vertue and valour ſet vp, and the way layd open for euery common perſon, be he neuer ſo meanely borne, to aſpire vnto the greateſt honours and preferments both of the Court and of the field, yea euen vnto the neereſt affinitie of the great Sultan himſelfe, if his valour or other worth ſhall ſo deſerue: when as on the contrary part the diſloyall or cowardly is to expect from the ſame ſoueraigne power nothing but diſgrace, death, and torture. And yet theſe great ones, not contented by ſuch commendable and lawfull meanes ſtill to extend or eſtabliſh their farre ſpreading Empire, if that point once come in queſtion, they ſticke not in their diueliſh policie to breake and infringe the Lawes both of Nations and Nature. Their leagues, grounded vpon the Law of Nations, be they with neuer ſo ſtrong capitulations concluded, or ſolemnity of oath confirmed, haue with them no longer force than ſtandeth with their owne profit, ſeruing indeed but as ſnares to intangle other Princes in, vntill they haue ſingled out him whom they purpoſe to deuoure; the reſt faſt bound by their leagues, ſtill looking on, as if their owne turn ſhould neuer come, yet with no more aſſurance of their ſafety by their leagues, than had the other whom they ſee periſh before their faces. As for the kind law of Nature, what can be thereunto more contrary, than for the father moſt vnnaturally to embrue his hands in the bloud of his owne children? and the brother to become the bloudy executioner of his owne brother? a common matter among the Othoman Emperors. All which moſt execrable and inhumane murthers, they couer with the pretended ſafety of their State, as thereby freed from the feare of all aſpiring competitors (the greateſt torment of the mighty) and by the preſeruation of the integritie of their Empire, which they thereby keepe whole and entire vnto themſelues, and ſo deliuer it as it were by hand from one to another, in no part diſmembered or impaired. By theſe and ſuch like means is this barbarous Empire (of almoſt nothing) growne to that height of maieſty and power, as that it hath in contempt all the reſt, being it ſelfe not inferiour in greatneſſe and ſtrength vnto the greateſt monarchies that euer yet were vpon the face of the earth, the Roman Empire onely excepted. Which how farre it ſhall yet further ſpread none knoweth, but hee that holdeth in his hand all the kingdomes of the earth, and with his word boundeth in the raging of the ſea, ſo that it cannot further paſſe. Moued with the greatneſſe and glory of this ſo mighty and dreadfull an Empire, growne for the moſt part out of the ruine of the Chriſtian commonweale, with the vtter ſubuerſion of many great and flouriſhing kingdomes, and wofull fall of many moe right puiſſant and mighty princes, not without griefe to be remembred; I long ſince (as many others haue) entred into the heauy conſideration thereof, purpoſing ſo to haue contented my ſelfe with a light view of that which might well be for euer of all good Chriſtians lamented, but hardly or neuer remedied; vntill that afterwards led with a more earneſt deſire to know the ſtrange and fatall mutations by this barbarous Nation in former time brought vpon a great part of the world, as alſo ſo much as I might to ſee ſo great a terrour of the preſent time, and in what termes it ſtandeth with the reſt, I had with long ſearch and much labour, mixt with ſome pleaſure and mine owne reaſonable contentment, paſſed through the whole melancholly courſe of their tragicall Hiſtorie: yet without purpoſe euer to haue commended the ſame or any part thereof vnto the remembrance of poſteritie, as deeming it an argument of too high a reach, and fitter for ſome more happy wit, better furniſhed with ſuch helpes both of nature and art as are of neceſsity requiſite for the vndertaking of ſo great a charge, than was my ſelfe, of many thouſands the meaneſt. Not vnmindefull alſo of that which the Poet (keeping decorum) ſaith in like caſe, though far leſſe matter, of himſelfe:

Cum canerem Reges & prælia, Cynthius aurem Velit, & admonuit: Paſtorem Tittere pingues Paſcere oportet oues, deductum ducere carmen.

When I did ſing of mighty Kings, or elſe of bloudy warre, Apollo pluckt me by the eare, and ſayd I went too farre: Beſeemes a Shepheard Titterus, his fatlings for to feed,
And for to fit his rurall ſong vnto his ſlender reed.

Beſides that, ſo many difficulties euen at the firſt preſented themſelues vnto my view, as to ouercome the ſame, if I ſhould take the labour in hand, ſeemed to me almoſt impoſsible: for beſide the ſea and world of matter I was to paſſe through (requiring both great labour and time) full of the moſt rare example both of the better and worſe fortune in men of all ſort and condition, yeelding more pleaſure vnto the Reader, than facilitie to the Writer; I ſaw not any (among ſo many as had taken this argument in hand) whom I might as a ſure guide or loadſtarre long follow in the courſe of this ſo great an Hiſtory: many right worthy and learned men (whoſe memory my ſoule honoureth) contenting themſelues to haue with their learned pennes enrolled in the records of neuer-dying Fame, ſome, one great expedition or action, ſome another, as in their times they fell out; yea, the Turkiſh Hiſtories and Chronicles themſelues (from whom the greateſt light for the continuation of the Hiſtorie was in reaſon to haue been expected) being in the declaration of their owne affaires (according to their barbarous manner) ſo ſparing and ſhort, as that they may of right bee accounted rather ſhort rude notes, than iuſt Hiſtories, rather pointing things out, than declaring the ſame, and that with ſuch obſcuritie, by changing the antient and vſuall names as well of whole kingdomes, countries, and Prouinces, as of cities, townes, riuers mountaines, and other places, yea and oftentimes men themſelues into other ſtrange and barbarous names of their owne deuiſing; in ſuch ſort as might well ſtay an intentiue Reader, and depriue him of the pleaſure, together with the profit he might otherwiſe expect by the reading thereof; whereunto to giue order, perſpicuitie, and light, would require no ſmall trauell and paine: Not to ſpeake in the meane time of the diuerſitie of reports in the courſe of the whole Hiſtorie, ſuch as is oftentimes moſt hard, if not altogether impoſsible to reconcile. Notwithſtanding all which difficulties, with many others more proper vnto my ſelfe, hauing with long labour and diligent ſearch paſſed through the courſe of the whole Hiſtorie, and ſo in ſome reaſonable ſort ſatisfied my ſelfe therein, I thought it not amiſſe, as well for the worthineſſe of the matter, as for the Zeale I beare vnto the Chriſtian Commonweale, and for the ſatisfying alſo of ſome others my good friends much deſirous of the ſame, to make proofe if out of the diſperſed Workes of many right worthy men, I could ſet downe one orderly and continuate Hiſtorie of this ſo mighty an Empire, with the great and fatall mutation or rather ſubuerſion of many right ſtrong and flouriſhing Kingdomes and States (the proper worke of all mighty riſing Empires, ſtill encreaſing by the fall of others) wherewith this proud Monarchie hath alreadie daunted a great part of the world, being ſo many and ſo ſtrange, as that moe, or more wonderfull were not euer to be ſeene in any of the greateſt Monarchies of antient time or memorie; and ſo together, and as it were vnder one view, and at one ſhew, to lay open vnto the Chriſtian Reader, what I was glad to ſeeke for out of the confuſed Labours of many: A Worke ſo long and laborious, as might well haue deterred a right reſolute and conſtant minde from the vndertaking thereof, being as yet to my knowledge not vndergone or performed by any. Wherein, among ſuch varietie, or more truly to ſay, contrarietie of Writers, I contented not my ſelfe, as a blinde man lead by his Guide, happely of no better ſight than himſelfe, to tread the ſteppes of this or that one man, going for a while before me, and by and by leauing me again ſtumbling in the darke : but out of the learned and faithful works of many, according to my ſimple iudgment to make choice of that was moſt probable, ſtil ſupplying with the perfections of the better, what I found wanting or defectiue in the weaker, propounding vnto my ſelfe no other mark to aime at, than the very truth of the hiſtorie ; as that which is it ſelfe of power to giue life vnto the dead letter, and to couer the faults eſcaped in the homely penning or compiling therof. Which the better to perform, I collected ſo much of the hiſtory as poſſibly I could, out of the writings of ſuch as were themſelues preſent, and as it were eye-witneſſes of the greateſt part of that they writ, and ſo as of all others beſt able, moſt like alſo to haue left vnto vs the very truth. Such is the greateſt part of ſo much of the hiſtorie of the Greeke empire as I haue (for the better vnderſtanding of the riſing of the Turks in this hiſtory ſet down, gathered out of the doings of Nicetas Choniates, Nicephorus, Gregoras, and Laonicus Chalcocondiles, all writing ſuch things as they themſelues ſaw, or were for moſt part in their time, and neere vnto them done. Such are the wonderfull and almoſt incredible wars betwixt old Amurath the ſecond, and his foſter childe the fortunat prince of Epirus, of the Turkes commonly called Scanderbeg, and by that waiward tyrant at his death together with his kingdome deliuered, as it were by inheritance, vnto his ſon, the great and cruell Sultan Mahomet . all written by Marinus Barletius, himſelfe an Epirot, and in all thoſe troubleſome times then liuing in Scodra, a city of the Venetians ioyning vpon Epirus. Such is the wofull captiuity of the Imperiall city of Conſtantinople, with the miſerable death of the Greeke Emperor Conſtantinus Palæologus, and the fatall ruine of the Greeke empire, written by Leonardus Chienſis, Archbiſhop of Mytilene, being himſelfe then preſent, and there taken priſoner. Such is the lamentable hiſtorie of the Rhodes, taken for moſt part out of Ia. Fontanus his three bookes de bello Rhodio, a learned man then preſent, and in great credit with Villerius the great Maſter, at ſuch time as that famous Iſland, after it had by him and the other worthy knights of the Order, bin moſt wonderfully of long defended, was to the great ruth of Chriſtendom taken by the great Sultan Solyman. Such is the moſt tragicall hiſtory of Baiazet, Solymans youngeſt ſon, collected out of the notable Epiſtles of Augerius Busbequius, Legationis Turcicæ, he himſelfe then lying embaſſador for the Emperor Ferdinand at Conſtantinople, and preſent in Solymans campe, at ſuch time as he himſelfe in perſon went ouer with his army into Aſia, to countenance his eldeſt ſon Selymus, who ſucceeded him in the empire, againſt his valiant yonger brother Baiazet, and beſide well acquainted with the great Baſſaes, Achmet, Ruſtan, Haly, and others, oftentimes mentioned in the hiſtory following. Such is alſo the hiſtory of the taking of the antient city of Tripolis in Barbary from the knights of Malta, by Sinan the proud Baſſa, written by Nicholas Nicholay lord of Arfeuile, preſent at the ſame time with the lord of Aramont, then embaſſador for the French king vnto Solyman. So might I ſay alſo of the miſerable ſpoile of the fruitfull and pleaſant Iſlands of the Mediterranean, made by Lutzis Baſſa, Solyman his brother in law, and great Admirall; with the ſubmitting of the Iſland of Naxos to the Turks obeiſance, written by Iohn Criſpe, at that time duke of the ſame Iſland. And ſo likewiſe of diuers other parts of the hiſtory, too long to rehearſe. But foraſmuch as euery great and famous action had not the fortune to haue in it a Cæſar, ſuch as both could and would commend vnto poſterity by writing that whereof they might truly ſay, They were themſelues a great part, many right excellent Generals contenting themſelues with the honor of the field, and their glory there woon, leauing the honorable fame thereof to be by others reported) for lacke of ſuch moſt certain Auhtors, or rather (as I before ſaid) eye witneſſes, I gathered ſo much as I could of that remained, out of the workes of ſuch as being themſelues men of great place, and well accquainted with the great and worthy perſonages of their time, might from their mouths, as from certaine Oracles, report the vndoubted truth of many moſt famous exploits done both by themſelues and others: as might Pau: Iouius from the mouth of Muleaſſes king of Tunes, from Vaſtius the great Generall from Auria the prince of Melphis, Charles the Emperor his Admirall, and ſuch others: or els out of the writings of ſuch as were themſelues great trauellers into the Turks dominions, and withall, diligent obſeruers of their affairs and ſtate, as were the Phyſitions Pantaleon, Minadoie, and Leunclauius (of all others a moſt curious ſearcher of their antiquities and hiſtories) vnto which great clerkes, and ſome others of that learned profeſſion, we may worthily attribute the greateſt light & certainty of that is reported of a great part of the Turkiſh affaires. But theſe in the courſe of ſo long an hiſtory failing alſo (as by conferring that which is hereafter written, together with their hiſtories, is eaſily to be perceiued) to perfect that I had taken in hand, I tooke my refuge vnto the writings of ſuch other learned and credible authors, as of whoſe integritie and faithfulneſſe the world hath not to my knowledge at any time yet doubted : yea for theſe few late yeares I was glad out of the German and Italian writers in their owne language in part to borrow the knowledge of theſe late affaires: as alſo from the credible and certain report of ſome ſuch honorable minded gentlemen of our owne country, as haue either for their honors ſake ſerued in theſe late wars in Hungary, or vpon ſome other occaſions ſpent ſome good times in trauelling into the Turks dominions, but eſpecially vnto the Imperiall citie of Conſtantinople, the chiefe ſeat of the Turkiſh Empire, and place of the great Turks abode: amongſt whom, I cannot but deſeruedly remember my kind friend and couſin M. Rog. Howe, vnto whoſe diſcreet & curious obſeruations during the time of his late abode at Conſtantinople, I iuſtly account my ſelfe for many things beholden. In which courſe of my proceeding, if the Reader find not himſelfe ſo fully ſatisfied as hee could deſire, I would be glad by him my ſelfe to be better informed, as being no leſſe deſirous to learne the truth of that I know not, than willing to impart to others that little which I know.

Thus much I thought good to ſet downe, to perſuade the Chriſtian Reader of the truth of the hiſtory following, wherein he ſhall find matter enough to wonder at, and no leſſe ſtrange than that whatſoeuer it is that is written of the greateſt Monarchies of antient time, vnto whom for power and maieſtie it yeeldeth little: but ſo much the more worthy our conſideration than they, for that their periods alreadie run, and ſo their furie ouer paſt, this in our time ſo flouriſheth, and at this preſent ſo mightily ſwelleth, as if it would ouerflow all, were it not for the mercy of God firſt, and then by the force of ſome few of the Chriſtian princes neereſt vnto ſo great a danger, with their ſo great charge, to their immortall glorie, and benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale, mightily checked and kept within ſome bounds and compaſſe. This hiſtory for the moſt part thus, as is aforeſaid paſſed through, and brought to ſome good perfection, was yet by me againe laied aſide, and like enough euen as an abortiue fruit to haue periſhed in the birth before it was growne to perfection, had I not, many times fainting in the long and painefull trauell therewith, by my eſpeciall good and honourable friend, Sir Peter Manwood of S. Stephens in the countie of Kent, knight of the honorable Order of the Bath, a great louer and fauorer of learning (and in whoſe keeping it ſo for the moſt part many yeares in ſafety reſted) been ſtill comforted, and as it were againe reuiued, and finally encouraged to take it in hand; and as at firſt to perfect it; ſo now againe to continue it: vnto whom (being the onely furtherer, ſtay, and help of theſe my labors) thou art for ſuch pleaſure as thou findeſt therein in courteſie beholden, and I for euer bounden. Now, what I for my part haue in this my long trauell performed, I leaue it to thy good diſcretion to conſider, contenting my ſelfe in ſo great matter to haue bin willing to haue done ſomething; wiſhing no longer to liue, than in ſome meaſure to be profitable to the Chriſtian common-weale, which long ſince in my nurſing mothers houſe Lincolne Colledge in Oxford, where I was ſometime Fellow, I did purpoſe to performe, as it ſhould pleaſe God in time to giue me means and occaſion: In which mind I hope by the goodneſſe and mercy of Chriſt my Sauior ſo long as I liue to continue. Onely this fauour (to conclude with) I requeſt of thee, that if in this ſo long and perplexed an hiſtory (by piece meale of ſo many diuerſly handled) written by me in a world of troubles and cares, in a place that affoorded no means of comfort to proceed in ſo great a worke, thou chance to light vpon ſome things otherwiſe reported than thou haſt elſewhere read them (as I doubt not but thou maieſt) not therefore forthwith to condemne what thou here findeſt, beeing haply taken from a more certaine reporter than was that whereunto thou giueſt more credit, or at leaſtwiſe not written by me, as meaning in any thing to preiudice thy better Iudgement, but to leaue it to thy good choice in ſuch diuerſity of reports to follow that which may ſeeme vnto thee moſt true. By which courteſie thou haſt already encouraged me to ioyne vnto my former hiſtorie a continuation for ſome few yeares, in this edition, and yet mayſt (God giue me life and health) hereafter incourage me to performe ſome other worke to thy no leſſe contentment. So wiſhing thee all happineſſe, I bid thee farewell. From Sandwich the laſt of March, 1610.

Thine in all dutifull kindneſſe,

R. KNOLLES.

THE GENERALL HISTORIE OF THE TVRKES, BEFORE THE RISING OF THE OTHOMAN FAMILIE, WITH ALL THE NOTABLE EXPEDITIONS OF THE CHRISTIAN PRINCES AGAINST THEM.

THE glorious Empire of the Turkes, the preſent terrour of the world, hath amongſt other things nothing in it more wonderful or ſtrange, than the poore beginning of it ſelfe, ſo ſmall and obſcure, as that it is not well known vnto themſelues, or agreed vpon euen among the beſt writers of their Hiſtories, from whence this barbarous nation, that now ſo triumpeth ouer the beſt part of the world, firſt crept out or tooke their beginning. Some (after the manner of moſt nations) deriue them from the Troians, led thereunto by the affinitie of the words Turci & Teucri, ſuppoſing (but with what probability I know not) the word Turci or Turks to haue bin made of the corruption of the word Teucri, the common name of the Troians: as alſo for that the Turks haue of long moſt inhabited the leſſer ASIA, wherein the antient & moſt famous city of TROY ſometime ſtood. No great reaſon in my deeming; yet giue the authors thereof leaue therewith to pleaſe themſelues, as well as ſome others, which dwelling much further off, borrow, or rather force their beginning from thence, without any probabilitie at all; and that with ſuch earneſtnes, as if they could not elſewhere haue found any ſo honorable anceſtors. Otherſome report them to haue firſt come out of PERSIA, and of I wot not what city there to haue taken their name: neither want there ſome which affirme them to haue taken their beginning out of ARABIA, yea & ſome out of SYRIA, with many other far fet deuices concerning the beginning & name of this people: all ſeruing to no better purpoſe, than to ſhew the vncertaintie thereof. Among others, Philip of MORNAY the noble & learned Frenchman, in his worthie worke concerning the truneſſe of the Chriſtian religion, ſeemeth (and that not without good reaſon) to deriue the Turks, together with the Tartars, from the Iewes, namely from the ten Tribes, which were by Salmanaſer king of ASSIRIA, in the time of Oſeas king of ISRAEL, carried away into captiuitie, & by him confined into MEDIA, & the other vnpeopled countries of the North: whoſe going thither is not vnaptly deſcribed by Eſdras, where among the great hords of the Tartars, in the fartheſt part of the world Northward, euen at this day are found ſome, that ſtil retaine the names of Dan, Zabulon, and Nepthaly, a certaine argument of their diſcent: whereunto alſo the word Tartar or Tatar, ſignifying in the Syrian tongue, remnants or leauings, and the word Turke, a word of diſgrace, ſignifying in Hebrew, baniſhed men, ſeemeth right well to agree. Beſides that, in the Northern countries of RVSSIA, SARMATIA, & LYTHVANIA, are found greater ſtore of the Iewiſh nation, than elſwhere, and ſo neerer vnto the Tartarians ſtil the moe: whereunto Io. Leunclauius the moſt curious ſearcher out of the Turks antiquities & monuments, addeth as a farther coniecture of the diſcent of thoſe barbarous Northern people from the Iewes, That in his trauell through LIVONIA into LYTHVANIA in the Coun-trie neere vnto the metropolitan citie of Riga, hee found there the barbarous people of the Lettoes, quite differing in language from the other country people of the Curons & Eſtons, no leſſe barbarous than themſelues; who had always in their mouths as a perpetual lamentation, which they with dolefull moans daily repeated abroad in the fields, Ieru, Ieru, Maſco Lun: whereby they were thought to lament ouer Ierusalem and Damasco, as forgetfull of all other things in their antient country, after ſo many worlds of yeres, and in a deſolate place ſo far diſtant thence. And Munſter in his deſcription of Livonia, repeating the like words, reporteth, That this rude people being demanded what they meant by theſe words ſo often & ſo lamentably by them withoutcauſe vttered: anſwered, That they knew no more, than that they had bin ſo of long taught by their anceſtors. But to leaue theſe opinions cõcerning their beginning, ſo diuers and vncertain, & to follow greater probabilities as concerning the place from whence they came, it is vpon better ground thought by diuers others, and thoſe of the beſt Hiſtorians, That this barbarous nation which hath of late brought ſuch fatall mutations vpon ſo great a part, not of Chriſtendome only, but euen of the whole world, tooke their firſt beginning out of the bare and cold country of Scythia: induced thereunto both by the authority of the greateſt Coſmographers, as by moſt apparant reaſons. Pomponius Mela the deſcriber of the world, reckning vp the people neere vnto the great riuer Tanais (the bounder of Europe from Asia Eaſtward) amongſt others maketh mention of the Turkes, in theſe words, Geloni vrbem ligneam habitant. Iuxta Thyrſagetæ Turcæq; vaſtas ſyluas occupant alunturq; venando. Tum continuis rupibus late aſpera & deſerta regio ad Arympheos vſque permittitur: The Geloni inhabit a city of wood, and faſt by, the Thyrſagets & Turks poſſeſſe the vaſt forreſts, and liue by hunting. Then, a rough and deſart country, with continual rocks, is ſpaciouſly extended euen as far as vnto the Arympheians. Pliny alſo in like manner reckning vp the Nations about the fennes of Mæotis, agreeing with that Mela reporteth, ſaith, Deinde, Euazæ, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Meſſeniani, Coſtobocci, Choatræ, Zigæ, Dandari, Tuſſagetæ, Turcæ, vſque ad ſolitudines ſaltuoſis conuallibus aſperas, vltra quos Arymphei qui ad Riphæos pertinent montes: Next vnto them, are the Euazæ, Cottæ, Cicimeni, Meſſeniani, Coſtobocci, Choatræ, Zigæ, Dandari, the Thuſſagets and Turks, vnto the deſarts rough with woodie valleys: beyond whom are the Arympheians, which border vpon the Riphean mountaines. And Ptolomie in the deſcription of Sarmatia Asiatica, maketh mention of the Tuſci, whom many learned men ſuppoſe to haue bin the ſame nation with the Turks. Vnto which antient teſtimonies of reuerend antiquitie, adde the manners and conditions of the Turks, their antient attire, their geſture, their gate, their weapons, and manner of riding and fight, their language and dialect, ſo well agreeing with the Scythians; and a man ſhall find matter enough ſufficient to perſuade him in reaſon, that the Turkes haue vndoubtedly taken their beginning from the Scythes; whom they in ſo many things reſemble, and with whom of all other nations they beſt agree.

The great agreement betwixt the Turkes and Scythians.

Now it hath been no leſſe doubted alſo, among the writers of the Turks hiſtories, at what time, and for what cauſes the Turkes (to the trouble of the world) left their naturall ſeats in the cold country of Scythia, to ſeek themſelues others in more pleaſant & temperat countries more Southerly, than it had bin of their originall beginning. Blondus and Platina report them, enforced with a generall want, to haue forſaken their natiue Countrie, and followed their better fortune, in the yeare of our Lord 755: with whom alſo Segonius agreeth in the cauſe of their departure, but not in the time or place whẽ or wherby they departed: for they (as he ſaith) iſſued out of their dwelling places in the yere of Grace 844, by the ſtraits of the mountaine Caucasus: whereas the other with greater probabilitie ſuppoſe them to haue come forth by the Caſpian ſtraits: which the Turkes alſo (as ſaith Sabellicus) affirme of themſelues, their anceſtors (as they ſay) being by their neighbors driuen out of the Caſpian mountains. Some others there be that report them to haue forſaken their natiue country, neither inforced therunto by neceſſity, or the power of others; but for their valor ſent for by the Sultan of Persia, to aid him in his wars: vnaduiſedly ſuppoſing that to haue bin the cauſe of their firſt comming out, which indeed hapned long time after, as in the proces of this hiſtory ſhall appeare. But whatſoeuer the aforeſaid cauſes of want, or of the enemies power, might inforce them vnto, a greater power no doubt it was that ſtir'd them vp, euen the hand of the Almightie, who being the author of al kingdoms vpon earth, as wel thoſe which he hath appoynted as ſcourges wherewith to puniſh the world, as others more bleſſed, will haue his worke and

A purpoſe full of Diuine maieſtie, to appeare in the ſtirring of them vp from right ſmall beginnings, in the increaſing and eſtabliſhing of their greatneſſe and power, to the aſtoniſhment of the world; and in the ruine and deſtruction of them againe, the courſe of their appointed time once runne. As for the difference of the time of their comming forth, before remembred, it may reaſonably be referred to the diuers emotions of that people, who beeing not vnder the command of any one, but of their diuers gouernors, as the manner of that people was, are not to be thought to haue come forth all at once, either for one cauſe; but at diuers times, ſome ſooner, ſome later, and that for diuers cauſes. This people thus ſtirred vp, and by the Caſpian ports paſſing thorow the Georgian Country, then called IBERIA, neere vnto the Caſpian ſea, firſt ſeiſed vpon a part of the greater ARMENIA, and that with ſo ſtrong hand, that it is by B their poſteritie yet holden at this day, and of them called TVRCOMANIA; of al other the moſt true progenie of the antient Turkes. In which great Countrey they of long vnder their diuers leaders, in the manner of their liuing moſt reſembling their anceſtors, roamed vp and downe with their families and heards of cattell, after the manner of the Scythian Nomades, their countrey men, without any certaine places of abode, yet at great vnitie among themſelues, as not hauing much to loſe, or wherefore to ſtriue.

Armenia, now called Turcomania, the firſt ſeat of the Turks after their firſt comming out of Scythia.

The firſt kingdome of the Turks erected in PERSIA by Tangrolipix, Chiefetaine of the Selzuccian Familie: with the ſucceſſe thereof.

THis wandring & vnregarded people, but now the terror of the world, thus firſt ſeated in ARMENIA, long time there liued in that wide country, after D their rude and woonted manner, (from which the Turcoman nation their poſteritie in that place, euen at this day, as we ſaid, much differeth not) and not onely notably defended the Countrey, thus by them at the firſt poſſeſſed, but ſtill incroching farther & farther, and gaining by other mens harms, became at length dreadful vnto their neighbors, and of ſome fame alſo farther off: whereunto the effœminate cowardiſe of thoſe delicate people of ASIA, with whom they had to do, gaue no leſſe furtherance than their owne valour; being neuertheleſſe an hardie rough people, though not much skilfull or trained vp in the feats of warre.

The fame of theſe Turks, together with their fortune, thus daily increaſing, and the mighty empire of the Saraſins as faſt declining, which vnder their Chaliphs, the ſucceſſors of the falſe E Prophet Mahomet, hauing in leſſe than the ſpace of two hundred yeares ouerſpread not onely the greateſt part of ASIA and AFRICKE, euen vnto GADES & the pillers of Hercules; but alſo paſſing ouer that ſtrait, had ouerwhelmed almoſt all SPAINE; & not there ſtaying, but paſſing the Pirenei, had pierced euen into the heart of France, and diuers other parts of Chriſtendome, as namely ITALY, SICILY, the famous Iſland of the RHODES, with many others of the MEDITERRANEAN: now diuided in it ſelfe, and rent into many Kingdomes, turned their victorious arms from the Chriſtians, vpon one another, to the mutual deſtruction of themſelues & their empire. Amongſt other the Saraſin Sultans, which forgetting their obedience to their great Caliph, tooke vpon them the ſoueraigntie of gouernment (which admitteth no partner) was one Muhomet Sultan of PERSIA, a right great prince, who hardly beſet on the one ſide F with the Indians, and on the other with the Caliph of BABYLON his mortall enemie, prayed aid of the Turks his neighbors, who were now come euen to the ſide of ARAXIS, the bounds of his empire: vnto which his requeſt the Turkes eaſily granted, in hope thereby to find a way for them afterwards to enter into PERSIA, and ſo ſent him 3000 hardie men vnder the leading of one Togra Mucalet, the ſonne of Mikeil a valiant captaine, and chiefe of the Selzuccian tribe or familie; whom the Greekes commonly call Tangrolipix, and ſome others, Selduck, or Sadock, names (as I ſuppoſe) corrupted of the great familie whereof he was deſcended. By the aid of this Tangrolipix (for now we wil ſo call him, as by the name moſt vſed) Mahomet the Perſian Sultan ouercame Piſaſiris the Caliph of BABYLON, his Arabians being not able to endure the force of his Turkiſh Archers. This war thus happily ended, the Turkes deſiring to returne home, requeſted of the Sultan leaue to depart, and with a ſafe conuoy to bee conducted vnto the riuer ARAXIS, and there to haue the paſſage of that ſwift riuer opened vnto them, which was by the Perſians ſtrongly kept by two Caſtles built vpon each end of the bridge, wherby the riuer was to be paſſed. But Mahomet loath to forgo ſuch neceſſarie men, by whom he had obtained ſo great a victory, and purpoſing to imploy them further in his ſeruice againſt the Indians, would by no meanes hearken vnto their requeſt; but ſeeming therewith to be diſcontented, commanded them to ſpeake no more thereof, threatning them violence if they ſhould more preſume to talke of their departure. The Turks therfore doubtful of their eſtate, and fearing further danger, ſecretly withdrew themſelues into the deſart of CARAVONITIS: and for that they were in number but few, and not able to come into the open field againſt ſo many millions of the Saraſins, liued as they might, by continuall incurſions and roads which they made out of the deſart forreſt into the countries adioyning: wherewith Mahomet greatly incenſed, ſent out an army of twentie thouſand men, vnder the conduct of ten of his beſt Captaines, againſt them: who for want of water and other neceſſaries, doubting to enter the deſart, encamped themſelues in the ſide of the forreſt, there to conſult what courſe to take. But Tangrolipix, who with his Turks lay a great way off in the couert of the woods and mountains, vnderſtanding of the comming of his enemies, and of the manner of their lying, thought it beſt vpon the ſudden by night to ſet vpon the Saraſins and Perſians, if ſo happily hee might ouerthrow them by policie, whom he was not able to encounter in plain battell. Vpon which reſolution hauing trauelled 2 days long march in the deſart, the third day at night he ſuddenly ſet vpon his enemies, lying negligently in their trenches, & by his vnexpected comming brought ſuch a feare vpon them, that they without longer ſtay betook themſelues to flight, euery man ſhifting for himſelfe, without regard of others. This victorie ſo happily gained, and Tangrolipix now (beyond his hope) throughly furniſhed with armor, horſes, and aboundance of all things needfull for the wars, kept the woods and forreſts no longer as a theefe or out-law, but ſhewed himſelfe in the open field, where daily repaired vnto him numbers of rogues & vagabonds ſeeking after ſpoyle; with many other deſperate vallains, who for feare of puniſhment were glad of ſuch a refuge: ſo that in a ſhort ſpace his armie was growne to be fifty thouſand ſtrong; and ſo much the ſtronger, for that they had nothing to truſt vnto more than the valor of themſelues. Whileſt Tangrolipix thus increaſeth, Mahomet inraged with the ouerthrow of his armie, in his furie cauſed all thoſe ten captains which had the leading thereof, to haue their eyes pluckt out; threatning alſo to attire all the ſoldiers that fled out of the battel, in womans apparel, and ſo diſgraced to carry them about as cowards; and withall raiſed a great armie for the ſuppreſſing of the Turks. All things being now in readineſſe, he ſet forward; when by the way the ſouldiers whom hee had ſo threatned to diſgrace, ſuddenly fled to the enemy: with whoſe comming Tangrolipix greatly encouraged and ſtrengthned, reſolued to giue the Sultan battell. And ſo boldly comming on, met with him at ISPAHAN a city of PERSIA, where was fought betwixt them a moſt terrible battell, with wonderfull ſlaughter on both ſides. In the heat of which battel, Mahomet vnaduiſedly riding to and fro to encourage his ſoldiers, falling with his horſe, brake his necke: vpon which miſchance both the armies comming to agreement, by common conſent proclaimed Tangrolipix Sultan in his ſtead, and ſo made him King of PERSIA, and of all the other large dominions vnto that kingdome belonging.

Mahomet the Perſian Sultan goeth himſelfe with an armie againſt Tangrolipix.

Tangrolipix by conſent of the ſouldiers made Sultan of Perſia.

Tangrolipix firſt Sultan of the Turks.

This was the firſt kingdome of the Turks, begun by the good fortune of Tangrolipix, about 214 yeres after their comming out of SCYTHIA, in the yere alſo of our Lord, 1030, Conſtantinus Monomachus then raigning, or a little before (according to the Turks account) in the raign of Romanus Argirus, Conſtantine his predeceſſor. Tangrolipix by rare fortune thus of a meane captain become king of PERSIA, forthwith commanded the garriſon which kept the bridge ouer the riuer ARAXIS, to be remooued, and ſo free paſſage to be giuen vnto the Turkes his countrymen, at their pleaſure to come ouer: who in great multitudes repaired into PERSIA, where they were by the new Sultan wel prouided for, & by little & little promoted vnto the

A greateſt dignities of that kingdome, the Perſians and Saraſins, the antient inhabitants thereof, being by theſe new come gueſts now kept vnder, and as it were troden vnder foot. Together with this kingdome, the Turkes receiued the Mahometane ſuperſtition, from which they before not much abhorred, as men vſing circumciſion: So that hard it is to ſay whether Nation loſt more; the Perſians and Saraſins by the loſſe of ſo great a kingdome; or the Turks, by imbracing ſo great a vanitie.

When the Turks firſt receiued the Mahometan ſuperſtition.

Tangrolipix with his Turkes thus poſſeſſed of the kingdome of PERSIA, held not himſelfe therewith long content, but made war vpon his neighbor princes, eſpecially againſt Piſaſiris the Caliph of BABYLON, whom he in diuers battels ouerthrew; and hauing at length ſlaine him, ioyned his kingdome vnto his owne. After that, he ſent Cutlu-Muſes his couſin, with an B armie againſt the Arabians, by whom hee was ouerthrowne and put to flight. But returning by MEDIA, he requeſted of Stephan the Greeke Emperours Lieutenant, leaue to paſſe with his armie by the confines of his countrie: which his requeſt Stephan not onely reiected, but alſo by ſtrong hand ſought to ſtop his paſſage; but ioyning battell with him, was by the Turkes eaſily ouerthrowne, and himſelfe taken. So Cutlu-Muſes returning to Tangrolipix, & recounting vnto him the ſucceſſe of his warres, perſuaded him to turne his forces into MEDIA, as a moſt fruitfull country, and eaſie to be ſubdued. But he highly offended with the ouerthrow giuen by the Arabians, would not hearken vnto him, but raiſing a new armie in hope of better fortune, went againſt the Arabians in perſon himſelfe. Cutlu-Muſes in the meane time fearing the Sultans diſpleaſure, fled with his followers and fauourites; and taking for his refuge C PASAR a ſtrong citie of the Choraſmians, reuolted from him: which the Sultan ſeeming not to regard, held on his intended journy againſt the Arabians, by whom hee was alſo put to the worſt, and enforced with diſhonour to returne. After that, he with part of his army beſieged Cutlu-Muſes, who by the ſtrength of the place, and valour of the people, for a great while notably defended himſelfe. In the meane time Tangrolipix, not vnmindfull what Cutlu-Muſes had before ſaid vnto him, concerning the eaſines of the conqueſt of MEDIA (a countrey, as he ſayd, defended but by women) ſent Aſan his brothers ſon, ſirnamed the Deafe, with a conuenient army to inuade the ſame: who entring into the frontiers of that prouince, was there by the Emperours lieutenant ouerthrown, and himſelfe with the greateſt part of his army ſlaine. With which loſſe the Sultan rather inraged than diſcouraged, ſent Habramy Alim his brother D againe, with an army of an hundred thouſand fighting men: with which ſo great a power the Emperors lieutenant thought it not good to encounter, vntill hee had procured further ayd from the Emperour, eſpecially out of IBERIA; and therefore kept himſelfe with ſuch power as he had, within his ſtrong and fenced places. Which Alim perceiuing, & out of hope to draw him vnto battell, roaming vp and downe the Countrey, at laſt beſieged ARZEN, an open town, but full of rich Merchants, by whom it was (contrarie to his expectation) notably defended for the ſpace of ſixe dayes; vntill that at length the Turkes ſeeing no other way to win it, ſet fire vpon it in diuers places; by force whereof the inhabitants were enforced for ſafeguard of their liues to flie, and to leaue the towne with an infinite wealth to the ſpoyle of the enemie. By this time was Liparites Gouernor of IBERIA, come with a great power to the ayd of the E Emperors Lieutenant in MEDIA: whereof Alim hauing intelligence, without delay haſted with his armie towards his enemies: and meeting with them a little before night, had with them a cruell fight; wherein the victorie fel vnto the Chriſtians, who had the Turks in chaſe a great part of the night. Neuertheles Liparites valiantly fighting in another wing of the battel, was there taken, & ſo carried away priſoner: for whoſe ranſome the Emperor ſent a great ſum of mony, with certain preſents to the Sultan; all which he ſent back againe, & frankly ſet Liparites at libertie, wiſhing him neuer to beare armes more againſt the Turks. And with him ſent the Seriph, a man of great place among the Mahumetans, his Embaſſador vnto the Emperor. Who comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, amongſt other things, proudly demanded of the Emperour, to become tributarie vnto the Sultan, and ſo to bee at peace with him for euer: F Which his vnreaſonable demand was by the Emperour with no leſſe diſdaine ſcornefully reiected, and the Seriph ſo diſmiſſed. Which contempt of his Embaſſadour the Sultan taking in euill part, as alſo not a little mooued with the death of his nephew, and loſſe of his armie, with all his power inuaded the Roman prouinces; but being come as far as COIME without any notable harme doing, for that the countrey people hearing before of his comming, had in time conueighed themſelues with their ſubſtance into their ſtrong holds, whereof there was great ſtore in thoſe countries; and hearing alſo that the Greeke Emperour was raiſing a great power to come againſt him at CESAREA; not daring to proceed any further, leauing ſo many enemies behind him, he fretting in himſelfe, returned into MEDIA, where finding the people all fled into their ſtrong townes, he layd ſiege vnto MANTZICHIERT, a citie ſtanding in a plaine champian Countrey, but ſtrongly fortified with a triple wall and deepe ditches. This Citie hee furiouſly aſſaulted by the ſpace of thirtie dayes without intermiſſion, but all in vaine, the ſame being ſtill notably defended by Baſilius Gouernour thereof, and the other Chriſtians therein. The Sultan wearie of this ſiege, and about to haue riſen, was by Alcan one of his chiefe Captaines, perſuaded yet to ſtay one day, for him to make proofe in, what he were able to doe for the gaining thereof: whereunto the Sultan yeelded, committing the whole charge of the aſſault vnto him. Aloan the next day diuiding the Armie into two parts, and placing the one part vpon the higher ground, of purpoſe with the multitude of their ſhot to haue ouerwhelmed the defendants; with the other part of the Armie, furniſhed with all things needfull for the aſſault, approched to the walls: the Sultan in the mean time, with certaine of the chiefe Turkes, from an high place beholding all that was done. But this ſo forward a Captaine in the middeſt of his endeauour loſt himſelfe, being ſlaine with a great number of his followers in approching the wall. His dead bodie knowne by the beautie of his Armor, was by two valiant young men that ſallyed out of the gate, drawne by the haire of his head into the Citie, and his head beeing forthwith cut off, was caſt ouer the wall among the Turks: wherewith the Sultan diſcouraged, and out of hope of gaining the citie, roſe with his army, pretending himſelfe with other his vrgent affaires to be called home, and threatning withal, the next ſpring to returne with greater power, and to do great matters. But not long after, great diſcord aroſe betwixt the Sultan and his brother Habramie Alim, inſomuch that the Sultan ſought by diuers meanes to haue taken him out of the way: which Habramie perceiuing, fled to his Nephew Cutlu-Muſes, add ioyning his forces with his, denounced warre vnto the Sultan his brother; who meeting with them not far from PASAR, ouercame them in plain battell, wherein Habramie was taken, and preſently by the commandement of his brother put to death. But Cutlu-Muſes, with his couſin Melech and 6000 Turkes, fled into ARMENIA; and by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, requeſted of the Emperor Conſtantinus Monomachus, to bee receiued into his protection. But the Sultan with his armie following them at the heeles, they for their more ſafetie were glad to flie into ARABIA. The Sultan afterwards turning into IBERIA, did there great harme, ſpoyling the countrey before him: againſt whom the Emperor ſent Michael Acoluthus, a valiant captaine. Of whoſe approch the Sultan hearing, and that he would vndoubtedly ere long giue him battell, (deeming it no great honour vnto him to ouercome the Emperors ſeruant, but an eternall diſhonour to be of him ouerthrowne) retired with his armie backe againe to TAVRIS, leauing behind him one Samuch with 3000 Turkes, to infeſt the frontiers of the Emperors territories: which both he and other the Turks Captaines afterward more eaſily did, for that Monomachus the Emperour hauing prodigally ſpent the treaſures of the Empire, to increaſe his reuenue, had impoſed a tribute vpon the frontier countries of his Empire, woont before to bee free from all exactions; in lieu whereof they were bound to defend the paſſages from all incurſions of the enemie: but now preſſed with new impoſitions, had diſſolued their woonted garriſons, and left an eaſie entrance for the barbarons enemies into the prouinces confining vpon them. Beſides that, the Emperors immediately following, and eſpecially Conſtantinus Ducas, abhorring from wars, and giuen altogether to the hoording vp of treaſure, gaue little countenance, and leſſe maintenance, vnto men of ſeruice, which in ſhort time turned to the great weakening, and in fine to the vtter ruine of the Conſtantinopolitan empire. At the ſame time alſo the gouernment of the Conſtantinopolitan empire, by the death of Conſtantinus Ducas the late Emperour, came to his wife Eudocia with her 3 ſons, Michael, Andronicus, and Conſtantinus, all very yong: whoſe ſex & tender yeres the barbarous nations hauing in contempt, at their pleaſure grieuouſly ſpoyled the prouinces of the empire, namely MESOPOTAMIA, CILICIA, CAPADOCIA, yea and ſometimes as farre as CŒLESIRIA. The report wherof much troubled the Empreſſe, & gaue occaſion for many that loued her not, to ſay, That ſo troubled an Eſtate required the gouernement of ſome worthie man. She held then in priſon one Diogenes Romanus, a man of great renowne and honourably diſcen-ror,if ſhe might by any meanes get the writing out of the Patriarchs hand,wherein her oath for neuer marrying againe was compriſed. For the compaſſing whereof, ſhee entred into a deepe deuice ful of feminine policie with one of her Eunuches,whom ſhe purpoſed to vſe as her pander for the circumuenting of the Patriarch. This craftie Eunuch inſtructed by his Miſtreſſe, D comming to the Patriarch Ioannes Xiliphilines, a man both for his place and integritie of life much honored,told him in great ſecret,that the Empreſſe had ſo far ſet her good liking vpon a yong gentleman,a nephew of his called Barda (then a gallant of the court)as that ſhe could bee content to take him to her husband,and to make him Emperor, if ſhe might by his holineſſe be perſuaded,that ſhe might with ſafe conſcience do it,and by him be diſcharged of the raſh oath ſhe had vnaduiſedly taken,neuer to marrie againe,whereof hee had the keeping. The Patriarch, otherwiſe a contemner of worldly honours,yet mooued with ſo great a preferment of his Nephew,promiſed the eunuch to doe therein whatſoeuer the Empreſſe had deſired, which he accordingly performed. And ſo ſending for the Senators one by one, in whoſe good liking the matter chiefly reſted,he with much grauity propounded vnto them the dangerous eſtate of the E common-weale,with the troubles daily increaſing,and the continual feare of forrein enemies, not to be repreſſed by the weake hand of a woman,or the authoritie of young children,but requiinrg (as hee ſaid) the valiant courage of ſome worthy man. After that, he began to finde great fault with the raſh oath which the Empres had taken a little before the death of her huſband,neuer to marry ; and vtterly condemning the ſame,as contrary to the word of God,& vniuſtly exacted of her, rather to ſatisfie the iealous humor of the Emperor her late husband,than for any good of the common-weale: hee in fine perſuaded them,that the vnlawfull oath might be reuoked,and the Empres ſet at libertie at her pleaſure,by their good liking to make choice of ſuch a man for her husband, as might better vndertake ſo weightie affaires of the empire, more fit for a man, than for ſo tender a Lady and three young children. The greater part of the F Senate thus perſuaded by the Patriarch, and the reſt with gifts and promiſes ouercome by the Empreſſe,the patriarch deliuered vnto her the writing ſhe ſo much deſired,and diſcharged her of her oath: whereupon ſhee forthwith calling vnto her,certaine of her ſecret friends, married Diogenes,whom ſhe cauſed to be proclaimed Emperour. Now thought Eudocia after the manner of a woman,to haue had her husband(whom ſhe euen from the bottom of diſpair had exalthe firſt forced himſelfe, but afterwards (beeing a man of a proud nature, and haughty ſpirit) became weary of ſuch obſeruance, and began by little and little to take euery day more and more vpon him. And for that the imperiall prouinces in the Eaſt, were in ſome part loſt, and the reſt in no ſmall danger, he, as well for the redreſſe thereof, as for his owne honour, and to ſhew himſelfe an Emperour indeed, and not the ſeruant of the Empreſſe, left the court, and paſſed ouer into Asia, although it were with a ſmal army and euill appointed: for why, it was no eaſie matter for him to furniſh out the army with all things neceſſarie, which by the ſloth and ſparing of the late Emperours, had, to the great danger and diſhonor of the empire, bin vtterly neglected.

Neuertheleſſe the Turkiſh Sultan, who at the ſame time with a great power inuaded the prouinces of the empire, hearing of his comming, and that he was a man of great valour, and doubting H what power he might bring with him, retired himſelfe; and diuiding his army, ſent the one part thereof into the South part of Asia, and the other into the North, which ſpoiled all the countrey before them as they went, and ſuddenly ſurpriſing the citie of Neo-Cesaria, ſacked it, and ſo laded with the ſpoile thereof departed. But the Emperor vnderſtanding thereof, and not a little grieued therewith, drawing out certaine bands and companies of the beſt and moſt readieſt ſouldiers in his army, and with them coaſting the countrey to get betwixt the Turks and home, vſed therein ſuch expedition, that he was vpon them before they were aware, and ſo ſuddenly charging them, brought ſuch a feare vpon them, that they betooke themſelues to their heeles, leauing behind them for haſte, their baggage and carriages, with all the priſoners and bootie they had before taken at Neo-Cesaria, and in their late expedition: yet was I there no great number of them ſlain, for that the Chriſtians forewearied with long trauel, were not able far to follow the chace. From thence taking his way vnto Siria, he ſent part of his armie to Melitena, and carried himſelfe from Aleppo, a great booty both of men and cattel.
At which time alſo the citie of Hierapolis was yeelded vnto him, where hee ſhortly after built a ſtrong caſtle. But whilſt he there ſtaied, newes was brought vnto him, that the other part of his army which he had ſent away, was ouerthrowne by the Turks; for the reliefe of whom, he roſe with all haſt and marched towards them: but being in number farre inferiour vnto his enemies, hee was by them as hee lay encamped, incloſed round in ſuch ſort, as that it was thought almoſt impoſſible for him to haue eſcaped. At which time alſo the gouernour of Aleppo traiterouſly reuolted from him, and ioyned his forces with the enemy, making now no K other reckoning, but aſſuredly to haue taken him. But whileſt the Turks thus dreame of nothing but of a moſt glorious victorie, and were in mind diuiding the ſpoile, the Emperour without ſo much as the ſounding of a trumpet, ſuddenly iſſuing out of his trenches, when they leaſt thought he durſt ſo haue done, and reſolutely charging them home, put them to flight, and had of them a notable victorie, had he throughly proſecuted the ſame. After that, hauing taken diuers towns he came to Alexandria, in Cilicia, and there all about in the countrey bilited his army, becauſe of the approach of winter, and ſo returned himſelfe to Constantinople. The next ſpring the Turks, according to their vſuall manner inuading the frontiers of the Empire, did much harme about Neo-Cesaria: whereof the Emperor aduertiſed, went thither with his armie, and quickly repreſſing their furie, tooke his iourney to the riuer Euphrates, where leauing part of his armie with Philaretus for the keeping of thoſe frontiers, he himſelfe retired L Northward into Capadocia. But after his departure, the Turks ſeting vpō Philaretus, put him to flight with his garriſons: and taking the ſpoile of the frontiers, entered into Capadocia, waſting all as they went: and afterwards turning into Cilicia, ſacked Iconium a rich and populous citie. Whereof the Emperour vnderſtanding at Sebastia, made towards them: but hearing by the way that they had ranſackt the citie, and were for feare of his comming already retired, he ſent Chatagurio gouernor of Antioch, with part of his armie to Mopsiphestia, to ſtop the Turks of their paſſage. But they in the plaines of Tharsus were before diſtreſſed by the Armenians, and ſtript of all their rich prey: and hearing farther of the approach of the Emperors power, fled by night and ſo eſcaped: which the Emperor vnderſtanding, and hauing M now well quieted thoſe prouinces, and the yeare farre ſpent, returned againe to Constantinople.
But after his departure, the Turks againe inuading the frontier prouinces, he ſent Manuel Comnenus, a valiant young man, Generall againſt them; who ſo preuailed, that the Emperor enuiyng at his honor, tooke from him a great part of his armie, and ſent him with a ſmall

A power into SIRIA. But as hee was vpon the way,he was by the Turkes entrapped neere vnto SEBASTIA, and there taken, moſt part of his armie being at the ſame time ouerthrowne and ſlaine: with which loſſe,the Emperour troubled,made great preparation to goe himſelfe in perſon againſt his enemies; who encouraged with the former victorie, ceaſed not to infeſt his territories. In the mean time by great fortune came Mannel Comnenus home,together with the Turke that tooke him; who being fallen into the diſpleaſure of the Sultan, fled vnto the Emperor with his priſoner, of whom he was honorably entertained. All things now in a readines, for ſo great an expedition as the Emperor had in perſon purpoſed,he ſet forward: and after long trauell hauing paſſed CESAREA,he incamped at a place called CRYAPEGA:where for ſeuere execution done vpon certaine mutinous ſouldiers, one of the legions of his armie B roſe in mutinie againſt him: whom (for all that) he quickly pacified with the terror of the reſt of his army, which he threatned to turne vpon them if they proceeded to forget their dutie.
After that,remouing to THEODOSOPOLIS,he diuided his army,and ſent Ruſelius one of his beſt captains,with one part thereof againſt Chliat, and another part he ſent to beſiege MANTZICIERTS, retaining with himſelfe the reſt, being of no ſtrength. The Turkes in MANTZICIERTS finding themſelues not able long to hold out, fel to compoſition,and yeelded the citie.
But ſhortly after,the ſouldiers left there in garriſon for the keeping thereof,going out to ſeeke for forrage, were by the Turks ſuddenly oppreſſed: which the Emperour vnderſtanding, ſent thither one Nicephorus Bryennius,with certaine companies to relieue the citie; who encountring with the Turks, and finding himſelfe too weake,ſent vnto the Emperor for aid: C who not knowing the ſtrength of the enemies, blamed him of cowardiſe, yet ſent vnto him Nicephorus Baſilacius with part of his armie; who ioining his forces with Briennius,and giuing the Turkes battell,put them to flight. But following too faſt vpon them vnto their trenches, and Bryennius making no great haſt after,he had his horſe ſlain vnder him,and ſo on foot heauily laden with armour,and not able to ſhift for himſelfe, was there taken and brought to the Sultan: who honourably entreated him,and oftentimes queſtioning with him concerning the Emperour,and ſhewing him his owne power,examined him alſo of the Emperours.

Tangrolipix was now dead, and the Sultan now in field againſt the Emperour,was Axan his ſon,a man of great wiſedom & diſcretion; who conſidering the doubtful euent of battel,ſent embaſſadors vnto the Emperor to intreat with him of peace. But hee(perſuaded by ſome of D his captains,that this motion made by the Sultan for peace,proceeded but of a meere feare and diſtruſt he had in his owne power,or els to gaine time vntill ſome greater ſtrength came) had ſmall regard of the embaſſadors or their meſſage,but proudly willed them to tel their maſter, That if he were deſirous of peace,he ſhould get him farther off,and leaue the place wherin he lay encamped,for him to lodge in: and ſo without other anſwer,comanded them away. Now had the Emperor(as is before ſaid)ſent away part of his army by Ruſelius againſt Chliat,whom he ſent now for in haſt again:but he hearing of the approach of the Sultan,by the perſuaſion of Tarchomiates, one of his captaines, was retired for his more ſafetie backe into the Romane frontiers,leauing the Emperour deſtitute of his helpe. At which time alſo a companie of the Scythians which ſerued in the Emperours campe, reuolted vnto the Turkes; not without E ſome ſuſpition,that the reſt of their fellows which remained,would ere long do the like; neuertheleſſe the Emperor preſuming of ſuch ſtrength as he had, or carried headlong with his owne fortune,reſolued to giue the Turks battell,and therfore putting his men in order,ſet vpon them. Who ſomewhat troubled with the Emperors ſo ſudden a reſolution,as being yet in ſom hope of peace,yet hauing put themſelues in order of battel,receiued the enemies charge; ſtill giuing a little ground,as men not greatly deſirous either to fight or to flie. This fight continuing long,and the day now declining,the Emperour doubting leaſt the Sultan ſhould ſend part of his army to aſſault his campe (from which he was now drawne ſomewhat far,and had left the ſame but weakly manned) cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, & ſo began orderly to retire himſelfe with them that were about him: which others a far off in the battell beholding, and camp as faſt as he could:after whom al the reſt moſt diſorderly followed:which the emperor be holding,and therewith not a little troubled,made a ſtand,labouring in vaine to haue ſtaid the reſt: for now the Turks incouraged with the ſudden flight of the Chriſtians,began hardly to purſue them,as men already ouerthrown by the hand of God; whom for al that the emperor with ſuch as yet ſtood with him,for a ſpace notably reſiſted. But being forſaken by the greater part of his army,& oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies,being wounded himſelfe,and his horſe ſlain vnder him,he was with taken al imbrued his own bloud,& the bloud of his enemies,of whom he had wounded and ſlain many. The Sultan aduertiſed of his taking, at the firſt beleeued it not,ſuppoſing it rather to haue been ſome other great man: vntill that he was both by them, whom he had but a little before ſent embaſſadour vnto him, and by Baſilacius one of his captaines then priſoner with him, aſſured that it was vndoubtedly hee, which Baſilacius brought before him to ſee if he knew him,fel downe proſtrate at his feet, as before his dread Lord and Soueraigne. The Emperor brought before the Sultan, and humbling himſelfe in ſuch ſort as beſt beſeemed his heauie fortune,the Sultan preſently took him vp,and thus cheerfully ſpoke vnto him: Grieue not noble Emperor (ſaid he)at thy miſhap for ſuch is the chance of war,ouerwhelming ſomtimes one ſomtimes another: neither feare thou any harme,for I will vſe thee not as my priſoner,but as an Emperor: which he accordingly did,preſently appointing him a princely pauillion,with all things anſwerable to his eſtate, ſetting him oftentimes at his owne boord,and for his ſake enlarging ſuch priſoners as he required. And after he had thus for certain daies honorably vſed him,and diſcourſed with him of many things,he concluded a perpetuall peace with him, vpon promiſe of a marriage to be made betwixt their children,and ſo with a ſafe conuoy ſent him away with greater honor than was at an enemies hand to haue bin expected. The Emperour in Turkiſh attire, which the Sultan had beſtowed vpon him,comming to THEODOSOPOLIS,there ſtaid the curing of his wounds,& afterwards accompanied with the Sultans embaſſadors,ſet forward toward CONSTANTINOPLE. But all was now there changed: for vpon the report of his captiuity, Iohn the Caſar with Pſellus one of the chiefe Senators,and others of the ſame faction,which alwaies enuied at the honour of Diogenes,preſently took the imperiall gouernment from Endocia the Empreſſe, and thruſting her into a monaſterie which ſhe had built neere to PROPONTIS, ſet vp Michael Ducas her eldeſt ſon,Emperour,in ſtead of Diogenes: whoſe ſimplicity, Caſar his vncle abuſing with the reſt,did now what they liſt. And hearing that Diogenes was now (contrary to their expectation)ſet at libertie by the Sultan,and comming towards the emperiall city,ſent out letters euery way in the new Emperors name,vnto all the gouernours of the prouinces whereby he was to paſſe,not to receiue him as Emperour,or to do him any honor: which Diogenes vnderſtanding,ſtaid at the caſtle of DOCIA,whither ſome of his friends with ſuch power as they were able to make,reſorted vnto him. Againſt whom, Caſar with the contrary faction firſt ſent his ſon Conſtantine,and after that Andronicus his eldeſt ſonne,both Diogenes his mortall enemies, with a great army: by whom Diogenes,with his friends and followers,were ouerthrowne and diſcomfited. Diogines himſelfe flying to the citie of ADANA, was there hardly beſieged by Andronicus, and in the end glad to yeeld himſelfe,vpon condition, that hee ſhould reſigne the empire, and ſo for euer after to lead a priuate life. For whoſe ſafetie,certaine of the chiefe of the clergie ſent of purpoſe from Michael the Emperor,gaue their faith: ſo Diogenes all attired in black,yeelded himſelfe to Andronicus; by whom he was brought to COTAI,then the metropoliticall citie of PPHRIGIA,there to expect what further order ſhould be taken for him from the court: during which time he fell ſicke, being (as many ſuppoſed) ſecretly poiſoned. But whilſt he there lay languiſhing,an heauier doome came from the young Emperour,That he ſhould haue his eies put out: which was forthwith in moſt cruell manner done; the clergie men that had before for his ſafetie gaged their faith, crying out in vaine againſt ſo horrible a crueltie. Thus depriued of his ſight,he was conueyed into the Iſland of PROTA, where his eies for lack of looking to,putrifying,and worms breeding in them,with ſuch an odious ſmel as that no man could abide to come nigh him,he in ſhort time after died,when he had raigned three yeares, eight monethes. All which miſerie was thought to haue happened vnto him through the malice of Caſar,without the knowledge of the youug Emperour his nephew.

Axan hearing of the miſerable end of the late Emperor Diogines,was therwith much grieued and the more,for that the league which he had to his good content ſo lately made with him, A was thereby come to nought: wherfore in reuenge thereof, he with great power inuaded the imperiall prouinces, not for ſpoile & booty only, as in former time, but now to conquer and to hold the ſame. Againſt whom, Michael the Emperor ſent Iſaac Comnenus his Lieutenant, with a great army: who meeting with the Turks, & ioyning battell, was by them ouerthrown with all his armie, and taken priſoner, and glad afterwards for a great ſumme of mony to redeeme himſelfe. After which ouerthrow, the Emperor ſent his vncle Cæſar with another army againſt them, who was by Ruſelius, that had before reuolted from the Emperour, ouerthrowne at the riuer SANGARIVS, and taken priſoner; whom he for all that, ſhortly after ſet at libertie againe, and ioyning with him againſt the Turks, were both together by them diſcomfited and taken priſoners, but afterwards redeemed; Cæſar by the Emperour, and Ruſelius B by his wife. This Ruſelius was a notable traitour, who ioyning with the Turks, did what hee liſt in the prouinces of the empire in the leſſer ASIA: for the repreſſing of whom, the Emperor ſent Alexius Comnenus, a young man, but verie politick and couragious; who ſecretly practiſing with the Turks that were great with Ruſelius, had him at laſt by them for a ſum of money betraied into his power: who forthwith ſent him to CONSTANTINOPLE to the Emperor, by whom he was impriſoned, but afterward ſet at libertie and employed againſt Bryennius and his brother, then vp in rebellion againſt the Emperour.

But to come neerer to the Turkiſh affaires. Cutlu-Muſes, who with his couſin Melech and others, were for feare of Tangrolipix their couſin fled into ARABIA, as is before declared, now in the beginning of the raigne of Axan, returned: and as the enuious competitors of his king- C dom, hauing raiſed a great power of their friends and partakers, were now ready to haue tried the matter with him by plaine battell. Againſt whom alſo, the Sultan on the other ſide had brought into the field his whole forces, and was now likewiſe ready to haue incountred them neere vnto the city of ERES. But whilſt the Turks thus diuided, ſtood ready to deſtroy themſelues, the Caliph of BABILON (from whom though the Turks had taken all temporal ſoueraigntie, yet in matters of religion ſtill held him in great reuerence and eſteem, as their chiefe Biſhop, and the ſucceſſor of their great Prophet) conſidering that nothing could be more dangerous to his ſect and religion, than that ciuil diſcention, the late confuſion and vtter ruine of the Saraſin empire, and authority of the Caliphs; and fearing the like effect in theſe new Saraſins, now the chiefe ſtay of the Mahometan ſuperſtition: ſetting aſide al pontifical formality, D whereby he was bound not to go out of his own houſe, came with all ſpeed, euen as the armies were now ready to ioyn battell, and thruſting himſelfe into the middeſt betwixt them, what with the reuerence of his perſon, what with his effectual perſuaſion, wrought ſo much, and preuailed ſo far with both parties, that they were content to lay down their weapons, and to ſtand to his order, and iudgment: which was, That Axan the Sultan ſhould ſtil inioy his kingdom and territories, whole and entire vnto himſelfe as he did: and that Cutlu-Muſes and his ſons, aided by him, and ſo inuading the prouinces of the Conſtantinopolitan empire, ſhould thereof ſubdue ſo much as they could vnto themſelues, and to be thereof accounted the only Lords and gouernors: which order as it was vnto the Turks, and for the maintenance of the Mahometan ſuperſtition, very wholſome and commodious, ſo was it vnto the Chriſtian com- E monweale and religion moſt dangerous and hurtful, as in proceſſe of time by proofe it appeared. For by this mean, in ſhort time after, Cutlu-Muſes with his couſins and ſons ſubdued all MEDIA, with a great part of ARMENIA, CAPADOCIA, PONTVS, and BYTHINIA, and ſo a great part of the leſſer ASIA. By the aid of this Cutlu-Muſes, and the fauor of the ſoldiers, Nicephorus Botoniates aſpiring vnto the empire of CONSTANTINOPLE, diſplaced his maſter the Emperor, Michael Ducas, after he had raigned ſix years and ſix moneths, and in the habit of a Monke thruſt him into an Abbey: which vſurper by the iuſt iudgement of God, was at length requited euen with the ſame meaſure, & in like manner ſerued by Comnenus; who thruſting him out, ſucceeded himſelfe in the empire. Much it was that this Cutlu-Muſes, with his ſons and kinſmen did for the inlarging of the Turkiſh empire, by the helpe of the great F Perſian Sultan: whoſe forces, together with their own, in diuers countries cõducted by theſe worthie leaders his nigh kinſmen, & doing great matters, gaue occaſion for themſelues to be accounted Sultans, though indeed they were none, neither their names ſuch as are by ſom antient writers, and others of later time alſo reported; but vnto the Turks themſelues by thoſe names, either for Sultans, vnknown. Out of theſe great cõmanders, all born of the Selzuccian Cutlu-Muſes with his ſonne and kinſmen take vp armes againſt Axan the Sultan.

A moſt hurtfull order for the Chriſtian common weale.

The ground of the errour of diuers writers about the ſucceſſors of Tangrolipix, otherwiſe of them called Sadocb family, hath Aithonus, and others following his report, deriued their Dogriſta, Aſpaſalemus, Meleclas, and Belchiaroc, whom they ſuppoſe to haue orderly ſucceeded Zadoc, otherwiſe called Tangrolipix, in the Turkiſh empire, and to haue done great matters: whereas both by the report of the Turkes themſelues, & the relation of the Greeks, it appears plainly, Axan (more truly called Ax-han, that is to ſay, the White king) to haue beene the ſon of Tangrolipix, and to haue ſucceeded him in the empire: and that by him the emperor Diogenes was taken, and not by Aſpaſalemus as they vainely imagine. As for Aſpaſalemus, whom the Turks by that name know not either any thing of his doings, it ſeemeth to haue beene a name corrupted of Aſpam Sallarius, the brother of Tangrolipix and Habrami, and not his ſonnes ſon as they would haue it. In like manner Meleclas alſo ſeemeth to haue been forged of Melech the ſon of Habrami, Tangrolipix his brother, and not of Aſpaſalemus, as ſome without any good ground report. Whom they finding to haue beene all great men in the Selzuccian family, with ſome others alſo, haue both corrupted their names, and giuen vnto them an imaginarie ſoueraigntie and ſucceſſion in the Turks firſt empire, ſuch as beſide that the Turks themſelues acknowledge not, is eaſily to be refelled out of the hiſtories of the Greeks, who had with them ſtill much to do. Wherefore leauing thoſe ſuppoſed princes of the Turks, with their imaginarie ſucceſſion, and doings, vnto the authors thereof, following more certainties, to returne again to the courſe of our hiſtorie. Axan the Sultan at the ſame time that he had by the mediation of the Chaliph (or not long after) fallen to agreement with his couſin Cutlu-Muſes; to increaſe the honour of his nation and the bounds of his empire, gaue vnto Ducat and Melech, two of his nigh kinſmen, the gouernement of DAMASCO and ALEPPO, with that part of SIRIA which ioyneth vnto them, of purpoſe that way to incroch vpon the Ægyptian Chaliph, who then had vnder his iuriſdiction, all, as far as LAODICIA in SIRIA; yet not with ſo large pripriuiledge as had Cutlu-Muſes, vnto whom and his poſteritie he had yeelded the abſolute honour of a Sultan or King, ouer ſuch conntries and prouinces as they ſhould win from the Chriſtians: but vnto theſe others his kiuſmen, he gaue the gouerment of the aforeſaid cities of DAMASCO and ALEPPO, in the frontiers of his dominion in SIRIA, conditionally that that they ſhould ſtill remaine his vaſſals, and hold of him as of their ſoueraigne, whatſoeuer they had, who neuertheleſſe in ſhort time mightily preuailed vpon the Egyptian, ſtil increaſing the Turkiſh territorie with the loſſe of the Saraſins, whoſe name together with their empire, was now by the Turks almoſt quite driuen out of ASIA.

But theſe proud branches of the Turkiſh Empire, thus ouerſpreading the leſſer ASIA, with the greateſt part of SIRIA, were in ſhort time after by the mercie of God, and the valour of the moſt Chriſtian and moſt religious princes of the Weſt, cut ſhorter, and brought againe into ſome better order. The full diſcourſe whereof, worthy eternall memorie, by others inrolled in the antient records of fame, I purpoſe not at large to follow, but in breif to touch, for the orderly continuation of the preſent hiſtorie, haſting to the doings of this victorious nation of latter times, wherein we are to make a longer ſtay, as more pertinent vnto the dangerous eſtate of the preſent time.

Peter a French Hermit goeth on pilgrimage to Ieruſalem.

It fortuned that whileſt Cutlu-Muſes and his ſons, ſupported by the Sultan Axan their kinſman, thus mightily preuailed againſt the Chriſtians in the leſſer ASIA on the one ſide, and Melech with his couſin againſt the Egiptian Caliph in SIRIA on the other: that one Peter a French Hermite mooued with a deuout zeale, according to the manner of that time, went to viſit the ſepulchre of our Sauior, with the other holy places at IERVSALEM: who comming into SIRIA, thē for the moſt part poſſeſſed by the Turks, & Saraſins, diligently noted by the way as he trauelled, the maners & faſhions of theſe barbarous nations, their gouernmēt, their cities, their power and ſtrength; but aboue all, the grieuous miſeries of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians, that there liued in moſt miſerable thraldom among them, without hope of releaſ: al which, he in the habit of a poore pilgrim, at liberty ſafely viewed, in the midſt of theſe miſcreants, being withall a little low hard fauoured fellow, & therefore in ſhew more to be contemnd than feared: yet vnder ſuch ſimple & homly feature lay vnregarded a moſt ſubtil ſharp & pearching wit, fraught with diſcretion and ſound iudgment, ſtil applying to ſom good vſe what he had in his long & painful trauel moſt curiouſly obſerued. He commeth to IERVSALEM, & performing his deuotions there, ſaw the grieuous miſery of the poore deuout Chriſtians, ſo greatly & heauy, as that greater or more intollerable could none be: wherwith not

A little grieued, he entred into a deepe diſcourſe thereof with Simon the Patriarke and Abbot of the monaſterie of the Chriſtians (there before built by certaine Italian Merchants) and with the maſter of the Hoſpitalers, by whom he was fully informed thereof, as of whatſoeuer elſe he required. After much graue conference, it was at length agreed vpon amongſt them, that the Patriarke and the grand Maſter, ſhould in their own, and the names of the other oppreſſed Chriſtians, write their letters vnto the Pope & the other Chriſtian Princes, concerning their miſeries; & to craue their aid for the recouerie of thoſe holy places out of the hands of thoſe cruell Infidels: of which letters the deuout Hermit promiſed himſelf to be the truſtie carrier, and of their petitions the moſt carefull ſoliciter. Whereupon the Patriarke and grand Maſter, in the name of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians wrot their letters vnto this effect:

B We the citiſens of the holy Citie, and countreymen of Chriſt Ieſus; dayly ſuffer thoſe things which Chriſt our King ſuffered but once, in the laſt dayes of his mortalitie. Wee are dayly buffeted, ſcourged, and pierced: euery day ſame of vs are brained, beheaded, or crucified. We would flie from citie to citie, vnto the remoteſt parts of the earth, and remooue out of the middle of that land where Chriſt our Sauior wrought our redemption, to lead a poore exiled and vagrant life; were it not impietie to leaue the Land (ſacred with the birth, doctrine, death, reſurrection, and aſcenſion of our Sauiour) without inhabitants and Prieſts; and that there ſhould firſt lacke ſuch as would indure death and martyrdome, than ſuch as would inflict the ſame; and that there ſhould not be which would willingly die for Chriſt, as in battell, ſo long as there were any that would fight againſt them. Theſe things truly wee moſt miſerably ſuffer: C yet was there a time when as our anceſtors feared no ſuch thing, either to themſelues or their poſteritie. And now perhaps the Chriſtian kingdomes of the Weſt liue likewiſe without the leaſt ſuſpicion of feare: but let them be moued by our example & teſtimony. The ſtrength of the Turks is daily increaſed, & ours diminiſhed: The continuall gaining of new kingdomes giueth them courage: They haue alreadie deuoured the whole world, in hope. The forces of the Turks are fiercer and ſtronger than the forces of the Saraſins, their policies deeper, their attempts more deſperat, their endeauors greater, and their ſucceſſe fortunater. Yet haue the Saraſins attempted both Romes: they haue beſieged Conſtantinople, and haue waſted not onely the ſea coaſts of Italie, but euen the heart of the land alſo. Then why ſhould the kingdomes of the Weſt preſume themſelues to ſtand in ſafetie and out of all perill, when as the chiefe fortreſſes of the world haue beene ſo indangered? What may the reſt of Chriſtendome promiſe vnto it ſelfe, ſeeing that Ieruſalem (the ſeat and ſpectacle of the Chriſtian Religion) hath beene beſieged, taken, ſacked, raſed, and D triumphed vpon? Seeing that of the Chriſtian profeſſion remaine but the poore and weake reliques, in compariſon of the antient whole entire bodie? This land, which is dayly beſprinkled with our bloud, yea the bloud it ſelfe crieth out for reuenge. And we your moſt humble ſuppliants, proſtrate at your feet, call vpon the helpe, aid, mercie, faith, and religion, of you moſt bleſſed Father, of the Kings, Princes, and Potentates; Chriſtians not in name and profeſſion onely, but in heart, ſoule, and ſpirit. Before the tempeſt thunder, before the lightning fall vpon you, auert from you and your children the ſtorme hanging ouer your heads: defend vs your poore ſuppliants, deliuer your religion from moſt wicked and accurſed ſlauerie. You ſhall in ſo doing deſerue immortall fame, and God ſhall requite your ſo great valour in this world with terreſtriall kingdomes, and in the world to come with eternall bliſſe, whoſe ſacred inheritance you ſhall haue defended from the rage of hell.

The Letters of Simon Patriarke of Ieruſalem, and of the graund Maſter of the Hoſpitalers, vnto the Pope and other Chriſtian Princes, in the behalfe of the oppreſſed Chriſtians in Ieruſalem.

Rome and Conſtantinople, which was alſo called Noua Roma, or new Rome.

E With theſe letters, and plentie of other ſecret inſtructions, the deuout hermit returning into Italie, and comming to Rome, deliuered his letters vnto Vrban the ſecond of that name, then Pope, with a ful diſcourſe of the miſeries of the Chriſtians vnder the Turkiſh thraldom, which he had ſeene at Ieruſalem and other places as he trauelled; requeſting his holy care for the redreſſe thereof: with whom he ſo preuailed, that ſhortly after, hee calling a Councell at Claremont in France, among other things, propounded the miſerie of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians at Ieruſalem, as an eſpeciall matter to be conſidered of. And hauing cauſed the aforeſaid letters, directed vnto him and the other Chriſtian Princes, to be openly read in the F Councell, whereunto three hundred and ten Biſhops were then out of diuers parts of Chriſtendome aſſembled, with the Embaſſadors of all countries, much moued the whole aſſembly to compaſſion: at which time alſo the hermit (whoſe flowing eloquence fully counteruailed what wanted in his feature, ſtanding vp in the midſt of the Councell, deliuered his meſſage in the name of the afflicted Chriſtians, with their heauie groanings and teares: which as they could not be in letters expreſſed, ſo were they not hardly by the religious hermit (as by him G who hauing but lately ſeene both the miſerie of the men, and deſolation of the places, and at the heart touched with the griefe thereof) ſo liuely repreſented, as that it mooued the whole aſſemblie with the like ſimpathie of heauineſſe and griefe. Which the Pope perceiuing, tooke thereupon occaſion to enter into a large diſcourſe concerning that matter, with many effectuall reaſons perſuading the Fathers and Princes there preſent, of the neceſſitie of ſo religious a Warre to be taken in hand, for the deliuerance of their oppreſſed brethren out of the thraldome of the Infidells; and now as well with their preſent Decree, as afterwards at their returne home into their Countreys, by all meanes to further the ſame. Which notable perſuaſion, with the heauie complaint of the Hermit, and the equitie of the Cauſe, ſo much mooued the whole Councel, and the reſt there preſent, that they all as men inſpired with one H Spirit, declared their conſent by their often crying out, Deus vult, Deus vult, God willeth it, God willeth it: which words ſo then vttered by way of applauſe, were in the great and moſt ſacred expedition following, much vſed of the deuout Chriſtians, as the fortunate ſignall of their cheerefull forwardneſſe, euen in their moſt dangerous enterpriſes. Strange it were to tell, and hardly to be beleeued (but that the antient Hiſtories beare witneſſe of the like) how farre in one dayes ſpace the report of this religious decreed warre was by flying Fame diſperſed.

An expedition agreed vpon by the Councel, for the relief of the Chriſtians oppreſſed in the Holy land.

The Councell diſſolued, and the reuerend Fathers returning euerie man home into his owne countrey, it pleaſed God by their effectuall perſuaſions ſo to worke with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, and people in generall, that in all countries and Prouinces in Chriſtendom, I were ſhortly to be ſeene men of all ſorts in great number, with red Croſſes on their breſts (the cogniſance of that ſacred expedition) readie of themſelues to ſpend both life and goods for the defence of the Chriſtian Religion, and recouerie of the Holy Land. The number of whom is of diuers diuerſly reported; but of moſt ſuppoſed to haue been three hundred thouſand fighting men: Of whom the chiefe Commanders were, Godfrey Duke of Lorrain, with his two brethren, Euſtace and Baldwin, all of the honourable Houſe of Buillon; Hugh ſyrnamed the Great, brother to Philip then the French King; Raymond and Robert Earles of Flanders; Robert Duke of Normandie, William the Conquerors ſonne; Stephan de Valoys Earle of Chartiers; Ademar Biſhop of Podie, the Popes Legat; and Peter the Hermit, not to be numbred amongſt the leaſt, as chiefe author of this moſt famous expedition: vnto whome manie K other honourable Princes ioyned themſelues, as partakers of their trauels, though not with like charge.

The chiefe commanders of the Chriſtians in their expedition into the Holy Land.

The firſt that ſet forward in this expedition, was one Gualter Senſauier a noble gentleman, with a great band of men: not long after whom followed Peter the Hermit, with fortie thouſand moe; who both trauelling thorow Germanie, Hungaria, and Bulgaria, were glad oftentimes, eſpecially in the further part of Hungarie and Bulgaria, to open themſelues a way with the ſword; and ſo with much labour, and no leſſe loſſe, came at length to Conſtantinople: where they were not greatly welcome vnto the Emperour Alexius Comnenus; who guiltie vnto himſelfe of the vnlawfull meanes whereby he had extorted the Empire from Nicephorus his predeceſſour, had that expedition of the Chriſtians into the Eaſt, in diſtruſt, as purpoſed againſt himſelfe: vntill that fully reſolued to the contrarie, by the Hermit and others; L and that a farre greater power was comming after, for the inuaſion of the Turkes, and recouerie of the Holy Land; he was content to relieue them now wearie of their long trauell: and afterward to make roome for them that were to come, ſhipped them ouer the ſtrait of Boſphorus into Aſia; who marching forward into Bithynia, encamped their Armie in the countrey not farre from the Citie of Nice. In the meane time Godfrey with his brethren, and diuers other Princes that had ioyned themſelues vnto him, with the Germaines and Loranois, and the greateſt part of the Armie, followed the ſame way that the Hermit had taken before him. At which time alſo Hugh the French Kings brother, with the Legate, the two Roberts (the one Duke of Normandie, and the other Earle of Flanders) and the reſt of the French Commaunders, paſſing ouer the Mountaines into Italie, came to Rome, with a wonderfull M great Armie: where taking their leaue of the Pope, becauſe they would be leſſe troubleſome vnto the Cities and Countreys whereby they were to paſſe, they diuided their great Armie into three parts; whereof the one part went to Bruduſium, and the other to Bary, and the third

A third to Hydruntum, vnto whom alſo Bohemund one of the great Princes of Apulia, joyned himſelfe with twelue thouſand good ſouldiers that followed him. From theſe three ports the Chriſtian armie departing, and croſſing the Adriaticke, arriued in ſafetie at Dirrachium, and nigh thereabout vpon the coaſt of Dalmatia: from whence they trauelled by land thorow Macedonia, to Conſtantinople; were they met with the Duke Godfrey and the reſt of the Armie: whom alſo at the firſt, Alexius the Emperor is reported to haue but coldly entertained, as jealous of his owne eſtate; vntill that better perſuaded of their deſignements and good meaning towards him, confirmed by many rich Preſents ſent vnto him by theſe ſtrange Princes, he joyned with them in league: wherein it was agreed, That the Emperor during the time of this expedition ſhould furniſh them with new ſupplies of men, armour, victuals, and whatſoeuer elſe they ſhould want: in regard whereof, the Princes on the other ſide promiſed to reſtore B againe vnto the empire, what prouinces, countries, or cities they ſhould happily gain out of the hands of the Turks and Saraſins, the Citie of Ieruſalem onely excepted: which agreement was afterward on the ſuſpicious Emperors part but ſlenderly performed. Neuertheleſſe this league ſo made, hee granted them paſſage, and ſo tranſported them ouer the ſtrait into Aſia: only Bohemund, for an old grudge betwixt the Emperour Alexius and his father, would not come to Conſtantinople, but marching with his armie thorow the vpper Myſia and Thracia, came ſooner than any man had thought, vnto the ſtrait of Helleſpontus, and ſo paſſed.

Godfrey duke of Buillon, and the other Christian Princes, meete together at Cōſtantinople.

Now had Gualter, and the Hermit Peter, with their armie, lien two moneths in the countrey about Nice, expecting the comming of the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes: for why, they C thought it not good before their comming to attempt any thing againſt the enemie, whome they knew to lie not farre off verie ſtrong. But the common ſouldiers wearie of ſo long lying, and nought doing, and pinched with ſome wants; and withall diſliking of Gualter their chiefe Commander, and the Hermit Peter, (of whoſe integritie and holineſſe they had a greater opinion, than of his proweſſe and direction) roſe vp in mutinie, and diſplacing Gualter, made choice of one Raymund a valiant Germaine Captaine, for their Generall: by whoſe conduct they tooke Exorgum, a towne of purpoſe forſaken of the Turks. For they long before vnderſtanding what a tempeſt of warre was growing vpon them out of Europe, ſought by all meanes to cut off theſe that were alreadie come ouer, as the forerunners of a greater Armie following; and therefore had left them this Towne, as a bait to traine them out of their D Trenches. And after that the Chriſtians were thus poſſeſſed of the Towne, hauing layd certaine ſtrong ambuſhes, they draue out certaine heards of cattell the more to allure them: all which certaine companies of the Chriſtians brought in without any loſſe, the Turks ſtil winking thereat. With which bootie the Chriſtians encouraged, went out three thouſand of them to take in a little towne not farre off; who were by the Turks cut off and ſlaine euerie mothers ſonne, as they were about to haue diuided the ſpoyle. Which ouerthrow reported into the towne, diſcouraged euen the chiefe commanders of the armie, ſo that they reſolued no more to trie the fortune of the field, before the comming of their friends. Neuertheleſſe the common ſoldiers condemning them of cowardiſe, choſe them a new Generall, one Godfrey Burel, whom they now requeſted not, but enforced to go out to reuenge the death of their fellows.
E Which their raſhneſſe not long after turned to their owne deſtruction: for ten thouſand of them going out of Exorgum, to forrage the countrey, were by the Turkes intrapped, and almoſt all ſlaine, except ſome few, which by ſpeedie flight eſcaped. The Turkes proſecuting their victorie, layd hard ſiege to them in the towne alſo, vntill they had partly with famine, and partly with the ſword conſumed the moſt part of them. The Hermit with the poore remainder of his armie tooke his refuge to Cinite, a towne not farre off, before abandoned by the Turks; where with much adoo he defended himſelfe vntil the comming of Duke Godfrey and the reſt of the Princes.

Cutlu-Muſes the Turke was now dead, hauing left vnto his ſon Sultan Solyman many large countries and prouinces, altogether gained from the Chriſtians in Aſia, whom he held in great F ſubiection and thraldome. This warrelike Prince hauing diſcomfited and almoſt brought to nought the hermits forces, was no leſſe careful for the withſtanding of the great army following: which now being come into Bithynia, & lying before Nicomedia, remouing thence, laid ſiege to the city of Nice, called in antient time Antigonia, of Antigonus, the ſon of Philip that built it; and afterwards Nicea, of Nicea the wife of King Lyſimachus. In this city dwelt many deuout Greeks, Chriſtians; but in ſuch thraldome vnto the Turks, that they could not do any G thing for the deliuerie of themſelues. This ſiege indured longer than the Chriſtian Princes had at the firſt ſuppoſed: who although they to the vttermoſt of their power forced the citie on three ſides, yet was it ſtill notably defended, new ſupplies ſtil comming from the Turks by the lake of Aſcanius ioyning vpon the other ſide of the Citie. But after that the Chriſtians, poſſeſſed of the lake, began on that ſide alſo to lay hardly vnto the citie, the Turkes diſcouraged, and ſeeing themſelues beſet round with their enemies, yeelded vp the citie the fift of Iulie, in the yeare 1097, after it had been fiftie days beſieged. But whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege, the Turks aſſailed that quarter of the campe where the Legat lay; by whom they were notably repulſed, and with great loſſe inforced to retyre vnto the mountains. In this Citie, amongſt the reſt of the Turks, was taken Solymans wife, with two of her children, whome H the Princes ſent priſoners to Conſtantinople. This city ſo woon, was according to the agreement before made, reſtored vnto Alexius the Emperour, whoſe fleet had in that ſiege done good ſeruice, by taking the lake from the Turks.

A cruell battell fought betwixt the Turkes and the Chriſtians.

The city of Nice thus won, the Chriſtian Princes remoouing thence with their armie, and marching thorow the country, came the fourth day after vnto a riuer which watred many rich paſtures: where as they were about to haue incamped, for the commodiouſneſſe of the place, and refreſhing of the armie, ſuddenly news was brought into the quarter where Bohemund lay, now buſie in caſting vp his trenches, That the Turkes with a great armie were readie euen at hand to charge him. For Solyman hauing raiſed a great power of his owne, and aided by the Sultan of Perſia his kinſman, was now come with an armie of 60000 ſtrong to giue the Chriſtians I battell: of whoſe approch Bohemund aduertiſed, left the fortifying of his trenches, and putting his ſoldiers in array, ſet forward to meet him; ſending word to the reſt of the Princes that lay a far off, to be readie as occaſion ſhould require, to relieue him. Theſe two armies conducted by their moſt reſolute chieftaines, meeting together, ioyned a moſt fierce and terrible battel, where in a ſhort ſpace the Turks lay ſlaine vpon heaps, in ſuch ſort that they ſerued the Chriſtians in ſtead of bulwarks. But whileſt Bohemund thus preuaileth in the battel, certain of the Turks horſemen wheeling about, brake into Bohemunds camp (not as then altogether fortified, & but ſlenderly manned) where among the women, and other weake perſons there left, they raiſed a great tumult & outcry, to the great appaling of them that were fighting in the battel: which Bohemund perceiuing, withdrew himſelfe with certain companies vnto the campe, K from whence he with great ſlaughter repulſed the enemie. But returning again into the battel, he found there a great alteration: for his ſoldiers whom before he had left as it were in poſſeſſion of a moſt glorious victorie, were now ſo hardly laid vnto by the Turks, as that they were readie to haue turned their backes and fled. Neuertheleſſe by his comming in, the battel was notably reſtored, and again made doubtful: when the enemie perceiuing how much the aſſaulting of the campe had troubled the Chriſtians in battell, ſent out certain troupes of horſemen again to aſſault the ſame; and had not failed vndoubtedly to haue taken it, being as aforeſaid not yet fortified, had not Hugh the French Kings brother come in good time to the reſcue: who comming in with 30000 horſemen, after hee had relieued the campe, entring directly into the battell, was notably incountred by a ſquadron of freſh ſoldiers of the Turks, by them L of purpoſe reſerued for ſuch euent. There began a battell more terrible than the firſt, with moſt doubtfull victorie: but at the length the Turks wearie of the long and cruell fight, and ſeeing moſt of their fellows ſlaine, began by little and little to giue ground, and ſo retyred into the mountains, which were not far off. In this battell, which continued a great part of the day, were ſlaine of the Turks 40000, and of the Chriſtians about 2000. The next morning Bohemund, with the French Kings brother, came againe into the field, in ſuch order as if they ſhould preſently haue giuen or receiued battell: where after they had ſtayd a great while, and ſaw no enemie to appeare, they fel to the honeſt burial of their dead; which were eaſily known from the Turks, by the red croſſes vpon their garments, the cogniſance of their ſacred warrefare.

Solyman flying with the remainder of his army, notably diſſembled his loſſe, giuing it out M that he had got the victorie: yet by the way as he went he burnt vp the countrey villages, and deſtroied or carried away whatſoeuer elſe he thought might ſtand the Chriſtians in any ſtead, if they ſhould further follow after him, leauing nothing for them but the bare ground.

After this victorie, Bohemund and the Chriſtian Princes, without reſiſtance marching

Antioch in Piſidia taken by the Chriſtians.

Heraclea yelded

A through the hot and drie countries of the leſſer Aſia, came to Antiochia a Citie of Piſidia, which they tooke with ſmal labour: and ſo marching vnto Iconium the principall citie of Cilicia, neere vnto the mountaine Taurus, were there alſo of the citiſens courteouſly receiued, where they ſtayed certaine dayes for the refreſhing of the armie. From thence they ſet forward toward Heraclea, where a great power of the Turks were reported to be aſſembled. But they, together with the garriſon ſouldiers, vpon the approch of the victorious armie of the Chriſtians, forſooke the citie & fled: the citiſens being Chriſtians (as they were yet generally in all the prouinces of the leſſer Aſia, but in great ſubiection to the Turks) and now rid of their cruel maſters the Turkiſh garriſons, came foth, & meeting the Princes, gladly yeelded themſelues with their citie vnto them, as vnto their deliuerers. Here the Chriſtian Princes fully in-B ſtructed of the great feare and deſperation of the Turks, who now in no place durſt abide their comming; for the more ſpeedy taking in of thoſe countries but lately oppreſſed by the Turks, diuided their armie into two parts, leauing the one part thereof with Baldwin and Tancred in Cilicia, for the full ſubduing thereof, (who in ſhort time tooke the cities of Tarſus, Edeſſa, and Manuſſa, with all the reſt of the country, the Turkes not daring any where to abide their comming:) the other part of the army in the mean time entring into the leſſer Armenia, tooke the ſame from the Turkes, which the Princes gaue to one Palmurus an Armenian, who had in that expedition done them great ſeruice. From thence they tooke their way into Capadocia, which they alſo ſubdued, driuing out the Turks in euery place, and tooke the cities of Cæſa-rea and Socor, where they ſtaied a few days for the refreſhing of the armie: with like ſucceſſe they paſſed thorow the reſt of the prouinces of the leſſer Aſia, of late poſſeſſed by the Turks, C ſtill chaſing them out before them, and ſetting at libertie the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians of thoſe countries. Whereof Solyman (crauing aid of Axan the Perſian Sultan his couſin) grieuouſly complained, by his letters to him directed in this ſort: The famous citie of Nice, with the countrey of Romania, which we by your aid and power haue gotten from the kingdome of the Greeks, and of your bountie poſſeſſed, the Chriſtians of the kingdome of France haue again taken from vs. Thus was the late erected kingdome of the Turks in the leſſer Aſia, by theſe valiant Chriſtian champions againe brought low, and they glad to retyre themſelues further off into the mountains and more Eaſterne countries, vntill this heat was ouerpaſt; and that they, taking the benefit of the troubled ſtate of the Greeke empire (afterwards rent in ſunder by ambition and ciuil diſcord, the ruine of the greateſt monarchies) recouered not onely their former ſtate, but became alſo D dreadfull vnto the Greeke Emperors themſelues: vpon whom they dayly gained in one corner or other, ſtill maintaining the honour of their eſtate vntill the riſing of the Othoman Familie, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall God willing be declared.

Sultan Solyman his letters vnto the Perſian Sultan Axan.

The Chriſtians bind themſelues by Oath, neuer to returne vntill they had woon the Holie Citie.

Theſe victorious Princes (then, and to the worlds end famous) not contented, to their im-mortall praiſe, to haue thus driuen the Turks out of the leſſer Aſia, and recouered ſo many countries; bound themſelues, as wel the Princes as the common ſoldiers, by ſolemne oath, neuer to returne againe into their countries, vntill they had accompliſhed that ſacred war with the conqueſt of the Holy citie. So mounting together the high mountain Taurus, and deſcen-ding thence as into another world, they came to the citie Mareſia, which they tooke without E reſiſtance, the Turks there in garriſon being by night before for feare fled: where the Chriſti-ans for the refreſhing of themſelues certaine days ſtaid. In the mean time Robert Earle of Flanders with 1000 men at armes, was ſent out to giue ſummons vnto a citie called Artaſia, about 15 miles diſtant from Antioch: when as the citiſens beholding the enſignes of the Chriſtians, ſuddenly tooke vp armes againſt the Turks there in garriſon, which had of long holden them in ſubiection, and preuailing vpon them, ſlew them euery mothers ſon: whoſe heads they preſented vnto the Earle, and receiued him into their citie. The Turkes to reuenge the death of their friends, and to recouer againe the citie before the comming of the reſt of the armie, ſent out about 10000 men out of Antioch; for thither was aſſembled a great power of them to haue hindred the further proceedings of the Chriſtians: & being come neere to Artaſia, they ſent before certain ſtragling companies, of purpoſe to draw the new come Chriſtians out of F the citie, lying in the mean time in ambuſh with the reſt, of purpoſe to intrap them. With theſe ſtragling companies the Flemings ſallying out luſtily, encountred, & eaſily put them to flight; the Turkes indeed flying of purpoſe to bring them within the danger of the other, lying in ambuſh. After whom the Flemmings eagerly following, were before they were aware en-cloſed round with their enemies, and there had vndoubtedly periſhed, had not the Citiſens G (being Chriſtians) preſently ſallied out and right worthily relieued them.

Antioch in Syria beſieged by the Chriſtians.

The deſcription of the famous citie of Antioch.

Shortly after, the Chriſtian Princes marching forward with their armie, were incountred by the Turke at the riuer Orontes, who had there thought to haue ſtayd their further paſſage: with whom Robert Duke of Normandie, who had the leading of the vantgard, had a hard conflict, vntill that the Turks, diſcouraged with the ſight of the armie ſtill comming on, forſooke the bridge, and betooke themſelues to flight. So the Chriſtians paſſing the riuer, came and incamped with their armie before the famous citie of Antioch, the one and twentieth day of October, in the yere 1097: the gouernor whereof vnder the Perſian Sultan was one Caſſianus, (of ſome alſo honored with the name of a King) who at the comming of the Chriſtians, had with him in the citie ſeuen thouſand horſemen, and twentie thouſand foot of the Turkes, with H great ſtore of victuals, and all manner of other prouiſions neceſſarie for the defence thereof.
This citie, called in antient time Epidaphane, or Epiphane, and of the Hebrewes, Reblatha, ſometime the ſeat of the Syrian Kings, and afterwards the metropoliticall citie of Syria, hauing vnder it an hundred and fiftie Biſhops, (famous for many things, and amongſt others, for that it was the ſeat of the bleſſed Apoſtle S. Peter, and firſt place whereas the profeſſors of the Chriſtian religion tooke the name of Chriſtians) is ſcituate vpon the riuer Orontes, about twelue miles from the ſea, and was then ſtrongly fortified both by Nature & Art, being compaſſed about with a double wall; the vttermoſt whereof was of hard ſtone, and the other of bricke, with 460 towers in the ſame, and an inpregnable caſtle at the Eaſt end thereof, whereunto was ioyning a deepe lake, comming out of the great riuer, which watred the South ſide I of the citie. Round about this ſtrong citie (one of the moſt aſſured refuges of the Turks) although it were in circuit great, lay the Chriſtian Princes encamped, except on that ſide which being defended with the high broken mountaines, is not there to be beſieged. Vpon whom the Turks out of the citie, during the time of the ſiege made many a fierce and deſperat ſallie, being ſtill by the Chriſtians moſt valiantly repulſed: eſpecially at the bridge which the Chriſtians had made of boats for their more commodious paſſage too and fro ouer the riuer. In this ſort was the ſiege continued vntill the beginning of Februarie, with many a bloudie ſkirmiſh.
At which time ſuch abundance of raine fell, as that hardly could a man finde any place to lie drie in; and the ſcarcitie of victual grew ſo great in the campe, that many (horrible it is to ſay) to aſſuage their hunger, were glad to eat the dead bodies of their late ſlaine enemies. In K theſe extremities many died of hunger and cold, yea their horſes alſo periſhed for want of meat, ſo that in the whole camp were ſcarcely left two thouſand horſes fit for ſeruice, the reſt being either all dead, or brought ſo low, as that they were altogether vnſeruiceable. Theſe miſeries dayly increaſing, diuers men of great account, whom no terror of the enemie could haue diſmaid, began ſecretly to withdraw themſelues out of the campe, with purpoſe to haue ſtolne home; among whom were Peter the hermit author of this war, and Tancred the nephew of Bohemund, who taken by the way, and brought backe with the reſt as fugitiues, were ſharply reprehended by Hugh the French Kings brother, as cowards, and traitors to their brethren and fellow ſoldiers, & ſo inforced to take a new oath for their fidelitie and perſeuerance. Bohemund in the mean time going to Arthuſia a town not far off, by good fortune cut off a great part L of the Turks there in garriſon: who after their vſuall manner ſallying out to haue cut off the forragers of the Chriſtians, were now themſelues caught tardie: whereby the countrey for a time was more open for the diſtreſſed Chriſtian ſoldiers to ſeeke abroad for reliefe. But this libertie ſo lately gained laſted not long, when newes was brought vnto the campe, That the Turks in great number, out of the prouinces about Aleppo and Damaſco, were comming vnto the reliefe of their beſieged friends in Antioch. Neuertheleſſe the Chriſtians truſting to their own ſtrength, & the ſtrength of the place wherin they were incamped, lay ſtil, & at their comming ſo incountred them, that they ſlew 2000 of them, and put the reſt to flight. In which conflict the Chriſtians got great ſtore of prouiſion and victuals which the Turkes had thought to haue put into the city. The heads of the ſlaine Turks the Chriſtians ſet vpon ſtakes before the M citie, to the more terrour of the defendants. This ouerthrow of the Turkes, wherein Caſſianus had loſt his eldeſt ſonne, with others of his beſt captains, ſo daunted the beſieged, that they requeſted a truce for a time of the Chriſtian princes: which granted, they of the city came oftentimes into the campe, and they of the campe likewiſe into the city: Caſſianus ſtil expecting reliefe

A liefe from the Perſian Sultan. Whileſt the Chriſtians Princes were thus buſie in Aſia, the Venetians with a great fleet of two hundred gallies ſcowring the ſeas, vnder the conduct of Henry Contarenus the Biſhop, and of Vitalis the Dukes ſon, meeting with the gallies of Piſa at the Rhodes, and falling out with them, had with them a great fight, wherin the Venetians hauing the vpper hand, tooke eighteene of their gallies, & in them fiue thouſand ſouldiers: whome they ſeeing to be marked with the red croſſe, the cogniſance of the ſacred war, they preſently ſet at libertie, together with the gallies, detaining only thirty of the better ſort as hoſtages. After that, the Venetians ſailing into Ionia, tooke the citie of Smyrna, and ſpoiled al along the coaſts of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, before for feare abandoned by the Turks.

The truce before taken between the Turks and the Chriſtians at the ſiege of Antioch, being B in ſhort time after broken by the death of one Vollo a Frenchman, ſlaine by the Turkes; the war was againe begun, and the citie more hardly laid vnto than before. At which time the gouernor, who in the time of this long ſiege, which had now continued nine months, had loſt moſt part of his beſt ſoldiers, was glad for the defence of ſo great a citie, to vſe the ſeruice of diuers Chriſtians, then dwelling in the citie. Among whom was one Pirrhus, a citizen of great reputation, vnto whom he had committed the guarding of a tower, called the two Siſters; but afterward S. Georges tower. This Pirrhus had ſecret intelligence with Bohemund Prince of Tarentum, with whom hee agreed to giue him there entrance into the citie, vpon condition, that he ſhould of the other Chriſtian Princes procure the gouernment of the citie to himſelf; and that he, with the reſt of the Chriſtian citizens in the citie, might bee at his hands well C vſed: which thing being eaſily obtained, all things agreed vpon, Bohemund with his ſoldiers were by night by Pirrhus let into the citie, who made way for the reſt of the armie to enter. The citie thus taken, many of the Turks fled into the caſtle, the reſt were put to the ſword, man, woman, & child; and among them alſo many of the Chriſtians, the furious ſoldiers taking of them no knowledge. Great wealth was there found, but ſmall ſtore of victuals. Caſſianus the late gouernor flying out of the city to ſaue himſelfe, in wandring thorow the mountains, fel into the hands of the Chriſtian Armenians, who lately thruſt out of Ieruſalem, were fled thither for refuge, by whom he was there ſlaine. In the citie were ſlaine about ten thouſand perſons. Thus was the famous city of Antioch, which the Turks had long before by famin taken from the Chriſtians, againe recouered the third day of Iune, in the yeere of our Lord God, 1098. The poore oppreſſed Chriſtians in Ieruſalem hearing of this ſo notable a victorie, gaue ſecret D thanks vnto God therfore, & began to lift vp their heads in hope that their deliuerie was now at hand. Of this victorie, the Princes of the armie by ſpeedy meſſengers & letters certified their friends in all countries, ſo that in ſhort time, the fame thereof had filled a great part of the world. Among others, Bohemund Prince of Tarentum, vnto whom the citie was deliuered, ſent the ioyfull newes thereof vnto Roger his brother prince of Apulia: whoſe letters as the moſt certain witneſſes of the hiſtory before reported, I thought it not amiſſe here to ſetdown:

Antioch betraied to the Chriſtians.

Caſſianus gouernour of Antioch in flying ſlaine.

I ſuppoſe you to haue vnderſtood by the letters of your ſonne Tancred, both of the great feare of ſome of vs, and the battels which wee haue of late with our great glorie fought. But concerning the E truce, and the proceeding of the whole action, I had rather you ſhould be certified by my letters, than the letters of others. King Caſſianus had required a time of truce: during which, our ſouldiers had free recourſe into the citie without danger, vntill that by the death of Vollo a Frenchman, ſlaine by the enemie, the truce was broken. But whilſt it yet ſeemed an hard matter to winne the citie, one Pyrrhus a citizen of Antioch, of great authoritie and much deuoted vnto mee, had conference with mee concerning the yeelding vp of the citie; yet vpon condition, That the gouernment thereof ſhould be committed to mee, in whom he had repoſed an eſpeciall truſt. I conferred of the whole matter with the Princes and great commanders of the armie, and eaſily obtained that the gouernment of the citie was by their general conſent allotted vnto mee. So our armie entring by a gate opened by Pyrrhus, tooke the citie. Within a few dayes after, the towne Aretum was by vs aſſaulted, but not without ſome loſſe and danger to our per- F ſon, by reaſon of a wound I there receiued. I aſſure you much of the valor of your ſon Tancred, of whom I and the whole armie make ſuch account and reckoning, as is to be made of a moſt valiant and reſolute Generall. Farewell. From Antioch.

The letters of Bohemund Prince of Tarentum, to his brother Roger prince of Apulia, concerning the winning of Antioch.

Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Antioch, Corbanas (the Perſian Sultan his lieutenant) Edeſſa in vaine beſieged by the Turks.

Corbanas the Sultans lieutenant, with a great armie commeth to recouer againe the citie of Antioch.

lieutenant) with a great armie beſieged Edeſſa, with purpoſe after the taking thereof, to haue G releiued the citie of Antioch. But this being notably defended by Baldwin left there of purpoſe with a ſtrong garriſon for the defence thereof; the Turke fearing in the meane time to loſe Antioch, the ſafeſt refuge of the Turks in all thoſe parts, roſe with his armie, and ſet forward againſt the Chriſtians: where by the way, it was his fortune to meet with Sanſadolus, Caſſianus his ſon, but lately fled from Antioch, by whom he vnderſtood of the loſſe of the citie, and by what meanes the ſame was moſt like againe to be recouered: vpon which hope, Corbanas with his mightie armie kept on his way, with a full reſolution to ſet all vpon the fortune of a battel. Whoſe comming much troubled the Chriſtians: for that although they were poſſeſſed of the citie, yet was the caſtle ſtill holden by the Turks. Neuertheleſſe leauing the Earle of Tholous in the city, with a competent power for the keeping in of them in the caſtle, H they tooke the field with the whole ſtrength of the armie, & ſo in order of battell expected the comming of their enemies: who couragiouſly comming on, as men before reſolued to fight, ioyned with them a moſt terrible and bloudie battell. Neither were they in the citie in the mean time idle; for that the Turks in the caſtle hauing receiued in vnto them certaine ſupplies from Corbanas, ſallied out vpon them that were left for the ſafegard of the citie, and had with them a cruell conflict. Thus both within the citie and without, was to be ſeene a moſt dreadful fight of reſolute men, with great ſlaughter on both ſides: yet after long fight & much effuſion of bloud, the fortune of the Chriſtians preuailing, the Turkes began to giue ground, and afterwards betook themſelues to plain flight, whom the Chriſtians hardly purſuing, made of them a wonderfull ſlaughter. In this battell were ſlain of the Turks aboue an hundred thouſand, I and of the Chriſtians about foure thouſand two hundred. There was alſo taken a great prey; for beſides horſes and other beaſts for burden, were taken alſo fiue thouſand camels with their lading. The next day, being the 28 of Iune, the caſtle was by the Turks (now diſpairing of reliefe) yeelded vp vnto the Chriſtians.

Antioch thus taken, Hugh the French kings brother, ſyrnamed the Great, was ſent from the reſt of the Princes to Conſtantinople, to haue deliuered the citie vnto Alexius the Emperor according to the agreement before made. But he, guiltie in conſcience of his owne foule dealing with them, vnto whom he had ſent no reliefe at all during the long and hard ſiege of Antioch; neither performed any thing of that he had further promiſed, and therefore knowing himſelfe hated of them; had in diſtruſt ſo great an offer of the princes, ſo euill deſerued, and K therfore refuſed to accept therof. Whereupon Bohemund by the general conſent of the whole armie was choſen Prince, or (as ſome call him) King of Antioch.

Bohemund choſen Prince of Antioch.

The plague in the Chriſtian army.

Diſcord ariſing vpon emulation betwixt Bohemund and Raimund.

After this long ſiege and want of victuals, enſued a great plague in the army of the Chriſtians, the Autumne following, whereof it is reported fiftie thouſand men to haue died, and amongſt them many of great accouat. But the mortalitie ceaſing, the Chriſtians in Nouember following, by force tooke Rugia, and Albaria, two cities, about two dayes iourney from Antioch: where diſſention ariſing betwixt Bohemund and Raimund, who of all others only enuied at his preferment vnto the principalitie of Antioch: Bohemund for the common cauſes ſake, gaue way vnto his aduerſarie, & retired with his ſouldiers backe againe to Antioch; after whom followed the Duke Godfrey, and the Earle of Flanders with their regiments. The reſt of L the Princes wintred ſome at Rugia, ſome at Albaria, from whence Raimund made ſundrie light expeditions further into the enemies countrey: but the Spring approching, the Chriſtian Princes with all their power tooke the field againe. Bohemund with them that remained with him, departing from Antioch, beſieged Tortoſa. Raimund in the meane time with the reſt, beſieging the citie of Tripolis: who become much more inſolent than before, by reaſon of ſome fortunate roades hee had made vpon the enemies the laſt winter, ceaſed not ſtill to maligne Bohemund and his proceedings: matter enough to haue diuided the whole power of the Chriſtians, & to haue turned their weapons vpon themſelues: which Bohemund well conſidering, roſe with his army; and becauſe he would not with his preſence trouble the proceeding of the religious war, retired himſelfe to Antioch. After whoſe departure, Godfrey & the Earle M of Flanders, tooke Gabella, a citie about twelue miles from Laodicia, and from thence returned againe to the ſiege of Tortoſa, whether Raimund came alſo with his armie, hauing before driuen the gouernour of Tripolis to ſuch compoſition as pleaſed himſelfe, and to furniſh him with ſuch things as he wanted. Thus was Tortoſa hardly on three ſides beſieged

A by the Chriſtians, but ſo notably defended by the Turks, that after three moneths hard ſiege, the Chriſtians were glad to depart thence: and marching long the ſea ſide, ſpoiled the countrey about Sidon. But foraſmuch as that citie was not eaſily to be won, they left it, and encamped before Ptolemais, which they alſo paſſed by: the gouernour thereof ſending them out victuals, with ſuch other things as they wanted, and vpon ſummons giuen, promiſing to yeeld the citie after they had once woon the citie of Ieruſalem. From thence they came to Ceſarea in Paleſtine, where they ſolemnly kept the feaſt of Whitſontide; and ſo to Rama, which they found for feare forſaken of the Infidels. Marching from Rama, and drawing neere to Ieruſalem, they in the vantgard of the armie, vpon the firſt deſcrying of the Holy citie, gaue for ioy diuers great ſhouts and outcries, which with the like applauſe of the whole army was ſo B doubled and redoubled, as if therewith they would haue rent the very mountaines, and pierced the higheſt heauens. There might a man haue ſeene the deuout paſſions of theſe moſt worthy and zealous Chriſtians, vttered in right diuers manners: ſome, with their eyes and hands caſt vp towards heauen, called aloud vpon the name and helpe of Chriſt Ieſus; ſome, proſtrate vpon their faces, kiſſed the ground, as that whereon the Redeemer of the world ſometime walked: others, ioyfully ſaluted thoſe holy places which they had heard ſo much of, and then firſt beheld: in briefe, euery man in ſome ſort expreſſed the ioy he had conceiued of the ſight of the Holy citie, as the end of their long trauell.

This moſt antient and famous citie, ſo much renowned in holy Writ, is ſcituate in an hillie countrey; not watred with any riuer or freſh ſprings, as other famous cities for moſt part be; C neither yet was it wel ſeated for wood, or paſture ground: but what wanted in theſe, and ſuch other benefits of nature, was by the extraordinary bleſſings of the moſt higheſt ſo ſupplied, as that the Iews there dwelling, ſo long as they kept the ordinances of the Lord, were of al other people in the world iuſtly accounted the moſt happie and fortunate. Yet in thoſe ſo bleſſed times, was this citie for the ſin of the people oftentimes deliuered into the enemies hand, and the glorie therof defaced; as wel appeareth by the whole courſe of the hiſtorie of holy ſcripture, as alſo by the antient & approoued hiſtories, as well of the Iewes themſelues, as others. Neuertheleſſe it ſtil roſe againe (though not in like glorie as before in the time of king Dauid, Salomon, & the other next ſucceeding kings) and ſo was ſtill repeopled by the Iews, vntill that at laſt according to the foretelling of our Sauiour Chriſt, it was with a great and of all others D moſt lamentable deſtruction, vtterly raſed and deſtroied by the Romans, vnder the leading of Veſpatian the Emperour, and his noble ſonne Titus, fortie yeares after our Sauiour his precious death and paſſion. Since which time, it was neuer vntill this day againe repaired, or yet well inhabited by the Iews; but lying buried in the ruins of it ſelfe, all the raigne of Domitian, Nerua, and Traian, vntill the time of the great Emperour Ælius Adrianus, it was again by him re-edified about the yeare 136, and after the name of him called Ælia; who together with the name changed alſo in ſome part the antient ſituation of the city. For wheras before it was ſeated vpon the ſteep riſing of an hil, in ſuch ſort that towards the Eaſt and the South it ouerlooked the whole ground, hauing only the Temple and the caſtle called Antonia, in the higheſt part of the citie; Adrian tranſlated the whole citie vnto the very top of the hill, ſo that the E place where our bleſſed Sauior ſuffered his moſt bitter paſſion, with the Spulchre wherein he was alſo laid, and from whence he in glory roſe again, before without the citie, were then incloſed within the wals therof, as they are at this day to be ſeen. Yet for all that, the Emperor being dead, in proceſſe of time this new built citie recouerd again the antient name of Ieruſalem, whereby it hath euer ſince, and is at this day yet knowne. This city ſo re-edified, the Emperor firſt gaue vnto the Iewes, whom he afterwards thruſt out againe for their rebellion, and gaue it to the Chriſtians to inhabit; ouer whom, one Marke, firſt Biſhop of the Gentiles there, had the charge. But foraſmuch as the Roman Emperors were at that time altogether Idolaters and perſecutors of the poore Chriſtians, the Church alſo at Ieruſalem, with others, endured ſundry & many grieuous perſecutions, vnder the emperors Antonius, Commodus, Seuerus, F Maximinus, Valerianus, Aurelianus, Diocleſianus, and Maxentius, vntill that at length Conſtantine the Great, conuerted vnto the faith of Chriſt about the yeare of Grace 320, ſuppreſſing the Pagan Idolatry, gaue generall peace to the afflicted Church: wherby the Chriſtian church at Ieruſalem, for the ſpace of three hundred yeares after, happily flouriſhed vnder the Greeke emperors, vntill the time of the emperor Phocas; who hauing moſt cruelly ſlain the good Emperour

A briefe diſcourſe of the ſtate & fortune of the Holy citie of Ieruſalem, from the deſtruction thereof, vnder Veſpatianus the Emperor, and Titus his ſonne, vntill it was now agian erecouered out of the hands of the Infidels by Godfrey of Buillon and the other Chriſtian princes of the Weſt.

rour Maurice with his children,and ſo poſſeſſed himſelfe of the empire, gaue occaſion there- G by vnto Choſroe the Perſian King,in reuenge of the death of Maurice his father in law,with all his power to inuade Syria: who as a tempeſt bearing downe all before him , tooke alſo by force the citie of Ieruſalem, hauing that yere,which was about the yere ſix hundred and ten, ſlain almoſt an hundred thouſand Chriſtians. But Phocas the vſurper beeing by them of his guard moſt cruelly ſlaine,and Heraclius ſucceeding in his ſtead, Choſroe was by him againe driuen out of Syria,and the holy citie againe recouered, about the yere 624. In theſe great wars againſt the Perſians,Heraclius had vſed the help of the Arabians,called Scenite,a warlike people of Arabia Deſerta,altogether giuen to the ſpoile: who,the wars now ended,expecting to haue receiued their pay,were contrary to their expectation,and without al reaſon reiected by them that ſhould haue paid them,with very foule and contumelious words;as,that there was H not mony enough to pay the Chriſtian ſoldiers of the Latines & the Greeks,much leſſe thoſe vile dogs (whom they ſo called, for that they had but a little before receiued the damnable doctrine of the falſe Prophet Mahomet,the great ſeducer of the world,who euen in that time flouriſhed.)Vpon which diſcontentment they at their returne reuolted from the empire, and ioined themſelues vnto their great Prophet, & ſo afterwards vnto the Caliphs his ſucceſſors, extending his doctrine,together with his ſoueraigntie,to the vtmoſt of their power: and that with ſo good ſucceſſe, that in ſhort time they had ouerrun all Ægypt, Syria, the land of Promiſe, and taken the holy citie. With theſe (the diſciples of Mahomet and his ſucceſſors, the Saraſins,for ſo now they would be called) the Greeke Emperours enſuing had for certaine yeres diuers conflicts, with diuers fortune, for the poſſeſſion of Syria. But at length wearied I out,and by them ouercome,they left the aforeſaid countries wholly to their deuotion. Hereby it came to paſſe,that the Saraſins for the ſpace of 370 yeres following held theſe countries, with many others in great ſubiection, oppreſſing ſtill the poore Chriſtians in Ieruſalem with moſt grieuous tributes and exactions: vnto whom they yet left a third part of the citie for them to dwell in,with the Temple of the Sepulchre of our Sauior, and mount Sion; not for any deuotion,either vnto them,or thoſe places,but for that it yeelded them a great profit by the recourſe of deuout Chrtſtians trauelling thither:reſeruing in the meane time vnto themſelues,the other two parts of the citie, with the Temple of Saloman, before re-edified by the Chriſtians. Now whileſt the Saraſins thus triumph it in the Eaſt,and not in the Eaſt only, but ouer a great part of the Weſt alſo; contenting themſelues with ſuch tributes as they had im- K poſed vpon the ſubdued nations and countries; vp ſtart the Turks,a vagrant,fierce,and cruell people; who firſt breaking into Aſia (as is before declared) and by rare fortune aſpiring vnto the kingdome of Perſia, ſubdued the countries of Meſopotamia, Syria,with the greateſt part of the leſſer Aſia,and Iudæa, together with the Holy citie: who both there and in all other places,held the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians in ſuch ſubiection and thraldome, as rhat the former gouernment of the Saraſins ſeemed in compariſon of this to haue bin but light and eaſie. Neither was there any end or releaſe of theſe ſo great miſeries to haue bin expected, had not God in mercy by the weake means of a poore hermit,ſtirred vp theſe moſt worthy Princes of the Weſt to take vp arms in their defence,who hauing with their victorious armies re-couered the leſſer Aſia, with a great part of Syria,were now come vnto this Holy citie. L Ieruſalem beſieged by the Chriſtians.

The gouernor of Ieruſalem vnderſtanding by his eſpials, of the proceedings of the Chriſtians,had before their approch,got into the citie a very ſtrong garriſon of right valiant ſouldiers,with good ſtore of all things neceſſarie for the holding out of a long ſiege. The Chriſtians with their army approching the city,encamped before it on the North;for that toward the Eaſt,& the South,it was not wel to be beſieged, by reaſon of the broken rocks and moun-taines. Next vnto the citie lay Godfrey the Duke,with the Germans and Loranois: neere vnto him lay the Earle of Flanders,and Robert the Norman: before the Weſt gate lay Tancred and the Earle of Tholous: Bohemund and Baldwin were both abſent;the one at Antioch,the other at Ediſſa. The Chriſtians thus ſtrongly encamped,the fift day after gaue vnto the citie a fierce aſſault,with ſuch cheerefulneſſe,as that it was verily ſuppoſed,it might haue beene euen then M woon,had they beene ſufficiently furniſhed with ſcaling ladders: for want whereof, they were glad to giue ouer the aſſault and retire. But within a few days after,hauing ſupplied that defect,and prouided all things neceſſarie,they came on againe afreſh,and with all their power gaue vnto the citie a moſt terrible aſſault,wherein was on both ſides ſeene great valour,po-licie,

A licie, and cunning, with much ſlaughter, vntil that at length the Chriſtians wearie of the long fight, and in that hot countrey, and moſt feruent time of the yeare, fainting for lacke of water, were glad againe to forſake the aſſault, and to retire into their trenches: only the well of Siloe yeelded them water, and that not ſufficient for the whole campe; the reſt of the wels which were but few, being before by the enemie either filled vp or elſe poiſoned.

Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Ieruſalem: a fleet of the Genowaies arriued at Ioppa; at which time alſo a great fleete of the Ægyptian Sultans lay at Aſcalon, to haue brought reliefe to the beſieged Turkes in Ieruſalem, whereof the Genowaies vnderſtanding, and knowing themſelues too weake to encounter them at ſea, took all ſuch things out of their ſhips as they thought good, and ſo ſinking them, marched by land vnto the campe. There was B amongſt theſe Genowaies diuers enginers, men (after the manner of that time) cunning in making of all manner of engines fit for the beſieging of cities: by whoſe deuice, a great mouing tower was framed of timber and thick plancks, couered ouer with raw hides, to ſaue the ſame from fire: out of which the Chriſtians might in ſafety greatly annoy the defendants. This tower being by night brought cloſe to the wall, ſerued the Chriſtians in ſtead of a moſt ſure fortres in the aſſault the next day: where whilſt they ſtriue with warlike valor & doubtful victory on both ſides, from morning vntil midday, by chance the wind fauouring the Chriſtians, caried the flame of the fire into the face of the Turks, wherwith they had thought to haue burnt the Tower, with ſuch violence, that the Chriſtians taking the benefit therof, & holpen by the tower, gained the top of the wal: which was firſt footed by the Duke Godfrey, & his brother C Euſtace, with their followers, and the enſignes of the Duke there firſt ſet vp, to the great encouraging of the Chriſtians, who now preſſing in on euery ſide, like a violent riuer that had broken ouer the banks, bare down all before them. All were ſlain that came to hand, men, women, & children, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition: the ſlaughter was great, & the ſight lamentable, all the ſtreets were filled with bloud and the bodies of the dead, death triumphing in euery place. Yet in this confuſion, a wonderful number of the better ſort of the Turks, retiring to Salomons temple, there to do their laſt deuoire, made there a great and terrible fight, armed with deſpaire to indure any thing; & the victorious Chriſtians no leſſe diſdaining, after the winning of the citie, to find there ſo great reſiſtance. In this deſperat conflict, fought with wonderful obſtinacie of mind, many fel on both ſides: but the Chriſtians came on ſo fiercely, D with deſire of bloud, that breaking into the temple, the foremoſt of them were by the preſſe of them that followed after, violently thruſt vpon the weapons of their enemies, & ſo miſerably ſlaine. Neither did the Turks thus oppreſſed, giue it ouer, but as men reſolued to die, deſperatly fought it out with inuincible courage, not at the gates of the Temple only, but euen in the midſt thereof alſo, where was to be ſeene great heaps, both of the victors and the vanquiſhed; ſlaine indifferently together. All the pauement of the Temple ſwam with bloud, in ſuch ſort, that a man could not ſet his foot, but either vpon ſome dead man, or ouer the ſhooes in bloud. Yet for all that, the obſtinate enemie ſtill held the vaults and top of the Temple, when as the darkeneſſe of the night came ſo faſt on, that the Chriſtians were glad to make an end of the ſlaughter, & to ſound a retrait. The next day (for that proclamation was made, for mercy to E be ſhewed vnto all ſuch as ſhould lay downe their weapons) the Turks that yet held the vpper part of the Temple, came downe and yeelded themſelues. Thus was the famous citie of Ieruſalem with great bloudſhed, but far greater honor, recouered by theſe worthy Chriſtians, in the yeare 1099, after it had beene in the hands of the Infidels aboue foure hundred yeares. 1099

A moſt cruell and bloudie fight, betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, euen in the Temple of Ieruſalem.

The next day after, hauing buried the dead, and cleanſed the citie, they gaue thanks to God with publicke praiers and great reioycing. The poore Chriſtians before oppreſſed, now ouercome with vnexpected ioy, welcomed their victorious brethren with great ioy & praiſe; and the ſoldiers embracing one another, ſparing to ſpeake of themſelues, freely commended each others valour. Eight daies after, the princes of the armie meeting together, began to conſult about the choice of their king: among whom was no ſuch difference, as might wel ſhew which F was to preferred before the others. And although euery one of them for proweſſe and deſert, ſeemed worthy of ſo great an honor, yet by the generall conſent of all, it was giuen to Robert Duke of Normandie: who about the ſame time hearing of the death of the Conquerour his father, and more in loue with his fathers new gotten kingdome in England, in hope thereof, refuſed the kingdome of Hieruſalem, then offered vnto him: which at his returne he found poſſeſſed by William Rufus his yonger brother, and ſo in hope of a better, refuſing the G worſe, vpon the matter loſt both.

Godfrey Duke of Buillon by the generall conſent of the Chriſtian army choſen firſt king of Ieruſalem.

After whoſe departure, Godfrey of Buillon Duke of Loraine (whoſe enſigne was firſt diſplaid vpon the walls) was by the generall conſent both of the Princes and the armie, ſaluted King. He was a great ſoldier, and indued with many heroical vertues, brought vp in the court of the Emperour Henrie the fourth, and by him much emploied. At the time of his inauguration, he refuſed to be crowned with a crowne of gold: ſaying, That it became not a Chriſtian man there to weare a crown of gold, where Chriſt the Sonne of God had for the ſaluation of mankind, ſometime worne a crowne of thorne. Of the greateſt part of theſe proceedings of the Chriſtians, from the time of their departure from Antioch, vntill the winning of the Holy Citie, Godfrey by letters briefly certified Bohemund, as followeth: H

After long trauell, hauing firſt taken certaine townes, wee came to Ieruſalem: which citie is enuironed with high hils, without riuers or fountaines, excepting onely that of Salomons, and that a very little one. In it are many Ciſternes, wherein water is kept, both in the citie and the countrey thereabout. On the Eaſt, are the Arabians, the Moabits and Ammonits. On the South, the Idumæans, Ægyptians and Philiſtians: Weſtward alongſt the ſea coaſt, lie the cities of Ptolemais, Tyrus, and Tripolis: and Northward, Tiberias, Ceſaræa, Philippi with the countrey Decapolis and Damaſco. I In the aſſault of the Citie, I firſt gained that part of the wall that fell to my lot to aſſaile, and commanded Baldwin to enter the citie: who hauing ſlaine certaine companies of the enemies, broke open one of the gates for the Chriſtians to enter. Raymond had the citie of Dauid, with much rich ſpoile yeelded vnto him. But when wee came vnto the Temple of Saloman, there wee had a great conflict, with ſo great ſlaughter of the enemie, that our men ſtood in bloud aboue the ancles: The night approching, wee could not take the vpper part of the Temple, which the next day was yeelded, the Turkes pittifully crying out for mercie: and ſo the Citie of Ieruſalem was by vs taken, the fifteenth of Iuly, in the yeare of our redemption 1099, thirtie nine dayes after the beginning of the ſiege, foure hundred and nine yeares after it fell into the hands of the Saraſins in the time of Heraclius the Emperour. Beſides this, the Princes with one conſent ſaluted mee (againſt my will) King of Ieruſalem: who although K I feare to take vpon mee ſo great a kingdome, yet I will doe my deuoire, that they ſhall eaſily know mee for a Chriſtian King, and well deſeruing of the vniuerſall Faith; but loue you me as you do, and ſo farewell. From Ieruſalem.

An hundred thouſand Turks and Saraſins ſlaine.

Godfrey of Buillon firſt Chriſtian King of Ieruſalem, dieth of the plague.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing at Ieruſalem, ſuch a multitude of the Turkes, and Saraſins their confederates (now in their common calamitie all as one) were aſſembled at Aſcalon (a citie about fiue and twentie miles from Ieruſalem) to reuenge the iniuries they had before receiued, as had not before met together in all the time of this ſacred war. Againſt whom, Godfrey (the late Duke, and now King) aſſembled the whole forces of the Chriſtians in thoſe countries, and leauing a ſtrong garriſon in the new woon citie, ſet forward: and meeting with L them, ioined a moſt dreadfull and cruell battell; wherein (as moſt report) were ſlaine of the Infidels, an hundred thouſand men, and the reſt put to flight. The ſpoile there taken, far exceeded all that the Chriſtians had before taken in this long expedition. Godfrey after ſo great a victorie, returning to Ieruſalem, gaue vnto God moſt humble thanks. The reſt of the Princes returned either to their charge, as did Bohemund to Antioch, Baldwin to Edeſſa, Tancred into Galiley, whereof hee was created Prince; or elſe hauing now performed the vttermoſt of their vowes, returned with honour into their owne countries. This was of all others the moſt honourable expedition that euer the Chriſtians tooke in hand againſt the Infidels, and with the greateſt reſolution performed; for the moſt part, by ſuch voluntarie men, as moued with a deuout zeale, to their immortall praiſe, ſpared neither life nor liuing in defence of the Chriſtian M faith and religion; all men worthy eternall fame and memorie. Not long after, enſued a great peſtilence (the ready attendant of long war & want) whereof infinit numbers of people died, and among the reſt Godfrey, the firſt Chriſtian King of Ieruſalem, neuer to be ſufficiently commended: who with the generall lamentation of all good Chriſtians, was honourably buried

After the death of Godfrey, the Chriſtians made choice of Baldwin his brother, Countie of Edeſſa, who leauing his former gouernment to Baldwin ſyrnamed Burgenſis, his neere kinſman, came to Ieruſalem honorably accompanied, and was there by the Patriarke on Chriſtmas day with all ſolemnitie crowned king, in the yere 1101. He aided by the Venetians & Genoways at ſea, and by Bohemund King of Antioch, by land, tooke from the Infidels the citie of Ceſarea B Stratonis, ſtanding vpon the ſea ſide, and ouerthrew certaine companies of the Ægyptian Sultans at Rama. But vnderſtanding that the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt were comming to his aid with a new power, he glad thereof, went to meet them, and ſafely conducted them to Ieruſalem alongſt the ſea coaſt, by the cities of Berythus, Sidon, Tyre, and Ptolemais, all yet holden by the enemie. At which time the Turkes at Aſcalon hauing receiued great aid from the Arabians and Ægyptians, inuaded the country about Ra[illegible]; where betwixt them and the Chriſtians was fought a moſt cruell battell, wherein the Chriſtians receiued a moſt notable ouerthrow, many of their great commanders being there ſlaine, and among the reſt, Stephan Earle of Charters, (but lately returned home from the former expedition, & now come backe againe) and Stephen Earle of Burgondie and Tholous: yea the King himſelfe hardly eſcaped the enemies hands, and after many dangers came at length to Ioppa, after it had been conſtant- C ly before reported him to haue been in that battell alſo ſlaine. Who hauing there in haſt repaired his armie, came againe ſpeedily vpon his enemies, fearing as then nothing leſſe; and ouerthrew them with ſuch a ſlaughter, as that they had ſmall cauſe to rejoyce of their former victorie. Neither were the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes in the other parts of Syria and Paleſtine, in the mean time idle, but ſought by all means to inlarge their territories. Tancred prince of Galilie hauing raiſed a great power, tooke Apamea the metropoliticall citie of Cœleſyria, and after much toyle woon alſo the citie of Laodicea. Baldwin alſo the Gouernor of Edeſſa, beſieging the citie of Carras, had brought the beſieged Turks to ſuch extremitie, that they were about to haue yeelded the citie; when ſuddenly he was ſet vpon by a great armie of the Turks ſent from the Perſian Sultan for the reliefe of the beſieged, & being there ouerthrown, D was himſelfe there taken, with Benedict the Biſhop, and one Ioſcelin his kinſman: who after fiue yeares captiuitie, found meanes with the Turke that had taken them, to redeeme themſelues, to the great offence of the Perſian Sultan, and of the Sultan Solyman.

Baldwin county of Edeſſa, and brother to Godfrey, ſecond king of Ieruſalem.

King Baldwin after the late victory, liued for a ſeaſon at ſome good reſt in Ieruſalem, vnmoleſted of his enemies: but knowing his greateſt ſafetie among ſuch warlike people, to conſiſt in arms, he vpon the ſudden raiſed the whole ſtrength of his kingdome, and laid ſiege to Ptolemais, otherwiſe called Acon, a city of Phœnicia, ſtanding vpon the riuage of the ſea, where he found ſuch reſiſtance, that he was glad to raiſe his ſiege and depart, hauing done nothing more than ſpoyled the pleaſant places about the citie. By the way in his returne backe againe E it fortuned him to meet with certaine companies of the enemies aduenturers, by whom he was in a ſkirmiſh mortally wounded, although he died not thereof in long time after: for albeit that the wound was by his ſurgeons healed vp, yet was the griefe thereof ſo great, that at length it brought him to his end. Yet he notwithſtanding the former repulſe, the next yere incouraged by the comming of the Genoa fleet, laid hard ſiege againe to Ptolemais both by ſea and land, which after twentie dayes ſiege was by compoſition yeelded vnto him.

King Baldwin mortally wounded.

Shortly after, the gouernor of Aleppo, with certaine other of the Turks great captaines in thoſe quarters, hauing ioyned their forces together, and ſo inuaded the countrey about Antioch, were by Tancred (whom Bohemund at his departure into Italie had left gouernuor of that citie) notably incountred and put to flight. At which time alſo the Caliph of Ægypt ſending great forces both by ſea and land againſt the King of Ieruſalem, was in both places diſcomfited, at land by the Chriſtians, and at ſea by tempeſt.

Bohemund in the mean time, with a great armie of voluntarie men and others (wherein he is reported to haue had fiue thouſand horſe, and forty thouſand foot) returning towards the Holy Land, in reuenge of many iniuries done by Alexius the Emperour, vnto the ſouldiers of this ſacted war, contrarie to his faith and promiſe to them before giuen; by the way landed his men in Epirus, and grieuouſly ſpoyled the countrey about Dirrachium, part of the Emperors dominion. Neither made he an end of ſpoyling, vntill he had inforced the Emperour for redreſſe of ſo great harmes, to make peace with him, and again by ſolemne oath to promiſe all ſecuritie and kindneſſe vnto all ſuch Chriſtian ſouldiers as ſhould haue occaſion to trauell too or fro thorow his countries, during the time of this religious war. After which agreement he put to ſea againe, and ſo returned for Ieruſalem: but whileſt he ſtayed at Antioch, he ſhortly after there died in the yeare 1108, leauing the principalitie thereof vnto his young ſonne Bohemund a child, vnder the tuition of his nephew Tancred.

Yet were the cities Berytus, Sidon, and Tyre, alongſt the ſea coaſt, in the enemies poſſeſſion: for the gaining whereof Baldwin the King raiſed a great armie, and ſo came and laid ſiege to Berytus, which after many ſharpe aſſaults he at length won, the 23 day of Aprill, in the yere 1111, and put to ſword moſt part of them that he found therein. The ſame yeare alſo he, aſſiſted by a fleet ſent vnto him out of Norway, beſieged the citie of Sydon: which the citiſens (ſeeing themſelues now beſet both by ſea and land) at length yeelded vnto him by compoſition, the 19 day of December. After which victorie he diſmiſſed the fleet, and returned himſelfe in triumph to Ieruſalem. Now of all the famous cities alongſt the ſea coaſt of Phœnicia and Paleſtine, from Laodicea to Aſcalon, was only the citie of Tyre that remained in the enemies hands: which citie Baldwin alſo hardly beſieged; neuertheleſſe it was ſo well defended by the Turks, that after he had all in vain lien before it by the ſpace of foure moneths, he was glad to riſe with his armie and depart.

It fortuned that within two yeres after, the Turks with a mightie armie ſent from the Perſian Sultan, inuaded the country of Cœliſyria, where ſpoiling al before them as they went, they came and incamped vpon the ſea coaſt neere vnto Tyberias. Againſt whom Baldwin gathered the whole ſtrength of his kingdome; with whom alſo Tancred (who now raigned in Antioch, the young Bohemund being dead) with the Countie of Tripolis, and the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, joyned their forces: who all together marching forward, came and incamped not far from the enemie, being in number far more than they. Mendus, Generall of the Turks armie (for ſo I find him called) vnderſtanding of their approch, ſent out certain companies of his men to ſkirmiſh with them: againſt whom the Chriſtians alſo ſent out others, who incountring them, eaſily put them to flight, being before commanded ſo to doe, of purpoſe to draw the Chriſtians into the danger of a great ſtrength, lying in ambuſh to intrap them: which according to the Turks deſire fel out; for the Chriſtians fiercely purſuing the flying enemie, fel into the ambuſh, and ſo before they were wel aware, were beſet on euerie ſide with their enemies: vnto the reſcue of whom other companies of Chriſtians comming in, & others likewiſe from the Turks, both the great armies were at length drawn into the field, where betwixt them was joined a moſt fierce & terrible battel, with great ſlaughter on both ſides: but at length the multitude of the Turks preuailing, the Chriſtians were put to the worſe, and ſo glad to flie: after whom the fierce enemie hardly followed, not without great ſlaughter. In which flight the King himſelfe hardly eſcaped, with Arnolphus the Patriarke. Whileſt Baldwin was thus buſied abroad, the Turks and Saraſins from Aſcalon came and beſieged Ieruſalem, being then but weakly manned: but hearing of the Kings comming, and that the armie of the Chriſtians daily increaſed with new ſupplies out of the Weſt by ſea, they retyred home againe, hauing burnt certaine ſtorehouſes full of corne, and ſpoyled ſuch things as was ſubiect to their furie.

Long it were to recount all the hard conflicts and combats this King had with the Saraſins and Turks, which for breuitie I paſſe ouer, contented to haue briefly touched the greateſt. In the laſt yere of his raigne, hauing for certaine yeres before liued in ſome reaſonable peace, he made an expedition into Ægypt, where he with much difficultie woon Pharamia, a ſtrong citie vpon the ſea coaſt, which he joyned vnto his owne Kingdome. After that, he went to the mouth of the riuer Nilus, and with great admiration learned the nature of that ſtrange riuer: and hauing therein taken abundance of fiſh, returned into the city, and there with the ſame feaſted himſelfe with his friends. But after dinner he began to feele the griefe of his old wound, and growing thereof ſicker & ſicker, returned with his armie toward Ieruſalem, where by the way neere vnto a citie called Laris, he died (to the great griefe of all the Chriſtians) in the yeare 1118. His dead bodie being brought backe vnto Ieruſalem, was there royally buried,

A neere vnto his brother Godfrey, after he had raigned eighteene yeares: whoſe ſepulchre is yet there alſo to be ſeene, faſt by the ſepulchre of his brother.

Baldwin Brugenſis choſen King of Ieruſalem.

The late King thus dead and buried, the Chriſtians with one conſent made choice of his couſin Baldwin, ſyrnamed Brugenſis, gouernor of Edeſſa: who by the name of Baldwin the ſecond, was the ſecond of Aprill in the yeare 1118, ſolemnly crowned King of Ieruſalem. He was of ſtature tall and well proportioned, of countenance comely and gracious, hauing his haire thin and yellow, his beard mingled with ſome gray haires hanging downe to his breſt; his colour freſh and liuely for one of his yeares. 1118 He was a man of great courage, and therefore no leſſe redoubted of his enemies, than beloued of his ſubiects, who had in him repoſed great hope both for the defence and inlarging of that new gained kingdome. Againſt him the ſame B Summer the Caliph of Ægypt, aided by the King of Damaſco and the Turks, in reuenge of the loſſe he had in the expedition the yere before receiued, raiſed a great power to inuade him both by ſea and land. Againſt whom Baldwin alſo oppoſed himſelfe with his whole ſtrength, and ſo came and incamped within the ſight of his enemies. In which ſort, when both armies had lien the one facing the other by the ſpace of three moneths, they both roſe; the Chriſtians fearing the multitude of the Turks, and the Turks the valour of the Chriſtians, and ſo retired without any notable thing doing.

This yeare died Alexius the Greeke Emperour, who euen from the beginning of this ſacred warre ſecretly repined at the good ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians in Syria, although his empire were thereby greatly inlarged: after whom ſucceeded Calo Ioannes his ſonne, who al the C time of his raign right worthily defended his territories in the leſſer Aſia, againſt the inuaſion of the Turks.

Not long after, Gazi one of the greateſt Princes of the Turks in the leſſer Aſia, with the king of Damaſco, and Debeis King of Arabia, ioyning their forces together, with a great army inuading the countrie about Antioch, came and incamped not far from Aleppo: againſt whom Roger Prince of Antioch, not expecting the comming of Baldwin and the other Chriſtian Princes his confederats, but preſuming of his owne ſtrength, went forth with greater courage than diſcretion, whereunto his ſucceſſe was anſwerable; for incountring with them at too much odds, he was by them in a great battell ouerthrowne, wherein himſelfe was ſlaine, with moſt part of his armie. Of which ſo great a ſlaughter, the place wherein this battel was fought was D afterward called the field of bloud. But whileſt the Turks after ſo great a victorie, careſly and at pleaſure roame vp and down the country, Baldwin ſetting vpon them, ouerthrew them with a great ſlaughter, and ſo put them to flight. After this victorie gained by the Chriſtians the fourteenth of Auguſt in the yeare 1120, King Baldwin in great triumph entred into Antioch, 1120 and ſo ioyned that principalitie vnto his owne kingdome.

The yere following, the Turks with another armie inuaded the ſame countrey againe: for repreſſing of whom, whileſt Baldwin and the other Chriſtian Princes were making their preparations, it fortuned that Gazi their great commander ſuddenly died of an Apoplexie; vpon whoſe death they retired without any further harm doing. Neuertheleſſe the next Spring, the 1122 King of Damaſco aided by the Arabians, entred againe with a great power into the countrey E about Antioch, and there did ſome harme: for the Antiochians now deſtitute of their owne Prince, and Baldwin (who had taken vpon him their protection) being farre off, and otherwiſe buſied at Ieruſalem, were much more ſubiect vnto the inrodes of their enemies (ſtill at hand) than before when they had a Prince of their owne ſtill preſent amongſt them. But Baldwin aduertiſed thereof, was making toward them with a moſt puiſſant armie, ſooner than they had thought it could haue bin poſſible. Of whoſe approch the Turks vnderſtanding, retired againe out of the country: after whom the King thinking it not good to make further purſuit, turned a little out of the way, and tooke by force Garaze, one of the ſtrongeſt caſtles of the Kings of Damaſco, built but the yere before, which becauſe it was not without great charge and danger to be holden, he raſed down to the ground.

F Baldwin notwithſtanding that he had many times thus honourably repulſed his enemies, wiſely conſidering how he was on the one ſide beſet with the Turks, & on the other ſide with the Saraſins (which yet raigned in Ægypt, the kingdome of Ieruſalem lying as it were in the mouth of them both) thought it good betime to craue aid of the Chriſtian Princes of Europe; and to that purpoſe had ſent diuers his Embaſſadors vnto diuers of them, but eſpecially vnto the Venetians, whom of all others he thought fitteſt at his need to yeeld him reliefe by ſea. It fortuned in the meane time, that Balac the Perſian Sultan with a great armie of the Turks inuaded the country about Antioch; whereof Baldwin vnderſtanding (although he certainly knew he ſhould ere long receiue aid from the other Chriſtian Princes his friends, but eſpecially from the Venetians, and might therefore with great reaſon haue protracted the war vntil their comming, yet being therewith much moued, or elſe his deſtinie ſo requiring) raiſed ſuch forces as he had of his own, and without longer ſtaying for his friends, with greater courage than good ſpeed ſet forward; and ſo joyning battell with the enemie, was therin ouerthrown, with the greateſt part of his armie, and himſelfe taken priſoner in the fight, with certain other of his beſt commanders; who all together were carried away captiues vnto Carras.

Vpon the report of this ouerthrow, and taking of the King, the Caliph of Ægypt on the other ſide tooke occaſion with all his power to inuade the kingdome of Ieruſalem; & hauing in himſelfe purpoſed the vtter ruine thereof, beſide the great armie which he ſent thither by land (which lay incamped not far from Aſcalon) he put to ſea an huge fleet alſo of 700 ſaile, for the diſtreſſing of the ſea townes, which he well knew were not otherwiſe to be won. This fleet of the Saraſin Kings (for Ægypt with the kingdomes of Tunes and Morocco were yet in poſſeſſion of the Saraſins) arriuing at Ioppa, there put aſhore their land forces, and hardly beſieged the town both by ſea and land. But whileſt they thus lay in great hope to haue won the town, Dominicus Michael duke of Venice, ſtirred vp by Calixtus then Biſhop of Rome, was come to Cyprus with a fleet of two hundred ſaile, for the reliefe of the Chriſtians in Syria and the Holie land: and hearing of the diſtreſſe of Ioppa, nothing diſmaid with the number of the enemies fleet, haſted thither, and came ſo ſuddenly vpon them, that he had (as ſome report) ouerthrowne them before they could put themſelues in order, or be in readineſſe to fight: or as ſome others ſay, after a great & doubtful fight, hauing ſunke or taken a great number of them, and put the reſt to flight, he obtained of them a moſt glorious victorie. With like good fortune alſo were the Saraſins ouerthrowne in a notable battell at land, neere vnto Aſcalon, by the Lord Euſtace, vnto whom the defence of the kingdome was committed after the taking of the King, who not long after ſo great a victorie died.

Tyre beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Ioppa relieued (as is aforeſaid) the Duke of Venice trauelled by land to Ieruſalem, where he was honorably receiued by Guarimund the Patriarke, and the confederation before made betwixt King Baldwin and the Venetians, vpon the ſame conditions ſolemnly againe renued.

1124 The Saraſins thus notably diſcomfited both by ſea and land, and the Chriſtians thereby not a little incouraged, and joining their forces together with the Venetians, came and the firſt of March laid ſiege vnto the antient and ſtrong city of Tyre: which they hauing beſet both by ſea and land, gaue thereunto many a ſharpe aſſault; which the Turks as men fighting for their liues and wiues right valiantly repulſed. In which ſort the ſiege was continued longer than the Chriſtians had at the firſt thought ſhould haue needed: yet at length after foure moneths ſiege, the Turks ſore weakened with often aſſaults, and hardly pinched with want of food, all their ſtore being ſpent, yeelded the citie by compoſition. Thus was the citie of Tyre (the moſt famous port of Phœnicia) yeelded vnto the Chriſtians the nine and twentieth of Iune, in the yeare 1124. The third part of this citie was giuen to the Venetians, according to the compoſition made betwixt them and the Kings of Ieruſalem, That of all ſuch cities as were by their helpe woon from the Infidels in Syria, they ſhould haue a third part, with one ſtreet, and free traffique in all the reſt of the cities of the Kingdome of Ieruſalem. Shortly after was King Baldwin ſet at libertie for the ranſome of an hundred thouſand ducats, after he had been eighteene moneths priſoner among the Turks.

The Duke of Venice hauing now ſpent almoſt three yeares in this ſacred expedition, and well confirmed the ſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria, returning home, by the way tooke the Iſlands of Chios, Rhodus, Samos, Mitylen, and Andrus, with the citie of Modon in Peloponeſus; all, places belonging vnto the Greeke Empire. Which hee did in reuenge of the iniuries done by the Emperor in the time of his abſence, who enuying at the ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians in Syria, as had his father Alexius before him, had in the abſence of the duke infeſted the territories of the Venetians, for the which he was now iuſtly requited, with the loſſe of a good part of his owne.

Baldwin alſo not vnmindfull of the iniuries vnto him before done by the Turks, in requitall

A thereof, inuaded the countrey about Damaſco, and there in three notable battells ouerthrew the king, and ſpoyled the country: wherein he tooke ſo great a prey, that therewith he redeemed his daughter, whom he had at the time of his deliuerance left in hoſtage with the Turkes for the payment of his ranſome. He alſo ouerthrew the Saraſins at Aſcalon, who aided by the Caliph of Ægypt, had ſundrie times inuaded the countrey about Ieruſalem. And ſo hauing well repreſſed his enemies, for a ſpace liued in peace.

Not long after, Hugh Paganus firſt Maſter of the Templars (an Order of knights firſt begun in the raigne of this Baldwin) before ſent to craue aid of the Chriſtian princes of the Weſt, againſt the Turks and Saraſins, returned with a great number of zealous Chriſtians, readie to lay down their liues for defence of the Chriſtian faith & religion: with whom Baldwin & the B other Chriſtian Princes of Syria joyning their forces, ſet forward and beſieged Damaſco, the regall ſeat of the Turks in thoſe quarters. But ſuch was the ſtrength of this citie, with the valor of the defendants, and contagiouſneſſe of the aire, that the Chriſtians (the heauens as it were then fighting againſt them) were glad to raiſe their ſiege, in vaine begun, and ſo to retyre.

Whileſt things thus paſſed in Syria, Fulke Countie of Turin, Mayn, and Aniou, a man almoſt of threeſcore yeres, hauing as he thought beſt diſpoſed of his things at home, had for deuotion ſake taken vpon him an expedition into the Holy land. In the time of which his preparations, Embaſſadors came vnto him from King Baldwin, offering him in marriage Meliſenda (or as ſome call her, Margaret) his eldeſt daughter, with the ſucceſſion into the kingdome of Ieruſalem in dowrie, if he ſhould ſuruiue the King; and in the meane time to content himſelfe C with the cities of Tyre and Ptolemais: of which offer he accepted, and ſo held on his journey before intended. It fortuned about three yeres after, that the king fell dangerouſly ſick, & feeling his death drawing on, hauing layd aſide all regall dignitie, cauſed himſelfe to be remooued out of his owne palace, into the Patriarkes houſe, which was neerer vnto the temple of the ſepulchre: and there calling vnto him Fulke the Countie, his ſon in law, with his daughter and his ſonne Baldwin, then but two yeares old, in the preſence of the Patriarke, and diuers other Princes and great Commanders, commended vnto them the gouernment and defence of the kingdome, appointing Fulke to ſucceed him. And taking vnto himſelfe the habit and profeſſion of a Monke (if he ſhould haue longer liued) preſently after gaue vp the ghoſt the two and twentieth day of Auguſt, in the yeare 1131; whereof he raigned with much trouble thirteen D yeres, and was ſolemnly buried in the temple vpon mount Caluarie, with the other two kings Godfrey and Baldwin his predeceſſors.

The death of Baldwin the ſecond, the third King of Ieruſalem.

The Kings funerall ended, the Princes of the kingdome with one accord made choice of Fulke the old Countie, Earle of Aniou, for their King: who the 16 day of September, was with all ſolemnitie by William the Patriarke crowned in Ieruſalem. This man in the beginning of his raigne, beſides his troubles abroad, was alſo vext with domeſticall and inteſtine diſcord; Pontius Countie of Tripolis, ſeeking by force of arms to haue rent the dukedome of Antioch from the kingdom: and Hugh Countie of Ioppa, for feare of due puniſhment for his treaſon, joyning himſelf with the Saraſins of Aſcalon, and ſo with them infeſting the territories of Ieruſalem, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian ſtate, and aduantage of the infidels. Which trouble- E ſome broyles were yet afterwards by the King, partly by force, partly by the mediation of the Patriarke and other Princes (who ſeeing the danger thereof like to enſue, had interpoſed themſelues) well againe appeaſed. Vengeance yet neuertheleſſe ſtill following both the aforeſaid traitors: Pontius being ſhortly after ſlaine by the Turks, and Hugh dying in exile.

Beſides theſe domeſticall troubles, the Turks alſo inuaded the countrey about Antioch, where they were by the ſudden comming of the King ouerthrowne, with the loſſe of their tents, & exceeding great riches. And that nothing might be wanting vnto the diſquieting of the ſtate of that new erected kingdome, not long after, Iohn the Conſtantinopolitan Emperor, (together with the empire, inheritour alſo of his fathers malice, againſt the proceeding of the Chriſtians in Syria) with a puiſſant armie paſſing thorow the leſſer Aſia, and by the way taking F by force Tarſus the metropoliticall citie of Cilicia, with the whole prouince thereunto belonging, came and beſieged Antioch; which Fulke but a little before had, together with Conſtance the daughter and heire of the late Duke of Antioch, giuen in marriage to Raymund Countie of Poitou, for that purpeſe ſent out of France. But in this ſo dangerous a ſtate of that Chriſtian kingdome, the other zealous Chriſtian Princes interpoſed themſelues as mediators betwixt the Emperor (pretending the ſame to belong vnto his Empire) and Raymund that was in poſſeſſion thereof. And in fine brought it to this end, that Raymund for the preſent ſubmitting himſelfe vnto the Emperor, ſhould from thenceforth hold his dukedome of him as of his Lord and Soueraigne: vpon which agreement the Emperour returned vnto Tarſus, where he wintred, and ſo afterwards vnto Conſtantinople.

Much about the ſame time, Sanguin one of the Turks great Princes, inuading the countrey about Tripolis, beſieged the caſtle of Mont-Ferrand: vnto the reliefe whereof Fulke comming with his armie, was by the Turks ouerthrowne, and for the ſafegard of his life glad to take the refuge of the caſtle, the Countie himſelfe being in that battell taken priſoner. After which victorie, the Turks layed harder ſiege vnto the caſtle than before; the beſieged in the meane time being no leſſe pinched within with famine, than pinched without by the enemie. In this the Kings hard diſtreſſe, the other Princes hauing raiſed the whole power of the kingdome, were comming to his reliefe: whereof the Turke vnderſtanding, offered of himſelfe to giue them all leaue freely to depart, and to ſet the Countie at libertie, ſo that they would deliuer vnto him the caſtle: of which his offer they gladly accepting, yeelded vp the ſtrong Hold, and ſo departed. The King by the way meeting with the armie, thanked his friends for their forwardneſſe, and ſo returned to Ieruſalem.

Calo Ioannes the Greeke Emperour ſeeketh in vaine to haue ſurpriſed the citie of Antioch.

About foure yeares after, Iohn the Conſtantinopolitan Emperour with a great armie came againe into Syria, with purpoſe to haue vnited the famous citie of Antioch vnto his Empire, and ſo to haue made a way into the kingdome of Ieruſalem, whereafter he had now a good while longed. But comming thither in hope to haue found the Cilicians and Sirians readie to haue receiued him, he was deceiued of his expectation, being ſhut out by the Latines, and not ſuffered to enter but vpon his oath, and that with ſome few of his followers; and ſo after due reuerence done vnto him, quietly to depart without any ſtirre or innouation in the citie. In reuenge of which diſgrace, at his departure he gaue the ſuburbs of the city as a prey to his greedie ſoldiers, pretending the ſame to be done for want of victuals; who made hauock of whatſoeuer came to hand, not ſparing the verie fruit trees, but cutting them downe to dreſſe their meat withall. Hauing thus vnder colour of neceſſitie reuenged the diſgrace receiued, he returned into Cilicia, and there wintred: where one day for his diſport hunting of the wild boare, and hauing wounded him with his boare ſpeare, the wild beaſt therewith inraged, and with all his force bearing forward vpon the weapon, forced the Emperours hand backward vpon the point of a poyſoned arrow that was hanging in a quiuer at his backe, and ſo was therewith lightly wounded. Neuertheleſſe as light as the wound was, ſuch was the ſtrength of the poyſon, that the griefe thereof ſtil increaſing, and his hand & arme more and more ſwelling, there was no remedie to be found, but that his arme muſt be cut off: which deſperat and vncertaine cure he abhorring, and in the extremitie of his paine oftentimes pleaſantly ſaying, That the Greeke Empire was not to be gouerned with one hand; ouercome with the ſtrength of the poyſon, died. In whoſe place ſucceeded his youngeſt ſonne Emanuel, Alexius and Andronicus his two elder ſonnes being both dead at his ſetting forth vnto this ſo vnhappie an expedition.

The death of Calo Ioannes the Greeke Emperour.

It fortuned about this time alſo, that the kingdome of Ieruſalem being now at peace, that Fulke the King, with the Queene his wife, lying at the citie of Ptolemais in the time of Autumne, it pleaſed the Queene for her diſport to walke out of the Citie, vnto certaine pleaſant fountains there by in the country; for whoſe companie the King would neeeds go alſo, with certaine of his courtiers: where by the way it chanced that certaine boyes running along the field, put vp an hare that was ſitting in a furrow; after which all the Courtiers on horſebacke gallopped amaine, with notable outcry and hollowing. Amongſt the reſt, the King to be partaker of the ſport, forcing his horſe to the vttermoſt of his power, in the midſt of his courſe fell, together with his horſe foundring vnder him, and in falling, chanced to fall his head vnder the horſe: with whoſe weight, and the hardneſſe of his ſaddle, he was ſo cruſhed, that the braines came out both at his noſe and eares. In this pittifull caſe being taken vp for dead, and with great heauineſſe being carried backe, he yet breathing lay ſpeechleſſe three dayes, and ſo died the thirteenth of Nouember, in the yeare of Grace 1142. His dead bodie afterwards brought to Ieruſalem, was there with great magnificence, and the generall lamentation of all his ſubiects, buried with the other Kings his predeceſſors.

The miſerable death of Fulke, fourth King of Ieruſalem.

Now had the late King left behind him two ſons, Baldwin about the age of thirteen yeres,

A and Almerick about the age of ſeuen. Of the elder of theſe two, the Chriſtian Princes made choice, who by the name of Baldwin the third, was together with Meleſinda his mother, partner with him in the kingdome, vpon Chriſtmas day with great ſolemnitie crowned King of Ieruſalem, in the yeare 1142. About which time, Sanguin the Turke, taking hold of the diſcord betwixt Raymund Prince of Antioch, & Ioſcelin Countie of Edeſſa, came and with a great power beſieged Edeſſa, the Countie being at the ſame time abſent: and did ſo much, that at length he tooke the citie by vndermining of it, where the bloudie Turke exerciſed all manner of cruelty vpon the poore Chriſtians in the citie. By the loſſe of this famous city, ſo large a territorie fell againe into the hands of the Turks, as that three Archbiſhopricks were thereby drawne from the Church of Antioch. The Turke encouraged with this victorie, ſtraightwaies B after beſieged Cologenbar, another ſtrong towne of the Chriſtians: one night drinking liberally with his friends, he was by one of them in his drunkenneſſe ſtabbed, and ſo ſlaine, and the ſiege raiſed. In whoſe ſtead Noradin his ſonne ſucceeded.

Baldwin the third of that name fiſt King of Ieruſalem.

Baldwin, in the firſt yeare of his raigne, recouered from the Turkes the Caſtle of Sobal, a ſtrong hold beyond Iordan, which hee notably fortified, for the defence of that ſide of his kingdome againſt the incurſions of the Turks. But the next yeare vndertaking an expedition againſt the King of Damaſco, he was by Noradin the Turke, the Kings ſonne in law, ſo hardly beſet in his returne, as that it was accounted a thing miraculous, how he with his armie eſcaped his hands.

The report of the loſſe of Edeſſa, with the miſeries there endured by the Chriſtians, being bruted thorow all parts of Chriſtendome, greatly moued the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt.
C Whom Eugenius the third, then Biſhop of Rome, ceaſed not both by himſelfe and by his Legates to ſtir vp to take that ſacred war in hand. And therein wrought ſo effectually, that almoſt in euery prouince of Chriſtendome preparation was made for the reliefe of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria. Of all others, Conrade the third then Emperor of Germanie, was moſt forward, who aided by the German Princes and others, with an incredible number of voluntarie men out of all parts of Chriſtendome, had raiſed a moſt puiſſant army, and therewith ſet forward on this ſacred expedition. Of this his deuout purpoſe he had before certified Emanuel the Greeke Emperour, thorow whoſe countries he was to paſſe, crauing that he might by his good fauor ſo doe, and for his money to be relieued with victuals, and other ſuch things as he ſhould haue need of for himſelfe or his people; promiſing in moſt quiet and peaceable manner D to paſſe, without any harme doing vnto his territories or ſubiects. Al which the Greek Emperor, commending his zeale, ſeemed in moſt large terms willingly to condeſcend vnto. Neuertheles he inwardly repined thereat, wiſhing indeed no better ſucceſſe to the Chriſtians in this ſo honourable an expedition, than did the Infidels themſelues, as by the ſequel of his doings wel appeared. For Conrade with his populous army, indeed a terror vnto the Greeks, entring into the frontiers of the Conſtantinopolitan empire, found al things in ſhew friendly (for why Emanuel had before giuen out ſtrait command, that good ſtore of victuals & all other neceſſaries ſhould be ready at all places to be ſold as the army was to paſſe:) but they were not farre come into the country, but that in the taile of the army ſtil followed certain ſtrong companies E of the Greeks, to keepe the ſoldiers from ſtragling from their enſignes, roaming about in the country, now & then cutting them ſhort, as they tooke them at aduantage. And ſtil the further that they trauelled, the more it was to be ſeen in the countenances of the diſcontented Greks, how vnwelcome gueſts they were. Yet ſtil on they went thorow the countries of their diſſembling friends, little differing from open enemies, vntil they came to Phillippopolis: in departing from whence, ſuch diſcord roſe between them that were in the rereward of the army, & the Greeks that followed them, that it was like to haue come to plain battell, had not thoſe broils, by the diſcretion of ſome of the wiſer ſort, bin in good time appeaſed. So marching on they came to Adrianople, & in few days after to the plain called Cherobachi, thorow which the riuer Melas hath his courſe, which in Summer being almoſt dry, in Winter or any other great downefall of water, right ſuddenly ouerfloweth his bankes, and ſo drowneth the whole country, that then it ſeemeth no more a riuer, but a ſea; and ſwelling with the wind, is not to F be paſſed ouer but by great boats. This riuer then ſuddenly riſing by night, by reaſon of the great rain that then fell, in ſuch aboundance, as if the flood gates of heauen had bin opened, ſo ouerflowed the place wherein the armie lay encamped vpon the ſide thereof, that with the violence of the water were carried away not only many weapons, ſaddles, garments, and ſuch other the ſouldiers neceſſaries, but euen the horſes and mules, with their burdens, yea & great numbers of armed men themſelues alſo, a moſt miſerable & lamentable thing to behold. Many valiant men there fel without fight, and died no men killing them: to be tal, helped not; neither did valor ſtand them in any ſtead; they periſhed like hay, & were caried away like chaffe, with ſuch outcries and lamentation, that they which ſaw it, verily ſaid, That the wrath of God was broke into the camp: ſuch a ſudden inundation had ouerwhelmed all, that happie was he could make ſhift for himſelfe, without regarding one another. This misfortune ſore troubled the Emperor with his whole army. Neuertheleſſe, the water being againe fallen, and all put in ſo good order, as in ſuch a confuſion was poſſible, he marched on to the imperial citie: which the ſuſpicious and malicious Greeke had before notably fortified & ſo ſtrongly manned with armed men gliſtring vpon the wals, in ſuch ſort as if it ſhould haue preſently bin aſſaulted.

Conrade approching the citie, was not ſuffered to enter, but perſuaded by the Greek Emperour forthwith to tranſport his armie ouer the ſtrait, with promiſe to ſupplie his wants with whatſoeuer he ſhould require. Which was don with ſuch haſt, as if nothing had bin farther to haue bin regarded, but only to haue them ſhipped ouer: in which ſeruice the Greekes ſpared no labour, or kinde of veſſell, that might ſerue to tranſport them. The Greeke Emperour in the meane time, by men ſecretly appointed for that purpoſe, keeping account of the number that paſſed, vntill that they wearied with the multitude, ceaſed further to number them. But when they were once ſhipt ouer, then began the couert malice of the Greek Emperor forthwith to appeare. For, beſides that they truſting vnto his promiſes, had brought little or no prouiſions ouer with them, the countrey people by his appointment brought nothing vnto them to ſell, as before: and they of the towns and cities ſhut their gates againſt them as they marched, not affording them any thing, but at an extream rate, for which they would firſt receiue their mony by ropes caſt down from the wals, and then deliuer them what they pleaſed therfore, yea and oftentimes nought at all. Among many other vile practiſes, not beſeeming Chriſtians, the miſchieuous Greekes, to poiſon the ſouldiers, mingled lime with the meale which they ſold vnto the armie, whereof many of the hungrie ſoldiers greedily feeding, died. Whether the Greeke Emperour were priuie thereunto, or no, is not certainly knowne; but certain it is, that he cauſed counterfeit mony to be coined, of purpoſe to deceiue them: and in briefe, there was no kinde of miſchiefe to bee practiſed againſt them, which either hee himſelfe deuiſed not, or ſet not others to deuiſe; to the intent that their poſteritie, terrified by this ſo vnfortunat an expedition, might for euer be afraid to take the like in hand againe. And that nothing might be wanting that malice could deuiſe, he had ſecret intelligence with the Turkes themſelues, concerning the ſtrength of the army, plotting vnto them the means how the ſame might beſt be defeated: whereby it came to paſſe, that ſome part thereof was by Pamplano, a captaine of the Turks, ouerthrowne neere Bathis, and many ſlain. But attempting to haue done the like vnto that part of the armie that paſſed thorow Phrygia, they were themſelues ouertaken in their owne deuice and ouerthrowne, with a great ſlaughter. After which, the Turks in great number, to ſtay the Chriſtians further paſſage, kept the riuer Mœander, encamping vpon the farther banke of that winding riuer, with a moſt huge army. There theſe worthy Chriſtians right well declared, that it was but their patience, that the Grecian legions that had before ſo long followd them, with their countries & cities they had paſſed by, were not to them become a prey. For the Emperor comming vnto the riuer ſide, where was neither bridge nor boat to paſſe ouer, & finding the great army of the Turks on the other ſide, ready to giue him battell if he ſhould aduenture the riuer, with their archers ſtanding vpon the very bank ſide: he retired a little out of the danger of the ſhot, and there encamping, commanded his ſoldiers to refreſh themſelues and their horſes that night, and to be ready againſt the next morning to ioyne battell with their enemies they were ſo far come to ſeek for. Little reſt ſerued him that night; early in the morning before day he aroſe, and arming himſelfe, put his whole army in order of battel: as did alſo the enemie on the other ſide of the riuer, with their batalions orderly placed, and their archers vpon the banke ſide, ready to giue the firſt charge on the Chriſtians, if they ſhould aduenture to come ouer. Both armies thus ſtanding in readines the one in ſight of the other, & nothing but the winding riuer betwixt them, the Emperor before reſolued to fight, with cheerefull countenance and ſpeech encouraged his men as followeth.

The Turks with a great armie ſeeke to ſtay Conrade his farther paſſage at the riuer Mæander.

A That this expedition was of vs taken in hand, for Chriſt his ſake, and for the glorie of God, and not of man, you know right well fellow ſouldiers. For, for this cauſe hauing contemned a pleaſant life at home, voluntarily ſeperated from our neereſt and deereſt friends, wee indure miſeries in forraine countries; wee are expoſed vnto dangers, wee pine with hunger, wee quake with cold, wee languiſh with heat; wee haue the earth our bed, the heauen our couering: and although wee be noble, famous, renowned, rich, ruling ouer nations; yet weare we alwaies our gorgets as neceſſarie bonds, & are with them and our armour loaded, as was the greateſt ſeruant of Chriſt, Peter, ſurcharged with two chaines, and kept with foure quaternions of ſoldiers. But theſe Barbarians (diuided from vs by this riuer) to be the enemies of the croſſe of Chriſt, whom wee of long haue deſired to encounter withall, in whoſe bloud (as Dauid ſaith) we haue vowed to waſh our ſelues: Who is there that knoweth not, except he be altogether blockiſh B and will not with open eyes ſee, nor open eares heare? If wee wiſh to aſcend ſtraight way into heauen, (for neither is God vniuſt, that hee knoweth not the cauſe of this our iourney, or will not in recompence giue vnto vs the immortall fields, and ſhadie dwellings of Paradice, which hauing forſaken our owne dwellings, haue choſe rather for his ſake to die than to liue) if wee call to remembrance what things theſe men of vncircumciſed hearts doe commit againſt our friends and countreymen, if wee remember what grieuous tortures they inflict vpon them, or if wee be any thing touched with the compaſſion of their innocent bloud, vnworthily ſpilt; ſtand now couragiouſly, and fight valiantly, and let not any feare or terrour daunt vs. Let theſe Barbarians know, that by how much Chriſt our maſter and inſtructer doth excell their falſe prophet and ſeducer, authour of their vaine impietie; ſo much are wee ſuperiours vnto them in all things. Seeing therefore wee are an holy campe, and an armie gathered by the power of God, let vs not cowardly loſe our ſelues, or feare for Chriſt his ſake honourably C to aduenture our liues. For if Chriſt died for vs, how much more right is it that we for him ſhould die alſo? Vnto this ſo honourable an expedition let vs alſo giue an honourable end: let vs fight in Chriſts name, with a moſt aſſured hope of an eaſie victorie. For none of them (I truſt) ſhal be able to abide our force, but ſhall all giue way, euen to our firſt charge. But if wee ſhall die (which God forbid) there ſhall be an honourable place of our buriall, whereſoeuer wee ſhall for Chriſt fall. Let the Perſian archer for Chriſt his ſake, ſtrike me, I will die in aſſured hope; and with that arrow, as with a chariot, I wil come vnto that reſt, which ſhal be to me deerer than if I ſhould with a baſe or ordinarie kind of death in my ſinnes end my dayes in a bed. Now at length let vs take reuenge of them, with whoſe impure feet our kinſmen and Chriſtian brethren troden downe, are gone into that common ſanctuarie, D in which Chriſt our Sauiour, equall and aſſociate to his Father, is become a companion of the dead. Wee are thoſe mightie men, wee all haue drawne our ſwords, which ſtand about the liuely and diuine ſepulchre, as about Salomons bed. Wherefore we that be free borne, let vs take out of the way theſe Agarens, the children of the bondwoman: and let vs remooue them as ſtones of offence out of the way of Chriſt: whom (I know not why) the Grecians feed vp as greedie wolues to their owne deſtruction, and with ſhame fat them with their bloud; when as with couragious mindes and thoughts beſeeming wiſe men, they ought ſo to haue beene driuen from their prouinces and cities, as rauening wilde beaſts from their flocks. Now for as much as this Riuer, as it ſeemeth, is not, but by ſome aduenture to be paſſed ouer, I my ſelfe will ſhew you the way, and be the firſt that ſhall take it. Let vs, ſerred together, forcibly breake into the riuer, and wee ſhall well enough ride thorow it. I know that the water beaten backe by E our force, will bee at a ſtand, and breake the courſe, returning as it were backward. By not vnlike meanes the Iſraelites in antient time on foot paſſed ouer Iordan, the courſe of the riuer being ſtaid. This attempt ſhall be ſpoken of in all poſteritie, it ſhall by no tract of time be worne out or forgotten, but ſtil remaine in freſh remembrance, to the great diſhonour of the Turkes, whoſe dead bodies ouerthrowne at this riuer, ſhall lie like a mountaine, and be ſeene as a Trophey of our victorie, vnto the worlds end, and our immortall praiſe and glorie.

A notable ſpeech of Conrade the Emperour, to encourage his ſouldiers to aduenture the riuer Meander.

Hauing thus ſaid, and the ſignall of battell giuen, euery man hauing before by deuout praier commended himſelfe vnto almightie God, he was the firſt that put ſpurs to his horſe, & tooke the riuer; after whom followed the reſt, ſo cloſe & ſo forcibly, with ſuch a terible outcry, that the courſe of the water, being by the force of their horſes ſtaid, and as it were beaten backtowards the fountain, the whole army paſſed ouer with leſſe trouble than was feared. And then F charging the Turks, already diſcouraged to haue ſeen them ſo deſperatly, & contrary to their expectation, to haue paſſed the riuer; after ſome ſmal reſiſtance put them to flight, wherin ſuch infinit numbers of them fel, the Chriſtians like fierce lions purſuing the chace, that al the vallies lies ran with bloud, and the fields were couered with the bodies of the dead. Many of the Italians were wounded with the Turks arrowes, and but few or none ſlain. But what a multitude of the enemies there fell, the ſundrie and hugie heapes of bones, to bee compared vnto great hils, did long time after well declare; whereat euery man that trauelled that way did worthily wonder, as did I my ſelfe (ſaith Nicetas Choniates) in reporting this hiſtorie. Not much vnlike that, is reported of the Cimbers, ſlaine by Marius in ſuch number, that of their bones the countrey people about Marcellis where the field was fought, long time after made walls for the defence of their vineyards. Iconium in vaine. beſieged by the Chriſtians.

After this ſo great a victory, the Chriſtians without reſiſtance came to Iconium, the chiefe ſeat of the Turkiſh Kings in the leſſer Aſia, which they hardly beſieged. Neuertheleſſe, ſuch was the ſtrength of the citie, being ſtrongly fortified both by Nature and Art, together with H the valour of the defendants, that lying there long, they little preuailed, preſſed in the meane time with greater extremities & wants in the camp, than were the beſieged in the citie: whereupon enſued ſuch a mortalitie, people dayly without number dying in the army, that the Emperor was glad to raiſe his ſiege and to returne into his countrey. The chiefe cauſe as well of this ſo great a mortalitie, as of the ouerthrow of ſo notable an action, moſt men aſcribe vnto the malice of the Greekes; who not without the priuitie of their Emperour (as it was commonly bruited) mingled lime with the meale which they brought to ſell into the armie, whereof the hungrie ſouldiers deſirouſly feeding, were therewith poiſoned, and ſo miſerably died. Of the certaine time of this iourney of the Emperours into Aſia, Authours agree not; 1146 howbeit muſt referre it vnto the yeare 1146. I

This expedition, though not ſo fortunat as it was at the firſt wel hoped of, yet profited the Chriſtian common weale in this, That the Turks therewith throughly buſied, and doubtful of the euent thereof, Baldwin in the meane time fortified Gaza (ſometimes a famous citie of the Philiſtines, but as then ruinous) which ſerued as a moſt ſure bulwarke for the defence of that part of his kingdome towards Ægypt: and alſo for the diſtreſſing of Aſcalon, the only refuge of the Ægyptians, then left in that countrey: which ſtrong citie ſtanding vpon the ſea ſide, he with all the power of his kingdome afterward beſieged both by ſea and land; vnto the reliefe whereof, the Caliph of Ægypt, after it had beene fiue moneths by the Chriſtians beſieged, ſent a ſtrong fleet of threeſcore and ten gallies. At which time alſo on the other ſide Noradin the Turke, who had now got into his hand all the kingdome of Damaſco, to withdraw the K Chriſtians from the ſiege of Aſcalon, beſieged Paneada, from whence he was by the valour of the citizens repulſed, as was alſo the Caliphs fleet at ſea, and the ſiege at Aſcalon continued. Where at length the Chriſtians after long batterie had made a breach in the wall; but giuing thereunto an aſſault, they were with great loſſe of their men repulſed, and the breach againe by the enemie repaired; who to the greater deſpight of the Chriſtians, hanged ouer the wals in ropes the dead bodies of their ſlaine: with which ſpectacle the chiefe commanders of the armie were ſo moued, that they with all their power returned againe to the aſſault, with a full reſolution to gage thereon their whole forces: which they ſo couragiouſly performed, that the beſieged diſcouraged with the great ſlaughter of their men, and now with true valour ouercome, craued parley; and ſo couenanting that they might with their liues in ſafety depart, L agreed to yeeld vp the citie, which they accordingly performed. The ſpoile of the citie was giuen to the ſoldiers, and the gouernment thereof vnto Almericke the Kings brother, Earle of Ioppa. By this victorie, great ſecuritie was gained vnto that ſide of the kingdome, the enemy hauing now no place left in thoſe parts whereon to ſet his foot.

The honourable expedition of Lewis the French king, by the malice of the Greekes, and enuie of other Chriſtian princes of Syria fruſtrated and brought to nought.

About the ſame time alſo (or as ſome write, euen at the ſame time together with the Emperor) Lewis the French King, the eight of that name, tooke vpon him the like expedition for the reliefe of the Chriſtians in the Holy Land: who ſetting forward with all the chiualrie of France, and accompanied with diuers other great Princes, with a right puiſſant army came to Conſtantinople, where he was by Emanuel the Emperor honorably receiued, with all the outward ſhews of feigned courteſie that could be deuiſed. But hauing paſſed the ſtrait, and landed M in Aſia, he found nothing anſwerable to that the diſſembling Greeke had before moſt largely promiſed. And to diſtreſſe him the more, was by falſe guides before corrupted by the Emperour, conducted thorow the moſt deſolate and barren countries, where by the way a wonderfull number of his ſouldiers periſhed of hunger and thirſt: many of them alſo being cut off in

A the ſtrait and difficult paſſages, or as they ſtraied from the army by the Greeks themſelues, appointed by the malicious Emperour for that purpoſe. Yet after many dangers paſſed, and his armie ſore waſted, he came at length into Syria, and laid ſiege vnto Damaſco, the royal ſeat of Noradin the Turkiſh king; which he ſo notably impugned, that the defendants were almoſt out of hope to be able for any long time to hold out. Neither had it otherwiſe happened, had not enuie, the inſeparable attendant of all honourable actions, fruſtrated ſo great an hope: for the beſieged Turks being brought to great extremity, and now euen at the point to haue yeelded the citie, certaine of the Chriſtian Princes of that countrey, vnderſtanding that the king had promiſed the gouernment of that ſo famous a citie, vnto Philip Earle of Flanders, if it ſhould be won, & ſecretly grudging to haue a ſtranger preferred before themſelues, corrupted B alſo (as ſome ſay) with the Turks gold, fraudulently perſuaded the King to remoue from that part of the city where he lay, and might in fine haue taken the ſame, vnto another far ſtronger: where, after he had lien a great while, ſtriuing with no ſmall extremities, he was enforced for want of victuals to raiſe his ſiege and to depart. And ſo without any thing done worth the remembrance, returned againe into France, deteſting the very name of Emanuel the Greeke Emperor, by whoſe ſiniſter dealing, ſo notable an expedition was brought to be of none effect, to the great diſcouraging of all other Chriſtian Princes for taking the like againe in hand.

Now had the ſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria, for certaine yeres after the aforeſaid expeditions, reſted in good peace: when Noradin the Turke (moued with ſome iniuries done by the Chriſtians vnto the Turkes and Arabians, who by the leaue of King Baldwin dwelt in the forreſt of Lybanus) came and ſtraitly beſieged Paneada, a citie of the Chriſtians there by: vpon C whom the Chriſtians in the citie, now brought vnto great extremitie, made a moſt deſperate ſallie, and had with the Turks a ſharpe and cruell fight: but oppreſſed with the multitude, and inforced to retire, they were ſo hardly purſued, that the Turks together with them entred the citie, and put to ſword al that came in their way. Neuertheles, the greater part of the citizens (by good fortune) had in good time before retired themſelues into the caſtle, which was of great ſtrength, and there ſtood vpon their gard. Of whoſe diſtreſſe, with the taking of the city, Baldwin hearing, raiſed a great army, & ſo ſet forward to relieue them. But Noradin hearing of his comming, and doubtfull of his owne ſtrength, after hee had taken the ſpoile of what hee could, ſet fire on the city, and ſo departed. The citizens thus deliuered, repaired again the wals D of the city, the Kings power ſtill defending them. Noradin with his power all the while lying cloſe in the woods not farre off, ſtill awaiting the offer of ſome good opportunitie to take the Chriſtians at aduantage, which ſhortly after fel out according to his owne deſire: for the king doubting no ſuch matter, but ſuppoſing him to haue bin quite gone, hauing at his returne ſent away all his footmen, followed after himſelfe, accompanied only with his horſmen, and they alſo not very ſtrong: but as he was paſſing the riuer Iordan, he was ſuddenly ſet vpon by Noradin & the Turks, and after a ſharp conflict ouerthrown: the king himſelf with ſome few hardly eſcaped to Saphet, a town there by; moſt part of his nobility being there either ſlaine or taken priſoners: among the reſt, Bertrand of Blanquefort, maſter of the Templars, with diuers others of great name, fel at that time into the enemies hands, & ſo were carried away priſoners.

Paneade againe repaired by the Chriſtians.

E After this victorie, Noradin ſtrengthened with new ſupplies from Damaſco, came againe and beſieged Paneade, in good hope, that the citizens diſcouraged with ſo great an ouerthrow of the king, and out of hope to bee by them relieued, would now either yeeld the city, or elſe not be able long to hold it out. But the king, contrary to his expectation, had in ſhorter time than was thought poſſible, raiſed a great power; and aided by the prince of Antioch, and the countie of Tripolis, was marching to the reliefe of his citie: of which approch Noradin vnderſtanding, although hee had made diuers breaches in the wals, and brought the citizens almoſt vnto vtter deſpaire; roſe with his armie and departed. And ſo Baldwin hauing now twice relieued the beſieged citie, returned alſo to Ieruſalem.

Many an hard conflict with the Turks had this young king afterwards, during the fortunate F time of his raigne: wherein that troubleſome kingdom happily flouriſhed amidſt the miſcreants; all which to recount, were long and tedious. Yet among other things, it is worth the remembrance, how that Noradin the Turke, then King of Damaſco, beſieging Sueta, a caſtle belonging to the kingdome of Ieruſalem, was in a ſet battell by Baldwin ouerthrowne and put to flight, with the loſſe of the greateſt part of his armie. King Baldwin had before married ried Emanuel the Greeke Emperors neece: and now the ſame Emperor by Guido Stephanus, and Triſillas his embaſſadours, requeſted to haue giuen him againe in marriage one of the Kings nigh kinſwomen. Vnto whom the King, after mature deliberation had concerning the matter, offered him Matilde, an honourable Lady, the ſiſter of the countie of Tripolis; whom the Emperour refuſed: and afterward by the conſent of the king, made choice of Mary the daughter of Raimund Prince of Antioch lately dead. Which the countie of Tripolis taking in euill part, in reuenge therof, by certaine men of warre whom he put to ſea, grieuouſly infeſted the frontiers of the Emperours dominions. Now during the time that the marriage was in ſolemnizing, the king made his abode at Antioch, at which time hee fortified the caſtle of Pontiſer vpon the riuer Orantes, againſt the incurſions of the enemies. But lying there, he according to his wonted manner, to preuent ſickneſſe, vpon the approch of Winter tooke phyſicke of Barac a Iew, the countie of Tripolis his phyſitian. After the taking whereof, hee fell preſently into the bloudie flix, and afterward into a conſumption: whereby it was verily ſuppoſed, that he was poyſoned by the Iew; and the rather, for that ſome little part of the ſame medicine that was left, being giuen to a dogge, he thereof in ſhort time dyed. The King thus languiſhing in paine, to change the aire, remooued firſt to Tripolis, and afterward to Berytus, where hee departed this troubleſome life, to liue with his Sauiour Chriſt in bliſſe for euer. His dead bodie was afterward with generall mourning of his ſubiects conueied to Ieruſalem, and there ſolemnly enterred by the bodie of his father. He departed the 13 of Februarie, in the yeare of Grace 1163, when he had raigned 21 yeares. He was a man ſo gracious, that not onely his friends, but euen the Infidels themſelues (as it is reported) lamented his death. Inſomuch that Noradin King of Damaſco, his antient enemie, beeing incited by ſome of his captains to inuade his kingdome at ſuch time as his funerals were in ſolemnizing, refuſed ſo to doe, anſwering, That compaſſion and regard was to be had of the iuſt ſorrow of the Chriſtians his ſubiects; for that they had loſt ſuch a King, the like was hardly againe to be found in the world.

The death of king Baldwin lamented by his enemies.

Diſcord among the Turkes in the leſſer Aſia.

Maſut the Sultan diuideth his kingdome amongſt his three ſonnes.

But leauing the kingdome of Ieruſalem, with the greater part of Seruia, thus victoriouſly gained from the Infidels; let vs for the orderly continuation of our hiſtorie, againe returne to ſee the proceedings of the Turkes at the ſame time in the leſſer Aſia alſo: wherein they yet held the ſtate of a kingdome, though not ſo great as before the comming of the Princes of the Weſt into thoſe countries. After the death of Sultan Solyman (with whom Duke Godfrey and the other Chriſtian Princes had much to doe as they paſſed into Syria) as is aforeſaid, one Muhamet ſucceeded him: betwixt whom and Maſut, Sultan of Iconium, great diſcord aroſe, which at length broke out into open war, to the further weakning of that late ſhaken kingdome. For the maintenance of which quarrell, as profitable for his ſtate, Iohn Comnenus the Greeke Emperor, gaue aid to Maſut, againſt his enemie Muhamet. Neuertheleſſe in ſhort time the two Infidels (profeſſing both one ſuperſtition) became friends, & ioyning their forces, ouerthrew the Emperour with his whole armie, as he lay at the ſiege of Iconium, at which time he himſelfe with much adoe eſcaped by flight. Maſut afterwards hauing got into his hands the whole kingdom of the Turks, at the time of his death diuided the ſame among his three ſons: vnto Clizaſtblan his eldeſt ſon he gaue Iconium his chiefe city, with the towns and prouinces ſubiect thereunto: vnto Iagupaſan his other ſon (or rather as ſome will haue it, his ſon in law) he allotted Amaſia and Ancyra, with the fruitfull countrey of Cappadocia, and the places adioyning: but vnto Dadune his other ſon (or ſon in law) he gaue the great cities of Ceſarea and Sebaſtia, with the large countries thereabouts, all ſometime a part of the Greeke empire, but then the portions of the Turks. Long it was not after this diuiſion of the kingdome, but that theſe brethren after the manner of ambitious men, forgetfull of the bonds both of loue & nature, fell at diſcord among themſeluer; the Sultan ſeeking the deſtruction of Iagupaſan, and hee likewiſe of him, and that not by ſecret meanes, but euen by open force of armes. Emanuel the Greeke Emperor in the mean time wiſhing the deſtruction of them both, heartily reioycing thereat, and by his embaſſadours ſecretly animating the one againſt the other; yet in open ſhew more fauouring of the part of Iagupaſan than of the Sultan, by whoſe aid hee obtained againſt him many notable and bloudie victories: inſomuch that the Sultan wearie of the quarrell, was glad not onely by his embaſſadours to ſeeke the Emperours fauor, but euen in perſon himſelfe to goe and meet him, as he came with his army out of Syria,

A and ſo to accompanie him vnto Conſtantinople, where he was together with the Emperour moſt honorably receiued, with all the ſignes of joy and triumph that could poſſibly be deui-ſed. The Emperor no leſſe rejoycing to be ſued vnto by ſo great a Prince, than did the Sultan at his ſo honorable entertainment.

Nicetas Choniates, rerum ab imper. Manuele Comneno, geſtar. li. 3. fol. 143.

Among other queint deuices of many, for the ſolemniſing of ſo great a triumph, there was an actiue Turke who had openly giuen it out, That againſt an appointed time he would from the top of an high tower in the tilt yard flie by the ſpace of a furlong: the report whereof had filled the citie with a wonderfull expectation of ſo ſtrange a noueltie. The time prefixed being come, and the people without number aſſembled, the Turke according to his promiſe, vpon the top of an high tower ſhewed himſelfe, girt in a long and large white garment, gathered into many pleits and foldings, made of purpoſe for the gathering of the wind: wherwith B the fooliſh man had vainely perſuaded himſelfe to haue houered in the aire, as doe birds vpon their wings, or to haue guided himſelfe as are ſhips with their ſailes. Standing thus houering a great while, as readie to take his flight; the beholders ſtill laughing, and crying out, Flie Turke, flie, how long ſhall we expect thy flight? The Emperor in the meane time ſtill diſſua-ding him from ſo deſperate an attempt; and the Sultan betwixt feare and hope hanging in doubtfull ſuſpence what might happen to his countreyman. The Turke, after he had a great while houered with his armes abroad, (the better to haue gathered the wind, as birds do with their wings) and long deluded the expectation of the beholders, at length finding the winde fit, as he thought, for his purpoſe, committed himſelfe with his vaine hope vnto the aire: but C in ſtead of mounting aloft, this fooliſh Icarus came tumbling downe with ſuch violence, that he brake his necke, his arms, his legs, with almoſt all the bones of his bodie. This fooliſh flight of the Turke gaue ſuch occaſion of ſport and laughter vnto the vulgar people (alwaies readie to ſcoffe and jeaſt at ſuch ridiculous matters) that the Turks attending vpon the Sultan could not walke in the ſtreets vnderided; the artificers in their ſhops ſhaking their arms, with their tooles in their hands, as did the Turke, and ſtill crying out, Flie Turke, flie: whereof the Emperor hearing, although he could not chuſe but thereat ſmile himſelfe, as not ignorant of the ſcoffes and taunts of the vulgar people; yet in fauour of the Sultan, who was not a little grie-ued therewith, he commanded ſuch their inſolencie to be reſtrained.

The ſolemnitie of the triumph ouerpaſſed (which by an ominous earthquake at the ſame time hapning, was ſomwhat obſcured) the Emperor to ſhew his wealth, & to gratifie the Sul-D tan, gaue vnto him many rich and royal preſents, with ſuch a maſſe of treaſure, as that he much wondred thereat. In requitall whereof, and in token of his thankfulneſſe, he again honored the Emperor with the name of his father, and terming himſelfe by the name of his ſon, promiſed to reſtore vnto him the citie of Sebaſtia, with the territorie thereunto belonging, then part of Dadune his inheritance. Neuertheleſſe all this was nothing elſe but meere diſſimulation, as afterward by proofe appeared: for returning home, he thruſt Dadune indeed out of Sebaſtia, which he ſpoyled, with the country thereabout; but forgetfull of his promiſe, kept it wholly to himſelfe, and by force tooke alſo from him the city of Cæſarea, with the country of Amaſia, by him before but lately poſſeſſed. In like manner he bent his forces alſo vpon Iagupaſan E his other brother, who in the verie preparation of thoſe wars died: by whoſe vntimely death the citie of Ancyra, with all his dominions in Capadocia, fell into the Sultans hands. Who now poſſeſſed of all his fathers kingdome, and ſwelling with pride, forgetting all former cur-teſies, inuaded the Emperors territories, & tooke from him the citie of Laodicea in Phrygia, where he did great harme, as alſo in the country thereabouts, killing the people as he went, or elſe carrying them away with him captiues. For the repreſſing of which outrages, the Emperor with a ſtrong armie paſſed ouer into Aſia, and there in the frontiers of his territories fortified Dorileum againſt the incurſions of the Turks. In performing whereof, he, to the example and ſtirring vp of others, carried the firſt basket of ſtones himſelfe vpon his ſhoulders; and vſed ſuch further diligence, that in ſhort time the citie was compaſſed about with ſtrong wals, F and deepe ditches, maugre the Turks, who ceaſed not with continuall alarmes and skirmiſhes to haue hindred the worke. With like care, and for like purpoſe he alſo fortified Subleum, another ſtrong Hold; and leauing in either place a ſtrong garriſon, returned againe to Conſtantinople. Neuertheleſſe the Turks ceaſed not with continuall inrodes to doe what harmes they might vpon the frontiers of the Empire, although not altogether with ſo good ſucceſſe as before,

Vnkindneſſe betwixt the emperour and the Sultan.

before,being many times cut off by the garriſons of the late fortified towns : which grieuances G ſtill increaſing, cauſed the Emperor to expoſtulate with the Sultan,as with an vnthankfull man, and forgetfull of ſo great kindneſſe before done vnto him,as the eſtabliſhment of him in his kingdome came vnto : who with no leſſe vehemencie vpbraided him againe with inconſtancie and breach of promiſe, as well for fortifying the aforeſaid places, contrarie to the league betwixt them, as for that hauing promiſed much more, he had thereof performed nothing.
Thus vnkindneſſe dayly growing vpon euerie trifle (as it commonly falleth out among men of great ſpirit, and jealous of their owne honors) it was dayly expected,when the matter ſhould fall out into open and bloudie war; both of them being men of great valour,and apt to reuenge the leaſt iniurie to them offered. Yet was it the Sultans manner, warily to mannage his wars by his politique and expert captaines; whereas the Emperour being of an hotter nature, H and couragious aboue meaſure, commonly in all his great expeditions aduentured his own perſon,without reſpect what danger might thereof inſue vnto himſelfe or his ſtate.Long it was not but that the Emperour,fully reſolued to be reuenged of ſo many wrongs done vnto him and his ſubiects by the Turks,raiſed the whole power of his Empire, both in Europe and Aſia, in ſuch ſort as if he had therewith purpoſed, not only to haue raſed to the ground Iconium the regall ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultan, but euen vtterly to haue deſtroyed the whole Nation of the Turks. Thus with a moſt puiſſant and populous armie,wel appointed of all things neceſſarie, he paſſed ouer into Aſia, and ſo in good order marching thorow Phrygia, Laodicea, Chonas, (called in antient time Paſſas) S.Archangel,Lampis, Cælænas, (where the head of the great and famous riuer Mæander riſeth,whereinto the riuer Marſyas falleth) and from I thence to Chonia,he with euill lucke,and worſe ſpeed,paſſed by Myriocephalon, an old ruinous caſtle, ominous by the name thereof,as by the euent in ſhort time after it prooued. And albeit that he marched verie circumſpectly, ſtill intrenching his armie in euery place where he lodged; yet could he make but ſmal ſpeed,by reaſon of the multitude of his carriages,and of the baſe people that attended the ſame. The Turks in the meane while oftentimes ſhewing themſelues in troupes, and in places of aduantage skirmiſhing ſometime with one part of the armie,and ſometime with another,but neuer daring to aduenture the fortune of a juſt battell: yet by ſuch meanes were the victuallers of the armie oftentimes cut off, and the paſſages for the Emperor made verie dangerous. And the more to diſtreſſe the Chriſtians in their long trauell, they found the countrey before them of purpoſe deſtroyed by the Turks,and the water K in many places poyſoned, whereof the Chriſtians vnaduiſedly drinking, fell into many grieuous diſeaſes,eſpecially the flix,and thereof died in great number. The Sultan in the mean time, although he had in readineſſe a right puiſſant armie of his owne,and had procured great aid from the Perſian Sultan his kinſman and chiefe ſupporter; yet fearing the doubtful euent of war,& loath to aduenture his whole eſtate vpon the fortune of a battell,ſought by his embaſſadors ſent for that purpoſe,to grow to ſome peace with the Emperour, and that vpon ſuch honorable conditions,as by the wiſer ſort were thought not to be at any hand refuſed : which large offers,the Sultan as deſirous of peace,made vnto him not once,but againe & again:which the Emperor neuertheleſſe (repoſing great confidence in his owne power,and prickt forward by the gallants of the court, better acquainted with the braue triumphs of peace, than the L hard wars of the Turks) proudly reiected, and ſo diſmiſſing the Embaſſadors, ſcornfully willed them to tel their Maſter, That he would giue him anſwer vnto his requeſts vnder the wals of Iconium. Which cauſed the Sultan, now out of all hope of any reconciliation to be made betwixt the Emperour and him, with all his power to take the ſtraits of Zibrica, whereby the armie of the Chriſtians,departing from Myriocephalon,muſt of neceſſity paſſe.The entrance into theſe ſtraits was by a long valley, on either ſide incloſed with high mountaines, which towards the North riſing and falling according as the hils gaue leaue,opened into diuers large vallies, which by little and little growing againe ſtraiter and ſtraiter, with high and craggie rocks hanging ouer on either ſide,and almoſt touching one another,gaue vnto the painful traueller a moſt hard and difficult paſſage. M

A great ouerſight of the Emperour.

Into this ſo dangerous a valley the Emperor,not fearing the enemies force, deſperatly entred with his armie, hauing neither prouided for the cleering of the paſſages, or ſafetie of his carriages,in no other order than as if he had marched thorow the plaine and champaine countrey,although it were before told him (that which he ſhortly after, but too late ſaw) that the enemie had ſtrongly poſſeſſed both the ſtraits & mountains, to hinder his farther paſſage. The vauward of his armie was conducted by Iohn and Andronicus the ſons of Angelus Conſtantine, acompanied with Macroducas Conſtantine and Lapardas Andronicus: in the right wing was Baldwin the Emperors brother in law; and in the left Maurozomes Theodorus: after them followed the drudges and ſcullions, with an infinit number of carters and other baſe people, attending vpon the carriages, with the baggage of the whole armie: next vnto theſe came the Emperor with the main battel, conſiſting for the moſt part of right valiant & worthie ſoldiers: the rereward was ſhut vp by Andronicus Contoſtephanus, with a number of moſt reſolute men. They were not far entred into theſe ſtraits, but that the Turks from the mountains and broken cliffs ſhewed themſelues on euery ſide, deliuering their deadly ſhot from the vpper ground, vpon the Chriſtians below, as thick as haile: neuertheleſſe the ſons of Angelus, with Macroducas and Lapardas, and the vantgard, caſting themſelues into a three ſquare battell in forme of a wedge, with their targuets in manner of a penthouſe caſt cloſe together ouer their heads, and their archers on euery ſide luſtily beſtowing their ſhot among the thickeſt of their enemies, by plain force droue them out of the ſtraits they had before poſſeſſed, and cauſed them to retire farther off into the mountains, and ſo hauing made themſelues way, with little or no loſſe paſſed thoſe dangerous ſtraits; vntil that at length hauing recouered the top of a hill very commodious for their purpoſe, as the caſe ſtood, they there ſtaied, & preſently incamped themſelues. And haply with like good fortune might the reſt of the armie haue paſſed alſo, had they in like order, and with like courage preſently followed after: but failing ſo to do, & troubled with the multitude of their carriages, which could not poſſibly make any way thorow thoſe ſtrait & rough paſſages, (but troubled themſelues one another, as alſo the whole armie) they were from the vpper ground miſerably ouerwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkiſh archers, whoſe arrows fel as thick vpon them from the mountains, as if it had bin a perpetual tempeſt or ſhoure of haile, to the great diſordring & diſmaying of the whole armie: which the Turks quickly perceiuing, and therewith encouraged, in great numbers came downe from the mountaines, where they had before houered ouer the heads of the Chriſtians, and forcibly entring the plaine ground, and comming to handie blows, firſt ouerthrew the right wing; where Baldwin himſelfe ſeeking to reſtore his diſordred companies, and to ſtay the furie of the enemie (now raging in the bloud of the Chriſtians) with a troup of valiant horſmen breaking into the thickeſt of them, as became a worthie captaine, was there compaſſed in with the multitude of his enemies, and ſlaine, together with all his followers, and the greateſt part of the whole wing by him commanded. With this victorie the Turks were ſo encouraged, that comming downe with all their power, they ſtopped all the ways whereby the Chriſtians were to paſſe, who as men couped vp in thoſe dangerous ſtraits, were not able either to defend themſelues, or to helpe one another: but incloſed as deere in a toyle, and one troubling another, were the cauſe both of the deſtruction of themſelues & others. For by reaſon of the ſtraitneſſe of the place, neither could they that were before, retire, neither they that were behinde in the rereward, come forward to relieue the one the other, as need required: the carriages alſo, which were many, & in the midſt of the armie, ſeruing them to no other purpoſe, than to the hurt of themſelues. There were the beaſts that ſerued for burden, together with the ſoldiers, ouerwhelmed with the Turks ſhot, the vallies lay ful of dead bodies, the riuers ran mingled with the bloud of men and beaſts, in ſuch terrible manner as is not by pen to be expreſſed. For the Chriſtians not able either to go forward or retire, were there in thoſe ſtraits ſlain like ſheepe: if any courage or ſparke of valour were by any ſhewed againſt the enemie, fighting at ſo great aduantage, it was but loſt, ſeruing to little or no purpoſe. And to increaſe their miſeries, the Turks in ſcorne ſhewed vpon the point of a lance the head of Andronicus Bataza, the Emperors nephew, who comming with an armie out of Paphlagonia, and Heraclea Pontica, againſt the Turks of Amaſia, was now by the way by them ouerthrown and ſlaine. The report whereof, confirmed by the ſight of his head, and the conſideration of the deſperate danger wherein the whole armie preſently ſtood, ſo troubled the Emperor, that he was at his wits end; and with drie teares (if it may be ſo ſaid) diſſembling his inward grief, as one out of comfort, ſtood doubtful which way to turn himſelfe. For the Turks hauing ſuffered the vantgard to paſſe, with all their power charged the Emperours maine battell, as his chiefe ſtrength, nothing doubting, but that hauing once ouerthrowne it, they ſhould eaſily and at pleaſure ouerthrow the reſt. Oftentimes

The Emperor in great perplexitie.

had the Emperor attempted to haue driuen the enemy out of thoſe ſtraits, and ſo to haue opened G a way for his armie to haue paſſed, but all in vaine, the power of the Turks ſtil increaſing, and they at great aduantage notably maintaining the paſſages before by them taken. Neuertheleſſe ſeeing no leſſe danger in ſtaying ſtil, than in going forward, he with a few of his beſt ſoldiers, armed with deſpaire, and reſolued to die, (vnto which kind of men nothing is terrible) ſet forward directly vpon his enemies, willing the reſt with like reſolution euery man to make for himſelfe the beſt ſhift he could. And ſo with many wonds and ſturdie blows both giuen and receiued, he by plaine force and might of hand brake thorow the thickeſt of his enemies, and ſo eſcaped out of thoſe ſtraits as out of a trap: but yet not without many wounds receiued in his perſon, and himſelfe ſo wearied as that he was not able to lift vp his helmet, being beaten cloſe to his head; and in his targuet were found ſticking 30 of the Turks arrows, or thereabouts, H the manifeſt tokens of his danger. The other legions ſeeking to follow the Emperour, (for other way they had none) were on euery ſide hardly aſſailed by the Turks, and infinite numbers of them ſlaine, beſide many others that periſhed in thoſe ſtraits, ouerborn and trodden to death by their own fellows. Yea ſuch as had the fortune to eſcape out of one of theſe perrilous ſtraits, were forthwith ſlaine in the next: for this ſo dangerous a paſſage thorow the mountains, was diuided (as is aforeſaid) into ſeuen vallies, which giuing faire and broad entrances, the farther a man went, grew ſtil ſtraiter and ſtraiter, all which ſtraits the Turks had before ſtrongly poſſeſſed. At which time alſo, the more to increaſe the terrour of the day, the light ſand raiſed with the feet of the men and horſes, was with the violence of a moſt tempeſtuous wind which then blew, carried ſo forcibly and thicke, that both the armies grapling together, I as if it had bin in the darkneſſe of the night, killed whomſoeuer they met withall, without reſpect of friend or foe; by which errour many were euen of their own friends ſlaine. In euery place lay great heaps of Turks ſlain together with the Chriſtians, and with them great number of horſes and other beaſts for carriage; ſo that thoſe vallies where this bloudie conflict was, ſeemed to be nothing elſe but a large burying place of the Turks & Chriſtians with their horſes: but the greater number was of the Chriſtians that periſhed, and they not altogether of the common ſort, but euen of the braueſt captaines, and the Emperours neereſt kinſmen. The violence of the wind ceaſing, and the day cleering vp, there was of all others to be ſeene (a moſt wofull ſpectacle) men yet aliue, ſome wounded, ſome whole, couered ſome to the middle, ſome to the necke, with dead carkaſes, in ſuch ſort as that they were not able with any ſtrugling to get out: who with their hands caſt vp towards heauen, with ruthfull voices cried out K for helpe to ſuch as paſſed by; but al in vain, for euery man poſſeſſed with the common feare, and by their danger meaſuring their own, paſſed by them without compaſſion, as more careful of their own ſafetie, leauing them yet liuing, as men to be numbred among the dead.

A moſt miſerable ſpectacle.

The emperor in danger to haue been taken, valiantly defendeth himſelfe.

The Emperor himſelfe, as a man almoſt now ſpent, being got out of the danger, ſtood a while to breath himſelfe vnder the ſhadow of a wild peare tree, without any page or man to attend him; whom a poore common ſouldier eſpying, and mooued with compaſſion, came vnto him, and offering him the beſt ſeruice he could, helped him vp with his helmet, and buckled vp his armor, which before hung dangling here & there about him: when in the mean while a Turke comming in vpon him, had taken his horſe by the bridle, in hope to haue led him away priſoner: L whom for al that, the Emperor as wearie as he was, with the trunchion of his broken lance which he had yet in his hand, ſtrucke down to the ground, and ſo cleered himſelf of him. Preſently after came alſo another ſort of the ſtragling Turks, readie alſo to haue ſeiſed vpon him, and to haue taken him priſoner; of whom he ſlew one with the aforeſaid horſemans ſtaffe, and with his ſword ſtrucke off the head of another of them, and ſo kept them off, vntill that by the comming in of ten of his own ſouldiers he was relieued. Departing thence with purpoſe to haue joyned himſelfe vnto the legions that were gone before in the vauward, he had not gone far, but that he was much troubled by other Turks that he met, and the heapes of the dead bodies that lay in his way: yet at laſt, hauing with much labour and more danger paſſed the ſtraits, & a riuer running thereby, being glad in many places to ride ouer the dead bodies of M his own people, & ſome other of his own ſoldiers now reſorting vnto him, he there ſaw Iohn Catacuzene, a noble & right valiant gentleman that had maried his niece, fighting alone againſt a great number of the Turks, to be compaſſed in and ſlaine; whom he was no way able to relieue.
Which Turks alſo ſeeing him paſſe by, followed after him, as after a moſt rich prey, in

A hope to haue either preſently taken or ſlaine him: whom neuertheleſſe he (encouraging the ſmall companie he had about him) notably repulſed, and ſo ſometime marching forward, and again as occaſion required making a ſtand, came at length long looked for, but moſt welcome, vnto the legions that were gone before, not ſo ſorrie for their owne hard eſtate, as carefull of his danger.

The malaperte ſpeech of an inſolent ſoldier, to the Emperour.

The great patience of the Emperour.

A ſharpe reprehenſiō of a common ſoldier, vnto the emperour.

But before he could come to thoſe his legions, he readie to faint for thirſt, commanded water to be brought him out of the riuer that ran faſt by; which after he had taſted, & by the vnpleaſant taſt thereof perceiued the ſame to be infected, he fetching a deep ſigh, ſaid, O how vnfortunatly haue I taſted Chriſtian bloud! whereunto an audacious and malapert ſoldier there preſent, and more bitter than the cruell time it ſelfe, replied, Emperor, thou didſt not now, thou didaeſt B not now, I ſay, firſt, but long ſince, and oftentimes drinke the bloud of the Chriſtians, euen vntil thou waſt drunke againe, at ſuch time as thou didſt with moſt grieuous exactions vexe and deuoure thy poore ſubjects. Which reproachfull ſpeech the Emperor put vp in ſilence, making as if he had not heard it. With like patience he alſo forbare the ſame railing companion, at ſuch time as he ſeeing his treaſures hardly beſet, and in danger to be taken by the Turks, to animate his ſoldiers, willed them to do what they could to reſcue the ſame, and to take it for their labour: This treaſure (ſaid this impudent fellow) ſhould before haue been giuen vnto thy ſoldiers, rather than now, when as it cannot be recouered but with great danger and bloudſhed: and therefore if thou be a man of valour, as thou wouldeſt be accounted, and as the preſent caſe requireth, valiantly charge the Turks (now readie to carrie it away) thy ſelfe, and ſo recouer thyne euill gotten goods. Whereunto the Emperour anſwe- C red no more but, Good words ſouldier, & ſo put it vp, as did Dauid the railings of Shimei. Shortly after the comming of the Emperor vnto thoſe legions of his vauntgard (the onely remainder of his armie that was left whole and vnbroken) came alſo Andronicus Contoſtephanus, who had the leading of the rereward, with diuers other of great place, who had by good fortune eſcaped the furie of the Turks. The miſeries of that day (not well to be expreſſed) being ended by the comming on of the night, the Chriſtians ſate in the campe, oppreſſed with a generall heauines, leaning their heads vpon their elbows, & conſidering the preſent danger wherein they were, ſcarcely accounted themſelues among the liuing: the Turks in the mean time to increaſe their feare, all the night running about the campe, and crying aloud vnto ſuch of their countreymen in the campe, as had abiured their religion, or for other reſpects had taken part D with the Imperials, that they ſhould that night get them out of the campe, wheras otherwiſe if they ſtayd vnto the morning, they ſhould be all but loſt men. In this ſo great an extremitie the Emperor not knowing not what to do, calling together his chiefe commanders, declared vnto them the deſperat danger they were in, together with his reſolution; which was, ſecretly himſelfe to flie, and to leaue the reſt, euerie man to make what ſhift he could for himſelfe. Which his baſe determination, ſo foule as fouler could not be, they all wondering at, as proceeding from a diſtraughted mind, and by chance ouerheard by one of the common ſoldiers that ſtood without the tent, the ſame ſoldier fetching a deepe ſigh, in deteſtation therof cried out with a loud voyce, What meanes the Emperor? And ſo turning himſelfe vnto him, ſaid, Art not thou he that haſt thruſt vs into this deſolate and ſtrait way, and caſt vs headlong into deſtruction? E and haſt as it were in a morter incloſed vs in theſe rockes and mountains, readie as it were to ouerwhelme vs. What had we to do with this vaile of mourning, and mouth of hell? Wherefore came we into theſe miſchieuous and rough ſtraits? What can we particularly complaine of the Barbarians, which in theſe inextricable windings and ſtraits haue thus intangled and beſet vs? Was it not thou that broughtſt vs hither? And wilt thou now, as ſheepe appointed to the ſlaughter, thy ſelfe betray vs? With which ſo ſharpe a reprehenſion the Emperor throughly pierced, changed his former determination for flight, reſoluing now to ſtand by it, whatſoeuer hapned. But what ſhould he now doe, beſet with his enemies ſtill readie to deuoure him? Help he ſaw none, either in himſelf, or to be expected from others, nought remained but death and deſpaire. In this extremity, al mans help now failing, it pleaſed the moſt mighty (which chaſtiſeth & healeth again, which ſtriketh, and F yet giueth life, and ſuffereth not the ſtaffe of the ſinners always to rage into the portion of the iuſt) with mercifull eye to looke downe vpon theſe diſtreſſed men, and with an vnwonted kind of clemencie to touch the Sultans heart, in ſuch ſort, as that he which but the other day ſtood in dread of the Emperour, and now hauing him as it were in his power, was ouercome with his miſerie: or as in times paſt he by Huſai ouerthrew the councell of Achitophel, and changed the mind of Abſalon to follow ſuch aduice as ſhould bring him to deſtruction: ſo then alſo he turned the mind of the Turkiſh Sultan, that (perſuaded by certain of the chiefe men about him, who in time of peace had vſed to receiue great gifts and Preſents from the Emperor) he of his own accord by his Embaſſadors offered peace vnto the Emperor, before that he in ſo great diſtreſſe ſued vnto him for any; and that vpon the ſelfe ſame conditions they had made their leagues before. The Turks in the meane time ignorant of the Sultans reſolution, early in the morning were readie to aſſault the Emperors campe, in hope at once to haue ouerthrown his whole power, and with a barbarous outcrie ſtill riding about it, came ſo nigh, that with their arrows they ſlew diuers of the Chriſtians within their own trenches: againſt whom the Emperor ſent out Iohn the ſon of Conſtantinus Angelus, and after him, Macroducas Conſtantinus, but to little or no purpoſe. In the mean time came one Gabras, a man of greateſt reputation among the Turks, Embaſſador from the Sultan; by whoſe commandement the Turks ceaſed further to aſſault the campe. This Gabras comming vnto the Emperour, and after the manner of the Barbarians, honoring him with reuerence done euen down to the ground; firſt preſented him with a goodly horſe, whoſe furniture was all of ſiluer, as if it had bin for triumph, and a faire two edged ſword. Afterwards falling into a large diſcourſe concerning a peace to be made, and with many kind words as with an inchantment appeaſing the Emperours heauineſſe conceiued of his late loſſe; he among other pleaſant conceits then vttered, ſeeing the Emperor in a rich robe of yellow ouer his armor, told him, that the colour was not fit for war, as ominous, and portending euil lucke: whereat the Emperor a little ſmiling, gaue it him, with the fortune thereof; and receiuing the horſe and ſword ſent him from the Sultan, ſigned the peace. Amongſt other conditions of the peace (which the dangerouſneſſe of the time ſuffered not the Emperor curiouſly to examine) one was, That Dorileum and Subleum, before by him fortified, and the ground of this vnfortunat war, ſhould be again raſed. Peace thus beyond all hope being concluded, and the emperor deliuered of a great feare, purpoſed another way to return home, to auoid the ſight of the ſlaine: yet was he by his guides, euen of purpoſe as it was thought, led back the ſame way, to behold with his eys thoſe miſerable ſpectacles of the ſlain, which could not with any teares be ſufficiently lamented: for the ſtraits were made plain, the vallies were raiſed into hils, and the foreſts lay couered with the carkaſſes of the ſlain: no man paſſed by, but with heauines and griefe, calling by name vpon their friends and familiars there loſt. Hauing again paſſed thoſe dolefull ſtraits, the Turks were again in the taile of the armie: for it was reported, That the Sultan repenting himſelfe to haue ſuffred his enemies ſo to ſcape out of his hands, had giuen leaue to ſuch as would, to purſue them, but followed not himſelfe with his whole power, as before; for moſt of the better ſort of his ſoldiers loaded with the ſpoile, were now returned home. Yet theſe that followed after the army, ſlew many, eſpecially ſuch as were weake or wounded, and ſo vnable to follow the reſt: although the Emperour to help the matter, had for the repreſſing of them placed the beſt of his captains and ſouldiers in the rereward. Being come to Chonas, and now out of feare of his enemies, he gaue vnto euery one of his hurt ſouldiers mony to pay for the curing of their wounds, and to bring them into their countries; and comming to Philadelphia, there ſtayed for the refreſhing of himſelf after ſo great miſeries. In his return he raſed Subleum, according to his promiſe, but not Dorileum: wherof the Sultan by his Embaſſadors complaining, he anſwered, That what he had, inforced thereunto by neceſſitie, promiſed, he greatly forced not to performe. In reuenge wherof, the Sultan ſent out one of his moſt valiant captains, called Atapack, with 24000 good ſoldiers choſen out of his whole armie, with ſtrait charge to waſt & deſtroy all the Emperors prouinces and towns euen vnto the ſea ſide, without ſparing man, woman, or child; and in token thereof, to bring with him ſome of the ſea water, an oare, and ſome of the ſea ſand: who according to his charge ſpoiled Phrygia, with the cities along the riuer Mæander, euen vnto the ſea ſide: and ſo returning with a rich prey, by the way ſpoyled what before he had left vntouched. But in paſſing the riuer Mæander, when he feared leaſt, he fell into the hands of Iohn Bataza the Emperours nephew, and of Ducas Conſtantine a moſt valiant Captaine; of purpoſe ſent againſt him by the Emperour with a great power: where hee was by them ſlaine, together with all his Armie, and the rich bootie he had taken, all againe recouered. the habit of a Monke, in token he had forſaken the world. All the time of his raigne he was no the famous city of Attalia, and ſo daily encroched more and more vpon the prouinces of B the empire, ioyning the ſame vnto his owne; which was no great matter for him to doe; the Greeke empire being then no better gouerned than was the chariot of the Sun (as the Poets could not (as he ſaid) long ſtand with the others ſo great power, which he therfore (as in duty bound) wiſhed to be abridged: aggrauating withall the infamous report of Alexius his too much familiaritie with the empreſſe; which firſt muttered in court, afterwards flew (as he ſaid) throughout the whole world. The reformation of which things, as tending to the danger of the perſon of the Emperour, & diſhonor of the ſtate, he forſooth as one in conſcience bound, with great grauity and eloquence (beeing a very learned man) both in open ſpeech and writing moſt earneſtly deſired: and therby ſo wrought, as that he was generally accounted for a man of great experience (as indeed he was) and a faithful counſellor to the ſtate, a thing much to haue bin wiſhed. Wherefore leauing Oenum, the place whereto hee was by the Emperour H Emanuel in a ſort baniſhed, trauelling towards Conſtantinople, hee gaue it out in euery place where he came, what he had ſworne, and what he would for his oathes ſake do: vnto whom men deſirous of the change of the ſtate, & ſuch as gaue credit vnto the report long before giuen out, That he ſhould at length become Emperor; flockt in great numbers, as birds about n owle, to ſee him, and with vain praiſes to chatter about him. In this ſort he came as far as Paphlagonia; in euery place honorably receiued, as if he had bin a deliuerer of his countrie ſent from God. And in the imperial city he was not longed for of the vulgar people only, as their light and load ſtar, but diuers of the nobility alſo by ſecret meſſengers and letters, perſuaded him to haſten his comming, and to take vpon him the gouernement; aſſuring him, that there would be none to reſiſt him, or to oppoſe themſelues againſt his ſhadow, but all ready to receiue I him: eſpecially Mary the yong Emperors ſiſter by the fathers ſide, with her husband Caſar (who beeing a woman of great ſpirit, and grieuing much to ſee her fathers Empire made a prey vnto Alexius the preſident, & the Empreſſe her ſtep mother, whom ſhe naturally hated) had raiſed a great and dangerous tumult in the citie againſt them both, which was not without much bloodſhed appeaſed: and now ceaſed not by often and moſt earneſt letters (to her own deſtruction and her husbands, as it afterwards fel out) to prick forward Andronicus and to haſten his comming: who by letters and meſſengers daily comming vnto him from the court ſtill more and more encouraged, leauing behind him the country of Paphlagonia, came to Heraclea in Pontus, and ſtil on towards the imperiall citie, with great cunning and diſſimulation winning the hearts of the people as he went. For who was ſo ſtonie hearted, whom his ſweet K words and aboundant teares flowing from his gracious eyes, as from two plentiful fountains down by his hoary cheeks, might not haue moued? All that he did or deſired, was (as he ſaid) for the common good and liberty of the Emperor. By which means he had drawn vnto him a wonderfull number of the rude countrey people by the way as he came. But comming into Bythinia, he was by Iohn Ducas gouernor of the great city of Nice, ſhut out as an enemy to the ſtate, and ſo at Nicomedia alſo. Neuertheleſſe, paſſing by thoſe cities, he held ſtil on his way, vntill at length he was neere vnto a caſtle called Charace, encountred by Andronicus Angelus, ſent with a great power againſt him, by the great preſident Alexius; who otherwiſe as an effeminat man, giuen ouer to his pleaſure, ſpending the greateſt part of the night in rioting by candle light, and moſt part of the day in his bed, with curtaines cloſe drawne as if it had beene L night: yet doubtful now of the comming of his enemy, left nothing vndon which he thought might helpe for the aſſuring of his ſtate. Many of the nobilitie of whom he ſtood in doubt, he gained vnto him by means of the Emperors mother; who by her rare beautie, ſweet words, & gracious behauior, as with a line drew al men to her. Other ſome hee ouercame with gifts and great ſummes of money, whereof hee now made no ſpare: And ſo wrought the matter, that no man of any account or marke went ouer to Andronicus. Who neuertheleſſe with ſuch followers as hee had, ioyning battell with Angelus (ſent againſt him, as is before ſaide) ouerthrew him and put him to flight. Wherewith Alexius much troubled, in great diſpleaſure and without reaſon, called Angelus (now fled to Conſtantinople) to an account for the money deliuered vnto him for the defraying of the charges of that vnfortunate warre: who M ſeeing his misfortune to be ſo taken as if he had framed it himſelfe, and of purpoſe betraid the army committed to his charge; by the counſell of his ſix ſonnes, being all men of great valor and wiſedome, firſt tooke the refuge of his owne houſe: but finding himſelfe there in no preſently

A preſently fled ouer the ſtrait to Andronicus: who ſeeing of him comming towards him, is reported to haue vſed this text of Scripture, Behold I will ſend mine Angell before thy face, to prepare thy wayes, alluding to his name of Angelus, as the preſage of his good ſucceſſe. Wherefore incouraged with the comming of theſe noblemen his kinſmen, he without longer ſtay marched directly vnto the ſea ſide, and there a little aboue Chalcedon encamped almoſt right ouer againſt Conſtantinople: cauſing wany great fires (moe than needed) to be made in his armie, to make it ſeeme vnto them of the citie greater than indeed it was; and with the ſight thereof to keep the citizens in ſuſpence, with the doubtful expectation of ſome great matter to enſue. Wherein he was no whit deceiued; for they hauing him now as it were in ſight, leauing their worke, ran ſome to the ſea ſide, ſome vp to the hils and high towers to behold his armie a far off, willing with their friendly lookes, if it had bin poſſible, to haue drawn him ouer the ſtrait B into the citie. Alexius knowing himſelfe not able by land to encounter with ſo ſtrong an enemie, (for now ſome which on foot could not go ouer to Andronicus, were ſecretly in heart already with him; otherſome thought themſelues ſufficiently to ſhew their fidelitie to the Emperor, if ſitting ſtil at home, they ſhould take part with neither: for ſo haue ſubtill heads and aſpiring mindes, for the furtherance of their deſires, taught the common people both to ſay & thinke) thought it beſt by ſea to auert the preſent danger: and therefore commanded all the Emperors gallies (being before rigged vp and ready) to be ſtrongly manned and put to ſea, for the keeping of Propontis and the ſtrait of Boſphorus, that Andronicus ſhould not that way paſſe. Now had hee determined to haue made eſpeciall choice of ſome aſſured friend of his own to be General of this fleet, as he had done of the captains & maſters, being all his own C kinſmen or domeſticall ſeruants: but as he was about to haue ſo done, Contoſtephanus (ſyrnamed the great captain) oppoſed himſelfe againſt it, challinging that place as due vnto himſelf, before all others: ſo that ouercome by his authoritie (which it was no time for Alexius now to diſpute) he was glad to commit the charge and truſt of the whole fleet vnto him, as Generall. Thus hauing (as hee thought) made the ſea ſure, he ſent ouer vnto Andronicus, as from the Emperor, (for all was done in his name) one George Xiphilinus, with letters and other inſtructions, whereof the effect was, to command him forthwith in peace to returne to the place from whence he came, & not farther to trouble the ſtate: promiſing him in ſo doing, the Emperors fauor, with many great honors and preferments to be afterward beſtowed vpon him; which otherwiſe might turn to his vtter deſtruction. Which letters Xiphilinus hauing deliuered, and D done his meſſage, is reported to haue ſecretly aduiſed Andronicus to proceed in his purpoſe, and not in any caſe to yeeld to that which was of him required: wherwith Andronicus encouraged, proudly reiected the graces offered, & willed the meſſenger to tel them that ſent him, that if they would haue him to returne vnto the place from whence he came, they ſhould firſt diſplace the proud preſident Alexius; & call him vnto an account for the villanies he had don; then the Emperours mother they ſhould depriue of her honors, & ſhut her vp as a Nun into ſome cloyſter, there to learn to amend her life; & laſt of al, that the Emperor according to his fathers wil, ſhould take vpon himſelf the gouernment, & not be ouertopt by others, by whoſe too much authority, his maieſty & honor was (as he ſaid) too much impaired. But within a few E days after, Contoſtephanus, the great captain & General, caried ouer al the gallies to Andronicus, leauing nothing but their names for the preſident in his rols to look vpon. whoſe reuolt aboue al other things encouraged Andronicus, & caſt Alexius euen into the bottome of deſpaire. For now Andronicus his friends flocked together in the city, not ſecretly as before, but openly in al places: and ſuch as wiſht a change in the ſtate, impudently ſcoffing at Alexius, paſſed ouer the ſtrait to Chalcedon in great numbers to Andronicus, where hauing filled their eys with beholding of his goodly perſon, his cheerfull countenance, & reuerent age; and their eares with his ſweet words & great promiſes, returned home merry & ioyful, as if they had bin in ſome tereſtrial paradice, filling the city with his praiſes. After that, Andronicus his two ſons, Iohn and Manuel, with diuers others, whom the preſident had caſt in priſon, were ſet at liberty, & other F of his chiefe fauorits laid faſt in their rooms. As for Alexius the preſident himſelf, with all his friends & faction in the court, they were taken & committed to the keeping of the guard: a right ſtrange alteration. But about midnight, Alexius himſelf was ſecretly conueied out of the court to the Patriarchs houſe, & there kept with a ſtronger guard than before. A wonderfull change, & worth marking, a man ſo honorably born, but yeſterday in greateſt honor, attended words, perſuading him with patience to endure his hard fortune, and not with ſuch ſpeeches as fitted not his preſent ſtate, to prouoke his keepers to vſe him euill. Within a few daies after early in a morning, he was brought out of the Patriarchs houſe, and ſet vpon a very little immoderat power, or rather of the inſolent ſoueraigntie of Alexius: who, had he with more moderation and vigilancie gouerned, might both haue kept Andronicus out of the citie, and himſelfe from ſo great miſerie; hauing at his command all the Emperors treaſure, his gallies, with moſt part of the ſtrength of the empire. Now came the noblemen ouer apace to Andronicus:

The meeting of the Patriarch & Andronicus the laſt that came, was the reuerend Patriarch Theodoſius, with the chiefe of the clergie: of whoſe approch, Andronicus hearing, went out of his tent to meet him, and falling downe (as great as he was) flat at his horſes feet, and in a while after ariſing againe, kiſſed the Patriarchs foot, calling him, the Emperors Sauiour, the louer of vertue, the defender of the truth; and comparing him with the famous Father Iohn Chryſoſtome, omitted not any honorable title hee I could poſſibly deuiſe to giue him. But the deuout Patriarch, that had neuer ſeene Andronicus before, hauing now well viewed him, and marked his ſterne countenance, his ſubtil nature, his craftie and diſſembling manners, his exceeding ſtature, being almoſt ten foot high, his ſtately gate, his proud looke, his continual ſeueritie, and melancholie ſilence; as it were pittying them that to their owne deſtruction had called ſuch a man in, ſaid, Hitherto I haue heard, but now I haue alſo ſeene, and plainly knowne: and fetching a deepe ſigh, adioyning thereunto that ſaying of the Prophet Dauid: As we haue heard, ſo haue we alſo ſeene. In which words, he couertly quipped the diſſembled meeting and ſubmiſſion of Andronicus: and withall called to remembrance the words of the Emperour Emanuel, wherewith he had many times ſo painted forth Andronicus vnto the Patriarch, as if he would moſt liuely haue repreſented him vnto his view. K Andronicus paſſeth ouer the ſtrait.

All things in the citie and in the pallace ſet in order according to Andronicus his mind, by his two ſons, and leaue giuen vnto the Emperors friends to come ouer vnto him, and to be acquainted with him; at length Andronicus himſelfe departing from Damalum, in a gallie croſſed the ſtrait, oftentimes by the way merrily ſinging that ſaying of the heauenly Pſalmiſt: Returne my ſoule into thy reſt, becauſe the Lord hath done well vnto thee, hauing deliuered my life from death, mine eyes from teares, and my feet from falling. The Emperour with his mother Xene, then lay not in the pallace at Conſtantinople, but at another princely houſe of his in the countrey neere vnto Philopatium, as Andronicus had appointed: whither Andronicus firſt went, and comming vnto his preſence, moſt humbly proſtrat before him, with ſobbing and teares, as his deceitfull manner was, kiſſed his feet. As for the Empreſſe his mother, he lightly ſaluted her, L and as it were but for faſhion ſake, not diſſembling in his countenance the old grudge he bare againſt her. And ſo without longer ſtay went vnto his tent prouided for him not far off; round about which, all the great noblemen had pitched their tents alſo, flocking vnto him as chickens ſeeking for refuge vnder the hens wings. Hauing there ſtaied with the Emperour a good while, he was deſirous to go vnto the imperiall citie, and to ſee the late Emperor Emanuel his couſins graue. Where entering into the monaſterie of our Lady, where he was buried, and comming to his tombe, he wept bitterly, and roared as it were mainely out. So that diuers of

And when one of his kinſemen would haue pulled him from the tombe, ſaying that hee M had ſorrowed for him enough; he would not be remoued, but requeſted them to ſuffer him yet a little to tarrie by the tombe, for that he had ſomthing in ſecret to ſay vnto the dead: and ſo with his hands caſt vp and cloſe together, as if he had praied, and his eys faſt fixed vpon the tombe, he moued his lips, and ſecretly ſaid ſomthing, but what, no man could tel. Some ſaid it

A was ſome charme or incantation. But others more pleaſantly conceited, ſaid, and (as it afterward appeared) more truly, that Andronicus did triumph ouer the dead Emperor Emanuel, and reuell with his ghoſt, with theſe or like words: I haue thee now faſt, my cruel perſecutor, by whom I haue bin driuen to many great extremities: and hauing wandred almoſt all the world ouer, haue thereunto bin made by thee a common by-word. But now this tombe riſing vp with ſeuen tops, & priſon, out of which thou canſt not ſtart, holdeth thee oppreſſed with a dead ſleepe, out of which thou ſhalt not be awaked, but by the ſounding of the laſt trumpe. And now will I be reuenged of thy poſteritie, and ſatisfie my ſelfe as a Lyon with a fat prey; and take ſharpe reuenge of all the wrongs thou haſt done me, when I haue once poſſeſſed my ſelfe of this royall citie.

After that, viſiting al the Emperors ſtately houſes, but ſtaying in no place long, he diſpoſed B of al matters of ſtate, according to his own pleaſure. Vnto the yong Emperor he allowed hunting, and other his vain delights, with keepers ioined vnto him, to watch not only his going in & out, but alſo that no man ſhould talke with him of any matter of importance: for all the gouernment of the ſtate he tooke vnto himſelfe: not for that he wiſhed ſo well therunto, aboue others, but ſo to driue from the court al them of the contrary faction to himſelf, that were able to do any thing, & had before borne ſome ſway. The ſoldiers, whoſe help he had vſed in aſpiring to the gouernment, he rewarded with great bounty; all their offices and preferments hee beſtowed either vpon his own children, or other his great fauourits; diuers of the nobility of whom he liked not, were by him in ſhort time driuen into exile: ſome were by him depriued of their ſight, and ſome others caſt in priſon, not knowing any cauſe why, more than that they C were by him ſecretly condemned, for that they were of the nobility, or had done ſome good ſeruice for the ſtate, or exiled for their perſonage, or ſome other thing that grieued Andronicus, or els for the ſparke of ſome old diſpleaſure which yet lay hid as fire raked vp in the aſhes. So that the ſtate of that time began to grow moſt miſerable: & the trecherie euen of men neereſt in blood, ſeeking the deſtruction one of another, for to ſerue their own turns, or to gratify Andronicus, moſt horrible: not only one brother betraid another, but euen the father his ſon, and the ſon his father, if Andronicus would haue it ſo. Some accuſed their neereſt kinſmen, that they derided Andronicus his proceedings, or that without regard of him, they more fauoured Alexius the yong emperor, then, a great offence. Yea, ſuch was the miſchiefe of the time, that many in accuſing others, were themſelues accuſed; & charging others of treaſon againſt Andro- D nicus, were themſelues charged by them whom they accuſed, & ſo clapt vp both together in one priſon. Neither were they of the nobility onely, which were enemies to Andronicus, thus hardly dealt withal, but euen ſome of his great fauorits & followers alſo: for ſome whom but yeſterday he had vſed moſt kindly, & enrolled among his beſt friends, vpon them to day hee frowned & tyranized moſt cruelly: ſo that you might haue ſeen the ſame man the ſame to day (as it is reported of Xerxes his admiral) to be crowned & beheaded, to be graced & diſgraced: inſomuch that the wiſer ſort deemed Andronicus his praiſings, the beginning of a mans diſgrace; his bounty, his vndoing; & his kindnes, his death. The firſt that taſted of his tiranny, was Mary the daughter of Emanuel the emperor, who for the hate ſhe bare to Alexius the late Preſident, & the empreſſe her mother in law had (as is aforeſaid) aboue al other, wiſht for his com- E ming; but was now by one Pterigionites (ſomtime an eunuch of her fathers, corrupted by Andronicus, hauing in his aſpiring mind purpoſed the vtter deſtruction of all Emanuels poſteritie) cunningly poiſoned; as was her husband Cæſar, who liued not long after her, poiſoned alſo (as was ſuppoſed) with the ſame cup that his wife was. Now among others of the late emperors houſe, none had euer ſtood more in his light, than had the faire empreſſe Xene, the yong emperors mother, whom now he ceaſed not moſt bitterly (though wrongfully) to accuſe, as an vtter enemie both to the emperor & the ſtate, making as if he would leaue al, and again depart, if ſhe were not remoued from the Emperor her ſon: and by his cunning ſo incenſed the giddy headed vulgar people againſt her, that they came flocking to Theodoſius the good Patriarch, ready to teare him out of his cloaths, if he conſented not to the remouing of the empreſſe, as Andro- F nicus had deſired. So a counſel being called of ſuch his fauorits and others, as were not like indifferently to heare her cauſe, but aſſuredly to condemne her, the guiltleſſe empreſſe after many things falſly laid to her charge, was accuſed of treſon: as that ſhe ſhould by her lettters haue ſolicited Bela king of Hungarie, her brother in law, to inuade Brantizoba and Belligrade, two ſtrong places belonging to the empire. Whereupon ſhee was condemned, and ſhamefully caſt into a moſt filthie priſon neere vnto the monaſterie of S. Diomede. Amongſt other no- G blemen called vnto this wicked counſell, were Leo Monaſteriotes, Demetrius, Tornicius, & Conſtantius Petrenus: who not yet altogether deuoted to Andronicus, being asked their opinions concerning the Empreſſe, ſaid, They would be glad firſt to know, Whether that counſell againſt his mother, were called by the Emperors conſent or not? With which ſpeech, Andronicus peirced to the heart as with a ſword, in great rage ſtart vp and ſaid, Theſe are they which encouraged the wicked preſident to all his villanies, lay hands vpon them. Wherupon they of his guard in threatning manner ſhook their weapons & ſwords at them, as if they would euen preſently haue ſlain them: and the tumultuous common people, catching them by their cloaks as they came out, pulling them ſome one way ſome another, were ſo fierce vpon them, as that they had much adoe to eſcape out of their hands with life. Now lay the faire Empreſſe (but H the other day one of the greateſt princes of the Eaſt, and honored of all her ſubiects) in great miſerie & deſpaire, ſcorned euen of her baſe keepers, euery houre expecting the deadly blow of the hangman. Yet was not the crueltie of Andronicus againſt her, ſo any thing aſſuaged, but greeuing that ſhe yet breathed, ſhortly after aſſembled the former counſell, the miniſters of his wrath, demanding of them, What puniſhment was by law appointed for ſuch as betraied any towne or prouince of the Empire? whereunto anſwere beeing giuen in writing, That it was by the law, death, he could no longer hold; but that he muſt in great choler breake out againſt the poore empreſſe, as if it had bin ſhe that had done it: and therupon the wicked counſellors crying out with one voice, That ſhe was to be taken out of the way, as they had before agreed, by and by without longer ſtay, a damned writing was ſubſcribed by the yong Emperor I her ſon, as if it had bin with the bloud of his owne mother, whereby ſhe was (I abhor to write it) moſt vnworthily condemned to die. The men appointed to ſee this moſt horrible & cruell execution done, were Manuel, Andronicus his eldeſt ſon, and Georgius Auguſtus, his neere kinſman; who both diſmaid at the very mentioning of the matter, not regarding the emperors command, ſaid plainly, that they neuer before conſented to the death of the empreſſe, but had clean hands of ſo hainous an offence, & therefore would now much leſſe ſee her innocent body diſmembred in their ſight. At which vnexpected anſwer Andronicus much troubled, with his fingers oftentimes pluckt himſelf by the hoary beard, and with burning eyes caſting ſomtime vp his head, & ſomtime downe, ſighed at his own moſt miſerable tyrannical eſtate, fretting inwardly, that they which were neereſt vnto him, whom he thought he might euen with K a beck haue commanded to haue done any miſchiefe, abhorring his cruelty, ſhould refuſe to do the thing he ſo much deſired to haue don: yet repreſſing his anger for a while, within a few days after, he again commanded her to be ſtrangled; which was accordingly don by Conſtantinus Tripſicus, and Pterigionites the vngracious eunuch, by whoſe helpe he had before poiſoned Mary the emperors daughter, with Cæſar her husband, as is before declared. Thus periſhed this great empreſſe, cruelly ſtrangled in priſon, by theſe two wicked men, the mercileſſe executioners of Andronicus his wrath. Her dead bodie lately adorned with all the graces of nature, euen to the admiration of the beholders, was without more adoe ſecretly raked vp in the ſand faſt by the ſea ſide: a poore ſepulchre for ſo great a perſon.

A wicked counſell.

The miſerable death of the empreſſe.

What might not Andronicus now do to others, that durſt thus cruelly to deale with the yong L emperors own mother, & neereſt friends? yet was all couered vnder the pretence of the common good, and ſafety of the ſtate and empire. And the more to ſhadow Andronicus his ſecret purpoſes, as not proceeding of any priuate or hidden malice, or aſpiring humor, from which he of all men would ſeeme moſt free; and the more to manifeſt his deuotion & loyaltie to the young Emperour his couſin, he was the onely perſuader vnto the reſt of the nobilitie, to haue him ſolemnly crowned (which as yet by reaſon of his tender age he was not;) and at the time of his coronation, with his own ſhoulders ſupported him vp, as he was (after the maner of that ſolemnitie) carried vnto the great church, and ſo back againe; the Crocodiles teares ſtill plenteouſly running downe his aged face, as if it had bin for exceeding ioy: which many of the meaner ſort beholding, and deeming therof the beſt, highly commended his kindnes, accoun- M ting the yong Emperor thrice happie, in ſo graue a gouernour, and faithfull counſellor; who in loue and kind affection towards him, ſeemed not inferior to his naturall father: ſo cunningly had hee vnder the vaile of pietie, ſhadowed his moſt execrable treacherie; as that in the very plotting thereof, he was accounted moſt louing and kinde. But hidden treaſon, be it neuer

The ſlie practiſe of Andronicus in aſpiring to the Empire.

A ſo wel diſſembled, muſt at length ſhew it ſelfe. So Andronicus hauing got into his power both the Emperor and the empire, and the chiefe friends of the late Emperor Emanuel being taken out of the way, or elſe driuen into exile, thought it now high time for himſelfe to aſpire vnto that high ſoueraigntie, after which he had ſo many yeres longed. Wherfore calling together a councel of his flatterers and fauorits, whom he had for ſuch purpoſe promoted vnto the higheſt places of ſtate (all or the moſt part of the graue councellors and friends of the late Emperor Emanuel being now diſplaced, or otherwiſe taken out of the way) he as a man only carefull of the common good, declared vnto them the dangerous ſtate of the empire, by reaſon of a rebellion raiſed in BYTHINIA at NICE, by Iſaack Angelus, and Theodorus Catacuzenus; & another at PRVSA, by Theodorus Angelus; requiring their graue aduice for the ſuppreſſing thereof: who B not ignorant of their lords purpoſe (as thereof before ſufficiently inſtructed) anſwered with one conſent, That of ſuch great miſchiefes there would be no end, except hee were ioyned in fellowſhip of the Empire together with Alexius, by his grauitie and deepe wiſedome to supplie what wanted for the good gouernment of the State in the yong Emperor his couſin. At which ſpeech the by-ſtanders (being in number many, and for the moſt part the followers of Andronicus his flatterers) gaue a great ſhout, and as if it had bin alreadie granted, with one applauſe cried out, Long liue Alexius and Andronicus the Greeke Emperors, and that with ſuch a vehemencie, as if they would therewith haue rent the verie heauens. The bruit thereof flying abroad into the citie, forthwith you might haue ſeene euery ſtreet and corner of the citie full of the vulgar people, with ſome alſo of better ſort, ſwarming together like Bees, & ſounding C the praiſes of Andronicus (who now was come out of his houſe into the court, with a world of people following him) and crying out, Long liue the Emperors Alexius and Andronicus. With which loud acclamation, mixt with the heauie ſighings of many good men, (for all were not mad of that frenzie) the yong Emperor awaked, and ſeeing the court full of people, and Andronicus by them ſaluted his fellow in the Empire; knowing now no other remedy, thought it beſt to yeeld vnto the time, & ſo with the reſt flattering the old tyrant, welcommed him ful ſore againſt his will, by the name of his friend & companion in the empire: which he now in diſſembling manner ſeeming vnwilling to take vpon him, & refuſing the place offred, was by the rout of his flattering fauorites enforced to his own great contentment, to yeeld to their re-D queſt: ſome of them with both their hands carrying him vp, vntil they had as it were againſt his wil placed him in the imperiall ſeat, prepared for him faſt by the yong emperor: others in the meane time no leſſe buſied in pulling off his priuat attyre, and putting vpon him the imperiall roabes.

The next day, when this participation of the empire ſhould be publiſhed, & they both proclaimed emperors, the name of Andronicus was ſet before the name of Alexius: whereof his fauorits (though ſome others interpreted it otherwiſe) gaue this reaſon, That it fitted not with the maieſty of the empire, that the name of a boy ſhould be ſet before the name of ſo reuerend graue, wiſe, & excellent a man as was Andronicus his companion in the Empire. Shortly after, Andronicus being brought into the great temple to be crowned, then firſt began to ſhew to the people a chereful countenance, & ſetting aſide his ſterne looke, after his long deuotion done, E filled the vain peoples heads with many large promiſes of a more happy form of gouernment than before. All which proued nothing but meere diſſimulation and deep deceit, that cheerefulnes of countenance & ſpeech ſeruing but for a while to couer his inward, ſecret, & moſt inhuman cruelty. And the more to deceiue the world, the ceremonies of his coronation paſt, at ſuch time as he ſhould for conſummation and confirmation of al, receiue the ſacred & dreadful myſterie, the pledge of our redemption, not without due reuerẽce to be named, much leſſe with impure hands touched: after he had receiued the bread, and taken the cup in his hand, he with a moſt deuout countenance framed of purpoſe to deceiue, & his eyes caſt vp to heauen, as if his ſoule had there already bin (the faireſt maske of hypocriſie) ſwore by thoſe dreadful myſteries, & moſt deeply proteſted in the hearing of the people ſtanding by, that he had taken vpon him the fellowſhip of the empire for no other end or purpoſe but to aſſiſt Alexius his coſin in the gouernment, & to ſtrengthen his power: whereas his ſecret meaning was nothing leſſe, as ſhortly after appeared. For after a few dayes ſpent in feigned deuotions for the proſperous beginning of his empire, hee forthwith turned his mind vnto other his more ſecret, but moſt wicked and execrable deſignes. And hauing aboue all things purpoſed the death of the yong Alexius depriued of the Empire.

Alexius condemned.

Alexius the emperor cruelly ſtrangled.

Emperor, he called together them of the Councell, his owne creatures and corrupt miniſters of his wickedneſſe, who had now oftentimes in their mouths that ſaying of the Poet,

> Eſt mala res multos dominarier: vnicus eſto
> An euill thing it is to be ruled by many:
> One King and one Lord, if there be any.

and that the old age of an Eagle was better than the youth of a Larke. So by the generall conſent of that wicked aſſembly (vnworthy the name of a graue counceel) a decree was made, That Alexius ſhould (as a man vnfit to gouern the State) be depriued of all imperiall dignitie, and commanded to liue a priuat life. Which diſloyall decree of the conſpirators was yet ſcarcely publiſhed, but that another more cruell came out of the ſame forge, That he ſhould forthwith be put to death, as one vnworthie longer to liue. For the execution of which ſo horrible a ſentence Stephanus Hagiochriſtophorites (one of the chiefe miniſters of Andronicus his villanies, and by him promoted euen vnto the higheſt degrees of the honours of the court) with Conſtantinus Trypſicus, and one Theodorus Badibrenus, captaine of the tormentors) were ſent out; who entring his chamber by night, without compaſſion of his tender age, or regard of his honour or innocency, cruelly ſtrangled him with a bow ſtring: which deteſtable murther ſo performed, Andronicus ſhortly after comming in, ſpurned the dead body with his foot, railing at his father the late Emperor Emanuel, as a forſworne and iniurious man; and at his mother, as a common whore. The head was forthwith ſtrook off from this miſerable carkaſſe (the mirror of honors vnſtabilitie) and left for the monſtrous tyrant to feed his eyes vpon: the bodie wrapped vp in lead, was in a boat carried to ſea by Io. Camaterius, and Theodoſius Chumenus, two of Andronicus his noble fauorits; who with great ioy and glee returned with the ſame boat to the Court, as if they had done ſome notable exployt. But long continueth not the ioy of the miſchieuous, vengeance ſtill following them at the heeles; as it did theſe two, who not long after, with the reſt that conſpired the innocent Emperors death, all or moſt part of them came to ſhameful or miſerable ends. Thus periſhed Alexius the Emperor, not yet ful fifteen yeres old, in the third yeare of his raigne: which time he liued more like a ſeruant than an Emperor, firſt vnder the command of his mother, and afterwards of the tyrant which brought him to his end.

Andronicus ſeeketh by tyranny to eſtabliſh his eſtate.

Who ioyeth now but old Andronicus, made yong again, as ſhould ſeem, by his new gained honors? for ſhortly after the murder committed, he married Anne the French kings daughter (as ſome report) before betroathed to yong Alexius; a tender & moſt beautiful lady, not yet full 11 yeres old, an vnfit match for three ſcore and ten. And in ſome ſort as it were to purge himſelfe & his partakers of the ſhamefull murther by them committed, & to ſtop the mouths of the people, he by much flattery & large promiſes procured of the biſhops a general abſolution for them all, from the oath of obedience which they had before giuen vnto the emperor Emanuel, & Alexius his ſon. Which obtained, he for a while had the ſame Biſhops in great honor, and ſhortly after in greater contempt, as men forgetfull of their duties and calling. After that, he gaue himſelfe wholly vnto the eſtabliſhing of his eſtate, neuer reckning himſelf thereof aſſured, ſo long as he ſaw any of the nobility or famous captains aliue, that fauored Emanuel the late Emperor, or Alexius his ſon: of whom ſome he ſecretly poyſoned, as Mary the Emperor Emanuels daughter, with her husband Caeſar; ſome for light occaſions hee depriued of their ſight, as he did Emanuel and Alexius the ſons of that noble captaine Iohn Comnenus; Andronicus Lapardus, whoſe good ſeruice he had oftentimes vſed; Theodorus Angelus, Alexius Comnenus the Emperor Emanuels baſe ſon: ſome he hanged, as Leo Syneſius, Manuel Lachanas, with diuers others: ſome he burnt, as Mamalus one of the Emperor Alexius his chiefe Secretaries; all men of great honor and place. For colour whereof he pretended himſelfe to be ſorrie for them, deeply proteſting, that they died by the ſeueritie of the law, not by his will, and by the iuſt doome of the Iudges, whereunto he was himſelfe (as he ſaid) to giue place; & that with teares plentifully running down his aged cheekes, as if he had been the the moſt ſorrowfull man aliue. O deepe diſſimulation, and Crocodiles teares, by nature ordained to expreſſe the heauineſſe of the heart, flowing from the eyes as ſhowers of raine out of the Clouds: in good men the moſt certaine ſignes of greateſt griefe, & ſureſt teſtimonies of inward torment:

but in Andronicus you are not ſo, you are far of another nature, you proceed of ioy, you promiſe not vnto the diſtreſſed pittie or compaſſion, but death & deſtruction! how many mens eys haue you put out? how many haue you drowned? how many haue you deuoured? Moſt of the nobilitie that fauored the late emperor Emanuel and Alexius his ſon, thus taken out of the way by Andronicus, ſtrook ſuch a feare into the reſt, that for ſafegard of their liues they betook themſelues to flight, ſome one way, ſome another, neuer thinking themſelues in ſafety ſo long as they were within the greedie Tyrants reach; whereof ſhortly after enſued no ſmall troubles, to the ſhaking of the ſtate of the whole empire. Iſaac Comnenus the emperor Emanuels nigh kinſman, took his refuge into CYPRVS, & kept that Iſland to himſelfe. Alexius Comnenus, Emanuels brothers ſon, fled into SICILIA, & there ſtir'd vp William king of that Iſland, againſt Andronicus, who with a great army landed at DYRRACHIVM, tooke the city, & ſo from thence without reſiſtance paſſing thorow the heart of MACEDONIA, ſpoiling the country before him as he went, met his fleet at THESALONICA, which famous city he alſo tooke by force, & moſt miſerably ſpoiled it, with al the country thereabout, ſo that he brought a great feare vpon the imperial city it ſelf. Vnto which ſo great euils Andronicus (intangled with domeſtick troubles, and not knowing whom to truſt) was not able to giue remedy, although for ſhew he had (to no purpoſe) ſent out certain of his moſt truſtie miniſters with ſuch forces as he could well ſpare. For the maieſtie of his authoritie growing ſtil leſſe & leſſe, & the number of his enemies both at home & abroad daily increaſing, & the fauor of the vnconſtant people (who now began to ſpeake hardly of him) declining, he vncertain which way to turn himſelfe, reſted wholly vpon tyrannie, proſcribing in his feare, not only the friends of ſuch as were fled, & whom he diſtruſted, but ſomtimes whole families together, yea and that for light occaſions, ſometime thoſe who were his beſt fauorits, whoſe ſeruice he had many times vſed in the execution of his crueltie: ſo that now no day paſſed wherein he did not put to death, impriſon, or torture one great man or other. Whereby it hapned that the imperiall city was filled with ſorrow & heauines, euery man hanging the head, & with ſilence couering his inward griefe, not without danger to haue bin then vttered. Among many others appointed to this ſlaughter, was one Iſaac Angelus a man of great nobilitie, whom Hagiochriſtopherites (the chiefe miniſter of Andronicus his tirannie, & for the ſame by him highly promoted) ſuſpecting, as one that bare no good will to the emperor (cauſe enough of death) came to his houſe to apprehend him; & finding him at home, after a few hot words commanded him to follow him: whereat the nobleman making ſome ſtay, & abhorring the very ſight of the wretch, as vnto him ominous & fatal, Hagiochriſtoporites himſelfe began to lay hands on him, reuiling his followers, that they had not forthwith drawn him out of his houſe by the haire of his head, vnto the priſon by him appointed. For they, touched with the honor of the man, & moued with pitty, forced him not, but ſtood ſtil as beholders. Iſaac ſeeing himſelfe thus beſet, & no way now left for him to eſcape, reſoluing rather there preſently to die, than ſhortly after to be murdred in priſon, drew his ſword as the reſt were laying hands vpon him, and at the firſt blow cleft the wicked head of Hagiochriſtophorites down to his ſhoulders; & ſo leauing him wallowing in his own bloud, & like a deſperate man laying about him amongſt the reſt, made himſelfe way through the midſt of them: And ſo imbrued with bloud, with his bloudy ſword yet in his hand, running thorow the midſt of the city, told the people what he had done; and crying vnto them for helpe in defence of his innocencie, fled into the great temple, there to take the refuge of the Sanctuarie: where he had not long ſit (in the place where the gultie flying thither for refuge vſed to ſit, & confeſſing their offence, craue pardon of ſuch as go in & out) but that the temple was filled with the multitude of people flocking thither out of al parts of the city, ſome to ſee the nobleman, ſome to behold what ſhould become of him: for all men thought that he would before Sun-ſet (notwithſtanding the reuerence of the place) be drawn thence by Andronicus, & put to ſome ſhameful death. Thither came alſo Iohn Ducas, Iſaacs vncle, and his ſon Iſaac, to increaſe the tumult; not for that they were any thing guiltie of the death of Hagiochriſtopherites, but for that they had before become ſureties vnto the ſuſpitious tyrant, for their kinſman Iſaac, and he likewiſe for them; by whoſe treſpas they wel knew themſelues now brought into no leſſe danger than if they had bin abettors therunto. And beſide them alſo, many other there were, which doubting of their owne eſtate, and fearing the like might happen to themſelues, pricked forward with hard ſpeeches, the common people flocking thither, inſtantly requeſting them to ſtay there, and to ſtand by them now at their need, being ſo iniuriouſly wronged, whoſe pittifull complaints mooued many to take part with them. At which time alſo, no man yet comming from the Emperor (being as then out of the city) to repreſſe the ſedition, nor any of the Nobilitie oppoſing themſelues, no friend of Andronicus appearing, none of his bloudie miniſters or officers ſhewing themſelues, nor any that did ſo much as ſpeake a good word in his behalfe, or in diſlike of the tumult, the boldnes of the ſeditious people increaſed, euery man in ſo great libertie ſaying what he liſt, and after their rude manner one incouraging another. So ſpent Iſaac that long night, not thinking (God wot) of an Empire, but ſtill expecting the deadly ſtroke of Andronicus. Yet had he with great intreating ſo preuailed, that diuers of the aſſemblie ſhutting the church doores, and bringing lights into the church, ſtayed there with him all night, and by their example cauſed ſome others to ſtay alſo. The next morning by breake of day were all the citiſens flockt again vnto the temple, curſing the tirant to the deuil, as the common enemy of mankind, wiſhing vnto him a ſhamefull death, & the honor of the empire vnto Iſaac. At that time by fortune, or rather God ſo appointing it, Andronicus was out of the city at his pallace of MELVDINVM, on the Eaſt ſide of PROPONTIS, where he was by nine a clocke at night certified of the death of Hagiochriſtuphorites, and of the tumult of the people: yet that night ſtirred he not, neither did any thing more, but by ſhort letters aduiſed the people to pacifie themſelues, and not by fooliſh rebellion to caſt themſelues into further danger. In the morning Andronicus his fauorits began to ſhew themſelues, and to doe what they might to haue appeaſed the tumultuous multitude; yea and preſently after came Andronicus himſelfe, and landed with his imperiall galley at the great pallace in the city. But with the inraged people naught preuailed either the perſuaſions of the one, or report of the preſence of the other: for they all, as vpon a ſignall giuen, and as men inſpired with one ſpirit, or ſtirred vp with the ſame fury, flocked together into the temple of S. SOPHIA, one incouraging another; and ſcoffing at ſuch as ſtood by as idle lookers on, without weapons in their hands, reuiling them and calling them rotten lymnes that had no feeling of the common harme. After that, they broke open the priſons, and ſet at libertie the priſoners, as fitteſt inſtruments to increaſe the tumult, who were not all notable offenders of the dregs of the people, but many of them borne of good houſes, and for ſome light fault, or inconſiderate word (whereof euery man was in thoſe times bound to giue an account) or for ſome friends offence againſt Andronicus, there laid faſt. Theſe of all others moſt animated the people, in ſuch ſort, as they which before for feare of the danger did but ſoftly murmure to themſelues againſt Andronicus, did now openly ioyne with the reſt of the baſe ſeditious. Then might you haue ſeen ſome with their ſwords and targets, ſome alſo in their armor, but the greateſt part armed but with clubs and ſtaues, & other ſuch like rude weapons, armes of furie, haſtily taken vp in their ſhops as by chance they came firſt to hand, running forth in euery place. By this aſſemblie of the moſt furious and promiſcuous people was Iſaac hoyſed vp, and with a generall applauſe ſaluted Emperor. At which time one of the Sextons of the church, with a ladder tooke downe Conſtantine the great his crowne of gold, (which for a monument hung ouer the holy altar, and ſet it on Iſaacs head: which he at the firſt ſeemed vnwilling to weare, not for that hee was not deſirous enough of the Empire, but for that he feared the extream danger of the matter, and thought thoſe things that were then done to be but as it were a ſicke mans dream, like enough ſtraitway to vaniſh: beſide that, he feared in ſo doing, the more to exaſperate Andronicus. Which his vncle Iohn Ducas (as is ſayd before, ſtanding by him) perceiuing, plucking off his owne cap, and ſhewing his old bald head, requeſted the people, That if his nephew did refuſe it, they would ſet it vpon his: whereunto they with a great outcry anſwered, That they would no more yeeld their obedience to an old bald man, as hauing receiued many harmes from the hoarie haires of old Andronicus; and therefore for his ſake hated euery old man, more fit for Charons boat, and his coffin, than for an Empire, and eſpecially if he had a forken beard and bald head, as had Andronicus and this Ducas. Thus was Iſaac by the tumultuous multitude inueſted in the empire; and ſo royally mounted vpon one of the Emperors horſes, richly furniſhed with a ſaddle and trappings of gold, which they had by chance gotten, was by them brought from the temple vnto the court; Baſilius Camaterus the Patriarch waiting vpon him, whom the headſtrong people had inforced againſt his wil to confirme with his authoritie what was by them done for the eſtabliſhing of Iſaac in the empire. Andronicus at his comming to the pallace perceiuing firſt by the confuſed crie of the tumultuous

A multuous multitude,and afterward by that which he ſaw with his eies,how the world went; calling vpon his old friends and flattering fauorits,thought firſt by their helpe to haue repreſſed the furie of the rebellious: who as friends of his better fortune, and not of himſelfe,were now for the moſt part ſhrunk from him;and thoſe that were left ſo feintly comming on,as if in his quarrell they had had no mind to ſpend their liues: with which heartleſſe company Andronicus fearing to oppoſe himſelfe againſt the furie of the multitude,with his bow & arrows in his hand got him vp into the higheſt tower of the pallace,called CENTENARIA,and from thence beſtowed certaine ſhot among the people.But ſeeing that to be to no purpoſe,and better perſuaded to do more with them by faire words,than ſuch vain force,hee from the top of the tower cried aloud vnto them, That if they would be quiet and depart, hee would by their B conſent reſigne the empire vnto his ſon Manuel: whereat the people more inraged,ſpared not to poure forth moſt reprochfull words in contempt both of himſelfe and his ſon; and ſo furiouſly brake into the court by one of the gates called CAREA. Which Andronicus beholding, and now out of all hope,caſting from him all his habiliments of honour,and diſguiſing himſelfe fled again to his gally,accompanied only with Anna his wife, and Maraptica his minion, & ſo returned to MELUDIUM,his place from whence he came. Iſaac but yeſterday in the bottom of diſpaire,and ſhadowed as it were with the hand of death,by the ſtrange change of fortune to day mounted vnto the higheſt type of worldly honour, entering the palace,was there again with the greateſt apprauſe of the people that might be,ſaluted Emperor. From whence he forthwith ſent out certain companies of his moſt aſſured friends & followers,to apprehend C Andronicus; who now as a man at once forſaken both of his friends and of his better fortune, ſecretly fled with his wife and his paragon,before remembred,to CHELE,attended vpon only with a few of his truſtie ſeruants,which had of long time ſerued him before he was Emperor. There taking ſhip,with purpoſe to haue fled vnto the Tauroſcythes(as not thinking himſelfe ſafe in any prouince of the empire) he was twice or thrice by foule weather put backe again,the wrought ſea abhorring (as it ſeemed) to carrie him that had ſo polluted it with the dead bodies of the innocent by him ſlain,and ſtill threatning(as it were)to deuoure him.Thus ſtrangely ſtayed by foule weather,or more truly to ſay,by the reuenging hand of the higheſt, he was found by ſuch as were ſent out to ſeeke after him, & being by them apprehended,was with two great yron chains faſt locked about his proud necke,and heauie gyues vpon his legs, D caſt into the caſtle of AMENA; and in that miſerable habit ſhortly after preſented to the Emperor Iſaac,yet buſied in appeaſing and reforming of the diſordred citie: where by the way as he went,he was by the people moſt ſhamefully reuiled, and iniuriouſly vſed; ſome plucking him by the beard,ſome by the haire of the head, ſome other in the meane time playing with his noſe,and bobbing him in the face,with a thouſand other deſpights done vnto him; eſpecially by ſuch women,as whoſe husbands he had before murdred or depriued of their ſight. Afterward being committed to the hatefull furie of the people,he had his right hand cut off, and was againe committed to the ſame caſtle,without meat,drinke, or other comfort: where after he had lien a few days,hauing one of his eyes put out,he was ſet vpon a foule leane cammel,with his face toward the taile therof,and ſo (as it were in triumph)led through the E Market place,his bald head all bare, as if it had bin a dead mans ſkull taken out of a charnel houſe; in a ſhort old coat; ſo miſerable a ſpectacle,as might haue expreſſed a fountain of teares out of the eyes of a right hard hearted man. But the bedlam & moſt inſolent citiſens,eſpecially they of the baſer ſort,as cookes,coblers,curriers,and ſuch like,flocking about him like Bees(without regard that he had but the other day worne vpon his head the imperiall crowne,then honored by them as a god,& extolled vnto the heauens; that they had not long before ſolemnly ſworne vnto him obedience and loyaltie) ranne now as men out of their wits, omitting no kind of villanie they could deuiſe to do vnto him: ſome thruſt nailes into his head, ſome caſt durt in his face,ſome the dung both of men and beaſts,ſome prickt him in the ſides with ſpits, ſome caſt ſtones at him as at a mad dog,and other ſome opprobrious and deſpightfull words, F no leſſe grieuous vnto him than the reſt: amongſt others, an impudent drab comming out of the kitchen,caſt a pot ful of ſcalding water in his face; and in brief, their outrage ſo exceeded, as if they had ſtriuen among themſelues, who ſhould do him the greateſt villanie. Hauing thus ſhamefully,as in a ridiculous triumph brought him into the Theatre, they there betwixt two pillars hanged him vp by the heeles: where hauing ſuffered all theſe deſpightfull indignities, Andronicus forſaken of his flattering fauorits.

Andronicus the Emperor hanged vp by the heeles.

with many moe, not without offence to be named, he with an inuincible courage yet ſtill held his patience, not giuing one euill word, but ſometimes ſaying, Lord haue mercie vpon me; and otherwhiles, Why do you breake a bruiſed reed? Yet the furious people nothing mooued with the calamitie of ſo great a man, (of all others now the moſt miſerable) ſtript him of his bad cloathes as he hung, & cut off his priuities. One among the reſt, to make an end of him, thruſt his ſword in at his throat vp to the twiſt as he hung: other two with their long ſwords proued their ſtrength, who could ſtrike furtheſt into his buttocks. Thus miſerably periſhed this famous Emperour, after he had raigned two yeares. That which was left of his bodie (for many had carried away ſome pieces thereof) being taken downe from the place where he hung, was caſt into a baſe vault in the Theatre, where it for a ſpace lay, as the loathſome carkaſſe of ſome wilde beaſt, and the miſerable ſpectacle of mans fragilitie; for Iſaac the Emperour would not ſuffer it to be buried. Howbeit afterwards (the furie of the people ouerpaſſed, it was by ſome more charitable men remooued thence, and layd in a low vault neere vnto the monaſterie of the Ephori: which as Nicetas Choniates (author of this hiſtorie, ſpeaking of the time wherein he liued) ſaith, is yet there vndiſſolued to be ſeene. He was a man moſt honorably diſcended, of ſtature tall, and well proportioned; in his countenance ſate a certaine reuerend maieſtie, adorned with ſuch notable vertues, as might haue made him worthily to haue bin compared vnto the greateſt Emperors of his ſtocke and familie, had he not obſcured the ſame with too much ambition and crueltie; whereof the one cauſed him to lead the greateſt part of his life in priſon or exile; the other brought vnto him a moſt ſhamefull end.

Nicetas Choniates, Annal. lib. 1. fol. 161. col 4.

Iſaac Angelus the Emperour tyranniſeth.

Iſaac the Emperor thruſt from the Empire, and depriued of his ſight by his brother Alexius.

Iſaac Angelus his ſucceſſor, by the fauour of the people thus exalted vnto the Empire, at the firſt gouerned the ſame with great lenitie and moderation, as if hee had altogether abhorred from the effuſion of his ſubiects bloud: but afterwards not a little troubled both with forrein enemies, and domeſticall rebellion, beſieged in the Imperiall Citie by ſuch of the Nobilitie as thought themſelues no leſſe worthie of the Empire than himſelfe: for repreſſing of which inſolencies, and the aſſuring of his State, he became ſo ſeuere in chaſtiſing the offendors, and ſuch others as he had in diſtruſt, that he was counted of moſt men not inferiour in crueltie to Andronicus his predeceſſor; few dayes paſſing without the condemnation or execution of one great man or other, beſides them of the meaner ſort, of whom hee ſeemed to make no great reckoning: whereby he in few yeares loſt the loue and fauour of his Subiects, who before had him in great honour; and became vnto them no leſſe odious than was before Andronicus. Vpon which generall diſlike of the people, his ingratefull yonger brother Alexius (by him before for a great ſumme of money redeemed from the Turkes) tooke occaſion to riſe vp againſt him, and by the fauour of the ſoldiers depriued him together both of the Empire and his ſight: and hauing put out his eyes, thruſt him into a Monaſterie, there to liue as it were out of the world, as a man condemned to perpetuall darkeneſſe, after he had raigned nine yeres and eight moneths, being not yet full fortie yeares old. Whither it were the reuenging hand of God, for the hard meaſure vſed to Andronicus, or not, I leaue it to the wiſer to conſider; who in his deepe prouidence, wherewith he beſt gouerneth all things, would haue a moderation vſed in puniſhment of our moſt capitall enemies, as hauing alwayes before our eyes the ſlipperie ſtate of power and authoritie: and that as all worldly things are ſubiect to change, ſo by the iuſt iudgement of God it oftentimes falleth out, that what hurt we doe vnto others, the ſame we may receiue againe from others. In theſe ſo great and ſtrange mutations of the Conſtantinopolitan Empire (which I haue ſomewhat more at large proſecuted, not ſo much for the nouelty of the matter, although it were right ſtrange, as for that out of the loſſes & ruin thereof, the greatnes of the Turks for the moſt part grew) Clizaſthlan Sultan of Iconium, after the death of the Emperor Emanuel, found meanes to take from the Empire diuers ſtrong Townes and caſtles in the leſſer Aſia, together with a great part of the country of Phrygia: Alexius, Andronicus, and Iſaac the ſucceeding Emperours, troubled with dangers neerer home, hauing nothing to oppoſe againſt him, but faire intreatie and rich preſents; ſo redeeming for a while an vnſure peace, with no leſſe charge in ſhort time to be renewed againe. This victorious Sultan (for ſo he may of right be called) holding in his ſubiection a great part of the leſſer Aſia, now a man of great yeares, dying, left behinde him foure ſonnes, Maſut, Coppatine, Rencratine, and Caichoſroes, all men growne. Amongſt whom he diuided his Kingdome: Vnto Muſat he bequeathed Amaſia, Ancyra, Doryleum, with diuers other pleaſant Cities of Pontus:

A vnto Coppatine he aſsigned Melytene, Ceſarea, and the colonie now called Taxara: vnto Reucratine hee allotted Aminſum, Docea, with ſome other Cities vpon the ſea coaſt: but vnto Caichoſroes, he left Iconium his regall ſeat, and with it Lycaonia, Pamphilia, and all the countries thereabouts as farre as Cottianyum. Of theſe foure, Coppatine long liued not after his father; for whoſe inheritance Reucratine Prince of Docea, and Maſut Prince of Ancyra (his two brethren) fell at variance, and ſo at laſt into open warre. But Maſut finding himſelfe too weake for his warlike brother Reucratine, yeelded vnto him the territories which hee ſaw he muſt needs forgoe; and glad now to keepe his owne, ſo made peace with him. Reucratine being a man of an ambitious and haughtie ſpirit, with his forces thus doubled, denounced warre vnto his brother Caichoſroes; who doubting his owne ſtrength, fled vnto the Emperour B Alexius Angelus for ayde, as had his father done before him vnto the Emperour Manuel, although not with like good fortune. For the Emperour but of late hauing obtayned the empire by the depoſing of his brother, and altogether giuen to pleaſure, reputing alſo thoſe domeſticall warres of the Turkes, ſome part of his owne ſafetie; ſent him home without comfort, as one ſtrong enough of himſelfe to defend his owne quarrell againſt his brother.

The ſonnes of Clizaſthlan at variance among themſelues.

Howbeit, hee was ſcarcely come to Iconium, but he was by Reucratine expulſed thence, and driuen to flie into Armenia, where hee was by Zebune King of that countrey, a Turke alſo, honourably receiued and courteouſly vſed, but yet denied of the ayd he requeſted: the King pretending that hee was already in league with Reucratine, and therefore could not; or as ſome thought, fearing the dangerouſneſſe of the matter, would not intermeddle therein. C Wherewith the poore Sultan vtterly diſcouraged, returned againe to Conſtantinople, and there in poore eſtate, as a man forlorne, paſſed out the reſt of his dayes.

Now hauing thus paſſed through the Turkiſh affaires in the leſſer Aſia, together with the troubled eſtate of the Conſtantinopolitan empire, no ſmall cauſe of the Turks greatneſſe; the courſe of time calleth vs backe againe before we paſſe any farther, to remember their proceedings alſo at the ſame time, and ſhortly after, in Syria, Iudæa, Ægypt, and thoſe more Southerly countries, where theſe reſtleſſe people ceaſed not by all meanes to enlarge their empire, vntill they had brought all thoſe great kingdomes vnder their obeyſance.

After the death of Baldwin King of Ieruſalem, of whom wee haue before ſpoken, Almericus his younger brother, Earle of Ioppa and Aſcalon, beeing then about ſeuen and twentie D yeares old, was by the better good liking of the clergie and people, than of the nobilitie, elected King: not for that there wanted in him any good parts worthy of a kingdom, but for that ſome of them enuied vnto him ſo great an honour. Neuertheleſſe he was (as wee ſaid) by the generall conſent of the people, elected, proclamed, and by Almericus the Patriarch with al ſolemnitie crowned, the 17 day of Februarie, in the yeare of Grace, 1163. To begin whoſe troubled raigne, the Ægyptians firſt of al denyed to pay vnto him their wonted tribute. In reuenge whereof, he in perſon himſelfe with a puiſſant armie entred into Ægypt; and meeting with Dargan the Sultan, overthrew him in plaine battell, and put him to flight: who to ſtay the further purſuit and paſſage of the Chriſtians, cut the bankes of the riuer Nilus, and ſo drowned the countrey, that the King was glad to content himſelfe with the victorie he had E already gotten, and ſo to returne to Hieruſalem.

The next yeare Almericus was againe drawne downe with his power into Ægypt, by Dargan the Sultan, to aid him againſt Saracon; whom Noradin the Turke, King of Damaſco, had ſent as Generall with an army, to reſtore Sanar the Sultan before expulſed, and to depoſe Dargan. In which expedition Dargan being ſlaine, and Saracon hauing won certaine townes, kept them to himſelfe: Sanar doubtfull of his good meaning, ioyned his forces with Almericus, and by his helpe expulſed Saracon out of Ægypt. But whileſt Almericus was thus buſied in Ægypt, Noradin the Turk making an inroad into the frontiers of the Chriſtians neere vnto Tripolis, was by Gilbert Lacy, maſter of the Templars in thoſe quarters, and the other Chriſtians, when he leaſt feared, ſo ſuddenly ſet vpon, that he had much adoe by flight to ſaue himſelfe, F halfe naked for haſte, moſt of his followers being at the ſame time ſlain. In reuenge of which diſgrace, he not long after with a great power came and beſieged Arethuſa: for reliefe whereof, Bohemund Prince of Antioch, Raymond the younger, Earle of Tripolis, Calamon gouernour of Cilicia, and Toros Prince of Armenia, came with their power. Of whoſe comming the Turk hearing, raiſed his ſiege and departed. After whom theſe Chriſtian Princes eagerly gerly following, were by the Turkes ſhut vp in certaine deepe and rotten fennes (whereinto they had vnaduiſedly too far entred) and there with a great ſlaughter ouerthrowne. In which conflict, all the chiefe commanders of the armie were taken, except the Prince of ARMENIA, who forecaſting the danger, had retired, after he had in vaine diſſwaded the reſt from the further purſuit of the flying enemie. The Prince of ANTIOCH there taken, was about a yeare after for a great ſumme of money redeemed; but the Countie of TRIPOLIS was after eight yeares ſtraight captiuitie hardly deliuered. Noradin after this victorie returning againe to the ſiege of ARETHVSA, in few daies won the towne: and encouraged with ſuch good ſucceſſe, and the abſence of the King, laid ſiege to the citie of PANEADE, which was alſo deliuered vnto him, vpon condition that the citizens might at their pleaſure in ſafetie depart.

At the ſame time Saracon Generall of Noradin his forces, tooke from the Chriſtians two caſtles; the one in the countrey of SIDON, the other beyond IORDAN vpon the borders of ARABIA, both in the cuſtody of the Templars: twelue of whom the King at his returne hanged vp for treaſon.

Rhortly after Saracon, King Noradin his great man of war, with all the power of the Turks, came downe againe into ÆGYPT, with purpoſe to haue fully ſubdued all that notable kingdome vnto his Lord and maſter. Of whoſe power, Sanar the Sultan ſtanding in dread, praied aid of Almericus, promiſing vnto him beſide his yearely tribute, the ſumme of fortie thouſand ducats for his paines. The matter fully agreed vpon, and all things now in readineſſe, Almericus ſet forward with his armie, and encountring with Saracon and his Turkes at the riuer NILVS, ouerthrew him in a great battel: yet not without ſome loſſe, for the Turks in their flight lighting vpon the Kings carriages with the whole baggage of the army, and ouerrunning them that had the charge therof, carried away with them a moſt rich prey, whereby it came to paſſe that as the Chriſtians had the victorie, ſo the Turks inioyed the ſpoile.

Saracon after this ouerthrow hauing againe gathered together his diſperſed ſoldiers, tooke his way to ALEXANDRIA, where he was by the citizens receiued: after whom the King following, gaue no attempt vnto the city, for that he knew to be but vain, but incamped cloſe by the ſide of the riuer NILVS, from whence the citie was chiefly to be victualled. Whoſe purpoſe Saracon perceiuing, and betime foreſeeing the diſtreſſe of his whole armie for want of victuals, if he ſhould there long ſtay: leauing there his ſon Saladin (or as ſome call him his nephew) with a thouſand horſmen for the keeping of the citie, ſecretly by night departed thence himſelfe with the reſt ef his army: and paſſing through the deſerts, did great harm in the vpper parts of EGYPT. Of whoſe departure Almericus vnderſtanding, was about to haue followed him, but that he was otherwiſe perſuaded by the Egyptian captaines to continue his former purpoſe for the gaining of the citie: wherefore now after the departure of Saracon he began to approach the wals, and with diuers engines of war to diſturb the defendants: wherewith the citizens (better acquainted with the trade of merchandize, than the feats of war) diſcouraged, began now to conſult amongſt themſelues for the turning out of thoſe troubleſome gueſts whom they had ſo lately receiued: which Saladin perceiuing, certified Saracon his vncle therof, requeſting his ſpeedie reliefe in that his ſo dangerous eſtate, and with much intraty perſuaded the citizens for a while to hold it out, vntil he might from him receiue anſwer: of al which the Chriſtians and Egyptians without, hauing intelligence, laid ſo much the harder vnto the citie. Gladly would Saracon haue done what he was by his nephew requeſted: but perceiuing it to be a matter of no leſſe danger than difficultie, he by the means of Hugh, Countie of CESAREA, and one Arnolphus another noble Chriſtian, both then priſoners with him, concluded a peace with the King: whereupon the citie was forthwith yeelded vp, and Saladin with his Turks ſuffred in ſafetie to depart. At which time alſo al priſoners were on both ſides freely and without ranſome ſet at libertie. Thus Saracon for this time diſappointed of this his purpoſe for the conqueſt of EGIPT, returned back again to DAMASCO: and Almericus with great glory to ASCALON, where he arriued with his armie the 21 of September in the yeere 1167.

In this late expedition, K. Almericus on the one ſide enflamed with the wealth of EGYPT, and on the other encoraged with the weaknes of that effeminate people: reſting for the moſt part vpon forraine ſtrength; had purpoſed himſelfe to inuade the kingdom, & ſo if poſſible he might, to ioine it to his own. For color wherof, it was pretended that the Sultan contrary to his faith before giuen, had ſecretly ſought to ioine in league & amity with Noradin the Turk,

A King of DAMASCO. The chiefe ſtirter vp of the King vnto this warre, was one Gerbert maſter of the Templars; who iu reſpect of the aid by them of his order to be giuen, had obtained of the king, after the victorie gained, to haue the city of PELVSIVM with all the rich countrey about the ſame, giuen vnto him and his brethren the knights of the order for euer: vpon which hope, he contrarie to the mind of many of the Knights, for the furtherance of that war, gaged his whole wealth and credit, with all the treaſure of his houſe. So all things now in readineſſe for ſo great an enterpriſe, Almericus with his army ſet forward in October, and hauing in ten daies paſſed the ſandy deſert, came to PELVSIVM, which city he (after three daies ſiege) took by force, and put to ſword al them that were therein, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition: which citie, he according to his promiſe before made, gaue vnto the Templars. After that, he B began alſo to beſiege CAIRE, at which time his fleet ſacked the citie of TAPIVM. In the meane time, Sanar the Egiptian Sultan, conſidering the danger he was in, to ſatisfie Almericus his greedy deſire, offred to pay him twentie hundred thouſand ducats to withdraw his forces: & forthwith ſent him one hundred thouſand, for the ranſom of his ſon & his nephew taken priſoners at PELVSIVM: and for the reſt to be paid within fiue daies after, he gaue two of his nephewes hoſtages. Neuertheles the paiment he deferred from day to day, of purpoſe in the meane time to raiſe the whole power of ÆGIPT, as alſo to receiue aid from the Turks by Saracon, which he daily expected: of whoſe ſpeedie comming, Almericus vnderſtanding, left part of his armie at PELVSIVM, and with the reſt went to haue met him: but miſſing him by the way, Saracon with his Turks came in ſafetie to CAIRE vnto the Sultan, as he had deſired.
C Wherefore Almericus diſmaid with the multitude of two ſo great armies now ioyned together, retired back againe to PELVSIVM, and there taking with him the garriſon before left, returned home to HIERVSALEM: hauing in that expedition (begun with the breach of faith) laid the foundation of the ruine of his kingdome, as in few yeres after, it by proofe appeared, by the euill neighbourhood of the Turks, by that meanes brought downe into EGIPT.

Peluſium taken by Almericus.

Saracon the Turke after the departure of Almericus, eaſily perceiuing a moſt fit time and opportunitie to be offered for him now to obtaine that, which hee had in vaine before both ſought and fought for, encamped with his army neere vnto CAIRE, and notably counterfei-ted himſelfe of all others the moſt deuoted friend of the Sultans: ſo that betwixt them two paſſed all the kind tokens of loue and friendſhip, that could poſſible be deuiſed; the Sultan of-D tentimes feaſting the Turk, and in kindnes likewiſe being feaſted of him: but at length going as his manner was, vnto the camp to viſit him, he was by the Turkes ſlaine. So Saracon hauing brought to paſſe what he deſired, and entring the citie with his armie, was by the great Ca-liph (from whom the Ægyptian Sultans, as from their ſuperiors, the true ſucceſſours of their great Prophet Mahomet, tooke their authoritie) appointed Sultan, the firſt of the Turks that euer enioyed the ſame: which royall dignitie hee had not poſſeſſed fully a yeare, but that hee was taken away by death. In whoſe ſtead Saladin his brothers ſon, by and by ſtept vp: who altogether a martiall man, not regarding the reuerent maieſtie of the Caliph (as had his vncle Saraçon, and al the Egiptian Sultans before him) with his horſmans maſe ſtruck out his brains, and not ſo contented, vtterly rooted out all his poſteritie, the better to aſſure himſelfe and his E ſucceſſors the Turks in the poſſeſſion of his new begotten kingdom; and after that diuided the great treaſures of the Egyptians among his Turks, to encourage them the more to follow him in his warres againſt the Chriſtians.

The Sultan of Aegipt vnder the colour of friendſhip ſlain by Saracon.

This glorious kingdome ſo much ſpoken of in holy Scripture, & renowned of the learned hiſtoriographers of all ages, after the ruine of the Roman empire, was ſometime part of the Conſtantinopolitan empire, & a notable member of the Chriſtian cōmon weale; vntil that about the yere of our Lord 704, the Egiptians weary of the pride & couetuouſnes of the Gre-cians, reuolted from them vnto the Saraſins, whoſe ſuperſtition they alſo receiued: & ſo vnder the gouernement of the Saraſin Caliphs, the ſucceſſors of the falſe prophet Mahomet liued about 464 years, vntil that now being inuaded by Almericus, they prayed aid of Noradin the F Turke, Sultan of DAMASCO: who to their reliefe ſending Saracon with an army, repulſed indeed the Chriſtians, but oppreſſing their liberty, took to himſelfe the kingdom, which he left vnto his nephew Saladin, in whoſe poſterity it remained vntil it was from them again taken by the Circaſſian ſlaues the Mamalukes: vnder whoſe ſeruile gouernment it was holden of long time, til that by the great emperor of the Turks Selimus the firſt, it was again conquered & the Mamalukes

How the kingdome of Aegypt firſt fell into the hands of the Saraſins, with the notable alterations thereof.

Mamalukes vtterly deſtroyed: In the gouernement of whoſe proſperitie, the mightie Emperours G of the Turks, it hath euer ſince remained as part of their empire, vntill this day, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie God willing ſhall appeare.

1170 Saladin thus poſſeſſed of the great kingdome of EGIPT, and all things ſet in ſuch order as he thought beſt for the Newneſſe of his eſtate, with a great armie entred into the land of PALESTINE, in the yere 1170, and there beſieged DARON; which towne he woon, and ouerthrew ſuch as were ſent by King Almericus to haue relieued the ſame: with which ſmall victorie contenting himſelfe, as with the good beginning of his riſing fortune, he returned backe again into his kingdom: yet was his army ſo great and populous, as that the like armie of the Turks had neuer before bin ſeene in the Holy land. Wherefore Almericus conſidering in what great danger he ſtood, his kingdome now being on both ſides beſet by the Turks, ſent out his H embaſſadors vnto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to craue their aid for the defence of that kingdom which their fathers had won: and for the ſame purpoſe went himſelfe in perſon vnto the Emperor of CONSTANTINOPLE, of whom he was royally entertained, and afterward ſent backe loaded with the promiſes of great matters, as were alſo his embaſſadours from the Princes of the Weſt. All which for all that ſorted vnto nothing, but vaniſhed into ſmoake.

1171 The yeare following, viz. 1171, Saladin beſieged PETREA, the Metropoliticall Citie of ARABIA: but hearing that Almericus with a great power was comming to the reliefe thereof, he raiſed his ſiege and retired: as he did alſo next yeare after, hauing in vaine attempted the ſtrong caſtle of MONT-ROIALL, on the further ſide of IORDAN. In like manner alſo the third yeare he came againe into the Holy Land, and ſpoiled the countrey beyond IORDAN: but I hearing of the Kings comming againſt him, he forthwith returned againe into EGIPT. All theſe light expeditions, this politique Prince made not ſo much for hope of victorie, or to proue his enemies ſtrength, as to traine his ſouldiers, eſpecially the effeminate Egyptians, and to make them fitter to ſerue him in his greater deſignes.

1173 Shortly after died Noradin Sultan of DAMASCO, and in his time a moſt notable champion of the Turks, after he had raigned nine and twentie yeares. Vpon whoſe death, Almericus forthwith beſieged the citie of PANEADE, in hope to haue againe recouered the ſame: but he was by the widow of the late dead Sultan, for a great ſum of money and the deliuerie of certaine noble priſoners, intreated to raiſe his ſiege and depart. So hauing ſent away his armie, and traueling with his ordinarie retinue to TIBERIAS, where he had the Summer before bin K ſicke of the flix, feeling himſelfe not well, he returned on horſe backe by NAZARETH and NEAPOLIS to HIERVSALEM, where his old diſeaſe increaſing vpon him, he was alſo taken with a Feauer: wherwith after he had bin ſome few dayes grieuouſly tormented, he requeſted his Phyſitians, with ſome gentle potion to looſe his bellie, which was now ſomewhat ſtayed: which they refuſing to doe, he commanded the potion to be giuen him vpon his owne perill, hap thereon what hap ſhould: which being giuen him, and his bellie againe looſed, he ſeemed therewith to haue beene at the firſt well eaſed; but his wonted Feauer with great vehemencie returning, before his weake and ſpent bodie could be with conuenient meats refreſhed he ſuddenly died the tenth of Iuly, in the yeare 1173, when he had raigned about ten yeares. His dead bodie was with the great lamentation of all his ſubiects, ſolemnly buried by his L brothers. He was a moſt wiſe Prince, and withall right valiant, amongſt many moſt fit for the gouernment and defence of that troubleſome kingdome, ſo hardly beſet with the Infidels, if it had pleaſed God to haue giuen him longer life.

Baldwin the fourth of that name, ſeuenth King of Hieruſalem.

Foure daies after the death of Almericus, was Baldwin his ſonne, then a youth about thirteene yeares old, by the generall conſent of the Nobilitie choſen King, and by Almericus the Patriarch in the Temple with great ſolemnitie crowned in the yeare 1173: vnto whom as not yet by reaſon of his tender age, fit himſelfe to mannage the weightie affaires of the kingdom, Raymond Countie of TRIPOLIS, was by the whole conſent of the Nobilitie appointed Tutor to ſupplie what was wanting in the young King.

Noradin Sultan of DAMASCO (dead as is aforeſaid) left behind him Melechſala his ſonne, yet M but a youth, to ſucceed him in his kingdome. Whoſe gouernment the Nobilitie diſdaining, ſent ſecretly for Saladin Sultan of EGIPT, vnto whom at his comming they betrayed the city of DAMASCO, the regall ſeat of the Turkes in SIRIA. Whereof Saladin poſſeſſed, and entring into CELESIRIA without reſiſtance, tooke HELIOPOLIS, EMISSA, with the great citie of

CESAREA;

A CESAREA; and in fine, all the whole kingdome of DAMASCO, the citie of ARETHVSA onely excepted. But thus to ſuffer Melechſala the young Prince to be wrouged, and the kingdome of DAMASCO to be ioyned to the kingdome of EGIPT, was of the wiſer ſort thought not to ſtand with the ſafetie of the kingdome of HIERVSALEM, lying in the middle betwixt them both. Wherefore the Countie of TRIPOLIS, gouernour of that kingdome, made out certain forces to haue hindred his proceedings. At which time alſo, Cotobed Prince of PARTHIA, and Melechſalas vncle, ſent certaine Troupes of Parthian horſemen to haue aided his diſtreſſed Nephew, who were by Saladin ouerthrowne and almoſt all ſlaine, neere vnto ALEPPO where Melechſala lay. As for the Countie of TRIPOLIS and the other Chriſtian Princes, with whom Saladin in the newneſſe of his kingdom had no deſire to fal out; he appeaſed them with faire intreatie, and rewards; vnto the Countie hee ſent freely the hoſtages, which yet lay for B his ranſome at EMISSA: vnto the other princes he ſent rich preſents; and therewith ſo contented them all, that they returned without any thing doing againſt him. After which time, three or foure yeares paſſed in great quietneſſe, to the great ſtrengthning of him in thoſe new gotten kingdoms. At length vpon the comming ouer of Philip Earle of FLANDERS, the Chriſtian Princes of SYRIA encouraged, conſulted of an expedition to be made in EGIPT, whereof Saladin hauing intelligence, drew down into that countrey the greateſt part of his ſtrength. But Philip diſliking of that expedition, and the rather for that he ſaw no great cheerfulneſſe in the Countie of TRIPOLIS and the reſt thereunto; they with one conſent changed their purpoſe for EGIPT, and turning their forces a quite contrarie way, miſerably and without reſiſtance waſted the country about EMISSA and CESAREA.

C Whileſt the Chriſtians was thus buſied in CÆLISIRIA, Saladin on the other ſide tooke occaſion out of EGIPT to inuade the kingdome of HIERVSALEM: of whoſe comming, King Baldwin hauing intelligence, with ſuch ſmall forces as he had left, haſtened himſelfe to ASCALON. In the Meane time Saladin with a great armie was entred into the Holy Land, where burning the countrey before him, and raging in the bloud of the poore Chriſtians, hee came and encamped not farre from ASCALON: and ſtrucke ſuch a feare vpon the whole countrey, that they which dwelt in HIERVSALEM, were about to haue forſaken the citie: as for the King himſelfe, hee lay cloſe within the citie of ASCALON, not daring to aduenture vpon ſo ſtrong an enemie. Wherewith Saladin encouraged, and out of feare of his enemies, diſperſed his armie, ſome one way, ſome another, to forrage the countrey. Which the King perceiuing, D ſecretly with all his power iſſued out of the citie, if happilie ſo he might ouertake the Sultan vnawares; neither was he deceiued in his expectation: for comming ſuddenly vpon him, and ſecretly charging him, he had with him for a good ſpace an hard and doubtfull battell, vntill that the victorie by the power of God, at length inclining to the Chriſtians, Saladin with his Turkes fled, ouerthrowne with a great ſlaughter, moſt part of his great armie beeing eyther there ſlaine, or loſt afterward with hunger and could. This victorie fell vnto the Chriſtians the 25-day of Nouember, in the yere 1177, not without the almightie hand of God, the Turk hauing in his army aboue 26 thouſand horſmen, and the king not paſt 4. hundred horſe with ſome few footmen. After which victorie, Baldwin in great triumph returned to IERVSALEM, and there ſhortly after with great care & diligence repaired the decaied wals of the city.

The Chriſtians diuiding the ſpoile, ouerthrowne by the Turkes.

E Saladin in reuenge of this ouerthrow, made diuers incurſions into the frontiers of the Chriſtians, and did great harm, ſpecially in the country about SIDON. For the repreſſing wherof, the king put himſelfe in armes, and going againſt him, ouerthrew part of his army, as they were carrying away a great bootie. Of which ouerthrow Saladin vnderſtanding, came in ſuch haſte with the reſt of his army, as if it had bin a ſudden tempeſt, vpon the Chriſtians, then in great ſecuritie diuiding the ſpoile; of whom they ſlew a great number, and put the reſt to flight: In which ſo ſudden a confuſion, Otto, grand maſter of the Templars, and Hugh the Earle of TRIPOLIS his ſon in law, were both taken priſoners. The Earle himſelfe with a few fled to TIRE: the king alſo at the ſame time was glad to ſhift for himſelfe, & by flight to ſaue himſelfe as he might: after which victory, Saladin beſieged a ſtrong caſtle which the king but the yere before had built vpon the bank of the riuer IORDAN, and giuen it to the Templars, with the country F round about; which caſtle Saladin took by force, and put to ſword al that were therein, except ſome few whom he carried away priſoners. By this victory Saladin became dreadful vnto the chriſtians in SIRIA, which cauſed them, eſpecially ſuch as had any charge, with more vigilancie to looke about them. Yet ſhortly after, a peace was for a time concluded betwixt the Sultan and the King; whereby their troubled eſtates breathed themſelues almoſt the ſpace of two yeares. G

But this ſo welcome a calme was by domeſticall troubles againe by the Kings friends ſuddenly troubled: for the countie of TRIPOLIS, to whom the gouernment of the kingdome was committed, comming towards HIERVSALEM, being by the ſuggeſtion of his enemies brought into ſuſpition with the King, as if he had affected the kingdome, was to his great diſgrace by the way commanded to ſtay. The chiefe authors of which diſcontentment, were the Kings mother, a woman of a turbulent nature, and her brother the Kings Steward; who in the abſence of the Earle, had wrought the Kings ſicke mind according to their owne appetites: But the reſt of the nobility wiſely foreſeeing vnto what great danger that diſcord might tend, H in diſpight of them, with much labor, cauſed him to be ſent for againe, and ſo reconciled vnto the King; by which means, that dangerous fire of diſſention was for that time appeaſed, which afterwards brake out againe, to the vtter ruine of that kingdome.

Saladin goeth out of Aegypt to Damaſco.

Saladin now wearie of the league he had before made with King Baldwin, as no longer ſtanding with his haughtie deſignes, renounced the ſame, and raiſing a great power in ÆGIPT, ſet forward toward DAMASCO. Of whoſe comming, King Baldwin hauing knowledge, with the whole power of his kingdome went to haue met him, not farre from the dead Sea, and there encamped at an old towne called PETRA. But Saladin turning out of the way, into the Kings territorie, came and encamped before MOVNT-ROIALL, a caſtle which Baldwin had giuen vnto the Templars, about three daies march fom the place where the King lay. I Galiley ſpoiled, and the caſtle of Burie taken by the Turkes.

There Saladin with the ſpoile of the country refreſhing his armie, now weary of long trauel, ſet forward againe, and ſo without reſiſtance arriued with his armie at DAMASCO. At the ſame time, the Turks Captains about DAMASCO, BOSTRVM, and EMISSA, perceiuing the frontiers of the Chriſtians thereabout to be kept with ſmall ſtrength, paſſed ouer IORDAN, and ſpoiling a great part of GALILEY, beſieged the caſtle of BVRIE, at the foot of mount TABOR, not farre from the cttie of NAIM; which caſtle they in few daies tooke, and hauing there made a great ſlaughter, carried away with them about fiue hundred priſoners. Saladin being come to DAMASCO, called together all the garriſons of that kingdome, and ioyning them vnto the forces he brought out of ÆGIPT, entred into the Holy Land: at which time the Countie of TRIPOLIS, gouernour of the kingdome, lay ſicke of a burning feauer. Neuertheleſſe the King encouraged by the Knights of the order, went out with his armie againſt K him; and encountring with him neere vnto a village called FROBOLET, ouerthrew him in a great battell; wherein, and afterward in the flight, moſt part of the Sultans armie periſhed: Saladin himſelfe being glad by ſpeedie flight to eſcape the danger, and ſo by long marches to get him againe to DAMASCO.

Beritus in vain beſieged by the Turkes.

In reuenge of this ouerthrow, Saladin hauing repaired his armie, and ſent for his fleet out of ÆGIPT, came and beſieged BERITVS both by ſea and land: at which time alſo his brother, whom he had left gouernour in ÆGIPT, beſieged DARVM, a ſtrong towne in the vttermoſt bounds of the kingdom of HIERVSALEM towards ÆGIPT: both whoſe forces Baldwin being not able at once to repreſſe, by the counſell of his nobilitie, thought it beſt firſt to re- L lieue BERITVS, as the place of greateſt importance. And for that purpoſe ſet forward with his armie by land, hauing alſo rigged vp three and thirtie gallies at TYRE, for the reliefe thereof by ſea. Of which preparation Saladin vnderſtanding, as alſo of the Kings comming (by letters intercepted by his ſcouts, directed to the beſieged, for the holding out of the ſiege, with promiſe of ſpeedie reliefe) he preſently roſe with his armie, and departed: whereof the King being aduertiſed, retired to SEPHOR.

Saladin inuading Meſopotamia, is himſelfe inuaded by the King of Hieruſalem.

Not long after, Saladin according to his ambitious nature, deſirous aboue meaſure to extend the bounds of his Kingdome, and ſeeing the ſucceſſe of his attempts againſt the King of HIERVSALEM not anſwerable to his deſire, conuerted his forces vnto the countries more Eaſtward; and paſſing the riuer EVPHRATES, and entring into MESOPOTAMIA, partly by M force, partly by corruption, got into his hands the cities of EDESSA, CARRAS, and diuers others. In which time the king of IERVSALEM took occaſion firſt to ſpoile the country about DAMASCO, and after that diuers other places of the Sultans kindome, making hauocke of whatſoeuer came in his way, & ſo laded with the ſpoile of the Turks, retired to IERVSALEM.

Saladin

A Saladin with victorie returning out of MESOPOTAMIA, in reuenge of the iniuries done vnto him in his abſence, marched directly to ALEPPO, the ſtrongeſt citie of the Chriſtians in that part of SYRIA, which aboue all other he longed after: where he had not long lien, but that it was by the treaſon of the gouernour deliuered into his hands, with all the countrey thereabouts: wherewith the Chriſtian Princes were ſo diſcouraged, that they euen then began to feare greater matters to enſue. The Prince of ANTIOCH ſold TARSVS the metropoliticall citie of CILICIA, to Rupinus Prince of ARMENIA; for that hee ſaw it was not without great charge and danger to be by him defended, being ſo farre from him, and Saladin as it were now ſtept in betwixt him and it.

Aleppo betraied vnto the Turks

At the ſame time, King Baldwin at NAZARETH fell ſicke of a feuer, the leproſie alſo his old B diſeaſe growing dayly more and more vpon him: inſomuch as deſpairing of his life, hee called vnto him Guy Luſignan Countie of IOPPA & ASCALON, vnto whom he had before eſpouſed Sybil his eldeſt ſiſter, and in the preſence of his mother, the Patriarch, and all the chiefe commanders of the ſoldiers of the ſacred war, appointed him gouernor of the kingdome, reſeruing vnto himſelfe only the title of a King, with the citie of IERVSALEM, and a yerely penſion of ten thouſand duckats: all which was done, to the great diſgrace and diſcontentment of the Countie of TRIPOLIS the old gouernor.

It was not long, but that Saladin hauing breathed himſelfe a little, after ſo great labors came againe into the Holie land, where he tooke many caſtles, and did infinite harm; inſomuch that the country people were glad for feare to forſake their houſes, & to flie into cities. The C Chriſtian armie in the meane time lying faſt by at SEPHOR, not once mouing, although many a faire occaſion were offered: for the chiefe Commaunders affectionated vnto the Countie of TRIPOLIS, and enuying at the preferment of Guy the new gouernor, were vnwilling to fight, but finding one excuſe or other, ſuffered the enemie at his pleaſure to ſpoyle the country, and ſo in ſafetie to depart, which he had neuer before done in thoſe quarters.

Within leſſe than a moneth after, Saladin with a great armie well appointed with all the habiliments of war needfull for the beſieging of a city or ſtrong caſtle, came againe into the land of PALESTINE, and paſſing thorow the countrey beyond IORDAN, ſate downe at laſt before PETRA, in hope by the taking thereof to haue made his paſſage between ÆGYPT and DAMASCO more ſafe. Of which his purpoſe King Balawin hauing knowledge, and taught by the euill D ſucceſſe of late, to what ſmal purpoſe it was to commit the mannaging of his wars vnto a Generall ſo euill beloued, and leſſe regarded, as was Guy his brother in law; ſent againſt him with his armie, Raymund the Countie of TRIPOLIS the old gouernor, whom he had again reſtored vnto the gouernment, and diſplaced Guy. Of whoſe comming Saladin hearing, raiſed his ſiege after he had lien there a moneth, and ſo departed.

Petra in vaine beſieged by the Turks.

A little before this expedition, the King ſtil growing ſicker and ſicker, his foule diſeaſe ſtil increaſing, by the common conſent of the nobilitie, appointed Baldwin his nephew by his ſiſter Sybilla, a child but of fiue yeres old, to ſucceed him in the kingdome; and the Countie of TRIPOLIS to haue the gouernment of the ſtate during the time of his minoritie. This Sybilla the kings ſiſter was firſt married to William the yonger, Marques of MOVNT-FERRAT, who E dying within three months after, left her with child with this his poſthumus ſonne Baldwin, now by his vncle deputed vnto the hope of the kingdome. After whoſe death ſhe was married to Guy Luſignan Countie of IOPPA and ASCALON, the late gouernour; who taking in euill part this the kings deſignement, eſpecially for the gouernment of the kingdome by the Countie of TRIPOLIS, departed from the court as a man diſcontented, vnto his city of ASCALON: whereof the Patriarch and the Princes of the ſacred war, fearing (and that not without cauſe) great danger to enſue, came to the King, then holding a Parliament in the citie of ACON, moſt humbly requeſting him for auoyding of further danger, and the ſafetie of his kingdome, to receiue againe into his fauour the Countie Guy his brother in law, and to make an attonement betwixt him and the Countie of TRIPOLIS. But this their requeſt ſorted to no purpoſe; for F that the Parliament was diſſolued without any thing for the good of the Commonweale in that point concluded.

Diſſention in the court of Ieruſalem.

After that time the kingdome of IERVSALEM began ſtil more and more to decline; in the old King Baldwin (ſicke both in bodie and mind) was almoſt no hope: in the young King (yet vnfit for ſo great a burthen) much leſſe: and the diſſention betwixt the two Counties Guy and King Baldwin ſendeth Embaſſadors vnto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt for ayd.

Raymund with their fauorits, was like enough to bring great harme vnto the State. Beſides that, the Countie of Tripolis fearing the power of Guy his enemie, was thought to haue ſecret intelligence with Saladin the Turke, inſomuch as the King was almoſt in purpoſe to haue proclaimed him traitor. Wherefore the King now reſted only vpon the councel of William Archbiſhop of Tyre, and the maſters of the Knights of the ſacred warre: by whoſe aduice he ſent Heraclius Patriarch of Ieruſalem, Roger Molins maſter of the Knights of S. Iohns, and Arnold maſter of the Templars, Embaſſadors vnto Lucius the third, then Pope, vnto Frederick the emperor, Philip the French King, and Henry the ſecond, King of England, to declare vnto them the dangerous ſtate of that Chriſtian kingdome, and to craue their aid againſt the Infidels. Theſe Embaſſadors comming to the Councell then holden at Verona, with great grauity and diligence, in the preſence of the Pope & of the Emperor, declared the hard eſtate of the Chriſtians of the Eaſt, with their humble requeſt vnto them for aid; in ſuch ſort that they mooued them, with all the Princes there preſent, to compaſſion. From thence they were by the Pope directed vnto Philip the French King, with whom hauing diſpatched their affaires, they from him paſſed ouer into England, and afterward into Germanie: and had at length brought their negotiation to ſo good paſſe, that in euery place great preparation was made for a great expedition to be made againſt the Turks, for the reliefe of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt: with which good newes the Embaſſadours returning to Ieruſalem, filled the ſicke King with the hope of great matters. But greater quarrels ſhortly after ariſing betwixt the Pope and the Emperour, and ſharpe warre likewiſe betwixt the French King and the King of England, and the other Chriſtian Princes alſo being at no better quiet, the notable expedition that had with the expectation thereof ſo filled the world, was againe layd aſide and quite daſhed. Whereof King Baldwin vnderſtanding, both by meſſengers and letters from his friends, oppreſſed with griefe and heauineſſe more than with the force of his diſeaſe, (a man for his proweſſe and painefulneſſe not inferior to any his predeceſſors) died without iſſue the 16 day of May, Anno 1185, being but fiue and twentie yeres old, whereof he had raigned twelue. His bodie was afterward with the generall mourning of his ſubiects, ſolemnly buried in the Temple neere vnto the mount Caluarie, together with his predeceſſors the Kings of Ieruſalem.

Guy the ninth and laſt King of Ieruſalem.

King Baldwin thus buried, Baldwin the fift of that name, yet but a boy, was crowned King. But then began the ſparkes, which had of long lien raked vp and hidden in the aſhes, to breake out into a great fire: for Raymund Countie of Tripolis contended the whole gouernement of the kingdome, & tuition of the King to be due vnto him, by the appointment of the late King, and conſent of the nobilitie; and did ſo much, that he had almoſt obtained it to haue bin confirmed vnto him in open Parliament. But Sybylla a woman of a moſt haughtie ſpirit (ſiſter vnto the late King, and mother vnto the yong King yet liuing) prickt forward her husband Guy, in no caſe to giue place vnto his competitor Raymund; and ſo animated him, that by the helpe of his own fauorits, and the countenance of Boniface Marqueſſe of Mount-Ferrat, (who euen then was come with a great power into Syria) he extorted from the nobilitie whatſoeuer hee deſired. But ſeuen moneths were ſcarce well paſſed, but that this yong King Baldwin was dead and buried; poyſoned (as was reported) by his mother, for the deſire ſhee had of the Kingdome her ſelfe: whoſe death ſhe with all ſecrecie concealed, vntill ſhe had obtained of the Patriarch and other Princes of the kingdom, that Guy her husband might be proclaimed king. So by her means it was ſo wrought, that vpon one and the ſelfe ſame day the yong King Baldwin was buried by his vncle, and Guy the Countie crowned. This yong King Baldwin, by reaſon of his tender yeres and ſhort raigne, is of ſome not reckoned amongſt the Kings of Ieruſalem: howbeit, ſeeing he was by his vncle and the Princes of that time thought worthy of the kingdome, let him alſo haue his place amongſt the reſt as the eighth King of Ieruſalem.

When Guy was thus poſſeſſed of the kingdome, the Countie of Tripolis ſeeing himſelfe out of al hope of the gouernment, & highly therewith diſcontented, did what he might by al meanes to croſſe the doings of the King: whoſe ſicke and aſpiring mind Saladin prickt dayly more and more forward, promiſing him his helping hand whenſoeuer he ſhould need; which curteſie the Countie deſirouſly embraced. For now the fatall period of the kingdome of Ieruſalem grew faſt on, & al things tended to deſtruction, diſcord raigning in euery place: which Saladin well perceiuing (after that he had compacted with the County) by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, inuited the Turks, Saraſins, and Ægyptiaus, as men agreeing in one and the ſame religion, A gion, generally to take vp armes in ſo fit an opportunitie of the diſcord of the Chriſtians, aſſuring them of great prey and ſpoyle, beſides the honor of the conqueſt. The city of Ptolomais was the place by him appointed, where all this power ſhould meet: whither ſuch a multitude of the barbarous Mahometans (partly for the hatred of the Chriſtian religion, partly for the hope of the rich ſpoyle which Saladin had promiſed them) came flocking out of all places, that in ſhort time there was met together about fiftie thouſand horſemen, beſides an infinite number of foot: and vnto ſuch as could not ſafely paſſe by the borders of Ieruſalem, to them the falſe Countie gaue ſafe conduct, by the countries of Tiberias, Nazareth, and Galile.

Saladin vpon the diſcord of the Chriſtians taketh occaſion to inuade the Holy land.

All the power of the Infidels thus aſſembled, Saladin laid ſiege vnto the city of Ptolomais: which the Templars and the Knights hoſpitallers had notably fortified, and ſtrongly manned, B (as before vnto them giuen by the Kings of Ieruſalem, to defend againſt the Infidel) and therein now were both the maſters of both thoſe honorable Orders, with the whole flower of the Knights of their profeſſion. Vnto this citie Saladin gaue a moſt terrible aſſault vpon May day in the morning, in the yere 1187, which was by the Chriſtians notably defended, & the enemie with great ſlaughter ſtill beaten downe. In the heat of this aſſault, the two great maſters ſallied with certaine troupes of their moſt readie horſemen, aſſailed the enemies campe, and bearing downe all before them, raiſed there a great tumult, and by and by turning vpon the backes of them that were aſſaulting the citie, made there an exceeding great ſlaughter. Inſomuch that Saladin diſmayd, firſt with the confuſion in his campe, and now with the ſudden danger behind him, was glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and to turn his whole forces vpon them, C where was fought a moſt bloudie and terrible battell. Amongſt others that there fought, the Countie of Tripolis, now an enemie vnto God and his Countrey, diſguiſed in the habit of a Turke notably helped the Infidels, and meeting with the great maſter of the Knights Hoſpitalers, vnhorſed him; who ſurcharged with the weight of his armor, and oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies, there died. Neuertheleſſe, ſuch was the valor of theſe worthy men, and new ſuccor ſtill comming out of the citie, that Saladin hauing in that battell, and at the aſſault loſt fifteene thouſand of his Turkes, was glad with the reſt to betake himſelfe to flight. Neither was this ſo notable a victorie gained by the Chriſtians without bloud, moſt part of the worthie Knights Hoſpitalers being together with their grand maſter there ſlaine.

Saladin by this ouerthrow perceiuing, that by open force he ſhould not be able to do much D againſt the Chriſtians, thought it good vnto his forces to ioyn alſo policie. Wherein the falſe Countie of Tripolis was the man hee thought beſt to make choice of, as his fitteſt inſtrument to worke by. Him he compacted withall, to ſeeke for grace at the King of Ieruſalems hands, as of his dread Soueraigne, and after ſo long diſcord, to ſue to be reconciled vnto him, as now wearie of the Turks amitie, with whom he ſhould make ſhew to be vtterly fallen out. At which time alſo, to giue the matter the better grace, Saladin of purpoſe with a great armie came and beſieged Tiberias, a citie of the Counties iuriſdiction: for the reliefe whereof, the traiterous Countie craued aid of the King and the other Princes of the ſacred warre. Who with an Armie, though not great, yet very well appointed, came according to his deſire, and encamped neere vnto the fountaine of Sophor: where they had not long ſtayed, but that they met with E the huge armie of the Turks, being in number one hundred and twentie thouſand horſe, and one hundred and ſixtie thouſand foot: with whom they ioyned a moſt ſharp and terrible battell, which by reaſon of the extremitie of the heat of the weather (it then being the twelfth of Iuly) and the approch of the night, was againe giuen ouer, both armies (as if it had bin by conſent) retyring. The next day the battell was againe begun, wherein the Turks, by the treaſon and ſhamefull flight of the falſe Countie of Tripolis, gained the victorie. In this battell Guy the King himſelf, with Gerard maſter of the Templars, Boniface Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, and diuers others, men of great marke, were taken priſoners. And to ſay the truth, in this battaile was broken the whole ſtrength of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt.

Guy King of Ieruſalem taken priſoner.

The Chriſtian commonweale by the treaſon of the falſe Countie thus betrayd vnto the Infi- F dels, Saladin without any great reſiſtance had the cities of Ptolomais, Biblis, and Berithus deliuered vnto him: in all which places he vſed his victorie with great moderation, not enforcing any Chriſtian (more than the Latines) to depart thence, but ſuffering them there ſtil to remaine as before, yeelding vnto him their obedience, with ſuch tribute as he had impoſed vpon them. With like good fortune he within the ſpace of one moneth tooke all the port towns betwixt Sidon and Aſcalon alongſt the ſea coaſt, excepting only the antient citie of Tyre: vnto the citie of Aſcalon alſo he laid ſiege by the ſpace of nine days; but loth to ſtay the courſe of his victorie, by the valour of the defendants reſolued there to ſpend their liues, he departed thence, and marched directly vnto Ieruſalem the chiefe citie of that kingdome: and approching the ſame, gaue ſummons thereunto, perſuading the citiſens yet whiles they had time, to yeeld themſelues, together with the citie, vnto his mercie. Which they refuſing to do, he incloſed the ſame with his armie, and by the ſpace of fourteene dayes layd a hard ſiege vnto it, leauing nothing vndone or vnattempted, that might helpe for the gaining thereof. At which time the citiſens conſidering the danger they were in, and that the ſtrength of the Kingdome, with the flower of their chiualrie, were in the late battell loſt, and that they were not now to expect any forreine aid, agreed vpon certaine conditions to yeeld vp the Citie: which were, That ſuch Chriſtians as would, might remaine ſtill with their libertie and goods; & that ſuch as would not, might in ſafetie depart with ſo much of their goods as they could carrie vpon their backes. Theſe conditions being by Saladin granted, the holy citie was vnto him deliuered the ſecond of October, in the yeare 1187; after that it had been by the Chriſtians holden from the time that it was by Godfrey of Bullion and other Chriſtians woon, about 89 yeares. Saladin entring into the citie, prophaned firſt the Temple of the Lord, conuerting it vnto the vſe of his Mahometan ſuperſtition; the other churches he vſed as ſtables for his horſes, only the temple of the Sepulchre was by the Chriſtians for a great ſumme of mony redeemed, and ſo kept vndefiled. The Latine Chriſtians he thruſt out of the Citie, yet with leaue to carry with them ſuch things as they were able themſelues to beare: who trauelling with heauie burthens, but much more heauie hearts, ſome to Tripolis, ſome to Tyre, ſome to Antioch, (for only theſe three cities were now left vnto the Chriſtians in Syria) were by the falſe Countie of Tripolis by the way lightned of their burthens, to the increaſing of the heauineſſe of their hearts, moſt of them beeing by him and his followers ſpoyled of that little they had by the mercie of their enemies ſaued in the ruine of their ſtate.

Ieruſalem beſieged.

Ieruſalem taken by Saladin.

G H I

Vnto the other Chriſtians that were naturall Syrians, Greekes, Armenians, Georgians, and ſuch like, Saladin appointed certain places of the citie for them to dwel in, where ſome of their poſteritie were long time after to be found. All the monuments of the Chriſtians were by the barbarous Mahometans and Turks defaced, only the Sepulchre of our bleſſed Sauior Chriſt, with the monument of Godfrey of Bullion, and his brother Baldwin, for the reuerence of the men, were by them ſpared. In theſe ſo great troubles aboue twentie thouſand of the Chriſtians periſhed: amongſt the reſt, the Countie of Tripolis was ſhortly after found dead in his bed, and (as ſome ſay) circumciſed; a manifeſt token of his reuolt, not from the King onely, but from the Chriſtian Faith alſo.

The death of Raymund the traiterous Countie of Tripolis.

K

Ieruſalem thus woon, Saladin returned againe to the ſiege of Aſcalon, which after he had by the ſpace of ten dayes moſt ſtraitly beſieged, was vnto him by compoſition deliuered: wherein amongſt other things agreed vpon for the ſafe departure of the citiſens, was compriſed alſo, that he ſhould freely ſet at libertie Guy the King, and Gerard maſter of the Templars, both before taken priſoners, as is before declared; which he afterward performed.

Thus the victorious Turke ſtil vrging his good fortune, departing thence, attempted to haue taken Tripolis; but hauing made ſome proofe of his owne forces, and the valor of the defendants, he was glad to giue ouer the ſiege, and to depart as he came. Marching thence with his army, becauſe he would leaue no place vnattempted, he laid ſiege vnto the city of Tyre, where Conrade Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat was a little before arriued with Iſaac Angelus the Greeke Emperors fleet, and a ſupplie of certaine companies of good ſoldiers. Vnto which place were come great numbers of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians, fled from Ieruſalem and other places, ſo that the citie was full of men.

This citie Saladin moſt furiouſly aſſaulted, but was by the Chriſtians notably repulſed, not without the great loſſe of his beſt ſoldiers. At which time alſo the Admirall of Sicilia diſcomfited his fleet at ſea, and landing his forces, came vnlooked for vpon the backe of him: ſo that hauing his hands full before by them of the towne, and charged behind by theſe new come enemies, he was glad to retyre in ſuch haſt, as that he left his Tents, with all that therein was, vnto the ſpoyle of the Chriſtians.

M

Within a few dayes after, Saladin hauing againe repaired his armie, inuaded the Countrey

A about Antioch; with fire and ſword deſtroying whatſoeuer was ſubiect to his furie, euen to the gates of the citie: but knowing that ſo ſtrong a citie was not without great charge & long ſiege to be woon, he thought it good to make proofe if it might by policie or corruption bee gained. Wherein he ſo cunningly dealt with the Patriarch, that he had by his means the caſtle (otherwiſe almoſt impregnable) for gold betrayd vnto him. By means wherof he in ſhort time became lord and maſter of that famous citie, (about ninetie yeres before hardly gained by the whole power of the Chriſtians, after eleuen moneths ſiege) and with it fiue and twentie cities moe, that depended of the fortune thereof, with all the prouinces belonging thereunto, alwayes deemed to haue been the third part of the kingdome of Ieruſalem.

The famous city of Antioch betrayd vnto the Turkes.

The loſſe of ſo great a citie, together with the ruine of the whole kingdome, had in a ſhort B ſpace filled euery corner of Chriſtendome with the heauie report thereof. Wherewith the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt (namely Frederick the German Emperor, with Frederick his ſon Duke of Sueuia, Philip the French King, Henry the ſecond, king of England, Otto Duke of Burgondie, Leopold Duke of Auſtria, with many other great Princes and Prelats of Germanie, Italie, and other places) not a little mooued, as alſo with the pittifull complaints of the Embaſſadors at the ſame time ſent from the diſtreſſed Chriſtians, aud the effectuall perſuaſions of Clement the third, then Pope; promiſed, and all, or moſt part indeed, made great preparations: which they afterwards, though not all at once (as letted by other occaſions) but at diuers times imployed, for the moſt part with the danger of their owne perſons, againſt the Turkes, for the reliefe of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians, and recouerie of the Holy land: but with what ſucceſſe C ſhall hereafter (God willing) be declared.

Of which ſo great preparations made againſt him, Saladin not ignorant, ſet at libertie Guy the King of Ieruſalem, who contrarie to his promiſe made at Aſcalon, he had now detained a yeare in priſon; yet before his inlargment exacting of him an oath, Neuer by force of armes afterwards to ſeeke to recouer his kingdome, or to reuenge the wrongs he had ſuſtained: hoping thereby to ſtay the comming of the other Princes in his quarrell. Which oath for all that, the Pope diſpenſed withal, as extorted by conſtraint from him, at ſuch time as Saladin had longer detained him in priſon, than of right he ſhould.

Guy now at libertie, and yet in mind a King, came to Tyre, but could not be there receiued, the citiſens hauing before ſworn their obedience vnto Conrade marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, by D whom they had bin notably defended againſt the furie of Saladin. Wherſore departing thence with ſuch power as he had, and the diſperſed Chriſtians dayly repairing vnto him out of all parts of Syria, he came & beſieged Ptolemais: where he had not long lien, but firſt came vnto him the Venetian fleet, with them alſo of Piſa, and after them the Flemings with a fleet of fiftie ſaile, who all ioyned their forces together for the winning of the Citie. But whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Ptolemais, came Saladin with a great armie to the reliefe of the beſieged: where betwixt him and the Chriſtians was fought a great battell, wherein the Chriſtians at the firſt had the better; but afterward feinting, and readie to flie, had there vndoubtedly receiued a notable ouerthrow, had not Geffrey Lyſignan the Kings brother (left for the guarding of the campe) in good time come in with new ſupplies; and not only ſtayd their E flight, but alſo repreſſed the further purſuit of the fierce enemie, now almoſt in poſſeſſion of the deſired victorie. Neuertheleſſe there were 2000 Chriſtians there ſlaine, and among them Gerard maſter of the Templars. Saladin by that which was now done, perceiuing how hard a matter it would be for him by land to relieue his citie, ſent for the fleet which he had ſtrongly rigged vp at Alexandria, and ſo by force put new ſupplies both of men & victuals into the beſieged citie. Wherewith the Turks encouraged, made often ſallies vpon the Chriſtians; and in deſpight of the Chriſtian religion, whipped the image of Chriſt crucified, which they had for that purpoſe in the ſight of the Chriſtians ſet vp vpon the top of the wall. With the ſame fleet alſo he ſo ſcoured the ſeas, that no victuals or new ſupplies of men could that way without great danger be brought vnto the campe: wherby ſuch ſcarcitie & want of al things began F ſhortly after to ariſe among the Chriſtians, that ſome of them not able longer to indure the famin, fled vnto the Turks campe, then lying not far off, crying out for bread. Of which diſtreſſe in the campe of the Chriſtians, Saladin knowing right well, both by ſuch fugitiues as dayly came ouer vnto him, and by his own eſpials, yet made ſhew as if he vnderſtood nothing thereof: but ſuddenly riſing with his armie (as doubtfull of his owne ſtrength) departed, leauing his campe ful of all manner of victuals. Whereof the Chriſtians vnderſtanding, and ſuppoſing him to haue for feare been gone indeed, in great numbers haſted vnto the forſaken campe, as vnto a moſt deſired prey: where whileſt they were gorging themſelues Saladin ſuddenly returning, and getting betwixt them and home, made of them a great ſlaughter. Neuertheleſſe the Chriſtians hauing now lien before the citie ſix moneths, continued the ſiege all the Winter, ouercomming with patience the hardeſt difficulties, in hope of aid from the other Chriſtian Princes, whoſe comming they expected with the firſt of the next Spring: during which time many an hot skirmiſh paſſed betwixt them and the Turks both by ſea and land.

Fredericke the Emperour ſetteth forward towards the Holy Land.

Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Ptolemais, Frederick the Emperor, with diuers of the great German Princes and others, before reſolued vpon an expedition for the recouerie of the Holy land, and the reliefe of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria: hauing now raiſed a great armie, furniſhed with all things neceſſarie for ſo long a journey, ſet forward from Ratisbone, and ſo comming to Vienna, and paſſing thorow Hungaria, Bulgaria, and Thracia, arriued at length at Conſtantinople; where he was by Iſaac Angelus the Emperour that then raigned, honorably entertained: but indeed more for feare and faſhion ſake, than for any loue or good will; for that he after the ſupicious manner of the Greekes, hauing in diſturſt ſo great a power of the Latine Emperors, wiſhed rather for his abſence than his preſence. And therefore ceaſed not in what he might, to haſten his paſſage ouer into Aſia, pretending for the color thereof, the neceſſitie the Chriſtians had of his preſent aid. So the Emperor with his Armie paſſing ouer the ſtreight, and without reſiſtance marching thorow the greateſt part of the leſſer Aſia, entred Into Lycaonia, where meeting with a great power of the Turkes, that were come from the Sultan of Iconium to ſtay his further paſſage, hee ouerthrew them in a great battell, and ſo marching directly on to Iconium, tooke it by force, and gaue the ſpoyle thereof vnto his ſoldiers, in reuenge of the iniuries before done vnto his vncle the Emperour Conrade, by the Sultan of that citie. Departing thence, and marching thorow Cilicia, hee in another battell ouerthrew the Turks, that hauing taken the ſtraits of the mountaines, had thought to haue ſtayd his further paſſage into Syria. After that, he tooke the citie Philomela, which the Sultan had ſtrongly fortified, which he raſed to the ground, and put to ſword all the peopeople therein, for that they contrarie to the law of nations, had ſlaine ſuch meſſengers as hee had ſent vnto them for the ſummoning of the citie. In like manner hee entred into the leſſer Armenia, where he tooke the citie Melitene, and ſubdued all the countrie thereabouts: vnto the reliefe whereof the Turks comming with a moſt huge armie, were by him with an exceeding great ſlaughter ouerthrowne and put to flight. After that, entring into Comagena, and meeting with Saphadin, Saladin his ſonne, with a great armie of the Turks, he ouerthrew him in the plaine field, and diſcomfited his whole armie: but whileſt hee too eagerly purſueth the enemie he had then in chace, his horſe foundring vnder him as he paſſed the riuer Saleph, hee was ſo ouerthrowne, and his foot hanging faſt in his ſtirrop, drawne thorow the deepe Riuer, and almoſt drowned; and at the farther ſide of the riuer was ſo plunged by his horſe, at his landing, that he was taken vp for dead: yet breathing a little, and caſting his eyes vp to heauen, with much adoe he vttered theſe few words, Lord receiue my Soule; and ſo in the hands of them that tooke him vp gaue vp the ghoſt, vnto the great griefe and hindrance of the Chriſtian Commonweale: for Saladin hearing of his approch, was ſo affraid of him, as that hee began to doubt, not how to keepe that he had before woon in Syria, but how to defend himſelfe in Ægypt. Thus miſerably periſhed this worthie Emperor, the tenth of Iune in the yeare of Grace, 1190, being then of the age of ſeuentie yeares, whereof hee had with much trouble raigned eight and thirtie. His dead bodie was carried along with the armie, and afterward with all funerall pompe buried in the Cathedrall church at Tyre.

Frederick the Emperors ſon choſen Generall of the Chriſtian Armie.

Frederick the Emperor thus dead, Frederick his ſon Duke of Sueuia, was by the general conſent of the Princes in the armie choſen Generall in his ſtead: vpon whom, with the reſt of the armie, yet mourning for the death of the Emperor, the Turks gaue a ſudden & fierce charge, in hope ſo to haue ouerthrowne them: but finding greater reſiſtance than they had before ſuppoſed, and hauing loſt ſome of their men, they with like ſpeed that they came, retyred again. Now began famine (one of the ordinarie attendants of great armies) to increaſe in the campe: for why, the Turkes for that purpoſe had before deſtroyed or carried away all that was in the Countrey, leauing nothing for the Chriſtians more than the bare ground. Wherefore

A Frederick turning a little out of the way, came to Antioch, which was eaſily deliuered vnto him, and his hungrie ſouldiers well refreſhed by the citizens, beeing as yet for the moſt part Chriſtians. But he had not there ſtaied paſt fifteene daies for the refreſhing of his armie, but that the plague (the handmaid of famin and another ſcourge of the greateſt multitudes) began to rage among his ſoldiers, in ſuch ſort, that he was glad with his army to forſake the citie, and to get him abroad againe into the open field: where forthwith newes was brought vnto him, that Dodequin Generall of ſuch forces as Saladin had ſent for out of Ægypt (which were not ſmall) was by great iourneyes comming towards him: againſt whom hee in good order ſet forward, with his fathers corſe ſtill carried in the midſt of his armie. Theſe two armies meeting together, and both willing to fight, ioyned a great and doubtfull battell, fortune now in-B clining to the one ſide, and by and by to the other; the Chriſtians exceeding their enemies in valour, and they them again in number. At length the Chriſtians in the vantguard began to retire, and they that ſeconded them were alſo hardly charged: when Frederick mindfull of his fathers valor, with a troupe of valiant horſmen brake into the enemies battel with ſuch force, that the Turks were glad to giue ground: after whom Leopold Duke of Auſtria comming pre-ſently on with his footmen, brought ſuch a feare vpon the whole army of the Turks, that they betook themſelues to ſpeedie flight. In this battell were foure thouſand of the enemies ſlain, with ſmall loſſe of the Chriſtians; and about one thouſand moe taken priſoners, with fifteen of their enſignes. After which victorie, Frederick marching further in Cælo-Syria, pacified Laodicea then in mutinie, and like to haue beene deliuered vnto the Turks. He alſo with a lit-C tle labour tooke Berythus, with diuers other cities of Syria, which before belonging vnto the Kings of Ieruſalem, were now reuolted vnto the Turks. So Afterward, comming to Tyre, he there ſolemnly buried his father, (dead, as is before ſaid:) and from thence certified Guy the King (ſtill lying with the other Chriſtian Princes at the ſiege of Ptolemais) of his comming: who forthwith ſent the Marques of Mont-Ferrat, with part of the fleet, to tranſport him with his people that were left, by ſea: for that by land he could not ſo ſafely haue come, being now but weake, for meeting with Saladin; who with a great armie lay ſtill houering about his be-ſieged citie, intentiue to all opportunitie. So was Duke Frederick, with his ſouldiers yet left, ſafely by ſea conducted from Tyre to the campe at Ptolemais, and there ioyfully receiued by the King and the other Princes, with the generall applauſe of the whole campe.

A great battell betwixt the Turks and the Christians.

D In the meane time the Turks ſallying out of the citie of Ptolemais, had done great harme among the Chriſtians, by whom they were not without ſome loſſe againe repulſed. But after the comming of Duke Frederick and his Germans, it was thought good by the generall con-ſent of all the great commanders in the army, that the citie ſhould be aſſaulted round: and to that purpoſe was euery mans regiment appointed what place to aſſaile. The King himſelfe with the Templars and the Italians from Piſa, vndertook that part of the citie which was toward the ſea: vnto Duke Frederick & his Germans, was allotted all betwixt the bridge ouer the riuer Bele, and the Biſhops palace: the Venetians, Genowaies, and Knights Hoſpitalers, were appointed vnto the reſt of the wall as far as the court of Raymund: the Friſelanders, Flemings, and Hollanders, tooke vp all the reſt of the wall vnto the ſea ſide. Thus was the citie at E once in euery ſide aſſailed by the Chriſtians, with ſuch furie, as if they had theron purpoſed to gage their whole forces, ſeeking by a thouſand wounds, and a thouſand kinds of death to haue by their ſcaling ladders gained the top of ahe wals, the Turks with no leſſe courage ſtil beating them downe again. But in the heat of this ſo dreadfull and deſperat an aſſault, Saladin ſtill houering aloofe, came now vpon the ſudden and aſſailed the campe of the Chriſtians, filling the ſame with feare and tumult: whoſe charge they that were left for the defence of the ſame, at the firſt notably receiued, but finding themſelues too weake, began to giue ground; by which means the Turks tooke certaine tents with ſome enſignes, and fired ſome other of the pauillions of the Chriſtians, hauing ſlaine ſomewhat moe than an hundred of the defendants.

Ptolemais aſſaulted by the Chriſtians.

The Chriſtians in the mean time little preuailing in the aſſault, and troubled with the dan-F ger of their campe, retired to the reliefe thereof. But the Turke perceiuing himſelfe too weak for the whole power of the Chriſtians, retired alſo; yet not with ſuch haſte, but that he had there almoſt loſt himſelfe. This notable aſſault was giuen the fourteenth of October: after which, many light skirmiſhes paſſed betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, but more for bootie, than for any other great purpoſe.

In the meane time, diuers great Princes of the Weſt that had vowed themſelues vnto this ſacred war, came thither, whoſe number rather increaſed the want of victuals, than furthered the ſeruice. At which time alſo the diſcord betwixt Guy the King (whoſe wife and children were now dead) and Conrade Marques of Mont-Ferrat (who had married Iſabel the late queens ſiſter, by whom hee pretended a claime vnto the title of the imaginarie kingdome) did much harme vnto the proceedings of the Chriſtians: ſo pleaſing a thing theſe haughtie ſtiles be vnto the loftie mindes of the ambitous. Shortly after the Chriſtians yet lying at the ſiege, the contagion and famine ſtill increaſing, it fortuned that Duke Frederick fell ſick of the Plague, whereof hee died; and with the great mourning of the whole armie, was afterward ſolemnly buried faſt by his father in the cathedral Church at Tire: after whoſe death the Chriſtians attempted no great matter againſt the city, although they were oftentimes by the Turks prouoked, but lay ſtil ſtrongly intrenched, expecting ſome greater aid from the princes of the Weſt.

Now all the hope of the Chriſtian affaires in Syria, and in the land of Paleſtine, reſted vpon the comming of the two mightie Princes, Phllip the ſecond of that name, King of France, and Richard the firſt, King of England: who hauing agreed betwixt themſelues, with their combined forces to relieue the diſtreſſed Chriſtians of the Eaſt; and againe (if it were poſſible) to repaire the broken ſtate of the kingdome of Ieruſalem, were now met together at Marſeilles in Prouence. From whence the French King firſt departing with his fleet for Cicilia, and with a proſperous gale for certaine dayes holding on his courſe, and now come nigh vnto the Iſland, was by force of a furious tempeſt ſuddenly ariſing, ſo toſſed and tumbled in the deep, that many of his Ships there periſhed, eaten vp of the Sea; others by force of weather driuen vpon the ſands and rocks, were there broken all to pieces; and the reſt, ſome with their maſts broken, ſome with their tacklings and ſailes rent, and all in generall ſore weather beaten, with much adoe arriued at Meſſana, the deſired Port. At which place King Richard afterwards (but with better fortune) arriued with his fleet alſo. Both the Kings now met together, reſolued there to winter: the French king enforſed by neceſſity ſo to do, for the reparing of the late loſſes he had receiued, as well in his people & prouiſion, as in his ſhipping; al which was to be relieued by new ſupplies out of France: and the king of England ſtaying to take order for the dowrie of his ſiſter Ioan (widow of William the late King of Cicilia) with Tancred the baſe ſonne of Roger, that had now aſpired vnto the kingdome of that Iſland. About which matter great ſtirs aroſe betwixt King Richard the Queenes brother, and Tancred the new King, inſomuch that it was like to haue broken out into open warre, had it not to the good contentment of King Richard beene otherwiſe taken vp, and ſo the controuerſie ended. But whileſt theſe two great Kings thus wintred in this fruitfull Iſland, and oftentimes as good friends met together, ſometime for their diſport, and ſome time to conferre of their ſo weightie affaires; the way (as was thought) to haue appeaſed all former diſpleaſure, and to haue increaſed loue: it fell out clean contrarie, iealouſie & diſtruſt, not only reuiuing the old, but alſo ſtil raiſing new quarrels betwixt them, to the great hindrance of the common good by them intended: which may ſerue for a warning to all great Princes, willing to continue in amitie, and to hold a good opinion one of another, neuer to ſee one the other; or comming ſo to an interuiew, not to conuerſe or ſtay long together: which as it is not often done without the danger of their perſons, ſo can it not poſſibly be long continued, but that it wil engender in themſelues as well as in their followers, iealouſie, enuie, hatred, and miſtruſt, as we haue before ſaid and hereafter in the courſe of this Hiſtorie may appeare.

There was an old quarrell betwixt theſe two great Kings, Richard and Philip, about Adela the French kings ſiſter; whom Richard hauing before (his father yet liuing) affianced, had now reiected, as her whom his aged father Henry the ſecond had too familiarly vſed: and in ſtead of her, to the great diſgrace of the French, eſpouſed the Lady Berengaria, daughter to the king of Nauar: which indignitie with diuers others, then ariſing betwixt the French and the Engliſh, as then with great heart-burning ſmouldred vp in reſpect of the common cauſe then in hand, afterwards brake out againe, to the ſhamefull ouerthrow of this moſt honorable expedition, and lamentable diſturbance of both realmes.

Winter paſt, and the Spring now come, the French King not altogether the beſt pleaſed, firſt looſed from Meſſana, and with his fleet in ſafetie arriued at Ptolemais, where he was by the Chriſtians, now the third yeare lying at the ſiege, ſo ioyfully receiued, as if he had beene

A to them ſent with ſuccours from heauen. After whom, ſhortly after followed alſo King Richard: of whoſe fleet (by force of weather ſore beaten and diſperſed) two ſhips by the rage of the tempeſt driuen a ground vpon the coaſt of Cyprus, were by the Iſland people ſpoyled, and the men that in them had hardly eſcaped the danger of the ſea, with moſt barbarous inhumanitie, ſome ſlaine and ſome taken priſoners: the reſt of the fleet arriuing there alſo, were with like inciuilitie forbidden to land; the Cipriots ready at hand in all places to keepe them off. With which ſo great an indignity the king iuſtly moued, and by force landing his people, with incredible celeritie and ſucceſſe ouerran the whole Iſland, neuer ceaſing vntill hee had made a ful conqueſt therof, and taken Iſaac Comnenus, commonly called the King of that Iſland and of ſome (for what treaſon I know not) Emperor of the Griffons, priſoner: yet was he indeed B neither King nor Emperor, but being a man of great nobilitie and power, and of the honorable ſtocke of the Comneni, had in the troubleſome raigne of Andronicus Comnenus the Emperor, his couſin, laid hold vpon that fruitfull Iſland, and there tyrannized as a reputed King; vntill that now he was by King Richard taken priſoner, and for his vnfaithfull dealing ſent faſt bound in chaines of ſiluer into Syria. The King thus poſſeſſed of the whole Iſland, there at Limozin married the Lady Berengaria the King of Nauars daughter, brought thither by Ioan late Queene of Cicilia, the Kings ſiſter. And ſo diſpoſing as he thought beſt of all things for the ſafe keeping of the Iſland, ſet forward againe with his fleet towards Siria. Where by the way he light vpon a great ſhip of the Sultans, laded with victuals and other warlike prouiſions for the reliefe of the beſieged; all which became a prey vnto him. So holding on his C courſe, he at length arriued at Ptolemais, where he was by the French King, and the reſt of the Chriſtians there lying, moſt honourably receiued.

King Richard reuengeth the iniurie done to his people by the Cipriots.

King Richard arriueth at Ptolemais.

Now had the citie of Ptolemais beene three yeares beſieged by the Chriſtians, and notably defended by the Turks: during which time many an hot aſſault and bloudie skirmiſh had paſſed betwixt them. And now the eies of all men were fixed vpon the two Kings of England and France, vnto whom all the reſt offred their obedience and ſeruice. The Chriſtian campe was great, compoſed eſpecially of Engliſhmen, Frenchmen, Italians, and Almaines; not them that were left of the Emperor Frederick his armie (for they were for the moſt part dead, or els returned home againe into their countries) but of ſuch as (moued with the zeale they bare vnto this religious war) came daily in great numbers thither: as did alſo many others of diuers D nations, deſirous in ſome meaſure to be partakers of ſo honourable a warre.

Theſe religious and venerous Chriſtians thus lying at the ſiege, had with much painful labor vndermined one of the greateſt towers of the city, called the accurſed Tower, with ſome part of the wall alſo, by means whereof they were in hope to find a way into the city. Wherefore rll things being now in a readineſſe for the firing of the mine, it was thought good by generall conſent, that an aſſault ſhould alſo at the ſame time be giuen vnto the citie: and therupon euery regiment was by lot appointed which part of the wall to aſſaile, which they all with great courage vndertooke. In the heat of which aſſault, the aforeſaid vndermined tower, with ſome part of the wall (the timber whereon it ſtaied, now burnt) fell down with a great fal, laying open a faire breach for the Chriſtians to enter: wherewith the Turks diſmaied, forthwith E craued to come to parle: which granted, they for ſafegard of their liues yeelded forthwith to giue vp the city, and to reſtore to the Chriſtians the holy Croſſe, with two thouſand captiues, and two hundred horſemen, ſuch as they ſhould require of all them that were in the power of Saladin; beſides 200000 Conſtantinopolitan ducats, to be by him giuen to the two Kings, for the coſt by them beſtowed in the ſiege. For paiment whereof the Turks in the city were to remain as hoſtages vnder the ſafe keeping of the Chriſtians, ſo that if all the couenants aforeſaid were not within forty daies performed by Saladin, they ſhould all for their liues be at the kings mercie. So was this ſtrong city, after it had bin almoſt three yeres beſieged, deliuered vp vnto the Chriſtians the 12 of Iuly, in the yere 1191. The firſt that entred were the Germanes 1191 of Auſtria, who as if they had bin the only men by whoſe valour the city had bin won, at their F firſt entry preſumptuouſly aduanced their enſignes vpon the top of the walls, to the great offence of al the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, but eſpecially of king Richard, who (not vnworthily for his princely courage was commonly called Richard Cueur de Lyon (not brooking ſo proud an indignity, cauſed the enſignes of Leopold their Duke to be puld down, and ſoiled vnder foot; which ſhortly after gaue him occaſion of repentance, as ſhall hereafter be ſeene.

The two Kings poſſeſſed of the citie, diuided the ſame, with all the people and ſpoile G thereof betwixt them, without regard of the reſt of the other noble Chriſtians, that had ſuſtained the whole trauell of that long ſiege: for which cauſe moſt part of them, ſeeing themſelues ſo deluded, withdrew themſelues from them, and with one conſent ſent them word, That they would forſake them, except they were made partakers of the gaines, as they had beene of the paines. Which the two Kings to content them, promiſed they ſhould: howbeit, they delayed ſo long their promiſes, that many worthy men, conſtrained by pouertie, departed diſcontented from them into their countries.

But long it was not, that this one citie, ſo lately gained, could contain theſe two great kings; whom two large kindomes could not retaine in peace. For albeit that they were in body together preſent, and in one, and that a moſt honorable action, combined, yet were they in H hearts farre aſunder, and their ſecret deſignes much different: enuie and diſtruſt ſtill reuiuing vnkindneſſe paſt, and miniſtring new matter of greater diſcontentments. King Richard, according to his noble nature, was of nothing more deſirous, than to haue the war continued vntill they had made a full conqueſt of Syria and the land of Paleſtine; and for that cauſe requeſted the French King to bind himſelfe together with him by ſolemne oath, there to ſtay yet three yeeres, for the regaining of thoſe countries. But he in mind long before eſtranged from King Richard, and in his deep conceit plotting matters neerer home better fitting his purpoſe, would by no meanes be perſuaded ſo to doe; but ſtill found one occaſion or other for to colour his departure. And ſhortly after (as the French Chronicles report) falling extreamely ſicke, hee requeſted King Richard and the other Chriſtian Princes to come vnto him: vnto I whom being come, he in few words declared his purpoſe of returne, as followeth:

I cannot my Lords longer endure the inclemencie and intemperature of the ayre in this extreame hot ſeaſon. If my death might profit the Chriſtian religion, or any one of you, or the Chriſtian Commonweale; there ſhould be no diſtemperature whatſoeuer, that could ſeperate me from you, or withdraw mee from hence. But more may the life of one abſent, ſerue and profit you, than the death of him preſent. I muſt of neceſsitie depart, yet at my departure I will leaue you fiue hundred men at armes, and ten thouſand footmen, the flower and choice of all the forces of France, vnder the conduct of my couſin Odo, Duke of Burgundie, vnto whom I will giue pay and entertainment, with a continual ſupplie of all things for them neceſſarie. K

The French king ſweareth to king Richard in his abſence not to inuade his territories in France.

This excuſe of the French Kings, King Richard could not take in good part: but ſaid, That it was apparant to all men, that hee abandoned the warres in Syria, to returne into France, for no other end or purpoſe, but the more eaſily to inuade the prouinces of Guien and Normandie, now diſfurniſhed of their garriſons, and ſo ſubiect to his malice. Which point he ſo vrged, that the French King could haue no leaue with his honor to depart, vntill ſuch time as he had by ſolemne oath bound himſelfe vnto King Richard, not to attempt any thing either by force or fraud againſt him, or any thing of his, vntil fiftie daies were expired after King Richard his return home: which how well it was by the French king obſerued, I leaue it to the report of the hiſtories of that time. And ſo the French king, not to be intreated longer to ſtay, leauing L behinde him the aforſaid number of men hee had promiſed, embarking the reſt of his armie, and accompanied with three tall ſhips of the Genowaies his friends, and Ruffin Volta their admirall, departed from Ptolomais to Tyre, the firſt of Auguſt, and two daies after, looſing thence, ſailed alongſt the ſea coaſt of Aſia, and cutting through the Mediterranean, arriued at length in the mouth of the riuer of Tyber, and from thence went to Rome: where after he had viſited Pope Celeſtine, and the famous places of that moſt renowned citie, he returned again to his fleet, and ſo by ſea arriued in ſafetie in France; hauing in that great expedition, ſo honorably by him entertained, performed nothing anſwerable to that the world looked for.

After the French King, followed Leopold Duke of Auſtria, with his Germans: and not long after him the Venetians alſo, with them of Piſa and Genua. Of whoſe departure Saladin vnder- M ſtanding, & that the Chriſtian forces were thereby much empaired, refuſed either to pay the money, or to reſtore the priſoners, as was promiſed at the giuing vp of Ptolemais: threatning moreouer to chop off the heads of al ſuch Chriſtian captiues as he had in his power, if the king ſhould ſhew any extremity vnto the pledges of the city. Neuertheles, ſhortly after he ſent his

A embaſſadours with great preſents vnto the King, requeſting a longer time for the ſparing of his pledges; which his requeſt, together with his gifts, the King refuſed to grant or accept.
Whereupon Saladin forthwith cauſed ſuch Chriſtian captiues as were in his power, to be beheaded: which albeit King Richard vnderſtood, yet would hee not preuent the time before agreed vpon for the execution of his priſoners, being the 20 day of Auguſt: vpon which day he cauſed the Turks priſoners, to the number of 2500 (or as the French and Germans write, to the number of 7000) in the ſight of Saladines armie to be executed.

The loſſe of the ſtrong towne of Ptolemais, much empaired the reputation of Saladin, euen among his owne people; as it commonly falleth out, that the euill ſucceſſe of a great commander in his affaires, altereth the good will, affection, and opinion, eſpecially of the vulgar B ſort, which iudge of all things by the euent. And albeit that his loſſes were great, and ſuch as much daunted him: yet hee thought it beſt as the caſe then ſtood, to make them greater, and with his owne hands (as it were) to ruinate and ouerthrow ſuch towns and cities as he ſaw he could not keepe, rather than to ſuffer them whole and vndefaced to fal into the enemies hand.
So carried headlong with diſpaire, he cauſed all the townes he had along the ſea coaſt in Syria and Paleſtine, to be ſacked and ruinated, and their wals ouerthrowne; eſpecially ſuch as were of moſt importance, and like to ſtand the Chriſtians in ſtead, namely Porphiria, Ceſarea, Ioppa, Aſcalon, Gaza, and Elam, with diuers other caſtles and citadels in the countries thereabouts; moſt part whereof were againe by King Richard and the Templars fortified and repeopled, although Saladin in the meane time did what hee might to haue letted the ſame.

C Nothing more hindred the good proceeding of the Chriſtian Princes, in this and other their moſt honourable expeditions againſt the Infidels, than the diſcord among themſelues: one ſtill enuying at anothers honor, and euery one iealous of his owne. Great ſtrife and heartburning there had been betweene the two Kings of France and England, during the time they were together in this ſacred expedition, to the great hindrance of the ſame. No leſſe contention had there bin betwixt Guy the late King of Ieruſalem, and Conrade Marqueſſe of Montferrat, about the title of that loſt kingdome: whereby the whole power of the Chriſtains in Siria was diuided into two factions. Richard King of England, Baldwin Earle of Flanders, Henry Earle of Champaine, the Knights Hoſpitalers of S. Iohn, the Venetians and Piſans, taking part with Guy: And Philip the French King, Odo Duke of Burgundie, Rodolph Earle of Claremont, D the Templars, the Genowayes, the Lantgraue of Thurin, Leopold Duke of Auſtria, and Robert Countie of Naſſau, taking part with Conrade the Marqueſſe. But Conrade ſhortly after the taking of Ptolemais beeing ſlaine; by two of the deſperate Aſſaſſins, or (as ſome others ſay) by two deſperate ruffians; (ſuborned thereunto by the Prince of Torone, in reuenge of the deſpight done vnto him by the ſayd Marqueſſe, by taking from him Iſabel his eſpouſed wife) as hee was walking in his citie of Tyre, and doubting no ſuch treaſon: King Richard ſeeing now a fit occaſion offered for the vtter extinguiſhing of that claime, and how to intitle himſelfe vnto that kingdome; perſuaded the aforeſaid Iſabel (the widow of the late Marqueſſe, and in whoſe right he had laid claime vnto the kingdome) to relinquiſh that ſo troubleſome a title, and to take to her husband Henry Earle of Champain, his E nephew, vnto whom he gaue the citie of Tyre. Guy the King exclaiming to the contrary, as of a wrong done vnto himſelfe. Shortly after he began alſo to temper with Guy, perſuading him to reſigne vnto him that little right and intereſt hee had in the kingdome of Ieruſalem, and in lieu thereof to receiue at his hands the kingdome of Cyprus: which his offer the poore king was glad to accept. By which exchange, Guy became King of Cyprus, and Richard, King of Ieruſalem; which honourable Title hee afterwards (as ſome report) vſed in his ſtile, as did ſome others his ſucceſſours the Kings of England after him. So Guy with al his wealth paſſing ouer into Cyprus, tooke poſſeſſion of the kingdome, where he long liued not. Neuertheleſſe that pleaſant kingdome continued in his family of the Luſignans, by the ſpace of about 283 yeares afterwards: vntill that at length that familie failing in the poſthumus ſonne of Iames F the baſtard, laſt King of that Iſland, it fell into the hands of the Venetians: by whom it was holden as a part of their ſeigniorie almoſt an hundred yeares, vntill that it was in our freſh remembrance againe from them taken by Selymus the ſecond, great Emperour of the Turkes, in the yeere 1571, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie ſhall in due place (God willing) be delared.

King Richard marcheth with his armie towards Ieruſalem.

Now was King Richard, for the increaſe of his honor, more deſirous than before of the citie

of HIERVSALEM, as the moſt precious and honorable prize of all that religious warre. And G thereupon with all the power of the Chriſtians then at his command, ſet forward from PTOLEMAIS, and was come on his way as farre as ARSVA, a towne ſcituated betwixt CESAREA and IOPPE. In the vauward was King Richard himſelfe, with the Engliſhmen: after whom followed Odo, Duke of BVRGVNDIE, with his French: and in the rereward Iaques de Auenes, with the Flemings, Brabanders, and Wallons, who after the death of their Countie Philip at the ſiege of PTOLOMAIS, had put themſelues all vnder his regiment. Saladin with a great army ſtill at hand, and as it were tending vpon them, firſt with certain embuſcadoes charged the rereward, and ſo afterward came on with his whole power: vpon whom Iaques turning himſelfe, with his Flemings, receiued the charge with great aſſurance, and ſo long themſelues endured the ſame, vntill the French came in to their ſuccours, and after them the Engliſh alſo. H There was fought a notable battell, and great valour ſhewed both on the one ſide and on the other, but eſpecially by them of the Turks part, who knew wel the purpoſe of the Chriſtians for the beſieging of HIERVSALEM, and that thereon depended their only hope, and that he that could hold the ſame, might almoſt aſſure himſelfe to carrie away the glorie of that war. The French and Engliſh in that battell honourably ſtroue who might ſhew the greateſt valour: neither would the low countrey men vnder Iaques their Generall, ſeeme to bee any thing behind them. This ſharpe conflict began about noone, and continued vntill the going downe of the Sunne. King Richard (as ſome write) was there wounded with an arrow: and Iaques valiantly there fighting was ſlaine, hauing ſold his life deere, to the great admiration of the Infidels, and dying left the victorie vnto the Chriſtians. I It is reported, that in this battell was ſlain more Turks and Saraſins, than in any one battell within the memorie of man before: of the Chriſtians were not loſt any great number, either any man of name, more than the aforeſaid Iaques, the valiant Generall of the Flemings.

King Richard purpoſing to haue beſieged Hieruſalem, is by the backwardneſſe of the French inforced to retire

The next day the Chriſtians remoued to BETHLEM, a towne about the mid way betwixt IOPPE and HIERVSALEM. But Winter now comming faſt on, & want of victuals like enough to increaſe, the king changing his mind for the ſiege, returned with the greateſt part of the armie to ASCALON, which he that winter new fortified, the wals therof being before by Saladin in his diſpaire demoliſhed: the Duke of BVRGVNDIE, with his Frenchmen, all that while quietly wintring at TIRE. In the mean time the power of the Chriſtians was that greatly diminiſhed, ſome one way departing from the campe, and ſome another. The Italians for the K moſt part, with them of PISA (who in theſe three yeres wars had ſtriuen with the Venetians for the honor of their ſeruice) were now returned home, as were the Venetians themſelues alſo, Neuertheleſſe, Winter now paſt, and the Spring time come, King Richard tooke the field again, and came to BETHLEM: where by the way he met with an exceeding great number of cammels, charged with great ſtore of victuals and munition, ſent by Saladin out of EGIPT to HIERVSALEM, all which he tooke: but purpoſing to haue gone on to the ſiege of IERVSALEM he was by the backwardnes of the French glad to change his purpoſe, and to returne to PTOLOMAIS: for the Frenchmen, perſuaded by the Duke their Generall (who well knew the French Kings minde) that if any thing worth remembrance were done, it was to be done by them, and that the glory therof ſhould wholly redound vnto the King of ENGLAND, as there L in perſon preſent, and to his Engliſhmen, ſhewed themſelues ſo vnwilling to the ſiege, as that therin was nothing done, to the great griefe of that worthy Prince. At which time alſo news was brought vnto K. Richard, how that Philip the French King (forgetful of his ſolemne promiſe made before his departure out of SIRIA) had now inuaded the country of NORMANDIE, & excited Earle Iohn (the kings brother, a man of a hauty and aſpiring nature) to take vpon him the kingdome of ENGLAND in his abſence: as had before in like caſe William the yonger brother, ſerued duke Robert his eldeſt brother, then abſent at his father the Conquerors death, in the firſt ſacred expedition vnder Godfrey of BVLLION. Wherfore K. Rich. beſide the preſent difficulties, fearing leſt while he was ſo far off in wars for defence of the Chriſtian common weale, he might loſe his kingdom at home, thought it beſt to grow to ſome good end M with Saladin, and ſo to make his return: but the politick and warie Sultan, not ignorant of the diſcord of the Chriſtians, & that their forces daily decaied in SIRIA; either of the troubled eſtate of the kings affaires at home in his kingdom or of his deſire to return; would not hearken to any other conditions of peace, but ſuch as might both for the preſent, weaken the forces of

A the Chriſtians in Syria,& diſcourage others that had a mind to come thither afterward, when they ſhould ſee that for naught they ſhould trauel to conquer that,which in the end they muſt of neceſſitie reſtore again. The conditions he offered,were, That the Chriſtians ſhould forthwith reſtore whatſoeuer they had woon in thoſe three yeres wars, Ptolemais only excepted; and from thenceforth for the ſpace of fiue yeres,the Turks ſhould not in any thing moleſt the Chriſtians, but to ſuffer them in peace to liue by them: which hard conditions (for that no better could be had) the king was glad to accept,and ſo concluded a peace. Wherby the labor and trauel of the two great kings,& ſo many nations with them,were all become fruſtrate and vain; hauing now to no purpoſe loſt their men,their mony,their time,their hope,their bloud, their long trauell,to gaine that they muſt now in one houre forgo; nothing more left vnto the B poore Chriſtians in Syria,than the cities of Antioch,Tyre,and Ptolemais.

This done,King Richard leauing the affaires of Aſia vnto the charge of Henrie Countie of Champagne his nephew,ſhipping the greateſt part of his people,with his wife Berengaria,firſt for Sicilia,and from thence for England, (where they in ſafetie at length arriued) followed ſhortly after with ſome few himſelfe; where by the way, by extremitie of weather he was in the Adriatique driuen to land vpon the coaſt of Hiſtria: where trauelling with a ſmall retinue homewards in the habit of a Templar,he was diſcouered & taken priſoner by Leopold duke of Auſtria,whom he had before diſgraced at the winning of Ptolemais, as is before declared: who now glad to haue him in his power,made priſe of him,and ſold him to Henrie the Emperor,for fortie thouſand pounds; by whom he was kept priſoner by the ſpace of a yere & three C moneths,and then ranſomed for the ſumme of an hundred and fiftie thouſand pounds.

About this time died the great Sultan Saladin, the greateſt terrour of the Chriſtians: who mindfull of mans fragilitie,and the vanitie of worldly honours,commanded at the time of his death no ſolemnitie to be vſed at his buriall,but onely his ſhirt in manner of an enſigne, made faſt vnto the point of a lance,to be carried before his dead bodie as an enſigne, a plaine Prieſt going before,and crying aloud vnto the people in this ſort: Saladin Conqueror of the Eaſt,of all the greatneſſe and riches he had in his life,carrieth not with him after his death any thing more than his ſhirt. A ſight worthie ſo great a King, which wanted nothing to his eternall commendation, more than the true knowledge of his ſaluation in Chriſt Ieſus. Hee raigned about ſixteene yeares with great honour,and dying left nine ſonnes, which were all murthered by Saphradin D their vncle, excepting one called alſo Saphradin Sultan of Aleppo; who by the fauor and ſupport of his fathers good friends,ſaued himſelfe from the treacherous practiſes of his vncle. Of this Saphradin the vncle, deſcended Meledin Sultan of Ægypt, and Coradin Sultan of Damaſco and Ieruſalem: Saladin his great kingdome being by them now againe rent in pieces.

The death of Saladin in ſhort time bruited abroad, with the diſcord amongſt the Turks and Saraſins about his dominions,put Celeſtinus (then Pope) in good hope, that the citie of Ieruſalem might in that change and hurlie be eaſily againe recouered, and that kingdome eſtabliſhed. But when hee had in vaine dealt to that purpoſe with the Kings of France and England, (then altogether buſied in their wars the one againſt the other) hee perſuaded Henrie the ſixt, then Emperor,to take the matter in hand: who (for that he well could not,or elſe would not E himſelfe in perſon vndertake that long expedition) ſent Henrie Duke of Saxonie his Lieutenant,with a great armie into Aſia: vnto whom were ioyned two Legats, Conradus Archbiſhop of Mogunſia another of the Electors,and Conradus the Biſhop of Herbipolis. At which time alſo many other great Princes tooke vpon them that holy war; namely Herman Lantgraue of Thurin, Henrie Palatine of Rhine, Henrie Duke of Brabant, Conrade Marqueſſe of Morauia, Frederick Duke of Auſtria,and Albertus Hapſpurgenſis,with ſome others: vnto whom alſo ioyned themſelues the Biſhops of Rheme, Halberſtat,and Ratisbone, with diuers other great Prelats. Who hauing paſſed thorow Hungarie and Thracia,and by the Greeke Emperor Alexius Angelus relieued with all things neceſſarie, were by the Grecian ſhips tranſported vnto Antioch, and ſo by land came to Tyre,and from thence to Ptolemais,with purpoſe to haue gone to F relieue the Germans beſieged in Ioppe; who before their comming were all by treaſon ſlaine, and the citie raſed: wherefore being come to the ruines thereof, they departed thence to Sidon,which they found alſo abandoned by the Turks. After that,they tooke Berithus, which citie they fortified,and ſo went to beſiege Torone,which citie when they had brought to the extremitie,as that it muſt needs (as it was thought) either yeeld or be taken, the Turkes came on ſo faſt to the reliefe thereof, that the Chriſtians were glad to raiſe their ſiege and to bee gone: which they in garriſon at Berithus perceiuing, and ſeeing the enemie to approch them, they abandoned the citie, and ioyning themſelues vnto the reſt of the armie, marched all together to Ioppe, a little before ruinated, which they now againe fortified. But the enemie comming to Berithus, and finding it forſaken, raſed it downe to the ground, and ſo in few moneths ſpace was Berithus both repaired and raſed, in the yeare 1197.

The Turks ouerthrowne by the Chriſtians.

Ioppe repaired by the Chriſtiās.

But whileſt the Chriſtians were repairing the citie of Ioppe, the Turks proud of that they had done at Berithus, came now to diſturbe alſo the fortifying of that place. Of whoſe comming the Chriſtians vnderſtanding, remoued by night about fiue miles from the citie, of purpoſe to draw the Turks vnto a conuenient place for battell. The Turks thinking them to haue been fled for feare, ſent part of their armie to aſſaile the citie; & with the other followed after them diſorderly, as if it had bin after men they had had in chaſe. Vpon whom the Chriſtians turning, had with them at the firſt a ſharpe encounter, but afterwards put them to flight: in which conflict certain thouſands of the Turks fel; of whom the Chriſtians taking the ſpoile, and hauing put the reſt to flight, returned againe vnto the fortifying of the citie. But the ioy of this victorie was by the ſudden death of two of the greateſt Princes in the armie greatly diminiſhed: for the Duke of Saxonie hauing in the battell taken great paines in performing the parts both of a worthie Generall and valiant ſouldier, had ouer-heated himſelfe, and thereupon without regard of his health taking cold, died of a feuer the fourth day after. The Duke of Auſtria mortally wounded in the battell, died alſo the night following.

About this time, or not long after, died Celeſtinus the Pope, author of this expedition, and Henrie alſo the German Emperor: after whoſe death great troubles began to ariſe in Germanie about the chuſing of a new Emperour. Whereof the Biſhop of Mogunſia (then chiefe Commander of the Armie of the Chriſtians in Syria) one of the Electors, and the other German Princes with him, hauing intelligence, could not by any entreatie of the poore Chriſtians (in whoſe quarrell they were come) be perſuaded longer to ſtay, but that needs home they would, and indeed home they went the ſame way that they came. After whoſe departure the Turks tooke Ioppe, hauing one of the ports betrayed vnto them by one of the Citie, at ſuch time as the Germans there in garriſon, after the manner of their countrie, vpon S. Martins day were careleſly making merrie together in their pots: vpon whom ſo ſurcharged with wine, the Turks entring by the port giuen vnto them, put them all with the reſt of the Chriſtians to the ſword, and ſo afterward raſed the citie downe to the ground. Of which victorie they became ſo proud, that they had thought without ſtop to haue driuen the Chriſtians quite out of Syria: but by the comming of Simon Countie of Mont-Fort (a moſt valiant and expert Captain, ſent thither by Philip the French King, with a Regiment of tall ſoldiers, at the inſtance of Innocentius 3, that ſucceeded Celeſtinus in the Papacie) & by ciuil diſcord then raigning amongſt the Turks themſelues for ſoueraigntie, their furie was repreſſed, and a peace betwixt them and the Chriſtians concluded for the ſpace of ten yeares; during which time the Turks promiſed not to moleſt the Chriſtians in Tyre or Ptolemais: which hapned in the yere 1199, or as ſome others ſay, 1198. After which peace ſo concluded, the worthie Countie returned againe with his ſouldiers into France: with whom we alſo will repaire into the leſſer Aſia (whither the courſe both of the time and of the hiſtorie now calleth vs) to ſee the other great affaires of the Turks in thoſe Eaſterne Countries; leauing for a ſeaſon theſe poore remainders of ſo many Chriſtians in Tyre and Ptolemais now for a while in peace, but to be ere long deuoured of the Infidels their enemies, as in the proces of this Hiſtorie ſhal in due time and place appeare.

The ruine of the Turks firſt Empire in PERSIA: with the ſucceſſe of their ſecond Kingdome in the leſſer Aſia, vnder the Aladin Kings.

AS no Kingdome or Empire vpon earth (were it neuer ſo flouriſhing or great) was euer yet ſo aſſured, but that in the reuolution of time, after the manner of other worldly things, it hath as a ſicke bodie beene ſubiect vnto many ſtrange innouations and changes, and at length come to nothing: ſo fared it now with the Turkiſh Empire, which firſt planted by Tangrolipix in Perſia and the other farre Eaſterne Countreys, increaſed by Axan his ſonne, and ſo by the Turkiſh Sultans their Succeſſours (although their names and doings, as too farre off, bee not vnto vs all knowne) for the ſpace of one hundred C and ſeuentie yeares continued, muſt now (I ſay) giue place vnto a greater power, and ſettle it ſelfe elſewhere, the ineuitable deſtinie thereof ſo requiring. It fortuned, that about this time (when in the ſpace of a few yeares ſuch mutations as had not before of long beene ſeene, chanced in diuers great Monarchies and States) that the Tartars, or rather Tattars, inhabiting the large, cold, and bare countries in the North ſide of Aſia (of all others a moſt barbarous, fierce, and needie Nation) ſtirred vp by their owne wants, and the perſuaſion of one Zingis (or as ſome call him, Cangis) holden amongſt them for a great Prophet, and now by them made their Leader, and honoured by the name of Vlu-Chan, that is to ſay, The mightie King, (commonly called the great Cham) flocking together in number like the ſand of the ſea, and conquering firſt their poore neighbours, of condition and qualitie like themſelues, and eaſie D enough to be entreated with them to ſeeke their better fortune, like ſwarmes of Graſhoppers ſent out to deuoure the world, paſſed the high Mountaine Caucaſus, part of the Mountaine Taurus, of all the Mountaines in the world the greateſt; which beginning neere vnto the Archipelago, and ending vpon the Orientall Ocean, and running thorow many great and famous kingdomes, diuideth Aſia into two parts: ouer which great Mountaine, one of the moſt aſſured bounders of nature, that had ſo many worlds of yeares ſhut vp this rough and ſauage people, they now paſſing without number, and comming downe as it were into another World, full of ſuch Natures pleaſant delights as neuer were to them before ſeene, bare downe all before them as they went, nothing beeing now able to ſtand in their way. Old Zingis their fortunate Leader dead in this ſo great an expedition, Hoccata his ſonne, eldeſt of his twelue brethren, E a man of great wiſedome and courage, tooke vpon him his fathers place: who ſending part of his great Armie for the ſubduing of the Countreys Weſtward, turned himſelfe with a world of people towards the Eaſt: where hauing ſubdued the Bactrians and Sogdians, with diuers others, he entred into India, and ſubduing that rich countrey on both ſides the riuer Indus, euen to the Eaſt Ocean, there in the countrey of Cathai built the famous citie of Cambalu, in circuit eight and twentie miles about; for pleaſure and plentie of all things neceſſarie for the life of man, of all the cities of Aſia the chiefe: where the great Cham of Tartarie ſtill reſiant, as in his Imperiall Citie, commandeth ouer one of the greateſt and ſtrongeſt Empires of the world. In whoſe Kingdome alſo, in the Prouince of Mangy more towards the Eaſt, he hath another moſt famous Citie called Quinſay, of all the Cities in the world the greateſt, F in circuit an hundred miles about, as M. Paulus Venetus writeth, who himſelfe dwelt therein about the yere 1260. It is ſcituate in a lake of freſh water, and hath in it twelue thouſand bridges; of which ſome are of ſuch an heigth, that tall Ships with their ſailes vp may eaſily paſſe vnder them. In this populous citie the great Cham hath for the keeping thereof always thirtie thouſand men in garriſon. The Tartar Kingdome thus planted in Cambalu, Hoccata conten-

The Turkes driuen out of Perſia by the Tartars.

ting himſelfe with the rich pleaſures of India, afterward managed his wars by his lieutenants, being for the moſt part his brethren, or other his nigh kinſemen; of whom he ſent out with his armies ſome Northward, ſome Weſtward, and ſome toward the South: by whom he ſubdued the Arachoſians, Margians, and diuers other great nations; and entring into Perſia, ſubdued the country, with all Parthia, Aſſiria, Meſopotamia, and Media. At this time in the city Balch or Belch in the countrie of Choraſan in the fartheſt part of Perſia, raigned ouer the Turks one Curſumes, of the Greekes called Corſantes; who finding himſelfe farre too weake to ſtand before the Tartarians, fled with all his people, leauing vnto them both the citie and the countrie which hee and the Turkes his predeceſſours had euer ſince the time of Tangrolipix poſſeſſed: which citie the Tartars raiſed, and tooke the Countrey vnto themſelues. In this generall flight of the Turks, when as euery man was glad to make what ſhift he might for himſelfe, Curſumes their Sultan died, the laſt of the kings of the Selzuccian familie that raigned ouer the Turks in Perſia: whoſe ſonne Vgnan-Chan taking vpon him the leading of ſuch multitudes of Turks as followed his father, ſeiſed vpon the great city of Babilon, now called Bagadat, neere vnto the ruines of the old Babylon: where hauing put to the ſword all the inhabitants thereof, he there and in the country thereabout ſeated himſelfe with the Turks his followers: but long he had not there reſted, but that the Tartars hearing thereof, purſued him, tooke him priſoner, and expulſed thence all his people. There was at the ſame time alſo another kingdome of the Turks at Nachan a citie in Perſia, giuing name vnto the countrey wherein it ſtood, not farre from Choraſan: wherein then raigned one Solyman, of the Oguzian familie, as had diuers other of his progenitours before him; who terrified with this dreadfull ſtorme ſo ſuddenly riſen out of the North, and warned by the ſudden fal of the Selzuccian Sultan & his kingdom, of far greater fame and power than himſelfe or his, fled alſo with ſuch his ſubiects as would follow him, into the leſſer Aſia. But of him and his proceedings more ſhall bee ſaid hereafter in the riſing of the victorious Othoman familie, as deſcended from him. After this, the Tartars together with their good fortune ſtill extending the bounds of their Empire, conquered Armenia the greater, with the countries of Colchis and Iberia: ſo that now their Empire was become of all others the greateſt and moſt flouriſhing. This great Conquerour the Tartar, had in his proud conceit purpoſed to haue ſubdued all Aſia, and to haue made the ſea the only bounder of his Empire: but ouercome with the delicacies of India, hauing diuided amongſt his people thoſe great prouinces and fruitfull countries, with the rich cities & pleaſant fields, he ſo reſted, embracing the manners and ſuperſtition of the people hee had ouercome. Long it were, and far from our purpoſe, to recount al the famous victories and conqueſts of this bare Northerne people: ſufficeth it to the Hiſtorie we haue in hand, that the Turks were by them then driuen out of Perſia, with the countries thereabouts, and their Togran kingdome (as they call it) firſt founded by Tangrolipix, there extinguiſhed, about the yere of our Lord 1202. The Turks thus driuen out of Perſia, and their kingdome ouerthrown, retired themſelues into the leſſer Aſia, poſſeſſed by the Turks their countrey men, long before brought thither by Cutlu-Muſes and his ſonnes, (as is before declared) and by them euer ſince in ſome part, though with diuers fortune holden. Where theſe Turks now arriued out of Perſia vnder the leading of Aladin the ſonne of Kei-Huſren, deſcended alſo of the Selzuccian familie in Perſia, and taking the opportunitie offered them by the mortall diſcord of the Latines with the Greekes, and the Greekes among themſelues, ſeiſed vpon Cilicia with the countries thereabouts, and there firſt at Sebaſtia, and afterward at Iconium, erected their new Kingdome; which of this Aladin is by the Turks called the Kingdome of the Aladin Kings, although their names were not all ſo.

Now about this time, and within the courſe of ſome few yeares after, ſuch great & ſtrange mutations happened in the Conſtantinopolitane Empire, as had not therein at any time before bin ſeen: whereby the whole eſtate of that great Empire, which ſometime commanded ouer a great part of the world, was almoſt vtterly ſubuerted, and a fit opportunitie giuen vnto the Turks & infidels for the ſure ſetling of themſelues, and eſtabliſhing of their kingdoms both in Syria and the leſſer Aſia: which briefly to run thorow ſhall not be from our purpoſe; their affaires proſpering by theſe troubles, and their proud & ſtately empire that now braueth all the reſt of the world, being raiſed out of the ruines of that Chriſtian Empire, & at this preſent triumphing euen in the ſame Imperial citie wherein theſe ſo great innouations hapned through

A the working of ambitious heads, to the lamentable ruine and deſtruction of a great part of the Chriſtian Commonweale.

Alexius the young Prince craueth ayd of Philip the Emperour and the Latine Princes, againſt his Vncle the Vſurper.

Alexius the vſurper, but now Emperor, not contented (as is before declared) traiterouſly to haue depriued Iſaac his elder brother of his empire and ſight together, ſought alſo after the life of the yong Prince Alexius his brothers ſon, & heire apparant of the empire; who ſeeing the villanie committed in the perſon of his father, ſaued himſelf by flight from the fury of his vncle, and ſo accompanied with certaine great Lords of the Greeks his fathers friends, fled to craue aid of the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, whō the Grecians commonly cal the Latines.
And firſt he tooke his way to Philip the German Emperour, who had married Ireue his ſiſter, the Emperor Iſaacks daughter, by whom he was moſt honorably receiued & entertained. This B great ladie not a little moued with the miſerie of her father, and the flight of her brother, ceaſed not moſt inſtantly to ſolicite the Emperor her husband, not to leaue vnreuenged ſo great a villanie, by the example thereof dangerous vnto himſelfe and others of like maieſtie & ſtate.
She declared vnto him, what an execrable indignitie it was, to ſee her father the Emperor vnworthily impriſoned, depriued of his empire & ſight, & of the ſocietie of men, by his brother that had by him receiued & recouered his life, his light, & his liberty: and to ſee the heire apparant of the Empire baniſhed by the wickednes of his vncle, to wander vp and down here and there like a beggar: a great part of which diſgrace, as ſhee ſaid, redounded vnto herſelfe the daughter of Iſaac, and ſiſter to the young wandring Prince, and to himſelfe alſo, the ſon in law vnto the vnfortunate Emperor her father. Moreouer ſhe ſaid, that the murderer Alexius durſt C neuer haue been ſo hardie as to commit ſo great and deteſtable a villanie, if he had not lightly regarded & contemned the maieſtie of the ſaid Philip; whom if he had had in any reuerence or honor, or at all feared, he durſt not haue attempted ſo villanous an act. This Greek lady, moued with iuſt griefe, with theſe & ſuch like complaints ſo preuailed with her husband, that he promiſed her to be in ſome part thereof reuenged; which hee could not for the preſent perform, letted by the wars he then had with Otho his competitor of the empire. At the ſame time it fortuned, that great preparations were making in France and Italy, and diuers other places of Chriſtendome, for an expedition to be made againſt the Turks into the Holy land. The chief men wherein were Theobald Countie of Champagne, (a man of great fame, & Generall of the Chriſtian armie) Boniface Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, Baldwin Earle of Flanders and Henault, D & Henry his brother Earle of S. Paul, Henry Duke of Louain, Gualter Earle of Breame, with diuers other noble gentlemen, which to name were tedious: vnto whom reſorted alſo many valiant and deuout Chriſtians out of diuers parts of Chriſtendome, readie to haue ſpent their liues in that ſo religious a war: ſo that now the number of them was great, and the army right populous. But beeing thus aſſembled together, they thought it not beſt to take their way to Conſtantinople, thorow Hungarie & Thrace, and ſo to paſſe ouer into Bythinia, for that the Greekes had ſtil in all former times ſhewed great vncourteſie vnto the Latines, in paſſing with their armies that way: and therefore they thought it much better now by the way of Italie to take their journey by ſea into the Holy land; and for their tranſportation, eſpecially to vſe the helpe of the Venetians, whom they found much the eaſier to be intreated, for that by the E means of ſo great an army, they were in hope to ſcoure the Adriaticke (then much infeſted by the Dalmatians) as alſo to recouer Iadera, with ſome other cities vpon the coaſt of Sclauonia, before reuolted from their ſtate to the Hungarians, as indeed they afterward did. But by the way as this army was marching out of France, & come into Piemont, the noble Countie of Champagne General thereof, there fell ſicke & died, to the exceeding griefe & ſorrow of the whole army: in whoſe ſtead, the Marques of Mont-Ferrat, a man of great nobilitie, & well acquainted with the wars of the Eaſt, was choſen General. This great army, tranſported by the Venetians into Sclauonia, tooke Iadera, with diuers other port townes along the ſea coaſt, and hauing there done what the Venetians moſt deſired, was about againe to haue bin imbarkt for Syria, & ſo into the Holy land. But the yong prince Alexius in the mean time had by himſelfe F & the noble Grecians (fled with him for feare of the tyrant) ſo wrought the matter with the Latin Princes of the Weſt, eſpecially with Innocentius tertius the Pope, with Philip the emperor his brother in law, & Philip the French king, that they pittying his eſtate, & induced alſo with ſome other conſiderations more proper to themſelues, tooke him as it were into their protection, commending by letters & meſſengers for that purpoſe ſent vnto the army, (which they might command) the defence both of himſelfe and his cauſe: who with the commendation of three ſo great Princes, comming to the armie yet lying at Iadera(expecting but a faire wind to haue paſſed into Syria)was there of them al moſt honorably receiued, as the ſon of an Emperor, and as became one to them ſo highly commended. And he himſelf alſo, as one knowing his good, was not wanting vnto himſelfe, but recommended his perſon to their protection, as a poore exiled Prince in diſtreſſe; yet was hee of a liuely ſpirit, gratious in ſpeech, beautifull to behold, and very young, and withall fully inſtructed by the noble Grecians that were with him, in all things that might ſerue to further his purpoſe. And foraſmuch as this great Armie conſiſted of diuers nations, eſpecially of the French, Italians, & Venetians, not all to be by one mean moued; he fitted euery one with ſuch motiues as hee thought might beſt preuaile with them: Vnto the French hee promiſed to pay the great ſums of money they had borrowed of the Venetians for the furniſhing of themſelues in this war: Vnto the Venetians he promiſed recompence for all the iniuries they had ſuſtained by the late Conſtantinopolitan Emperors, eſpecially by the Emperor Emanuel (who for that they refuſed to aid him in his warres againſt William king of Sicilie, did in one day confiſcat al the goods of the Venetian merchants within his empire, of a great value; and afterwards contrary to the law of nations, ſhamefully entreated their embaſſadors ſent vnto him, amongſt whom was Henry Dandulus, now by fortune generall for the Venetians in the army: who moued as wel with the wrong in particular done vnto himſelfe, as with the common, deſired to be reuenged both of the one & the other; which although he could not haue of Emanuel himſelfe, being long before dead, yet was he ſtill deſirous to haue it of ſome one of the Greeke Emperors, whoſoeuer he were:) Vnto the Pope and the Italians, both he & the noblemen with him, had before promiſed, that the Greek Church ſhould euer acknowledge the ſupremacie of the Church of Rome, and from thenceforth ſubmit it ſelfe thereunto, as vnto the ſoueraign judge of al the Chriſtian Churches: which cauſed the Pope Innocentius, by letters, by legats, by embaſſadors, and by all other means poſſible, to further the cauſe of the yong Prince Alexius, ſo combined with his own; alledging the diuerſitie of opinions in matters of religion, betwixt the Greeks and the Latines, to haue beene the chiefe cauſe that the Mahometans had not beene long agoe by their vnited forces ſubdued, or vtterly rooted out. In briefe, the young Prince ſpared not to promiſe moſt bountifull rewards in generall, to all that ſhould take his part againſt his vncle the vſurping Emperor.

By this means, the deuout war taken in hand for the reliefe of the poore Chriſtians in Siria, was laid aſide, & the ſame forces that ſhould haue bin therein imployd, now conuerted againſt the Greeke empire, to the great weakning of that ſide of the Chriſtian commonweale, and aduantage of the common enemie; who might then eaſily haue beene oppreſſed, had hee with the vnited forces of the Chriſtians bin on this ſide charged home, as he was on the farther by the Tartars. The Grecian war thus reſolued vpon, it ſeemed beſt vnto the great Commanders of the armie, to march directly to Conſtantinople, as to the head of the Grecian ſtate, & place where the tyrant whom they ſought after was reſiant. In the meane time it was by them giuen out thorow all the Greeke cities which the Emperour had ſtrongly manned and fortified for the ſtaying of their paſſage, that their purpoſe was not to make war againſt the Grecians their friends, but only to reſtore their lawfull Emperour vnto his former ſtate and honor: And that foraſmuch as euery city and town in antient Greece had appointed rewards, and almoſt diuine honours vnto ſuch as had deliuered them from tyrants, they ſhould now more fauourably receiue & intreat them that came to reſtore vnto euerie citie, and to euery man in generall, their former libertie and honor. And ſo vpon the reſolution for Conſtantinople imbarking their armie, and paſſing thorow the Ionian ſea into the Ægeum, and ſo without let thorow the ſtraits of Heleſpontus into Propontis, and entring the ſtraits of Boſphorus Thracius, which diuide Europe from Aſia, they came to an anker euen in the face of the citie. In this fleet were two hundred and fortie ſaile of tall ſhips, ſixtie gallies, ſeuentie ſhips for burthen, and one hundred and twentie ſaile of Victuallers: which all together made a moſt braue ſhew, couering that ſtrait in ſuch ſort, as that it ſeemed rather a wood than a part of the ſea. Thus for a ſpace they lay facing the city, attending if happily vpon the comming and ſight of ſo great a fleet, and the report of ſo puiſſant an armie as the yong Prince Alexius had brought with him, any tumult or ſedition might ariſe in the Citie. But the warie Tyrant had ſo well prouided therefore before hand, that the Citiſens, although they in heart fauoured the young Prince, and wiſhed

A him well, yet durſt they not once moue or ſtirre in his quarrell. Whileſt the fleet thus lay, embaſſadors came from the Iſle of Creet, in two great gallies, with three banks of oars, yeelding vnto the yong prince that goodly iſland, with all the towns and cities therein: which he forthwith gaue vnto the Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, Generall of the armie, thereby to encourage the other great commanders of the armie to doe the vttermoſt of their deuoire, in hope of recompence and rewards anſwerable to their deſerts and valour.

Before the arriuall of this fleet, Alexius the Emperour had with a great chaine made faſt the entrance of the hauen betwixt Conſtantinople and Pera, and appointed twentie great gallies wel manned for the keeping therof: but a great gale of wind ariſing, the General ſent out the greateſt and ſtrongeſt ſhip in the fleet (of her greatnes and ſwiftnes called the Eagle) which B with all her ſailes vp, carried with a full gale of wind, by maine force brake the chaine, and made a way for the reſt of the fleet to enter; which the Greekes in the gallies ſeeing, for feare fled, leauing the gallies for a ſpoile vnto the Venetians, by whom they were all taken, but not a man found in them. The hauen thus gained, Theodorus Laſcaris the Emperours ſon in law, was preſently ready vpon the ſhore with a ſelect companie of the braueſt gallants of the city and of the court, to haue hindered the Latines from landing; who running their ſhips a ground, landed with ſuch cheerfulnes and courage, and with ſuch haſt, that in one moment you might haue ſeene them leape out of their ſhips, take land, enter into the battell, and lay about them like mad men. This hot skirmiſh endured a great while, for that they were only footmen that ſuſtained this brunt, for the horſes could not ſo ſoone be landed, and the Greeks were brauely C mounted. All this great fight the Conſtantinopolitanes beheld, with doubtfull hearts, expecting what ſhould bee the euent thereof. There were in the citie ſix thouſand of the flower of Greece, which brauely ſallying out, made the battel much more doubtfull; yet ſuch was the valour and reſolution of the Latines, that in fine the Greekes diſcomfited, were glad to retire themſelues againe into the citie, but with what loſſe, was not certainly knowne: eaſie it were to gueſſe, that it was right great, for that the old tyrant Alexius diſcouraged therewith, and doubtful of his owne eſtate, with Theodorus Laſcaris his ſon in law, and ſome few others of his truſtie friends (hard to be found in ſo dangerous a caſe) the next night following ſecretly fled out of the citie, carrying away with him a wonderfull maſſe of treaſure (which he againſt all ſuch euents had cauſed to bee ſecretly hidden by his daughter Irene, in a monaſterie of Nuns D within the citie, whereof ſhe was the abbeſſe) and ſo ſaued himſelfe.

A hot skirmiſh betwixt the Greekes & the Latines at their landing.

Iſaac the old Emperor taken out of priſon, & againe ſaluted Emperor, together with yong Alexius his ſon.

The flight of the tyrant once bruted, the next morning the Conſtantinopolitans taking the old Emperor Iſaac out of priſon, ſaluted him againe for their Emperor, reioyſing greatly for his deliuerance and the ſafegard of his life: and after that opened the gates of the citie to the Latines, calling and ſaluting them by the names of the reuengers and ſauiours of the libertie of the Greekes, as alſo of the life and maieſtie of their Emperor: they requeſted them that they might ſee and ſalute Alexius their young Prince, whom they had ſo long deſired: and ſo was the citie of Conſtantinople, by the ſubmiſſion of the citizens, for that time ſaued from ſaccage and ſpoile. The old Emperor thus deliuered, and together with his ſon Alexius again placed in the imperiall ſeat, gaue the moſt hearty thanks that poſſibly he could vnto the Latine E Princes, for that by their bounty, charity, and valour, the Greek empire had bin deliuered out of a long and miſerable ſeruitude: and for his own particular, that he had receiued of them ſo great good, that albeit his ſight could not be reſtored to him againe, neuertheleſſe he acknowledged his life, his liberty, his empire, his countrey, his ſon, to haue bin vnto him by them reſtored, and he likewiſe to them, for which their ſo great deſerts he could not (as he ſaid) render them condigne thanks, or deuiſe rewards or honors anſwerable to their demerits and valour: and that therefore he did ratifie and confirme whatſoeuer his ſon had before promiſed vnto them for his deliuerance: and not only that, but further promiſed, That if they were not therwith contented, he would of his owne bountie giue them better contentment, not meaning they ſhould goe diſcontented, that had ſaued his life, and otherwiſe ſo highly pleaſured him.
F Hereupon this good old Emperor began to conſult with his friends about the means whereby he might ſatisfie and content the Latines in ſuch things as the yong prince his ſon had vnto them promiſed. And to the intent that the citizens of Conſtantinople might the more willingly doe that hee was to command them, and the more cheerefully pay ſuch impoſitions as he was to lay vpon them, he intreated all the Latines to retire themſelues out of the citie into their campe or about their ſhips, which they accordingly did. But the impoſition beeing ſet downe, and what euery man was to pay, ſeemed vnto the Greeks (as men of long accuſtomed to receiue tribute of others, and not to pay tribute to others) a matter moſt heauie and intollerable. In this very inſtant that this exaction was required, died the old Emperour Iſaac, who hauing of long beene kept in a darke and ſtinking priſon in continuall feare of death, and now deliuered and reſtored to his Empire, could not indure ſo ſudden and vnexpected a change, both of the aire and of his manner of liuing, but ſo ſuddenly died.

At this exaction impoſed for the contentment of the Latines, the light Conſtantinopolitans grieuouſly murmured and exclaimed, ſaying, That it was a villanous thing to ſee the Greeke empire ingaged and bound (by a yong boy) vnto a couetous and proud nation, and ſo to be ſpoyled and bare of coyne: That the great and rich Iſland of Crete lying in the midſt of the ſea, was by him giuen as a gift vnto the Latines: That the citie of Conſtantinople and the Greeke church, had by him beene enforced and conſtrained to yeeld vnto the See of Rome, to receiue the opinions of the Latine church, to ſubmit it ſelfe vnto the obeyſance of old Rome, from whence it had once happily departed euer ſince the time that the empire was by Conſtantine the Great tranſlated thence to them. Thus euery one ſaid for himſelfe in particular: thus all men ſaid in generall. And therof the noble men in their aſſemblies, and the vulgar people in their meetings, grieuouſly complained: whereupon a great ſedition and tumult was raiſed in the city. Some preſently tooke vp armes, and the common people all enraged ran furiouſly diſordered vnto the palace, with a purpoſe to haue committed ſome great outrage vpon the perſon of the yong emperor Alexius: who in that ſo ſudden an inſurrection, as might well haue troubled a right conſtant man, without longer ſtay reſolued vpon a moſt wholſome and neceſſarie point for the appeaſing of the peoples furie; vnto whom (aſſembled in a wonderfull multitude) he ſhewed himſelfe from aboue in his palace, promiſing them to remain in their power, and not from thenceforth to doe any thing without their aduice and liking, but wholy to depend vpon them: with which good words the people held themſelues well content, and ſo was the tumult for that time appeaſed. But forthwith the young emperor conſidering the iniury done vnto him, began to burn with the deſire of reuenge and to change his purpoſe. He could not together ſatisfie the citizens and the Latines: for if he would keepe his promiſe with the Latines, he muſt of neceſſitie offend his owne people; neither was there any means to be found to ſatisfie both the one and the other. But thinking himſelfe more bound to keep his promiſe with the Latines, whoſe forces he knew not how to withſtand, he ſent ſecretly to requeſt the Marques of Mont-Ferrat, General of the armie, to ſend him about midnight certaine companies of ſoldiers vnto the citie, aſſuring him to receiue them in by a gate neere vnto the palace, which ſhould bee opened vnto them by certaine of his truſtie ſeruants there left for that purpoſe. Of this plot Alexius Ducas (of his bittle browes ſurnamed Murzufle, whom of a baſe fellow the Emperor Iſaac had promoted vnto the greateſt honors of the court) was not ignorant, who being a man of an aſpiring mind, and in thoſe troubleſome times hauing long thirſted after the Empire, tooke now this occaſion to worke vpon.

Alexis ſeeketh to bring the Latines againe into the citie.

The Conſtantinopolitans again in an vprore.

The night following, he by his agents, men inſtructed for the purpoſe, raiſed a tumult in the citie, not inferiour vnto that which had hapned the day before: and at the ſame inſtant, as if he had had nothing to do in the matter, came ſuddenly to the yong Emperor in the dead time of the night (which he might at all times do, by reaſon of the great confidence the Emperor had in him) and with a ſad countenance told him, That the people were vp again in an vprore, and eſpecially they of his guard, & that they were comming toward him to do him ſome violence for the loue he bare vnto the Latines. With which vnexpected news the yong Emperor terrified, demanded of him as of his moſt faithfull counſellor, What were beſt in that caſe for him to do? Who preſently embracing him in his night gown, led him out by a ſecret doore into a tent he had of his owne in the court, as if he would there haue kept him ſafe: but far was that from his traiterous thoughts; who departing from him, as if he had gone to appeaſe the tumult, had before taken order, that he ſhould preſently after his departure, be caſt into bonds, & ſo be clapt vp into a cloſe ſtinking priſon: which done, the falſe traitor openly ſhewing himſelfe made an oration to the people, wherin he ſhewed himſelf to haue great compaſſion of the Greek empire, & of the Greeks his countrymen themſelues, ſpecially in that they were gouerned by a youth vnfit for the gouernment, who ſuffred himſelf to be miſſ-led according to the

A pleaſure of the Latines. And that it was high time for the citie of Conſtantinople, the ſeat of the Greeke empire, to looke about it, and to haue an eye vnto it ſelfe, ſith it was betraied and ſold by them which ought to preſerue and keepe the ſame: that they had now need of a man that loued his country and countrymen, before that which yet remained of the Græcian name were vtterly extinguiſhed by the Latines.

This his ſpeech, fitted of purpoſe vnto the humour of the ſeditious, was receiued with the great outcrie and applauſe of the windie headed people. Some cried out, that hee, and none but hee, was to bee made chiefe of the common weale that was by them to bee eſtabliſhed: otherſome cried as loud to haue him made generall of the armies and forces of the ſtate: but the greateſt crie was to haue him choſen and created Emperour; whereunto the reſt giuing B place, he was by the generall conſent of the tumultuous people, without longer ſtay, choſen and proclaimed Emperour.

Alexius the traitour, by no lawfull election or rightfull ſucceſſion, but only by the fury of the tumultuous people, thus created Emperour; was of nothing more carefull than how to breake the forces of the Latines, of whom only he now ſtood in dread. And therfore to begin withall, hee firſt attempted by certaine gallies filled with pitch, flax, brimſtone, and ſuch like matter apt to take fire, to haue burnt the Venetian fleet: which gallies ſo ſet on fire & carried with a faire gale of wind among the fleet, had bin like enough to haue done great harm, had it not by the warineſſe of the Venetians bin preuented: who being good ſea men, and not vnacquainted with ſuch deuiſes, eaſily & without danger auoided the ſame, by keeping themſelues C aloofe one from another in the ſea. This finenes ſorting to no purpoſe, he to color the matter ſent certaine meſſengers to the Generall, and other commanders of the army, to giue them to vnderſtand that that which was done for the firing of the fleet, had bin done without his priuity, by the malice of the tumultuous people, and that for his part he would be glad of their fauor and friendſhip, aſſuring them likewiſe of his, and promiſing them to aid them both with men and mony, and whatſoeuer els they ſhould haue need of in their wars againſt the infidels. Wherunto an anſwer was giuen by Dandulus the Venetian generall, that he would beleeue it, when Alexis the ſon of the Emperor Iſaac, whom the Latines had placed in the empire, ſhould aſſure them thereof, and intreat for the people, vpon whom the fault of that outrage was laid: which anſwer the more moued the traiterous tyrant, to rid himſelfe cleane of the feare of the D yong prince, by taking him out of the way; to the intent to hinder the people of the hope and great deſire they had to grow to ſome peace with the Latins, by taking him out of priſon, and receiuing him againe for their Emperor: For the people (by nature mutable, and not deſirous of the good of themſelues, but according to the occurrents preſent, without any great regard of that they had already done, or ought to haue done) began now to repent themſelues of that they had done againſt the yong Emperor Alexis in the fauor of the tirant, and commonly ſaid, That they muſt find ſome meanes, whatſoeuer it were, to remedie their fault together with their troubles. Wherefore Murzufle fearing the ſudden mutation of the people, with his own hands moſt villanouſly ſtrangled the young Prince Alexis in priſon, hauing as yet not raigned much aboue ſix moneths, and immediatly after cauſed it to be bruited abroad, That the ſaid E young prince deſpairing of his eſtate, had as a man deſperat hanged himſelfe.

The tyrant in vain hauing thus attempted the burning of the fleet, & ſtill fearing the reuenging ſword of the Latines, reſolued now by plain force to meet them in the field, and there to dare them battel. So hauing made ready and armed the whole ſtrength of the imperiall citie, he with cheerefull ſpeech encouraged his ſoldiers, requeſting them valiantly to maintain and defend their country of Greece, the monuments of their fathers, the glorie of their anceſtors, their preſent honor, and the future hope of their poſteritie: that hauing before their eyes the wals of their citie, within which they were borne, nouriſhed, and brought vp in hope of great matters, they would haue pitie and compaſſion of their temples, their wiues, their children, and in no caſe to ſuffer them to fall again into ſo miſerable & wretched a ſeruitude, but rather F to die a thouſand deaths. And the more to grace this his enterpriſe taken in hand for the defence of his country (as he would haue the world to beleeue it) with the colour of a ſuperſtitious deuotion alſo, he cauſed the Prieſts in their eccleſiaſtick attire and ornaments, to march forth in the armie, with an enſigne, hauing in it diſplayed the picture of the virgin Marie. So couragiouſly marching forward, hee firſt charged that quarter of the campe where Baldwin the Countie of Flanders lay, where at the firſt was fought a right fierce and doubtfull battell. G But afterward the alarum running throughout all the campe of the Latines, and new ſupplies comming in on euery ſide, the Greeks were put to the worſe, and inforced againe to retire into the city, hauing loſt a great number of men, together with their ſuperſtitious enſigne. It was a wonderfull thing to ſee, with what rare agreement the Latines, being of diuers nations, continued this expedition vndertaken againſt the Greekes. Seuentie two daies was this City of Conſtantinople ſtraightly beſieged by the Latines both by ſea and land, without giuing any time of reſt or repoſe day or night to the beſieged, freſh men comming ſtill on to the aſſault, as the other fell off, and in ſuch ſort troubled the Greekes in the citie, that they knew not well what to do or which way to turne themſelues. The Venetians vnto whom was committed the charge to aſſault that ſide of the citie which was toward the hauen, vpon two great gallies H made faſt together, built a ſtrong tower of wood, higher than the wals and rampiars of the town, out of which they both with ſhot and fireworks much troubled the defendants, wherwith they in the time of the aſſault approaching the wal, by their fine deuices fired that ſide of the citie: by the rage whereof, a great number of houſes were burnt, with many other ſtately buildings and ancient monuments of that famous citie: and had at that preſent gained a great tower neere vnto the port, deſtitute of defenders, had not the tyrant himſelfe in good time come with new ſupplies to the reſcue thereof. In like manner, the French, with the reſt, aſſayled the other ſide of the citie by land, where they were to fight not againſt the defendants only, but againſt deep ditches, high and ſtrong wals, and bulwarks alſo: neuertheleſſe, ſuch was the valour and furie of the Latines, with the deſire of victorie, as that they were not with any I difficulties to bee diſmaied; but preſſing ſtill on, by a thouſand dangers, at length after a moſt ſharpe aſſault, they gained one of the greateſt baſtilions on that ſide of the city, called the Angels tower, and ſo by plain force opened a way both for themſelues and the reſt into the city. Whereof Alexius vnderſtanding, and ſtrucke with preſent deſpaire both of his ſtate and life, the night now comming on, fled with Euphroſina the Emperour Alexius his wife, and Eudocia her daughter, whom he had married when he had raigned about a moneth and ſixteene daies.

The tyrant, author of all this miſchiefe, and of the calamities enſuing, thus fled, and the Latins furiouſly entring; the Prieſts and religious men in their ſurplices, and other eccleſiaſtick ornaments with their croſſes and banners (as in ſolemne proceſſion) met the Latins, and falling downe at the ſoldiers feet, with flouds of teares aboundantly running down their heauy countenances, K beſought them, but ſpecially the captains and commanders, to remember the condition of wordly things, and contenting themſelues with the victory, the glorie, the honour, the empire, the immortality of their name, to abſtain from ſlaughter, from burning, from ſpoiling & ranſacking of ſo beautifull a city: and that ſeeing they were themſelues men, they would alſo haue pitie of men: and being themſelues captains and ſoldiers, they ſhould alſo haue compaſſion vpon captains and ſouldiers; who although they were not ſo valiant and fortunate as they were, yet neuertheles were both captains and ſouldiers: and that they would keepe and preſerue their city, whereof (if they ruinated it not) they might haue much more pleaſure and commodity, than if they ſhould deſtroy the ſame, which as it had bin the principall ſeat of the Greek empire, ſo might it now be of the Latines: That ſeeing they had thereof a carefull regard, L as then belonging to another man, they ought now vpon better reaſon to haue more care therof, being their own: That the authors of all thoſe troubles and miſchiefes, Alexius the elder, and Murzufle, had already receiued a reward anſwerable to their follies, in that they were driuen into exile: That they would haue pity and compaſſion of an innocent and vnfortunate multitude of poore people, oppreſſed and grieuouſly tormented with the often tyrannies of their murderous lords and gouernors: That in ſo doing, God the Lord of hoſts, the giuer and guider of battels, the God of mercy, would therfore reward them: To conclude, they humbly beſought them to pardon their citizens, to put on the hearts of gracious & merciful lords and fathers, not of enemies and rough maſters, of forgiuers, not of reuengers; and to vnderſtand by their tears, their miſerable eſtate and woes paſſed. With this ſo humble a ſubmiſſion and complaint M of the religious, ſome of the better ſort were happily moued: but with the common ſoldiers, breathing nothing but victory, with their weapons in their hands, & the ſpoile of an empire in their power, what auailed praiers or teares? Euery man fel to the ſpoile, and in ſo great choice & liberty of al things, fitted his own diſordred appetite, without reſpect of the wrong

A or iniurie done to others: onely from the effuſion of innocent bloud they abſtained; they whoſe liues they ſought after, being already fled, together with the tyrant. Other iniuries and outrages (ſo great, as that greater none could be) were in euery place ſo rife, that euery ſtreet, euery lane, euery corner of the citie was filled with mourning and heauineſſe. There might a man haue ſeene noble men earſt of great honor, and reuerend for their hoarie haires, with other citizens of great wealth, thruſt out of all they had, walking vp and downe the citie weeping and wringing their hands, as men forlorn, knowing not where to ſhroud their heads. Neither ſtaied the greedie rage of the inſolent ſoldiers within the wals of mens priuate houſes, but brake out into the ſtately palaces, temples, and churches of the Greekes alſo, where al was good prize, and nothing dedicated to the ſeruice of God, left vnpolluted and defaced, no B place vnſought, no corner vnrifled: right lamentable and almoſt incredible it were to report all the miſeries of that time. Some of the Greeke Hiſtoriographers, men of great marke and place, and themſelues eye-witneſſes and partakers of thoſe euils, haue by their writings complained to all poſteritie, of the inſolencie of the Latines at the winning of the citie, to their eternall diſhonor: but that diſordered ſouldiers in all ages in the libertie of their inſolent victorie, haue done ſuch outrages, as honeſt minds abhorre to think vpon. Thus Conſtantinople the moſt famous citie of the Eaſt, the ſeat and glory of the Greeke empire, by the miſerable ambition and diſſention of the Greekes for ſoueraigntie, fell into the hands of the Latines, the twelfth of Aprill, in the yeare 1204, or after the account of others, 1200.

Conſtantinople thus taken, and the tyrants put to flight, the Princes and great commanders C of the armie held a counſell, to conſider what were beſt to bee done concerning the citie and the new gained empire: for after ſo great a victorie, they thought it not good to raſe ſo ancient and important a citie, ſeated as it were a watch-tower vpon the theatre of the world, ouerlooking both Aſia and Europe from the one to the other, as an eye of the vniuerſall, and ſo commodiouſly planted, as was no other city of the world, for the keeping vnder of the enemies of the Chriſtian Religion: but that it were much better to place there a Latin gouernor, to eſtabliſh there the Latine lawes and cuſtomes, and to vnite the Greeke church as a member vnto the Church of Rome. In which conſultation, ſome were of opinion, not to haue any moe Emperours in Chriſtendome but one, and therefore to make choice of Philip the Germane Emperour, authour of this warre, whoſe wife Irene was the onely daughter and heire of D the late Emperour Iſaac Angelus, vnto whom by all right the inheritance of her fathers empire belonged. But the greater part, conſidering that the troubled affairs of Greece, in ſo great a change and newneſſe of the empire, had need of the perſonall preſence of a Prince, thought it better to make choice of one among themſelues, who there ſtill reſiant in that place, might at all times giue aid vnto the Latines in their ſacred warres, taken in hand againſt the infidels: which opinion as the better, was approued of them all. The chiefe men in this election of the new Emperour, were Baldwin Countie of Flaunders and Hainault, Henrie his brother, Lewis Countie of Bloys, Symon de Montfort, Iohn de Dammartin, Gualter de Brienne, Hugh Countie of S. Paul, Iohn Countie of Brenne, Boniface Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, Stephen Countie of Perch, and fiue gentlemen of Venice: vnto whome alſo were ioyned two Bi- E ſhops of Syria, the one of Bethlem, the other of Ptolemais, who had oftentimes come to the campe of the Latines, to ſtirre them vp for the taking in hand the ſacred warre in Syria; with two Biſhops of France alſo, namely of Soiſſon and Troy in Champagne, and the Abbot of Lemely. Theſe great Lords and Prelates aſſembled into the Church of the holy Apoſtles, after they had there with great deuotion craued of God to inſpire them with his ſpirit for the choice of a good and iuſt Prince fit for ſo great a charge; with one conſent made choice of Baldwin Countie of Flaunders and Haynault, for Emperour of Greece: a braue and valiant Prince, about two and thirtie yeares old, who was afterward the ſixteenth day of May in the yeare 1204 (or after the computation of others, in the yeare 1205) in the great Temple of S. Sophia ſolemnly crowned by Thomas Maurocenus a Venetian, firſt Patriarch F of the Latines in Conſtantinople. From which time the Greeke Church in Conſtantinople began to receiue the rites and ceremonies of the Latines, and to acknowledge the ſupremacie of the Church of Rome.

It was not long after that Conſtantinople was thus taken by the Latines, but that they diuiding their forces without any reſiſtance, tooke in the moſt part of the great countries and prouinces on Europe ſide, belonging to the Greeke empire in the time of Iſaac Angelus G the late Emperour: the fortune of the whole empire, as it were following the fortune of the imperiall citie. Which large countries ſo gained from the Greeks, the Latins diuided amongſt themſelues, as good prize taken from their enemies. Vnto Baldwin the emperor and his ſucceſſors in the empire, was aſſigned the imperiall Citie of Conſtantinople, and the countrey of Thracia, with a limited ſoueraigntie ouer all the reſt of the prouinces by the Latines alreadie or afterwards to be gained. Vnto the Venetians in this diuiſion of the empire, was allotted for their ſhare all the rich Iſlands of the Ægeum, and Ionian, with the famous Iſland of Candie alſo; which although it were before by the youug Emperour Alexis in the beginning of theſe warres, giuen vnto the Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, yet in this diuiſion of the empire, it was taken from him (not without his good liking) and giuen to the Venetians, as for them H more fit: in ſtead and lieu whereof, the Marqueſſe had the citie of Theſſalonica with all the kingdome of Theſſalie, and a great part of Peloponeſus aſſigned vnto him, with the Royall title of a King. Of the aforeſaid Iſlands (in number many and exceeding rich) the Venetians in the name of the ſtate, fortified ſome few of the greateſt with conuenient garriſons, the reſt they left to bee poſſeſſed and defended by the better ſort of the citizens at their priuate coſt and charges; who according to their abilitie, tooke into their poſſeſſion, ſome one Iſland, ſome another, and ſome two or three, one, as they were able to ſet out their gallies, one, two, or moe, for the keeping of the ſame: ouer all which, the ſeigniorie neuertheleſſe had a generall care, ſtill keeping a fleet with one of their Admirals at ſea: by whom they not onely repreſſed the Genoa pirats then buſie in thoſe ſeas, but alſo tooke in certaine ſtrong townes in I the maine vpon the coaſt of Peloponeſus, namely Modon and Corone; all which they of long time after held as a part of their ſeigniorie. Some other particular places, yet parts alſo of the empire, were giuen vnto particular men: as the dukedom of Athens vnto one Geffrey of Troy in Champaigne, a French man, a valiant Captaine, whom they alſo made Prince of Achaia: Another Dukedome was alſo giuen to the Countie of Bloys; as were diuers other countries and townes alſo vnto other more priuate men: who neuertheleſſe were bound to hold the ſame of the Emperor, as of their Lord, and to pay him yerely a fourth part of the reuenue ariſing thereof, towards the maintenance of his ſtate. Yea the Greekes themſelues in this ſhipwracke of their ſtate and empire, although they diſdained nothing more than the ſtrange gouernment of the Latines, yet could they not be perſuaded to ioyne together in ſo common K a calamitie, but after their wonted manner ſought euery man how to ſhare out ſomething for himſelfe, without regard of the common good: one ſeized vpon one ſtrong towne or citie, and ſo likewiſe another; which for all that they held not long, driuen thence for the moſt part by a greater power, either of the Latines, or of their owne countreymen.

The man whom the diſcontented Greekes moſt looked after, was Theodorus Laſcaris, the Emperour Alexius Angelus his ſonne in law; who at the taking of the citie, fled to Adrianople, and afterward into Bythinia, where hee was of the people, not of that countrie onely, but of others alſo farther off, ioyfully receiued and honoured as their Emperour. So taking into his hands the countries of Bythinia, Phrygia, Miſſia, Ionia, and Lydia, euen from the windings of the famous riuer Mæander Southward, vnto the Euxine Sea Northward, hee with L the generall good liking of the people, tooke vpon him the eſtate of an Emperour, and ſo in the renowned citie of Nice made the ſeat of his empire. At the ſame time alſo Dauid, and Alexius Comneni, the nephewes of the tyrant Andronicus (ſometime Emperour of Conſtantinople) by his ſonne Manuel, poſſeſſing the more Eaſterne countries of Pontus, Galatia, and Capadocia, erected vnto themſelues another empire in Trapezond, where their poſteritie of the honourable houſe of the Comneni raigned in great glorie many yeares after, vntill their empire, together with the empire of Conſtantinople, was by the great Emperour of the Turkes, Mahomet the ſecond, ſubuerted and brought to nought, as ſhall afterward in due time and place be declared. Thus the Greek empire expoſed (as it were) to the general ſpoile, was no longer one, but many empires: Baldwin raigning in Conſtantinople, the Marqueſſe M of Mont-Ferrat in Theſſalie, Theodorus Laſcaris at Nice, Alexius Comnenus in Trapezond, and the Venetians in the Iſlands, all in royall dignitie. Beſides whome were many other leſſer Princes, which had heere and there according to their abilitie ſeized vpon ſome one or other part of the Empire, and there erected their Toparchies, raigning therein as

Baldwin (as is aforeſaid) created Emperor of Conſtantinople, by the helpe of the Venetian Admirall Dandulus, and other great commanders of the Armie, in ſhort time brought vnder his obeiſance all the cities of Thracia,excepting the citie of Adrianople, whereunto the better ſort of the diſcontented Greeks,together with Theodorus Laſcaris (diſdaining the gouernment of the Latines) were fled,as vnto a moſt ſafe ſanctuarie: which Baldwin knowing, and withal deſiring whileſt yet he had his friends about him,to ſet his new Empire in ſome good ſtay,without farther delay came and laid hard ſiege to the ſame. Now the Greekes generally euill entreated by the Latines,and grieued to be gouerned by them, were ſome of them fled B into other their neighbour Princes countries, but eſpecially into Bulgaria, otherwiſe called Miſia,a large kingdome, lying betwixt the great mountaine Æmus, and Danubius: by whoſe perſuaſion,Iohn King of that country,aided by the Scythians, (a fierce Northerne people, but lately come into thoſe quarters) and by the fugitiue Greeks themſelues, tooke vpon him to relieue the beſieged citie: and ſo with a great armie approching the ſame,ſent before certaine troups of the Scythian Archers on horſebacke,to fetch in ſuch bootie of horſes or cattell as they ſhould find neere vnto the Emperors campe; and withall commanded them, that being charged by the Imperials,they ſhould forthwith retire,ſo to draw them out of their trenches, into the place where the King with the greateſt part of his armie lay couertly to intrap them: Which the Scythians (well acquainted with ſuch ſeruice) ſo well performed vnder the leading of one C Cozas their Generall, that hauing once or twice drawne their enemies vnto ſome light skirmiſhes,and ſo retyring,and ere long againe with a greater number returning, they at length cunningly drew the Emperor with all his armie,in hope to do ſome great matter vpon them,euen as they wiſhed, into the place whereas the King with his armie lay in wait among the woods and mountaines for them; where they,wearied and out of breath with the former purſuit,& now on euery ſide beſet with freſh enemies,were ouerthrowne with a great ſlaughter. In which conflict to increaſe the loſſe,Baldwin the Emperour himſelfe was taken and ſent priſoner in bonds to Ternoua; where afterwards by the commandment of the barbarous king he was moſt cruelly put to death,hauing his hands and feet cut off, & ſo diſmembred was caſt out into a deepe valley,where hee yet lay miſerably breathing three dayes after, and ſo died; D leauing his bodie as fortunes ſcorne, for a prey vnto the wild beaſts and birds of the aire, no man vouchſafing to burie it. Thus periſhed this worthie Prince, for his vertues commended euen of the Greeks themſelues,being about the age of three and thirtie yeres, and not hauing raigned yet a full yeare,in the yere of our Lord 1206.

The victorie thus gained,and the citie relieued,the barbarous King with his ſauage ſouldidiers hauing taſted the wealth of the Latines ouerthrowne in the late battel, and the pleaſures of Thracia now ſubiect to their luſt; greedily purſued their good fortune, without reſpect of all humanitie: the open country they ouerran,ſpoiling whatſoeuer came to hand,the rich and famous cities they rifled,and afterward raſed them down to the ground; namely Serræ,Philippopolis, Apri,Rhedeſtum,Perinthus,Daonium,Arcadiopolis,Meſena,Zurulus,& Athyra: E the citiſens & country people fled into the cities for refuge, they put al to the ſword,without reſpect of age,ſex,or condition,except ſome few, whom they carried away with them priſoners; ſo that of all the prouinces of that rent and ruinated empire,the country of Thrace was moſt miſerable,as firſt ſpoyled by the Latines, and now layd deſolate by the Bulgarians and Scythians. Only ſome few of the ſtrongeſt cities,as Didymotichum and Adrianople (valiantly defended by the Greeks and Latines) eſcaped this furie of the Barbarians, all the reſt that fell into their hands being layd waſt and deſolate.

Henry ſecond Emperor of the Latines in Conſtantinople.

In this ſo troubled a ſtate of the new erected Empire of the Latines in Conſtantinople, the Latines made choice of Henrie the late Emperor Baldwins brother,as of all others the fitteſt to ſucceed him in the Empire: who aided by the Marqueſſe,now King of Theſſalie,& the other F Latine Princes,notably repulſed the Barbarians,and left them not vntill that at length he had recouered from them all ſuch townes and cities as they had before taken, and driuen them quite out of the countrie,and ſo well eſtabliſhed himſelfe in his new Empire.

But to leaue this diſmembred empire,now in the hands of many,and to come neerer to our purpoſe: Alexius Angelus the vſurper, driuen out of the imperiall citie by the Latines, to ſaue himſelfe, fled into Theſſalie, & from thence vnto Leo Scurus (then a man of great fame among G the Greekes) who tyranniſing at Nauplus, as had his father before him, was in theſe trouble-ſome times growne greater, by ſurpriſing of the two famous cities of Argos and Corinth: by whoſe meanes he cunningly entrapped Alexius Ducas, ſyrnamed Murtzufle, the traitour, and for a ſecret grudge not commonly knowne, put out his eyes: himſelfe an exiled man, being a moſt heauie enemie vnto the other alſo exiled; and himſelfe thruſt out of the Empire, a deadly foe vnto the other, oppreſſed with the like calamitie. Shortly after which loſſe of his ſight he was by chance taken by the Latines, and ſo brought backe to Conſtantinople, where hee was for murdring the yong Emperor Alexius, worthily condemned vnto a ſtrange and horrible kinde of death; for, caſt off from an high tower, and tumbling heeles ouer head downward, hee was with the waight of himſelfe, and violence of the fall, cruſhed all to pieces, and ſo miſerably H died, a death too good for ſuch a traitor. Not long after it fortuned alſo, that Alexius himſelfe wandering vp and down in Thracia, was by the Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, going againſt Scu-rus, taken and ſtript of his great treaſure, and whatſoeuer elſe hee had; and ſo ſent away naked, long time after in beggars eſtate wandred about in Achaia and Peloponeſus, now farre vnlike that Alexius which ſometime proudly raigned in Conſtantinople: but ſuch is the aſſurance of euill gotten honour. He hearing that Theodorus Laſcaris his ſonne in law raigned in Aſia, and there held the ſtate of an Emperour, reioyced not thereat as a kind father in law, but inwardly grieued thereat as an enemie, ſorrie that any other but himſelfe ſhould be honoured with the title of the Greeke Emperour: in which malicious humor he ſailing out of Greece into Aſia ouer the Ægeum, came ſecretly vnto the Turks Sultan Iathatines his old acquaintance, then ly- I ing at Attalia, (which famous citie he had not long before taken from the Chriſtians) vnto whom he declared his heauie eſtate, and how his empire had been rent from him, as well by the Greekes as the Latines; requeſting, that by his meanes hee might be reſtored againe into ſome part thereof, eſpecially that in the leſſer Aſia, which was by Theodorus Laſcaris, together with the honour of the Greeke Emperor, vniuſtly (as he ſaid) detayned from him. This Iathatines, now Sultan of Iconium, was the yonger ſonne of Sultan Aladin; who not long ſuruiuing his father Cai-Choſroe, left his kingdome vnto his two ſonnes Azadin and Iaſſadin, of the Greekes called Azatines and Iathatines: where long it was not, but that theſe two bretheren falling out for the ſoueraigntie, (which admitteth no equalitie) Iathatines was by Azatines his elder brother driuen into exile, and for the ſafegard of his life glad to flie vnto this Alexius, K then raigning at Conſtantinople, by whom he was honorably entertained, and as ſome write, conuerted and baptiſed. But Azatines the Sultan ſhortly after dying, this Iathatines returning home again, and renouncing the Chriſtian Religion, was by the Turks receiued for their Sultan: of whom the Emperour Alexius in like extremitie now craueth aid. The Sultan not forgetfull of his owne troubles before paſſed, or of the kindneſſe he had receiued, and mooued with the pittifull complaint of his old friend, together with his large offers, beſides that hee was in hope to ſhare out ſome good part of whatſoeuer he got, for himſelfe; tooke him into his protection, and forthwith ſent Embaſſadours to Laſcaris, threatning vnto him all extremities, except he did forthwith giue place vnto Alexius his father in law, vnto whom, as vnto the Greeke Emperor, thoſe countries which were by him poſſeſſed, of right (as he ſaid) appertai- L ned. With which vnexpected meſſage Theodorus was not a little troubled, as fearing both the Sultans power, and the inclination of the people to their old Emperor. Neuertheleſſe, hauing propounded the matter in councel, and finding the minds of his ſubiects well affected towards him, & a readines in them in his quarrell to aduenture their liues; he encouraged therewith, accompanied only with two thouſand choice horſemen, together with the Sultans Embaſſador, without farther ſtay ſet forward to Philadelphia: the Sultan at the ſame time with Alexius, (whom he carried with him as a bait to deceiue the people withall) and twentie thouſand Turkes, beſieging the citie of Antioch, ſcituate vpon the winding bankes of the riuer Meander. Which the Emperour Theodorus well vnderſtanding, and that the Sultan by gaining that ſtrong citie (ſtanding vpon the paſſage of the great riuer, the bounder of his Empire) ſhould M open a faire way for himſelfe into the heart of Romania Aſiatica, to the great hazard of his whole Empire, reſolued with thoſe few he had, to doe what he might to relieue his Citie.

And ſo ſetting forward vpon the ſpurre, carrying nothing with him more than a little victu-all; and now come neere vnto the Citie, ſent before the Sultans Embaſſador, following him Antioch beſieged by Iathatines.

A at the heeles. Who comming to the Sultan, and telling him of the Emperors approch with ſo ſmall a power, could hardly perſuade him that it was ſo, although hee bound it with many oathes: yet at length perſuaded of the truth of the matter, and that indeed it was ſo, hee in all haſt put his armie in the beſt order he could vpon ſuch a ſudden, but not to his beſt aduantage, being hindred ſo to do by the ſtraitnes of the place wherein he lay. Of the two thouſand ſelect horſemen in the Emperours armie, were eight hundred Italians, all moſt reſolute men, who giuing the firſt charge, brake through the middeſt of the Sultans army, diſordering his whole battell as they went; after whom followed alſo the Greeks, though not with like courage: but thoſe Italian horſemen now diuided from the reſt, & in number but few, in comming backe again, were by the diſordred Turks, ſome on horſebacke, ſome on foot, ſo beſet on euerie B ſide, as that there was no way left for them to paſſe, but there valiantly fighting, were altogether ſlaine, hauing both before and at the time of their death made ſuch a ſlaughter of the Turkes, as is hardly to be beleeued to haue beene poſſible for ſo few men to haue made. The Greeks alſo hardly laid to by the Turks, and diſcouraged by the ſlaughter of the Latins, were euen vpon the point to haue fled: when as the Sultan, now almoſt in poſſeſſion of a certaine victory, deſcrying the Greeke Emperor, and truſting to his own great ſtrength, ſingled him out, beeing as readie as himſelfe to meet him; when as at the firſt encounter, the Sultan with his horſemans maſe gaue him ſuch a blow vpon the head, as might haue killed a Bull, ſo that the Emperour therewith aſtonied, fell downe from his horſe: who yet euen in the fall comming ſomething againe vnto himſelfe, and although diſmounted, yet quickly recouering his feet, C with his faulchion hoxed the hinder legs of the Mare whereon the Sultan rid, beeing a moſt beautiful beaſt, & of a wonderfull height; which now ſuddenly faultring vnder him, and ſo the Sultan tumbling down as from an high tower, before he could recouer himſelfe, had his head cut off by the Emperor: which by and by put vpon a launce, and ſo holden vp, with the ſight thereof ſo diſmayed the Turks, that ſtrucken with a ſudden feare, they preſently fled, leauing the victorie vnto the Emperour, before more than halfe ouercome: who for all that, conſidering his ſmall number, durſt no further purſue them, but entring the citie, gaue thankes to God for ſo great a victorie. Vnto whom the Turkes ſhortly after ſent their Embaſſadors, and ſo vpon ſuch reaſonable conditions as it pleaſed him to ſet downe, concluded with him a peace.
Alexius himſelfe author of theſe troubles, taken in this battell and carried to Nice, was by the D Emperor his ſonne in law, notwithſtanding his euill deſerts, well intreated and vſed.

Iathatines the Sultan ſlaine by Theodorus Laſcaris the Greek Emperour.

Whileſt the Latins thus ſpend thoſe forces in ſubuerting of the Greek empire, which ſhould haue bin imployed for the reliefe of the Chriſtians in Syria, and that the Greeke Emperour Laſcaris was thus troubled with the Turks, the affairs of the Chriſtians in Syria and the Holy-land grew ſtill worſe and worſe. Whereof the Knights Hoſpitalers and Templars (the chiefe champions of the Chriſtian religion in thoſe countries) greatly blamed Almericus the king of Cyprus, for that he being ſo neere at hand, and hauing married Iſabella the heire of that kingdome, and ſo in her right taken vpon him the title of the King of Ieruſalem, gaue himſelfe wholly to pleaſure, doing nothing for the defence or reliefe of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians, or repreſſing of the Turks: who although they were yet in league with the Chriſtians there, E and at ſome diſcord alſo among themſelues, yet ſpared not as occaſion ſerued, ſtill more and more to encroach vpon them, & by building of new caſtles & fortreſſes to cut them ſhort. Of al which things, the aforeſaid Knights by their embaſſadors certified Pope Innocentius, requeſting his fatherly care for the remedy thereof: certifying him withal, that there was yet liuing one Mary, the daughter of the Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat, a ladie of rare beautie, whom they as her tutors had brought vp in hope of the kingdome, & now were ready to beſtow her vpon ſome ſuch man as he ſhould thinke worthie of her, together with the right ſhe had vnto the kingdome. Hereupon Innocentius diſcharging Almericus of the title of the kingdome of Ieruſalem, gaue it to Iohn Countie de Brenne of Daulphine in France, a man of great fame & valour, then in armes with the other Latine Princes againſt the Greeks. Who now returning home, F commended his earledome to his brother, and with ſuch power as as he was able to make, ſetting forward, came firſt to Venice, where he was royally entertained: and from thence ſailing to Conſtantinople, was with like honour receiued by the Emperor Henry, and ſo at length the fiſt of September arriued at Ptolemais in Syria, where hee was with the great rejoycing and applauſe of the people receiued as their King: And the laſt of the ſame moneth marrying Iohn Brenne by Innocentius the Pope appoynted King of Ieruſalem.

the aforeſaid Ladie Mary at Tyre, was there together with her with a great ſolemnitie crowned G King in the yere 1209. Which Almericus the old King of Cyprus hearing, ſhortly after 1209. died for griefe. Neither wanted this noble gentleman, thus honoured with the title of a Kingdome, ſome that enuied at his promotion, and therefore commonly called him in deriſion, a King, but ſtill with this addition, Sans Ville, that is to ſay, Without a Towne.

Now was the ten yeres peace, before taken betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians in Syria, at the comming ouer of Simon Marqueſſe of Mont-Ferrat (as is before declared) almoſt expired: which had not ſo much giuen to thoſe poore remnants of the Chriſtians ſome time of reſt and breathing, as had the diſcord of the Turks among themſelues; which hauing for the ſpace of nine yeres continued betwixt Noradin and Saphadin for the ſoueraigntie, was now by the death of Saphadin ended. Noradin contenting himſelfe with the gouernement of Aleppo, H and Corradin and Meledin the two ſonnes of Saphadin, diuiding their fathers kingdome betwixt them, the one taking vnto himſelfe Damaſco and Syria, and the other the great kingdome of Ægypt, but all enemies vnto the Chriſtians.

Corradin and Meledin diuide their fathers Kingdome betwixt them.

About this time alſo, or not long after, Innocentius tertius yet Pope, ſummoned a generall Councel to Lateran, whereunto, beſides a multitude of great Biſhops, and other reuerend Prelats, repaired alſo the honorable Embaſſadors of moſt of the Princes of Chriſtendome: vnto whom ſo aſſembled, among other things was propounded the dangerous eſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria, and how the ſame was by the helpe of the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt to be relieued.
Whereunto all the Fathers & Princes there aſſembled eaſily gaue their conſent: and thereupon were ſome appointed in euery countrey and prouince, to publiſh this decree of the I Councel, for the reliefe of the oppreſſed Chriſtians, and to ſtir vp the deuout people for the vndertaking of ſo religious a war. The chiefe furtherers of this ſacred expedition, to bee thus taken in hand againſt the Infidels, were the Biſhops of Germany, eſpecially the three great Biſhops of Mets, Cullen, and Triuers, whoſe example moued alſo many others, all which to rehearſe were tedious. Out of France alſo were ſent Henry the Countie of Niuers, & one Gualter the Kings great Chamberlain, with a great number of the gallant youths of France, and ſo out of diuers other places alſo: ſo that at length ſuch a number of men were met together at diuers ports of the Adriaticke, as made vp a fleet of two hundred ſaile; which with a proſperous wind carried ouer into Syria, arriued in ſafetie at Ptolemais the chiefe citie of the Chriſtians, now that Ieruſalem was loſt. After whom followed alſo Andrew King of Hungary, long K before bound both by his fathers commandement and his owne promiſe, for the vndertaking of that ſacred expedition: with whom came alſo Lewis Duke of Bauaria, and Leopold Duke of Auſtria, with their forces all wel appoynted: vnto whom alſo Iohn King of Ieruſalem ioyned himſelfe with his power. Great hope and expectation there was for ſome great matter to haue been done, now that ſo great forces of the Chriſtians were thus met together. Who ſetting forward from Ptolemais, and the firſt day marching into Galilee, by the way met with certain companies of the Turkes, whom they eaſily ouerthrew and put to flight. The next day they came to the riuer of Iordan, where they alſo diſtreſſed certaine of the Turks garriſons. There the King of Hungarie bathing himſelfe in the riuer, forthwith (as one diſcharged of his vow and promiſe) returned with all his power vnto Ptolemais, and ſo from thence backe again into L his country, all the reſt of the armie of the Chriſtians crying out to him to the contrarie: who after the kings departure ſtill marching on, came to the mount Thabor. But ſhortly after, Winter now comming on, and many of their cattell dying for cold and want of meat, they returned ſome to Ptolemais, ſome to Tyre, and there wintred. King Iohn and the Duke of Auſtria in the mean time tooke a caſtle betwixt Ceſarea and Caipha, called The caſtle of Pilgrims, from whence they much troubled the Barbarians thereabouts all that Winter. Vpon the appearance of the Spring, and the armie againe met together, it was thought beſt by all the great commanders, that for ſo much as the kingdome of Ægypt was the chiefe maintenance of the Mahometan ſuperſtition, againſt the Chriſtians in thoſe parts, and that ſo long as it ſtood vpright, they ſhould not be able to do any great matter in Syria, to attempt the conqueſt thereof, M as an exployt beſt beſeeming their valour, and ſo great preparation: for that that kingdome being once ſubdued, the Citie of Ieruſalem, with all the land of Paleſtine, would of themſelues without more adoo ſtreightway yeeld vnto them. And for as much as the famous Citie of Damiata, called in antient time Peluſium, not much inferiour vnto Alexandria,

A andria, was the firſt and moſt commodious port for their purpoſe, as neereſt vnto Syria; and that by the taking thereof they ſhould haue a faire entrance into the great riuer Nilus, with the command of a moſt rich and pleaſant countrey about it. They reſolued there to begin the war: and thereupon embarking themſelues with all things neceſſary for ſo great an enterpriſe, at Ptolemais, & carried with a faire wind, they in ſhort time arriued at the deſired port. Now that rich and antient citie, the key of that ſide of the kingdome, ſtood about a mile from the ſea, and ſomewhat diſtant alſo from the great riuer, enuironed with a nauigable ditch or Cut, drawn out of the Nile, in manner of an Iſland, as a man commeth from Syria by land, & compaſſed about with three ſtrong ſtone walls, the worke of the good Emperour Ælius Pertinax, and of him (as ſome affirme) called alſo Æliopolis. At the mouth of this cut, as you ſhould en-B ter vnto the citie, ſtood a ſtrong Watch-tower for the defence thereof, and round about it a number of faire houſes, in manner of a pretty town entrenched. Beſide that, for the more ſafetie thereof, the ſame cut was barred with a great ſtrong yron chaine, in ſuch ſort, as that it was not poſſible for any ſhip, without breaking of the ſame to enter. The Chriſtians with their fleet entring the mouth of the riuer, & comming to this cut, by great ſtrength brake the chain:
but thinking ſo to haue made their paſſage vnto the city, they found a greater ſtay at the watch tower, which ſtrongly built of ſquare ſtone, & wel ſtored with warlike engins of all ſorts, and a good garriſon of valiant ſouldiers, ſtayed their further paſſage, ouerwhelming them as they approched, with ſhot, fire, ſtones, timber, and ſuch like, before prouided for that purpoſe.

The ſcituation of Damiata in Ægypt.

The Chriſtians (after the manner of the fight of that time) had vpon certaine flat veſſels built
C certain high towers of wood for the aſſailing of the watch-tower: in the approching wherof, they were not only troubled with the enemie, but with the tumult and ſtir of their owne people alſo; ſome crying that they ſhould yet draw neerer vnto the tower; otherſome crying out as faſt, to haue the bridges caſt out, thereby to enter; and the enemie likewiſe with much clamor encouraging one another for the repulſing of the Chriſtians. So the ſoldiers hindred the mariners to do their buſines, and the mariners the ſoldiers. In the midſt of this hurly-burly & tumult, one of the wooden towers ſurmounting the reſt in height, ouercharged with the preſſe of men, fel, and in falling made ſuch a noiſe, as if heauen it ſelfe had fallen: where in a moment (as it were) was preſently to be ſeen a moſt heauy ſpectacle; many ouerwhelmed with the falling of the tower, lay there cruſhed to death; ſome grieuouſly hurt, & yet not dead, lay oppreſ-D ſed with the timber, crying out for helpe; others bruiſed or hurt, but not ouerwhelmed, for feare of further harme, leapt ſome into the Nile, ſome aboord the other ſhips neere by, ſome crying out of his arm, ſome of his leg, ſome of his head or other part of his bodie, to the great diſcomfiture of the reſt, in ſo much that the aſſault was for that time giuen ouer.

King Iohn (as well for his valour, as for the title of the King of Ieruſalem, choſen Generall of the armie) after he had appeaſed this tumult, and giuen the charge of them that were maimed or hurt, vnto skilfull ſurgeons, and buried the bodies of ſuch as were found drowned or ouerwhelmed, with cheerful ſpeech encouraged the reſt of his ſoldiers, perſuading them not to be diſcouraged with the accident of the fal of a tower, which was neither to be imputed to their cowardiſe, or the valour of the enemie, but only to the chance of warre.

E In the mean time Meledin the Ægyptian Sultan, had with a great armie encamped himſelfe within the ſight of Damiata, thereby to encourage the beſieged, and to fill them with hope of reliefe; ſending them oftentimes by the riuer, newes, meſſages, victuals, ſoldiers, armour, and whatſoeuer elſe they wanted. The chiefe cauſe of his ſtaying there, was to take occaſion for the ſurpriſing of the Chriſtians, if any ſhould bee offred, either by chance, or their owne negligence. Euery day ſome skirmiſh or other paſſed betwixt our men and the Barbarians, ours ſtill carrying away the victorie: yet could theſe Barbarians neither be drawn forth to battell, neither could our men keep them from victuals, for as much as they had the riuer of Nile at command, whereby victualls were out of the vpper part of Ægypt in great aboundance conueigh-ed into the Sultans campe: whereas on the contrary part, the ſame riuer diuiding it ſelfe into F many armes, in ſome places here and there ouerflowing, in another cut into many ditches and channels, and in ſome other pent vp by walls and cauſies, gaue vnto our men a thouſand diſ-pleaſures. And therfore ſeeing that the Sultan would neither giue nor accept of battel, they re-ſolued againe to lay ſiege to the tower. Wherefore hauing with great cunning, vpon two ſhips made faſt together, framed a Tower of moſt ſtrong timber, equall in height vnto the Watch-

B vnto the citie,ſtood a ſtrong Watch-tower for the defence thereof, and round about it a number of faire houſes,in manner of a pretty town entrenched. Beſide that,for the more ſafetie thereof,the ſame cut was barred with a great ſtrong yron chaine, in ſuch ſort,as that it was not poſſible for any ſhip, without breaking of the ſame to enter. The Chriſtians with their fleet entring the mouth of the riuer,& comming to this cut,by great ſtrength brake the chain:
a good garriſon of valiant ſouldiers,ſtayed their further paſſage, ouerwhelming them as they
approched,with ſhot,fire,ſtones,timber,and ſuch like,before prouided for that purpoſe.

The ſcituation of Damiata in Ægypt.

C certain high towers of wood for the aſſailing of the watch-tower: in the approching wherof, they were not only troubled with the enemie,but with the tumult and ſtir of their owne people alſo; ſome crying that they ſhould yet draw neerer vnto the tower; otherſome crying out as faſt,to haue the bridges caſt out,thereby to enter; and the enemie likewiſe with much clamor encouraging one another for the repulſing of the Chriſtians. So the ſoldiers hindred the mariners to do their buſines,and the mariners the ſoldiers. In the midſt of this hurly-burly &
tumult,one of the wooden towers ſurmounting the reſt in height,ouercharged with the preſſe
of men,fel,and in falling made ſuch a noiſe,as if heauen it ſelfe had fallen: where in a moment (as it were)was preſently to be ſeen a moſt heauy ſpectacle; many ouerwhelmed with the falling of the tower,lay there cruſhed to death; ſome grieuouſly hurt,& yet not dead,lay oppreſſed D with the timber, crying out for helpe; others bruiſed or hurt, but not ouerwhelmed, for feare of further harme,leapt ſome into the Nile, ſome aboord the other ſhips neere by, ſome crying out of his arm,ſome of his leg,ſome of his head or other part of his bodie,to the great diſcomfiture of the reſt,in ſo much that the aſſault was for that time giuen ouer.

of the armie) after he had appeaſed this tumult, and giuen the charge of them that were maimed or hurt,vnto skilfull ſurgeons,and buried the bodies of ſuch as were found drowned or ouerwhelmed; with cheerful ſpeech encouraged the reſt of his ſoldiers,perſuading them not to be diſcouraged with the accident of the fal of a tower,which was neither to be imputed to their cowardiſe,or the valour of the enemie,but only to the chance of warre.

within the ſight of Damiata,thereby to encourage the beſieged,and to fill them with hope of reliefe; ſending them oftentimes by the riuer, newes, meſſages, victuals, ſoldiers, armour, and whatſoeuer elſe they wanted. The chiefe cauſe of his ſtaying there, was to take occaſion for the ſurpriſing of the Chriſtians,if any ſhould bee offred,either by chance, or their owne negligence.
Euery day ſome skirmiſh or other paſſed betwixt our men and the Barbarians, ours ſtill carrying away the victorie: yet could theſe Barbarians neither be drawn forth to battell, neither could our men keep them from victuals,foraſmuch as they had the riuer of Nile at command, whereby victualls were out of the vpper part of Ægypt in great aboundance conueighed into the Sultans campe: whereas on the contrary part, the ſame riuer diuiding it ſelfe into F many armes,in ſome places here and there ouerflowing, in another cut into many ditches and channels, and in ſome other pent vp by walls and cauſies, gaue vnto our men a thouſand diſpleaſures.
And therfore ſeeing that the Sultan would neither giue nor accept of battel,they reſolued againe to lay ſiege to the tower. Wherefore hauing with great cunning, vpon two ſhips made faſt together, framed a Tower of moſt ſtrong timber, equall in height vnto the Watchtower, they brought the ſame neere vnto the Turks tower, & the ſuburbs adioining thereun- G to, after which followed alſo the reſt of the fleet well appointed for the aſſault. At which time all the reſt of the armie at land ſtood in battell readie ranged, as well to diſcourage them of the town, as that the Sultan ſhould not be able to helpe them without the hazarding of battel.

There began a fierce and cruell aſſault; they of the ſuburbes right valiantly defending themſelues againſt their enemies. Within theſe ſuburbs, the tower, and the trenches, dwelt not only Ægyptians, (the naturall inhabitants of the countrey) but alſo Arabians, Perſians, Syrians, Indians, Moores, and Æthyopians, who were there reſiant; for that, that citie was a publique mart whereunto all kind of merchandiſe were brought from farre out of the remoteſt parts of the world, and ſo from thence in like manner tranſported alſo: which encouraged them the more to fight for the defence of their liues and goods, the two things which men hold moſt H deare: and in like ſort animated our men vnto the aſſault, as well in the quarrell of the Chriſtian religion, as to inrich themſelues with the ſpoile of thoſe rich nations. The Chriſtians with their ſhips drew as neere as poſſibly they could vnto the land, to the intent that vpon the bank of the riuer they might come to fight hand to hand, and man to man, and ſo come cloſe vnto their enemies. But the Barbarians on the other ſide fought by ſhot and all other meanes they could, to keepe them further off, and ſo from landing.

A deſperat act of a Chriſtian.

That which moſt feared the Ægyptians, was, that as one of our ſhips by chance ran a ground vpon that ſide of the riuer where the enemy lay, and being boorded by the enemie, thronging in as faſt as he could, and there making a cruell ſlaughter, one of the Chriſtian ſouldiers going down vnder the hatches, made there a great hole, whereby the water abundantly comming in, I ſunke the ſhip before the enemie was aware, and ſo drowned a great number of the Ægyptians together with the Chriſtians. At which time alſo the high Tower built vpon the two ſhips, ioyning now cloſe vnto the watch-tower, and mating the ſame, diſmaied the defendants with the ſtrangeneſſe thereof, as with a miracle, in ſuch ſort, that they ſtrucken with a great feare, as now being to fight with a ſtrange, hardie, and cruell kind of men, without any great reſiſtance forſooke the tower and fled. The watch-tower thus taken, and they that ſhould haue defended the ſame, ſome ſlaine, and ſome fled; they in the ſuburbs diſcouraged, and flying away, were many of them wounded from aboue, out of the watch-tower but now gained by the Chriſti-ans. At which time alſo the other ſhips landed the ſouldiers, who entring the ſuburbs, put all they found there to the ſword, euen vnto the laſt man. There was found great abundance of K victuals, but far greater ſtore of riches, in ſo much that it ſeemed to haue bin the ſpoyle of Arabia, Perſia, and the rich Indies.

Damiata in vain aſſaulted.

Now yet remained the ſtrong towne of Damiata, which was forthwith aſſaulted by the Chriſtians, more to proue if in that heat and ſudden feare it would bee yeelded, than for any hope they had by force to win it. But hauing done what they could both by ſcaling, and by other engins, they gained nothing but hard blowes and wounds, & ſo retyred. Neuertheleſſe they lodged themſelues in the ſuburbs, and layd a great part of the armie betwixt the Sultan and the beſieged citie, to the intent that no ſupplie of victuals ſhould be brought vnto it, yet both the enemie oftentimes attempted to haue entred the citie, and the beſieged to haue ſal-lied out, but both the one and the other were letted to doe what they would haue done, & that L not without the great loſſe of their men: for why, the town was now on euery ſide ſo incloſed by the Chriſtians, as that no man could enter in or out thereof. Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege, it fortuned that the riuer of Niſe ſwelling with a great Eaſterne winde, riſe aboue the banks, & ſo ouerflowed the places wherein the Chriſtians lay, that they could keep nothing drie, and that moſt part of their victuals were therewith ſpoyled. With which vnſea-ſonable riſing of the riuer, the Chriſtians not a little troubled, by commandement of Pelagius the Popes Legate, gaue themſelues to faſting and prayer by the ſpace of three dayes. But the wind falling the fourth day, and the riuer againe decreaſing, they gaue themſelues more ear-neſtly to prayer than before, thanking the Almightie, that as he had put them in a great feare, ſo he had in mercie againe comforted them.

Now with long lying began victuals to grow ſcant in the Sultans campe, ſo that hee was M glad to ſend away halfe of his armie vp againe into the countrey of Caire. At which time alſo it chanced (as if it had beene in an extreame and common danger of the Mahometan ſuperſtition) that Embaſſadours ſent from Corradin Sultan of Damaſco and Ieruſalem, vnto the

A Princes of the Chriſtian armie, came to ſue for peace, both for himſelfe and his brother the Ægyptian Sultan; promiſing in regard thereof againe to reſtore vnto them the Holy Croſſe, and whatſoeuer els himſelf, his father, or Sultan Saladin had before taken from them: of which their offer, moſt part of the army liked wel, ſaying, That they had therefore taken vp arms for the recouerie of that which had been before gotten, and gained by the valour of the worthie Chriſtian captains, and had of late beene taken from them; and to blot out the ignominy of the loſſe therof, to the end it ſhould not be ſaid, that they could not leaue whole and entire vnto their children, what their fathers had got, when they had the keeping thereof; neither hauing loſt it, be able again to recouer it: that al theſe things being reſtored, there reſted not any further occaſion of war, or let to ſtay them as moſt victorious conquerours to returne home. B Neuertheles Pelagius, Pope Honorius his Legat (for Innocentius in the preparation of the wars was before dead at Peluſium) with king Iohn, the Maſters of the knights Hoſpitalers and Templars, the Duke of Auſtria, and the Germaines, were of opinion to the contrary: aleadging, That this ſacred warre was vndertaken generally againſt the Infidels, and for religions ſake againſt the Mahometan ſuperſtition, whereof the kingdome of Ægypt was the chiefe ſeat and ſtay; and that therefore they ought eſpecially to impugne that. Which perſuaſion, together with the authoritie of the perſuaders, ſo preuailed, that the Sultans large offers were reiected, and ſo the embaſſadors diſpatched without any thing obtained of that they came for. Whereupon Corradin fearing that the Chriſtians would at length come to Ieruſalem, as the place they moſt deſired; and doubting how hee ſhould bee able to defend the ſame, forthwith raſed the C wals thereof, and the more to deface it, ouerthrew and pluckt downe moſt of the goodly houſes, and other ſtately buildings therin, ſparing yet the tower of Dauid, and the holy Sepulchre; which he is ſaid to haue done at the humble requeſt and interceſſion of the Chriſtians of diuers countries, which yet dwelt there mixt with the Turks and Saraſins.

Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Damiata, the plague began to ariſe in the campe, whereof ſo many died, that it began to repent the great commanders of the armie that they had ſo much hearkened to the perſuaſion of the Legate (a man making no profeſſion of arms) rather than to the ſound aduice of others, who by long experience taught the ſudden alteration of matters of war, would willingly haue accepted of the Sultans large offers: ſo began Pelagius the Legat to be generally euill ſpoken of. There were now already ſix moneths paſt D ſince the beginning of the ſiege, and the Sultan lying in ſight had not with him ſo great an army as before, but only the flower and choice of his people, hauing (as we haue before ſaid) for want of victuals ſent away the reſt vp again into the country: now it fortuned that the Chriſtians, as men weary of the long ſiege, ſtood not ſo carefully vpon their guard, with watch and ward, as before, but gaue themſelues more to eaſe: which the Sultan perceiuing, drew nerer to the town, in hope vnder the couert of the ſilent night, to ſend new ſupplies vnto the beſieged; which companies by him appointed for that ſeruice, couragiouſly ſet forward, in hope to haue deceiued the Chriſtian ſentinels, & ſo indeed came neer vnto the town vnſeen or diſcouered; and now the foremoſt of thoſe companies were already entred the town; when the Chriſtians perceiuing them, & raſing an alarme, put themſelues in arms, and ſo furiouſly aſſailed the E hindermoſt of them, and in ſuch ſort, that they which were before within, & thoſe that were but now entred, fearing leſt the enemie in that hurly burly ſhould pell mell enter in with the reſt, ſhut them out of the gates, expoſed to the butcherie, where all were preſently cut in peeces.

Succours ſent vnto the beſieged.

The Chriſtians encouraged with this victory, the next day leauing a great part of the army before the town to continue the ſiege, preſented themſelues before the Sultans camp to giue him battell: who for all that well conſidering that the loſſe of a battell might endanger the whole ſtate of his kingdome, would by no meanes be drawne out of his trenches, but lay ſtill; wherewith the Chriſtians, eſpecially the French men (in the firſt charge naturally furious) greatly encouraged, attempted to haue forcibly entred their rampiers, but not with ſucceſſe anſwerable to their courage. For the Ægiptians perceiuing the ſmal number of their enemies, F notably repulſed them, & in fine inforced them to retire, hauing loſt Gualter one of their chiefe commanders, with diuers others: yea King Iohn in aſſailing the campe, loſt many of his men, and grieuouſly burnt in his face, hardly eſcaped himſelfe with life. After which diſcomfiture, they reſolued, not to thinke of any thing elſe but of the ſiege, and aboue all things to prouide that no ſuccours ſhould be brought into the towne. They in the citie more ſtraitly beſet and beſieged than before,and now brought vnto extream neceſſitie and famine,and out of al hope G of reliefe,aſſembled themſelues to conſult of their affaires,and what were beſt for them to do in ſo dangerous a ſtate: ſome one or other of them by night or otherwiſe ſecretly flying into the camp. And that more was,the citie had vndoubtedly bin yeelded by the greatet part,had not the chiefe commanders within mured vp the gates,and commanded that none of the inhabitants vpon paine of death ſhould come vpon the wals,or rampiers,to the intent they ſhould not get out,or caſt themſelues from aboue ouer the wals into the ditches. The chiefe commanders and captains went here and there vp and down the city,to ſearch and view al things, eſpecially the ſhops and ſtorehouſes, where finding ſmall ſtore of wheat, they diuided it in ſmall portions among themſelues: the common people enforced with want, eat whatſoeuer came to hand,were it lawfull or vnlawfnll or forbidden by their ſuperſtition,wholſom or vnwholeſome, H good or bad,ſalt or freſh,roaſted or raw; and ſo prolonged their liues with ſuch things as they could find. Now the beſieged, not able to indure theſe extreamities of the famine (being the paſſion that moſt grieuouſly and often troubleth mankind) they were alſo attached with the wrath of God: for the plague(the fury wherof had before attainted the camp of the Chriſtians,and afterward quite ceaſed)was now got into the city,where it made a great ſlaughter: which mortalitie day by day in ſuch ſort increaſed,that men were not only now no more to be found,to viſit,comfort,ſuccour, ſerue, and help the ſicke; but were wanting alſo to burie them,to draw them out of their beds and houſes,and to ſeperate the liuing from the dead: the ſtreets and houſes full of dead bodies,gaue forth a moſt horrible ſtinke,with a moſt grieuous and infectious aire: there was not any place cleare from the plague, or any man that I could boaſt hee had not bin attainted therewith,or the feare thereof; and remedie was there none. The rage and furie of theſe two deuourers,the famine,and plague,deuoured them without number,chuſing rather ſo to dy,than to ſubmit themſelues vnto their enemies;or to humble themſelues ſo low, as to craue their fauour. That they within were thus pinched with famine, the Chriſtians knew: but that the plague ſo raged amongſt them,they knew not. Now the Chriſtians had of purpoſe caſt vp certain trenches and baricadoes, for the keeping in of ſuch as the famin ſhould enforce to come out of the town; thinking that the beſieged,to eaſe their wants,would thruſt the baſer ſort of the people & vnprofitable mouths out of the city; vnto whom the Chriſtians meant not to giue any paſſage:for they hauing long before ſo ſtraitly enuironed the citie,as that no reliefe could be brought vnto it,lay now ſtil expecting when K the beſieged,enforced by neceſſity,ſhould yeeld themſelues;and ſo without loſſe of any man, to become maſters of ſo ſtrong and rich a towne. It was now more than a yeare that the Chriſtians had thus lien at the ſiege of Damiata, when as certaine of the ſouldiers vpon a brauerie aduentured with a few ſcaling ladders to mount the wal:in which doing,finding no reſiſtance, and withall hearing ſo great ſilence, as if there had bin no bodie within the citie,they ſtood ſtill a great while hearkening,but ſeeing that dumbe ſilence ſtil to continue,they returned vnto the camp,giuing the captains to vnderſtand how the matter ſtood;who at the firſt thought it to bee ſome policie and fineneſſe of the deceitfull enemie: yet afterward they thought it good to aduenture certaine men, to proue their fortune, and to cauſe certaine companies well appointed to ſcale one of the bulwarkes of the citie, in ſuch ſort, as if they ſhould haue L gone againſt a puiſſant enemy,that had had the power to reſiſt them. And hereupon were ſcaling ladders brought forth, and all things made ready, as for a great aſſault. So the Chriſtians couragiouſly mounting the ladders, without reſiſtance tooke the bulwarke. But as they were entring farther into the towne,a ſmal company of the Turks and Barbarians (all the ſouldiers that the furie of the plague had left,and they alſo with the famine & infection of the aire very weake and feeble) met them,and began to make ſome ſmal reſiſtance,but to no purpoſe,being forthwith al cut in pieces. Which done,the matter wherewith the gates of the city were mured, was preſently remoued,the gates ſet open, & the Chriſtians with enſignes diſplaied let in.

But euen at the very entring in at the gates,they were attainted with a moſt grieuous and horrible ſtinke,they ſaw a faire city diſpeopled,and that which was moſt fearefull to behold,the M ſtreets couered with bodies of the dead,and ſuch a dreadfull deſolation, as might moue euen the enemy himſelf to compaſſion. The Chriſtians were entred,as men appointed to haue done a great execution,and to haue made the channels run with bloud,as men iuſtly prouoked with the long ſiege,and the paines they had endured; they had their ſwords and weapons in their hands,

Damiata without reſiſtance taken by the Chriſtians.

Damiata vnpeopled by the plague.

A hands, but found none againſt whom to vſe them: for a man could not enter into any houſe, or goe into any ſtreet, but he muſt paſſe ouer the dead, or others which being not yet altogether dead, were miſerably drawing toward their end. Of ſeuentie thouſand perſons in the citie, were not found aboue three thouſand aliue, and thoſe for the moſt part yet yong children: for all the reſt were dead, taken away either with the ſword, famine or the plague; the greateſt part whereof lay yet ſtinking aboue the ground vnburied. Theſe three thouſand that were left, were ſo maigre and poore, that pitie it was to behold them: vnto whom their liues were granted, vpon condition that they ſhould make clean the city, and burie the dead, which they were three moneths in doing.

Thus was Damiata taken by the Chriſtians the fift day of Nouember, in the yeare 1221, after B it had beene more than a yeare by them beſieged. The ſpoile there taken was great, for beſides the rich marchandiſe brought thither from farre, was found great ſtore of gold, ſiluer, and precious ſtones. The Chriſtians thus enriched, and the citie made clean, ſtaied there more than a yeare after, as in a Colonie wherein they had beene willing to dwell, forgetfull of their owne country. In the beginning of theſe wars, the Princes of the army had with one conſent agreed, That whatſoeuer citie or territorie ſhould by them be taken from the Turkes or Infidels, ſhould bee giuen vnto the King of Ieruſalem, whom after the departure of the King of Hungarie, they had made Generall of the whole armie. But now that the citie was taken, Pelagius the legat, pretending, That by the vertue of his legation, it belonged vnto him to diſpoſe of all things taken in that ſacred war, (as a man not vnmindfull of his maſter) adiudged the citie C from thenceforth to belong vnto the See of Rome. With which indignitie and wrong, the King inwardly diſcontented, (and yet for the authoritie of the Legat, diſſembling the matter) withdrew himſelfe, and ſo retired to Ptolemais.

The yere following, Pelagius wearie to ſee the armes of the Chriſtians to corrupt with ruſt, and nothing doing, conſidering the deſire and hope hee had vtterly to haue ruinated the Infidels, together with their ſuperſtition, commanded, That euery man ſhould again take vp arms for the proſecuting of this war againſt the Sultan, and the beſieging of Caire. But for all that, when he had commanded what he would, or could, the ſoldiers little regarding his command with one voice cryed out, that they would not be commanded by any, but by the King of Ieruſalem only. So that the Legat, enforced by the ſouldiers, was glad to ſend vnto the King, to D requeſt him againe to returne vnto Damiata, and to take vpon him the charge for the managing of that war, taken in hand for the defence of the Chriſtian Religion: who for all that excuſed himſelfe from ſo doing, one while by his owne particular affaires, another while by his owne indiſpoſition: yet in fine, preſſed and ouercome with the praiers and requeſts of the other Latine Princes, he returned to Damiata, at the ſelfe ſame time, that the Duke of Bauaria arriued there with a goodly companie of braue men, brought thither out of his owne countrey, after he had beene now from thence ten moneths abſent.

Pelagius the Legat perſwadeth the Princes of the Chriſtian armie to proceed for the conqueſt of Aegypt.

The Legat deſirous of the proſecution of this war, requeſted and vrged the King, with the reſt of the Princes & great commanders, without delay to take the field, telling them, that the enterpriſe of the holy war was growne old, and cold, by thoſe long delaies and protracting of E the time: and that they which kept wars ſo far from home, ought to make haſt to force the enemie, to take all occaſions, to loſe no time, but euer to be doing, and to proue all things for the annoying of the enemy: and that that was the way, whereby the Worthies of antient times, both Kings and Emperors, had gained vnto themſelues empires, glory, greatnes, and wealth: That it was for them that were inuaded and aſſailed, vpon whoſe liues depended the ſafety of their country, their wiues, their children, & goods, to delay & prolong the time as they might to delude the enemy, to fruſtrate his deſignes, to defeat his attempts, and with delaies to dally him off, vntil that hauing therby weakned his forces, he ſhould together with his courage loſe alſo his hope: Caire (he ſaid) to be indeed a great city, but yet that the greateſt cities that euer were, had by the wars become great deſarts, forced by the power of their puiſſant and ſpeedy F enemies: & that great empires, as were thoſe of the Sultans, ought not to be inuaded or aſſailed by any forrain force, if they were not at the firſt onſet, ouerthrown, or at leaſt ſo weakned, as that they could not afterwards lift vp their heads or recouer themſelues; for otherwiſe, that they which had prepared a deſtruction for others, ſhould fall into the ſame themſelues: That it behooued either not to haue attempted or aſſailed Ægipt at al; or els now, after it had bin once aſſailed,not ſo to giue it ouer before it were conquered. The King of Ieruſalem,whether G it were that he were pricked with the griefe, that being called the King of the holy land, hee could not haue the citie of Damiata (vnder the leading and conduct won by the Chriſtians come to the ſacred war) giuen vnto him by the Legate; or that he had before proued that the higher country of Ægypt was not without great and manifeſt danger to be attempted; ſayd, that he would not in any caſe goe: alleaging that honorable and ſacred war to haue bin taken in hand,onely for the recouerie of the holy Land,and not for the winning of Memphis,Babylon, or Thebes in Ægypt; which after they were taken,would not for any long time continue in their fidelitie or allegeance,and could not poſſibly be kept by force:whereas Syria,by Godfrey of Bullion and the other great princes his aſſociats,entred into,conquered and poſſeſſed; and ſince his time,by diuers other Chriſtian Kings & Princes holden,was in right their own: H and that therefore he greatly commended the forwardnes,the diligence,the courage,the deſire, and whatſoeuer thing elſe Pelagius commended: but that he ought to employ the ſame in Syria,and not there where no need was, or from whence no profit was to be drawne or expected.

Neuertheleſſe the Legat wedded to his owne opinion, by the power of his authoritie, commanded the King of Ieruſalem, the Duke of Bauaria,with the reſt of the great commanders and captains,to take vp their armes,to get them into the field vpon the expidition by him appointed againſt the Sultan; threatning the paine of the high ſentence of excommunication againſt him or them,that would ſhew themſelues backward or vnwilling to doe what he had commanded. So as it were enforced by the Legat,they began with euill wil and worſe ſpeed, to ſet forward in Auguſt, in the very hotteſt time of the yeere. At which time the Sultan beholding I the great armie of the Chriſtians,in number about ſeuentie thouſand,retired as a man afraid,into ſuch places as hee thought beſt,farther off: which the Legat ſeeing (as one not acquainted with the feats of war (reioyced greatly,as if the victorie had bin already more than halfe gained; commending to the heauens them that he ſaw couragiouſly marching forward, ſaying, That fortune alwaies fauoured the valiant,and that vnto cowards all things fell ſtil out to the worſt. By the way the Chriſtians ſeized vpon a bridge,which the enemie had made ouer the Nile,and cut in pieces ſuch companies as were left for the keeping therof: ſo marching on they drew neere vnto Caire, and there in the ſight of that great and rich citie encamped: where running vp and down, the more to terrifie them of the citie, prouoked them to battell, vpraiding vnto them their lazines,their cowardiſe and ſloth,brauing them (if they were men) K to come out: Yet for all that they would not ſo doe,but keeping themſelues cloſe and couert within the citie, let them alone to brag & boaſt at their owne pleaſure. This ſiege continued long, of purpoſe protracted ſtill from day to day by them of the citie: and the great opinion of the Chriſtians had of their owne valour, with the ſmall regard they had of their enemies, made them ſo proud and careles, that they remembred no more to take good care of the war, of their dutie, their watch, or their ſentinels: their confidence was in their owne valour and good fortune,not conſidering or remembring that they were come into Ægypt,and that they had put themſelues within the trenches, ſallies, channels and cuts, of a deceitfull riuer,which not only brought victuals vnto their enemies,but alſo fortified them; who by how much they were the leſſe valiant,and leſſe vnderſtood of the art of war,the more they vſed of craft & ſubtilty L for the preſeruing of themſelues:ſo the crafty enemies drew the Chriſtians out at length, abuſing them with many delaies and deceits; making ſemblance of great feare,to make themſelues the leſſe to be feared;& more contemptible in their doings,to the end that they knowing the paſſages and ſtraights of the country,and reſeruing themſelues vnto the occaſions and aduantages both of the time, & of their enemies, might circumuent them and entrap them at ſuch time as they leaſt feared any ſuch matter. The Chriſtians,at all aduenture had encamped themſelues in a low ground,within the banks and cauſies of that fenny country,vnder the couert therof, thinking themſelues ſafe as in their trenches, againſt al ſudden ſallies or attempts of their enemies:but theſe places wherin they lay, were ſoft & durty,for ſo much as the country people vſed at their pleaſure to water them by channels & ſluces out of the riuer of Nile: M which now pluckt vp and opened,the riuer began to riſe and ouerflow all. Then too late they perceiued themſelues taken as in a grin, without power to defend themſelues, or to make any reſiſtance,or by any other means to ſhew their valor. So the riuer ſtil ariſing and ouerflowing gaue vnto the Turkes and Ægiptians good hope of their wars, and of a victorie more deſired

The Chriſtians entrapped within the ſluces of the riuer Nile.

A than hoped for ouer a warlike and victorious people. All the ground where the Chriſtians lay encamped, was couered with water, ſo high that the victuals were corrupted, and no place left for a man to ſtand or lie drie in.

Now at the ſame time the Ægyptians had taken the high places, with the paſſages vpon the wals and banks in that drowned countrey, to the intent that the Chriſtians ſhould not be able to retire or to ſaue themſelues out of the bogs and mariſhes couered ouer with water. So was their raſh valour and preſumptuous confidence in themſelues, expoſed vnto the enemies ſhot and furie; and when they would by force haue defended themſelues, their hardineſſe was ouercome by the craftie ſubtilitie of the weake enemie. Then began euery man to crie out againſt Pelagius the Legat, accuſing, condemning, and railing at him: the King himſelfe they B blamed not, for that he had done his dutie, in diſſuading of this expedition, and was contrary to his good liking himſelfe drawn into this war, the charge whereof he had not without great intreatie taken vpon him: neither might he with his credit wel complaine of this misfortune, leſt in ſo doing, hee might ſeeme to haue had no comfort in himſelfe. But as for the Legate, what counſell could hee then giue, what counſell could he then take for himſelfe? They of Venice, Piſa, and Genoa, left at Damiata, were indeed ſtrong at ſea, but how could they come to relieue him at Caire? And how, or by what forces could the Chriſtians breake out of the banks & ſluces of the cuts & channels, which winding in and out with a thouſand inextricable turnings incloſed them, beſet alſo on euery ſide with the victorious enemie? After they had bin thus coupt vp, and enuironed with the waters three dayes, you might haue ſeene the C poore ſoldiers in euery place fall downe dead for want of food and ſleep, and ſo periſh in the water; the like miſerable kind of death, the reſt were alſo in ſhort time after to expect: other helpe was there none, but to yeeld vnto neceſſitie, and to accept of ſuch conditions as it ſhould pleaſe the proud enemie to propound. Now the Sultan deſired not ſo much their liues, as the liberty of his country, and therfore required to haue the citie of Damiata again reſtored vnto him, & all things els in ſuch ſort as were before the beſieging thereof: and ſo the Chriſtians without more adoe to depart his country. Hard conditions if a man reſpect the hope whereupon the Chriſtians had vndertaken this war, & were ſo come into Egypt, with the toile there by them endured: but vnto him that wil but enter into conſideration of mens affairs, and eſpecially in martiall matters, it wil ſeem but an accident to be yeelded vnto, the like wherof hath D oftentimes hapned vnto the greateſt men of the world. Theſe conditions (ſuch as they were) were by the diſtreſſed Chriſtians accepted of. But when they were brought to Damiata, and there propounded to the Chriſtians there left, a great contention began to ariſe among them: ſome ſaid they would not accept of them, or ſurrender the towne, which beeing kept would be a ſtay for al the affairs of the Chriſtians in the Eaſt, and a moſt commodious place for them to haue recourſe vnto; but being reſtored and loſt, carried away with it all the hope of the Chriſtians, and that therfore it were better to indure al extremities, than to receiue ſuch diſhonorable and hurtfull a peace. Others of the contrary opinion ſaid, That they ought not to forſake them that were in danger before Caire, nor to expoſe them to the butcherie, but to haue a Chriſtian compaſſion of ſo many thouſands of ſoules as there lay diſtreſſed, ſeeing they E might be ſaued by the ſurrendrie of that one town: Towns (they ſaid) conſiſted of the number of men, and not men of the incloſures of wals and ditches. They that were of this opinion, for the deliuering vp of the town, ſeeing the other obſtinatly ſet down to the contrary, withdrawing themſelues from the counſel, preſently tooke vp armes, & by force entred the houſes of them that were of contrary opinion, and took from them their weapons, by that means & perforce to conſtrain them to yeeld to their deſire. As ſoon as they that lay before Caire (almoſt drowned in the waters) vnderſtood of this diſſention at Damiata about the deliuery of the town, they ſent them word, that if they would not yeeld the towne to the Sultan, they would forthwith ſend to Ptolemais, which would not faile to doe what ſhould be commanded, to haue it in ſtead of Damiata ſurrendred to the Egiptians. So was Damiata again yeelded to the F Infidels, and ſo great labors of the Chriſtians taken at the ſiege & winning therof, all loſt. That which made this indignity more tollerable, was that Sultan Meladin, hauing without bloudſhed gain'd ſo great a victory, did neither by word or deed any thing in diſpight or reproch of the Chriſtians, but vſed them with al courteſie, relieuing them alſo with victuals & ſuch other things as they wanted, and by faithfull guides conducting them in ſafetie out of the country.

The miſerie of the Chriſtians in the drowned land.

In like manner alſo, Corradin his brother, Sultan of Damaſco, made truce with the Latines G for eight yeares. Wherupon the King of Ieruſalem went ouer into Italie, and there by the perſuaſion of Honorius the Pope, his wife being now dead, gaue his daughter Yoland (now crowned Queene of Ieruſalem in the right of her mother) in marriage to Frederick King of Sicilia, and Emperor of the Latines, the rather thereby to ſtirre him vp for the taking in hand of the ſacred warre. Euer ſince which time, hee and the Kings of Sicilia his ſucceſſors haue beene called Kings of Ieruſalem, albeit that they haue euill proſecuted that their pretended right and title, as ſtill buſied in more prophane warres againſt other Chriſtian Princes. King Iohn afterwards departing from Rome for France, was by the way honourably entertained at Piſa: but arriuing at the French court, he found Philip the French King deſperately ſicke, who by his laſt will and teſtament gaue vnto the Knights Hoſpitalers and Templars, ſixtie thouſand H crownes for the maintenance of their warres againſt the Infidels; which money was to their vſe afterward payd vnto King Iohn. Who ſhortly after to diſcharge himſelfe of a vow he had made, to viſit the pilgrimage at Compoſtella, going into Spaine, by the way married Berengaria, the King of Caſtile his daughter: and there ſtaying a great while, returned againe into France, where he lay long expecting the ſetting forward of the Emperor Fredericks ſon in law for the recouerie of his wiues right to the kingdom of Ieruſalem; which although he ſolemnly vowed at ſuch time as he with all princely magnificence married the ſaid Lady at Rome, yet otherwiſe letted with troubles neerer home, performed not the ſame, vntill almoſt ſeuen yeares after: all which time the Chriſtians in Syria enioying the fruit of the late concluded peace for eight yeares, liued in great reſt and quietneſſe; where ſo leauing them, vntill the ariſing of new troubles, let vs in the meane time returne againe vnto the troubled affaires of the I Turkes, Greekes, and Latines, at Conſtantinople, and in the leſſer Aſia.

The death of Henry Emperour of Conſtantinople.

Peter Emperor.

Robert Emperour of Conſtantinople.

An horrible outrage committed vpon the perſon of an Empreſſe.

Henrie the ſecond Emperour of the Latines at Conſtantinople, after he had (as is aforeſayd) with much adoe repreſſed the furie of the Bulgarians and Scythes, his barbarous enemies, and ſo giuen peace to the miſerable countrey of Thracia, died, hauing raigned a moſt troubleſome raigne, about the ſpace of eleuen yeres. After whom ſucceeded Peter, Countie of Auſſerre, his ſonne in law, third Emperour of the Latines in Conſtantinople: who in the beginning of his empire, willing to gratifie the Venetians, and to reuenge himſelfe of Theodorus Angelus, a great Prince of Epirus, competitor of his empire, beſieged him in Dirrachium, which ſtrong citie, the ſaid Theodorus had but a little before ſurpriſed, belonging vnto the Venetian ſeigniorie. At which ſiege, Peter the Emperour lying, was ſo cunningly by the wilie Greeke vſed, K that a peace was vpon moſt honorable conditions betwixt them concluded, & a familiar kind of friendſhip ioined. Inſomuch that the Emperour at his requeſt, not well aduiſed, came vnto him as his gueſt: who now of his enemy became his hoſt, entertaining him with al the formalities that faigned friendſhip could deuiſe. But hauing him now in his power, and fearing no harm, regarding neither the lawes of fidelitie or hoſpitalitie, he moſt traiterouſly ſlew him, as he was yet in the middeſt of his banquet. Of whoſe end, ſome others yet otherwiſe report, as that he ſhould by the ſame Theodorus haue bin intercepted about the pleaſant woods of Tempe in Theſſalia, as he was trauelling from Rome to Conſtantinople, and ſo afterwards to haue bin by him cruelly put to death. Of whoſe misfortune, Tepulus gouernour of Conſtantinople L vnderſtanding, for the more ſafetie of the ſtate in that vacancie of the Greeke empire, made peace with Theodorus for fiue yeares, and the Turks for two. Shortly after came Robert (the ſon of the aforeſayd vnfortunate Emperour Peter) with his mother to Conſtantinople, and there in his fathers ſtead was ſolemnly ſaluted Emperor; but not with much better lucke than was his father before him: for ſhortly after his comming he tooke to wife a faire young Lady, the daughter of a great rich and noble Matron of the citie, but before betrothed vnto a gallant gentleman, a Burgundian born; with whom the old Lady broke her promiſe, and more carefull of her daughters preferment, than fidelitie, gaue her in mariage vnto the new Emperour. The ioy of which ſo great an honor was in ſhort time conuerted not into a deadly heauineſſe, but euen into death it ſelfe: for the yong Burgundian, more enraged with the wrong done him M than diſcouraged with the greatneſſe and power of the Emperour, conſorted himſelfe with a companie of luſtie tall ſoldiers, acquainted with his purpoſe, and awaiting his time when the Emperor was abſent, by night entred the court with his deſperate folowers, and firſt meeting with the beautifull yong Empreſſe, cut off her noſe and her eares, and afterward threw her old

A mother into the ſea, and ſo fled out of the citie into the woods and mountains, with thoſe deſperate cut-throats the miniſters of his barbarous crueltie. The Emperour pierced to the heart with this ſo great a diſgrace, ſhortly after went to Rome, to what purpoſe was not certainely knowne; but in returning backe againe through Achaia, he there died, leauing behinde him his yong ſon Balduin, yet but a childe, begotten by his firſt wife, to ſucceed him in the Empire; who by the name of Baldwin the ſecond, was crowned the ſixt and laſt Emperor of the Latines in Conſtantinople. And for becauſe he was as yet but yong and vnfit for the gouernment, hee was by conſent of the Nobilitie affianced, and afterward married vnto Martha the yonger daughter of Iohn Brenne King of Ieruſalem, a worthie old captaine, who was then Gouernour of Rauenna, which city, he being certaine yeres before ſent for out of France for that purpoſe, by B Honorius the Pope, he notably defended againſt the Emperor Frederick his ſon in law, (but that affinitie was before broken off by the death of the ſaid Emperors wife) who now ſent for out of Italie vnto Conſtantinople, had committed to his charge and protection, both the perſon and Empire of the young Emperour Baldwin, now his ſonne in law. Which great and heauie charge he for certaine yeres after worthily and faithfully diſcharged, vntill ſuch time as that Baldwin was himſelfe growne able to take vpon him the gouernment. Now although the Imperiall citie of Conſtantinople, with the countries of Thracia, Theſſalia, Macedonia, Achaia, Peloponeſus, and the reſt of the prouinces of Greece, were all or for the moſt part vnder the gouernment of Baldwin the Emperor, the Venetians, or other the inferior Latine Princes; yet were the oppreſſed Greeks, the natural inhabitants thereof, in heart not theirs, as abhorring nothing C more than that their forreine gouernment; but wholly deuoted to their owne naturall Princes, Theodorus Laſcaris and Alexius Comnenus, the one raigning at Nice in Bithynia, the other at Trapezond in Pontus, both called by the Greekes, Emperors, and ſo of them generally reputed. Laſcaris of the two the better beloued, and by farre of greateſt power, had during the time of his gouernment fought many an hard battell, (as is in part before declared) and ſtrongly fortified his chiefe cities againſt the inuaſion of his enemies, as well the Turks as the Latines: and ſo hauing as it were erected a new Empire in Aſia, and there raigned eighteene yeares, died, leauing behind him one Iohn Ducas Batazes, that had married the faire Ladie Irene his daughter and heire, to ſucceed him in the Greeke Empire in Aſia. This Iohn was a man of a great wit and ſpirit, and of more grauitie for his yeares, than was Theodorus his father in D law, neuer vndertaking any thing before he had thereof well conſidered; and once reſolued, not omitting or neglecting any thing for the performance thereof. So that it was not vnfitly ſayd of the Greekes, The planting of this new Empire to haue required the celeritie of Laſcaris, but the ſtay thereof to haue been the grauitie of Ducas. He in the beginning of his raigne in very ſhort time hauing ſet all things in good order, greatly augmented his legions, & ſhooting at a fairer marke than the Empire he held, euen the imperiall citie it ſelfe, and the recouerie of all Thracia and Grecia out of the hands of the Latines, which could not bee done without a fleet at ſea, built a great number of gallies in the ports of the leſſer Aſia. And ſo hauing rigged vp and manned a ſtrong fleet, and ſcouring the ſeas, in one Summer took in moſt of the Iſlands E of the Ægeum, namely Lesbos, Chios, Samos, Icaria, Coos, with the famous Iſland of the Rhodes, and many others alſo. And not ſo contented, to haue increaſed his Empire, the next Spring croſſing the Helleſpont, and landing his forces, firſt inuaded Cherſoneſus, and afterward to terrifie the Latines, forraged the countrey farre and neere, euen to the gates of Conſtantinople, no man daring to oppoſe himſelfe againſt him. At which time alſo he took many cities and ſtrong townes alongſt the ſea coaſt, as Calliopolis, Seſtus, and Cardia, with diuers others thereabout, ſome by force, ſome by compoſition, the Greekes almoſt in euerie place yeelding themſelues, where they were not ſo oppreſſed by the Latines, as that they could not helpe him. Now by theſe proceedings of the Greeke Emperor in Europe, was plainely to be ſeene againe the ruine of the Latine Empire in the Eaſt, all things proſpering in his hand according to his hearts deſire. Aſſan the Bulgarian King (no ſmall terror both vnto the Latines F and the Greekes) mooued with the fame hereof, by his Embaſſadours ſent of purpoſe vnto Iohn the Greeke Emperour, offered his daughter Helena in marriage with young Theodore his ſonne: of which offer the Emperour gladly accepted. For beeing buſied in his great affaires, he was loath to haue ſo great a King as was Aſſan, his enemie, able at his pleaſure to call in the Scythes; who with their multitude, as a great floud breaking ouer the bankes, had oftentimes carried carried away whole countries before them. Wherefore the match agreed vpon, the two great Princes by appointment met together about Cherſoneſus, where Helena King Aſſans daughter, beeing then about ten yeres old, was with great joy and triumph ſolemnly married vnto yong Theodor the Emperors ſon, much of the ſame age. Not long after, embaſſadors were alſo ſent vnto the Emperour from the Sultan of Iconium, to confirme and prolong the league betwixt them; for the Tartars not contented to haue driuen the Turks out of Perſia and the farre Eaſterne Countries, began now alſo to cut them ſhort in their prouinces in the leſſer Aſia. Wherefore the Sultan of Iconium, fearing leſt whiles he had his hands full of thoſe his moſt dreadfull enemies, of themſelues too ſtrong for him, hee ſhould behind be ſet vpon by the Greeke Emperour, and ſo thruſt out of all; ſent theſe his embaſſadours vnto him for peace: which hee for many cauſes eaſily granted. Firſt, for that hee foreſaw what an hard matter it would be for him to maintain war at once both in Aſia againſt the Turks, and in Europ againſt the Latines: then by this warlike nation, as by a moſt ſure bulwarke, to keepe his owne countries ſafe from the inuaſion of the barbarous Tartars, vnto whoſe furie hee ſhould himſelfe lie open, if the Turks were once taken out of their way. Both ſufficient reaſons for the Emperor to yeeld vnto the Sultan, which he did: ſo was the peace concluded, and the embaſſadors diſpatched. This peace exceedingly comforted, and afterwards inriched the Emperors countries: for now the people generally deliuered of the feare and miſerie of continuall warre, began on all hands to fall to their fruitfull labours of peace. Yea the Emperour himſelfe, to the ſtirring vp of others to the like good husbandrie, cauſed ſo much land to bee ploughed vp for corne, and ſo many vineyards to be planted, as might plentifully ſuffice his owne houſe; and ſuch poore as he dayly relieued; with a great ouerplus, which he cauſed to be carefully layd vp in ſtore: he kept alſo great heards of cattell, flockes of ſheepe, and fowles of all ſorts without number. The like he cauſed his kinſmen and other of the nobilitie to do, to the intent that euery great man hauing ſufficient for his owne ſpending at home, ſhould not take any thing from the poore country men, that ſo euery man contenting himſelfe with his own, might liue in peace without the grieuance of others. By which means in a few yeres euery barne and granarie was full of corne, euery cellar full of wines, euery ſtable full of cattell, euery ſtorehouſe full of victuals; the fields were couered with corne and cattell, and in euery mans yard were to be ſeene all kinds of tame fowles, without number. About which time alſo there fortuned a great famine among the Turks, inſomuch as that they were enforced to fetch their greateſt reliefe from out of the Chriſtian countries. Then might you haue ſeen euery way full of Turks, men, women, and children, trauelling to and fro into the emperors countries for victuals; their gold, their ſiluer, their other rich commodities, they gaue vnto the Chriſtians for food; a little corn was worth a good commodity, euery bird, ſheep, & kid, was ſold at a great rate: by which means the country mens houſes were full of the Turks wealth, & the emperors coffers ſtored with their treaſure. The greatneſſe of the profit ariſing of this plentie of the Chriſtians, and penurie of the Turks, may hereby eaſily be gathered, for that of eggs dayly ſold, ſo much monie was in ſhort time gathred, as made the empreſſe an imperial crown of gold, richly ſet with moſt orient pearle and precious ſtones of great price; which the emperour called Ouata, for that it was bought with egge money. Thus flouriſhed the Greeke empire in the leſſer Aſia, vnder the good Emperor Iohn Ducas: the Turks at the ſame time declining as faſt, daily pilled in one corner or another by the Tartars, and conſumed with famine at home.

Baldwin the laſt Emperor of the Latines in Conſtantinople.

Iohn Batazes made emperor of the Greeks in Aſia.

Plentie enſuing of peace.

An imperiall crown bought with egge mony

Frederick the German Emperor had of long time vowed to take vpon him an expedition into the Holy land; for performance whereof he was hardly called vpon, firſt by Honorius quartus the Pope, & afterward for his long delay excommunicated by Gregorie the ninth: not ſo much for the zeale they had vnto the ſacred war, as to buſie the Emperour afar off in warres abroad, whileſt they in the mean time, to increaſe their own power, drew from him ſome one part or other of his empire: which he not without cauſe fearing, from day to day, & yere to yere, delayed the performance of his vow, ſo much vrged by the Pope; by his preſence & power ſtil diſappointing all the ſlie deſignes of the Popes, conceiued or put in practiſe againſt him. But now at length mooued, or more truly to ſay, inforced with the thundering and lightning of Pope Gregorie, he reſolued to ſet forward in the yeare 1227. About which time, Iolenta, or Toland his wife, the king of Ieruſalem his daughter, died in childbed, being before deliuered of a faire ſonne. Now were met together at Brunduſium an exceeding great number of couragious

A gious and deuout ſouldiers out of all parts of Chriſtendome, eſpecially out of Germanie, vnder the leading of Lodwick Lantgraue of Thuringe, and Sigefride Biſhop of Auguſta; all ſtirred vp with the fame of ſo notable an expedition. But whileſt they there ſtayed ſomewhat long, the plague aroſe among the Germans, whereof in ſhort time after, both the Lantgraue and the Biſhop died, with many of the other beſt ſouldiers. The Emperour himſelfe was vpon his way as farre as Malea, vpon the further ſide of Peloponeſus, where falling deſperatly ſicke of a burning feauer, and put backe with contrarie windes, he returned againe to Brunduſium, and there ſtayed a great while after. Then began the Pope againe to fret and fume, and to caſt out his excommunications againſt the Emperour, as if it had been thunder and lightning, accuſing him of periurie, infidelitie, and many other grieuous crimes; of all which the Emperour was B readie to haue cleered himſelfe in an open aſſemblie of the Princes of Germanie to haue bin holden at Rauenna, had it not bin by the Pope and the troubles of Lombardie diſturbed. Neuertheleſſe, he by open proteſtations and writings, fully anſwered all the Popes vniuſt accuſa-tions, wherewith he had been ſo hardly charged: and yet deſirous to performe the expedition by him taken in hand, hauing ſet all things in good order, and put himſelfe againe in a readineſſe, he ſet forward from Brunduſium in Auguſt, in the yeare 1228, leauing the charge of his territories in Italie vnder the care of Reynold Duke of Spaleto. The Pope diſpleaſed, for that the Emperor at his departure had neither reconciled himſelfe, nor taken his leaue of him, and deeming therein his excommunications and fulminations to be contemned and ſet at naught, fell into ſuch a rage and choler, that he forbad all the Chriſtian forces that were in Syria, to C follow him, or to yeeld to him their obedience; and writ letters alſo vnto the Sultan, not to come to any agreement with the Emperour, or to yeeld vnto him any part of the Holy Land: which letters the Sultan afterwards ſent vnto the Emperor. Neither yet ſo contented, imme-diatly after his departure, ran vpon his kingdome of Naples, and ſo filled all Italie with troubles. Neuertheleſſe the Emperor happily arriuing at Ptolemais, was there honorably recei-ued of the Chriſtian forces, notwithſtanding the Popes threats and curſings. Of whoſe arri-uall Sultan Meledin hauing intelligence, and loth to draw ſo mightie an enemie as was the Emperor, vpon him, by his Embaſſadors offered him moſt honorable conditions of peace: which before he would accept of, he by conuenient meſſengers ſent vnto the Pope, to haue his con-ſent and approbation. But ſuch was his rage, as that hee would not ſuffer the meſſengers to D come into his preſence, or vouchſafe to read the Emperours Letters, being brought vnto him, but like a mad man preſently rent them in pieces. All which indignities the Emperor neuertheleſſe tooke in good part, and concluded a peace with the Turkes for ten yeares, vpon theſe conditions: Firſt, That he ſhould be annointed and accounted King of Ieruſalem: then, That the holy Citie, with all the land of Paleſtine ſhould be deliuered vnto him: thirdly, That hee might at his pleaſure fortifie the cities of Nazareth and Ioppe: fourthly, That all ſuch places as were ſometime in the power of Baldwin the fourth King of Ieruſalem, and taken from him by Sultan Saladin, ſhould be reſtored: and laſt of all, That all priſoners on both ſides ſhould be ſet at libertie without ranſome. So the peace concluded, the Emperor with his armie came to the deſolate citie of Ieruſalem, and there vpon Eaſter day with great ſolemnitie was crowned E King thereof, in the yere 1229. And ſo hauing repaired the walls of the Citie, with certaine churches, fortified Nazareth and Ioppe, & furniſhed them with ſtrong garriſons, and appointed Reynold duke of Bauaria, his lieutenant in Syria, he with two gallies only returned into Ita-lie. Euer ſince which time the Kings of Sicilia haue been alſo called Kings of Ieruſalem, and haue oftentimes borne the armes of both kingdomes.

Fredericke the Emperor crowned King of Ieruſalem.

The next yere Pope Gregory, in deſpight of the emperor Frederick, more than for any zeale to the Chriſtian religion, did by the Dominicans & Franciſcans (two orders of Friers but then lately erected) as by his trumpeters, ſtir vp a wonderfull number of zealous and deuout Chriſtians, almoſt in euery part of Chriſtendome, to take vpon them the croſſe (as they termed it) the cogniſance of ſuch as had by vow bound themſelues to take vp arms againſt the Turks and F Saraſins, for the recouerie or defence of the Holy land. Theſe deuout men met together in great number, vnder the leading of Theobald King of Nauar, Almericus Countie of Montfort, Henrie Countie of Champaigne, and others too long to rehearſe, (of purpoſe ſtirred vp to trouble the ten yeres peace before concluded betwixt the Emperour and the Turks in Syria) ſet forward, and after long trauell paſſing the ſtraight of Boſphorus, not farre from Conſtanti-

The vnfortunat expedition of the King of Nauarre into the Holy Land.

nople into Bithynia, came to the riuer Sangarius, & there ſtaied a while to refreſh themſelues. G Afterwards paſſing through Galatia, and ſo from country to country thorow the leſſer Aſia, they came at length vnto the ſtreights of the mountaine Amanus (a part of the mountain Taurus) which they found before taken by the Turks, and the Sultan of Iconium himſelfe not far off incamped with a ſtrong armie. Neuertheleſſe the valiant Countie of Montfort, which had the leading of the vantgard, couragiouſly marching forward, by plain force opened the paſſage of the mountain, hauing ſlain or put to flight the Turks appointed for the keeping thereof: the King of Nauarre in the mean time (though in vaine) aſſailing the Sultan in his campe; who fearing the great power of the Chriſtians, kept himſelfe within his owne ſtrength, and would not ſtirre. Wherefore the King ſeeing it to no purpoſe there longer to ſtay, diuiding his armie into three parts, left the Sultan, and followed after the Countie, placing his baggage H in the midſt, and the beſt of his ſoldiers in the rereward. But whileſt they thus march vp the great mountaine, the Turks better acquainted with thoſe paſſages, were ſtill at hand, aſſailing them ſometime behind, ſometime on the one ſide, ſometime on the other, as they ſaw occaſion: and at length taking them at an aduantage in a great plaine, ſet vpon them, now before almoſt ſpent with hunger and trauell, and there ſlew of them an exceeding great number. But by the comming on of the night the battell was broken off, and the Chriſtians repairing vnto their enſignes, paſſed the ſtraits, and ſo at length arriued at Antioch, hauing loſt by the way the greateſt part of the armie, with all their wealth, their victuals, and moſt part of their horſes: the remnant yet left, hauing a little refreſhed themſelues, were by ſea tranſported to Prolemais, from whence they were afterward by the Templars conducted to Gaza, where they I lay, and of the ſpoyle of the country greatly enriched themſelues. As for any other great matters they were not able of themſelues to take in hand; and helpe of ſuch forces as the Emperor had before left at Ieruſalem, and other places, they could haue none; hauing expreſſe charge from the Emperor himſelfe, not to doe any thing againſt the enemie, tending to the breach of the ten yeres league: which the Turks well perceiuing, and that they had to do but with theſe new come gueſts, and ſome few others their partakers; hauing gathered together their forces, lay in ambuſh for them in euery corner, to cut them off. Neither was it long, but that theſe of Gaza going far into the Country, and returning laded with ſpoile, were ſet vpon by the Turks; whom they (caſting away the ſpoyle they had before taken) notably repulſed and put to flight, the day now drawing to an end. But early the next morning appeared a farre K greater number of Turkes than before; which now putting on, charged the Chriſtians, who all that night had ſtood watching in their armor, and ſo ioyned with them a moſt cruell battel: wherein the Chriſtians ſhewed ſo much valour as was poſſible for men to doe; but wearied with the long fight, and oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies, they were ouercome and ſlaine almoſt euery mothers ſon. Among the reſt, the two Counties, Americus and Henry fell: the King of Nauarre himſelfe hardly eſcaped by the exceeding ſwiftneſſe of his horſe, and by vncertaine wayes wandring vp and downe the country, not knowing well which way to take, after two days came by good fortune to Ioppe: ſome few others eſcaped by flight to Ptolemais, the heauie meſſengers of the misfortune of their fellowes. The King afterwards viſiting the holy places at Ieruſalem, returned home into his countrie, with ſome few of his L followers, hauing performed nothing of that the world expected.

The Chriſtians by perſuaſion of the Templars, breake their League with the Turks.

About foure yeares after, Raynold Duke of Bauaria, whom Fredericke the Emperor had left his lieutenant in Ieruſalem, died; hauing by the ſpace of fiue yeres peaceably gouerned that bruiſed kingdome. After whoſe death, the Templars (who, he yet liuing, would oftentimes haue broken the League, but that they were by his wiſedome reſtrained) now tooke occaſion to ſtir vp the people to take vp armes againſt the Turks, without reſpect vnto the league yet in force, or of the dangers like thereof to enſue. Whereof the Ægyptian Sultan hearing, raiſed a great armie, ſending alſo for the Choraſines, a warlike nation then lying neere vnto Babylon, to come vnto his aid. Thus become verie ſtrong, he firſt layd ſiege to Gaza, but a little before repayred and fortified by the King of Nauarre and the Templars, which hee at length M tooke by force, and put to ſword all that were therein, as well the citiſens, as the garriſon ſoulers: in like manner he dealt alſo with them of Aſcalon and other places as hee went. To repreſſe this his furie, the Templars and Hoſpitallers had aſſembled the whole ſtrength of that weake Kingdome, and neere vnto Tyberias came to haue giuen him battell. Who vpon

A their approch haſtily retyred,as if he had for feare ſhunned battel. But whiles the Chriſtians as victors the night following lay negligently incamped along the riuer ſide,he returning back again with his armie,came vpon them before they were well aware, halfe ſleeping, halfe waking, but altogether vnarmed , with a moſt horrible outcry. The Chriſtians now altogether awaked,and not a little troubled with the ſuddennes of the matter, haſtily and diſorderly (as muſt needs in ſo great a confuſion) tooke vp their weapons,ſuch as came firſt to hand, and ſo couragiouſly oppoſed themſelues againſt their enemies. There was fought a moſt terrible and doubtfull battell,and that alſo for a long ſpace,the Chriſtians ſtill encouraging one another to do their laſt deuoir: but the Turkes ſtill keeping their order againſt the diſordred Chriſtians, and far moe alſo than they in number,preuailed,& there ouerthrew them with a great ſlaughter, B but not without the loſſe of many thouſands alſo of their own men, which there lay dead vpon the ground. Moſt part of the beſt Commanders both of the Templars and Hoſpitalers were there ſlaine,ſuch as eſcaped fled to Tyre.

The Sultan incouraged with ſo great a victorie,marched forthwith to Ieruſalem,which he tooke without reſiſtance,and there put to ſword all that hee found therein,men, women, and children,without reſpect of ſex or age: and afterwards hauing rifled the ſame, raſed it downe to the ground,burning the buildings,and ouerthrowing the walls not long before repaired by the Emperor Frederick,and much beautified by his lieutenant Raynold. And carried with an infernall fury,defaced and moſt ſhamefully polluted the ſepulchre of our bleſſed Sauiour,neuer before then violated or defiled,but of all nations vntouched & reuerenced; which for all that C may ſeem to haue bin done not ſo much for the hatred vnto the Chriſtian religion, as for that it was the place of all others moſt deſired of the Chriſtians; and for the gaining wherof they had vndertaken ſo many hard aduentures,and ſo much troubled the Saraſins and Turks.

Ieruſalem taken and raſed by the Turks.

Thus by the vnfaithfull breaking of the league,the moſt antient and famous citie of Ieruſalem, ſometime the terreſtriall ſeat of the moſt Higheſt,and glorie of the world,fell again into the power of the Turks & Infidels,in the yere 1234,in whoſe hands it hath euer ſince remained euen vntill this day: now a poore ruinous citie, gouerned by one of the Turks Sanzacks, and for nothing now more famous,than for the Sepulchre of our bleſſed Sauior,againe repaired and much viſited by the deuout Chriſtians, and not vnreuerenced by the Turkes themſelues.

D The loſſe of this ſo famous a citie, together with the dangerous ſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria,much grieued the other Chriſtian princes of the Weſt, eſpecially Frederick the Emperor, by whom it had bin but a few yeres before gained. Howbeit hee could not now remedie the matter according to his deſire,being himſelfe grieuouſly entangled with the endles troubles which Pope Gregorie had as it were by tradition left vnto the other Popes his ſucceſſors, for the troubling of his ſtate,vntil at length they had depriued him of his Empire,& not long after of his life alſo. Among other the great Princes,carefull for the poore Chriſtians in Syria, was Lewis the ninth,the French King,a Prince of great power,but of all others of that time moſt famous for his zeale vnto the Chriſtian religion,and for his deuout manner of life: who abounding in wealth and all things elſe of a great Prince to be deſired,and withall oftentimes E conſidering the notable expeditions many Chriſtian Princes had (to their immortall glorie) made,ſome into Syria,ſome into Ægypt,againſt the enemies of Chriſt, and for the reliefe of the oppreſſed Chriſtians,was many times about to haue taken vpon himſelfe the like. But in theſe his deuout motions,before he could reſolue vpon ſo great an enterpriſe,hee fell dangerouſly ſicke,inſomuch that for certaine days he lay ſpeechleſſe,deuoyd of ſence and motion, without any ſigne of life, but that hee did a little faintly breathe: when comming a little vnto himſelfe, (whither moued by deuotion,or troubled with his former conceits then running in his weake braine,is vncertaine) the firſt thing he asked for was the Croſſe (the Cogniſance of ſuch as vowed themſelues vnto the ſacred warre) which he ſolemnly receiued at the hands of the Biſhop of Paris. At which time alſo his three bretheren, Alphonſus Countie of Poitiers, F Charles Countie of Aniou, and Robert Countie of Arthois, with Hugh Duke of Bourgondie, William Earle of Flanders, Hugh Countie of Saint Paul,and afterwards moſt of the nobilitie of France,to accompanie the king,tooke vpon them the ſame charge. Neuertheleſſe it was not by and by taken in hand, but ſome few yeares let paſſe in the conſultation and preparation for ſo great an enterpriſe: many in the meane time diſcharging their vow, by dying before at home in peace in their own countries. At length the deuout King ſtill reſolute in his former determination, hauing taken order with Blanch his mother for his affaires at home, and put all things in readineſſe for his iourney, came to Lyons to take his leaue of Pope Innocentius the fourth, (who for feare of the Emperor Frederick, then lay there for his more ſafetie) and from thence to Marceilles; where imbarking himſelfe with his armie the fiue and twentieth day of Auguſt, the yeare 1248, hee the twentieth day of September following arriued in ſafetie in the Iſland of Cyprus, and was there royally entertained by Guy Luſignan then King of that countrey.

King Lewis ſetteth forward toward the Holy land.

Now was the French King deſirous to haue gone directly for Ægypt, without longer ſtay in Cyprus, had he not beene otherwiſe perſuaded, both for that his whole fleet was not yet come, and the time of the yere began to grow vnſeaſonable, and the weather tempeſtuous. But whileſt he there ſtayed, paſſing the Winter, the plague (one of the readie attendants of great armies) began to ariſe in the campe, which dayly increaſing, had in ſhort time taken away a great number of men, and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort. Amongſt whom were Robert Biſhop of Beauvais, Iohn Countie Montfort, the Counties of Vendoſme and Dreux, Archambaut Lord of Burbon, with diuers other Knights & Gentlemen, to the number of 240. ſo that by force of the infectious contagion, the King was conſtrained to diuide his armie into diuers places of the Iſland, attending vntill the infection ſhould ceaſe. In the meane time the Templars hauing in ſuſpect both the French and the Turkes, (the Turkes, for feare they ſhould ouerrun all; the French, leſt hauing gotten the victory, they ſhould take all into their owne hands, and ſo diminiſh their power and authoritie wherewith they tyranniſed ouer the other poore Chriſtians) ſent Embaſſadors ſecretly vnto Meledin Sultan of Ægypt, to perſuade him betimes to come to ſome good agreement for peace, ſo to auert the power of the French King from doing him further harme, or proceeding further in that war. Of which motion the Sultan well liking, ſent one of his noblemen to intreat with the maſter of the Templars concerning a peace, ſo that it might be by conſent of the French. The Templars glad of ſo honourable a meſſage, writ vnto the French King out of Siria, how the matter ſtood; perſuading him to accept of the peace offered, ſetting out in great words, the Sultans great preparations and power. And ſo indeed had abuſed the King, had not the King of Cyprus acquainted with his doings, perſuaded him that it was but a fineneſſe of the great maſter, and that he had firſt ſent vnto the Sultan, and procured that nobleman to bee ſent: which the King vpon conſideration perceiuing to be true, fed the Turks Embaſſador with hope of peace, but writ vnto the Maſter of the Templars, vpon the price of his head, from thenceforth not to receiue any embaſſage from the enemie, or to haue any further intelligence with him.

Winter now paſt, and the plague well ceaſed, diuers noble gentlemen and great commaunders which following the king, and ſetting forth ſomewhat late, or for feare of the plague had ſtayed by the way, and wintred ſome in one place ſome in another, began to repaire vnto Cyprus: as Robert duke of Burgondie, who hauing wintred in Achaia, came now in the beginning of the Spring vnto the king, with a number of good horſemen; and with him, William Prince of Achaia, with a great fleet out of Peloponeſus, which country, with moſt part of Grecia, was then vnder the command of the Latines; amongſt others came alſo William ſyrnamed Longeſpie, Earle of Saliſburie, with a band of luſtie tall ſouldiers. So the army being met together, and all things againe in readineſſe, King Lewis departing from Cyprus, and toſſed at ſea with contrarie winds, about fiue days after fell with the coaſt of Ægypt, and there with all his fleet came before the ſtrong town of Damiata, being (as wee haue ſaid) the key of that kingdome. The Sultan long before vnderſtanding of the French Kings purpoſe for the inuaſion of his country, had ſtrongly fortified his frontier townes, and put into them ſtrong garriſons, beſide the great power he kept with himſelfe in readines at all aſſaies, as occaſion ſhould require. Vpon the approch of the Chriſtians, the gouernor of Damiata was readie vpon the ſhore, with a number of braue ſouldiers to keepe them from landing; who neuertheleſſe reſolutely before ſet down for the performing of that they came for, manning forth their long boats with their archers and croſſebowes to beat the enemie from the ſhore, ran a ground with their other ſmal boats, made of purpoſe for the landing of men; and ſo without longer ſtay came to handie blowes; where for a while was fought a moſt ſharpe and cruell battell, the Chriſtians ſtriuing to land, and the Turkes to keepe them off, many falling on both ſides. But what

A ſhould an handfull doe againſt ſo many? The Turks oppreſſed with the multitude ſtill landing more and more, and hauing done what was poſſible for them to doe, fled into the towne, leauing behind them their gouernor, with fiue hundred of their beſt ſoldiers dead on the ſhore.

1249 This citie of Damiata was exceeding rich and populous, and had in the former warres not bin taken but by more than a yeares ſiege, (as is before declared) and that not ſo much by the valour of the Chriſtians, as by the extremity of the plague and famin: ſince which time it had bin ſtrongly fortified by the Turks, with deepe ditches, high wals, and ſtrong bulwarkes, and was at that time wel ſtored with victuals alſo, and al things els for the induring of a long ſiege. Neuertheleſſe, the ſoldiers that were left, and the citizens (diſcouraged with the loſſe of their gouernor, and remembrance of the miſeries before indured in the former ſiege, and ſeeing the B Chriſtians now ready againe to beſiege the ſame) the night following, a little before the break of day, ſet fire euery man vpon his owne houſe, and ſo by a bridge which they had made of boats fled ouer the great riuer, breaking the bridge when they were ouer, for feare their enemies ſhould thereby haue followed after them. The Chriſtians perceiuing their flight, without reſiſtance entred the city, and being ſtrangers, did what they could to quench the fire, and to ſaue that which the inhabitants themſelues would faine haue with fire deſtroyed; and ſo afterwards found great aboundance of riches, with plentifull ſtore of all manner of victuals, wherewith the ſouldiers both inriched and refreſhed themſelues. This ſo happy and vnexpected a victorie happened vnto the Chriſtians about the beginnning of October, in the yeare 1249. Sultan Meledin himſelfe, diſcouraged with the loſſe of ſo ſtrong a citie, offered vnto the C French King for the redeeming thereof, and to haue peace at his hands, more territorie in Syria and the land of Paleſtine, than the Chriſtians had of long time before: which large offer was by the French, eſpecially by the Earle of Arthois the Kings brother, proudly reiected, and Alexandria the moſt famous port and metropoliticall citie of Ægypt, further demanded, to the great diſcontentment of the Turks and Saraſins. In theſe troubles died Meledin the old Sultan, a man not much beloued of his people: in whoſe ſtead Melech-ſala (or Melexala, as ſome call him) a valiant and couragious Prince, wel beloued of his ſubiects, and but euen then returned out of Syria and Arabia, where he had beene to craue ayd of the other Mahometane Princes, was choſen Sultan. Which Princes, eſpecially the Sultan of Damaſco, although they had not of long beene at any good accord amongſt themſelues, or with the Ægyptian; D yet in this common danger of their ſuperſtition, which by the loſſe of Ægypt was like to bee greatly weakened, they ioined hands together, and ſo ſent him great ayd.

The citizens of Damiata ſet fire vpon the citie, and ran away by the light.

The new Sultan thus ſtrengthened, drew neerer vnto the Chriſtians, which then lay encamped not far from Damiata, and had with them a hot skirmiſh, wherein he was put to the worſe, & ſo with ſome loſſe glad to retire. But the Chriſtians the next day, in hope of like ſucceſſe ſallying out again were ouerthrowne, with ten times more loſſe than was he the day before, and ſo faine to flie vnto the campe. By which victorie the Sultan encouraged, began now to conceiue better hope of the ſucceſſe of his wars; and by ſtopping the paſſages both by water and land, to prouide, that no victuals could without great perill be brought either vnto the citie or the campe, inſomuch that at length victuals began to grow ſcarce in both: whereof E the Sultan was not ignorant, as beeing thereof throughly informed by ſuch fugitiues, as for want or other cauſes, oftentimes fled out of the French campe into his.

Winter thus paſſing, and wants ſtill increaſing, it fortuned that the gouernor of the great citie of Caire (vpon the fortune whereof depended the ſtate of the whole kingdom) a man not euill affected vnto the Chriſtian religion, and in his heart highly offended with the Sultan, for the death of his brother by him wrongfully executed; by ſecret meſſengers perſuaded the French king to come on with his army to the citie, the regal ſeat of the Sultan, promiſing him to deliuer it into his power, with ful inſtructions what he had in all points to do for the gaining thereof. Whereupon the King, who had before of himſelfe purpoſed the ſame exploit, but now filled with a greater hope, aſſembled together the greateſt forces he was able to make. At I which time alſo he ſent for the Earle of Salisburie, with the reſt of the Engliſhmen, who for many proud indignities offered them by the French (eſpecially by the Earle of Artois the kings brother) whereof they could haue no redreſſe, were gone to Ptolemais, without purpoſe to haue any more ſerued in thoſe wars: but now being ſent for by the King, with promiſe of better vſage and honorable recompence for the wrongs paſt, returned againe into Ægypt, A faire offer fondly refuſed.

there to doe their laſt endeuor. With whoſe comming the King ſtrengthned, but more by the G new ſupplies brought vnto him by his brother Alphonſus out of France, leauing the Duke of Burgundie with a conuenient garriſon, with the Queene his wife, Odo the Popes Legate, and diuers other great Ladies in Damiata, he himſelfe ſet forward with his army towards Caire.
Of whoſe comming the Sultan hearing, and loth vpon the fortune of one battel to aduenture his whole eſtate, offered by his embaſſadors to reſtore vnto him all the land of Paleſtine, with a great ſumme of money for the defraying of the charges of thoſe wars, and all the priſoners he had taken, ſo that he would redeliuer vnto him the citie of Damiata, and ioyne with him in league and amitie. Which faire offer for all that, the French King, by the perſuaſion of the Legat and others, refuſed. So the King marching ſtill on, was to paſſe an arme of the great riuer Nilus (the Sultan on the other ſide ſtill readie with his armie to ſtay his paſſage) which he H had thought to haue made by a bridge of boats, prepared for the ſame purpoſe: but better conducted by a fugitiue Saraſine vnto a foord, before to him vnknowne, ſent his brother Robert Earle of Artois, with the third part of the armie before him, accompanied with the maſter of the Templars and the Earle of Saliſburie, with their followers. Who paſſing the riuer at the aforeſaid foord, ſuddenly aſſailed the Turks in their tents (the Sultan being then abſent in ſolemniſing one of their prophane feaſts) and put them to flight. With which victory the French Earle aboue meaſure encouraged, would needs on forwards, as if hee would himſelfe alone haue carried away the glorie of the whole conqueſt. Whom for all that certaine of the ancient Templars, better acquainted with the manners of that deceitfull nation than hee, and better conſidering alſo of their owne abilitie and ſtrength, perſuaded him to content himſelfe with I the honour hee had already got, and not to proceed any further in proſecuting of the enemie, vntill the comming of the reſt of the armie, eſpecially in that deſperate eſtate of the enemie, wherein he was to win or loſe all. Vnto whom the proud Earle in great diſpight replied, that he would proſecute his victorie, and follow his good fortune; calling them daſtards and cowards, opprobriouſly obiecting vnto them the common fame, whereby it was commonly reported, That the Holy land might long ſince haue beene againe vnited vnto the bodie of the Chriſtian common-weale, but for the foule colluſion of the falſe Templars and Hoſpitalers with the Turks and Infidels. With which reprochfull ſpeech, the maſter of the Templars not without cauſe mooued, anſwered for himſelfe and his fellowes, that he ſhould, when he would and where he durſt, diſplay his enſignes, and he ſhould find them as ready to follow as he was K to goe before them. The Earle of Saliſburie alſo willing to ſtint this ſtrife, perſuaded Earle Robert not to be ſo wedded to his own opinion, but to liſten to the graue and wholſome counſell of the Templars, being men of great experience: and ſo turning vnto the maſter of the Templars began likewiſe with gentle words to pacifie him alſo. But whileſt he was yet ſpeaking, the Earle interrupting him with many opprobrious words, called him daſtard and coward, and wiſhed that the army were rid of him, and the fearefull cowards his countreymen.
Whereunto the Earle of Saliſburie anſwered, Well Generall, on in Gods name, and whereſoeuer you dare ſet your foot, mine ſhall be as far as yours; and I beleeue we goe this day, where you ſhal not dare to come nigh my horſes taile; as afterward indeed it proued. How be it the Earle ſo ſaid, for that Earle Robert and the Frenchmen had many times in reproch and diſdaine, after their manner, L called him and his followers Engliſh tailes.

The proud earle conſtant in his former purpoſe, and not to be otherwiſe perſuaded, ſet forward; and firſt aſſaulted a little towne or caſtle, not far off, called manſor, whereunto he inconſiderately approching, was notably repulſed; and hauing loſt a number of his men, was as a man diſcouraged, about to haue retired. When ſuddenly the Sultan, neerer at hand than the Earle had thought, ſtirred vp with the noiſe of the alarum, came on with his whole power; and finding the army of the Chriſtians now diuided (as he had long wiſhed) with the multitude of his people encloſed them round, and had with them a great and mortall fight: wherein though the Chriſtians right worthily behaued themſelues, for the ſmall number they were, yet oppreſſed with the multitude, and on euery ſide beſet, they were ſlaine downe right. Then but all M too late, it repented the Earle of his fooliſh raſhnes, and that he had not hearkned onto better counſel, and ſeeing the Earle of Saliſburie valiantly fighting, cried out vnto him to flie, ſeeing God as he ſaid fought againſt them. Whereunto the noble Earle anſwered no more, but God forbid that my fathers ſonne ſhould runne away from the face of a Saraſin. The French Earle think-

King

A king by the ſwiftnes of his horſe to haue ſaued his life, flying out of the battell, and taking the riuer of Thaſnes, ouerladed with his armour, was there drowned. The Earle of Saliſburie couragiouſly enduring the enemies charge, with his owne hand manfully ſlew many a Turke and Saraſin that day, vntill that at length hauing his horſe ſlaine vnder him, and himſelfe ſo wounded in the legs, as that he was not able longer to ſtand, yet vpon his knees laying about him like a deſperate man, and ſelling his life as deere as he could, was there ſlaine, but not vanquiſhed.
With him periſhed the whole armie, ſo encloſed by the Sultan, that ſcarce any one eſcaped aliue, more than two Templars, one Hoſpitaler, and one common ſouldier, the meſſengers of this heauie newes.

Earle Robert in flying drowned.

The Earle of Saliſburie valiantly fighting ſlaine.

About the ſame time alſo ſickneſſe daily increaſing in the French campe, the king purpoſing B to march forward to Caire, ſent a great number of ſicke and weake people downe the riuer of Nilus to Damiata; of whoſe going the Sultan vnderſtanding, cauſed a great number of ſmall boats to be carried in carts by land vnto the riuers ſide, which wel manned, and meeting them by the way, ſet vpon them, and burnt or drowned them euery mothers ſonne, ſauing one onely Engliſhman, called Alexander Giffard, who wounded in fiue places of his body, eſcaped yet into the French campe, reporting there what had happened vnto the reſt.

Now had the Sultan alſo got intelligence of the compact betwixt the gouernour of Caire and the King, for the betraying of the city; and thereupon had cauſed him to be ſuddenly apprehended and put in ſafe keeping, vntil he were at better leiſure to vnderſtand farther of the matter: which no leſſe troubled the French King, than did the former miſfortune, all his hope C for the yeelding vp of the city being therby cut off. Thus his hopes together with his ſtrength daily decreaſing, he would haue gladly accepted of the conditions which he before refuſed, which the Sultan, now growne very ſtrong, would by no means heare of, but in ſtead thereof, by way of deriſion, ſent to know of him, what was become of all his mattockes, forkes, rakes, ſythes, plowes, & harrows, which he had brought ouer with him? and why he ſet them not to worke, but ſuffred them like an euil husband to rot and ruſt beſide him? All which, with much more, the good king was glad to put vp: for now his forces greatly diminiſhed, aſwell by ſickneſſe, as by the former loſſes, finding himſelfe far too weake, he would faine haue retired back again to Damiata: which the Sultan foreſeeing, got ſo betwixt him and home, that now there was no remedy, but either to fight it out, or yeeld. The king himſelfe had bin often before intreated D by his nobilitie, whilſt the riuer was yet vnpoſſeſſed by the enimie, to haue conueyed himſelfe by water to Damiata, for that in the ſafetie of his perſon conſiſted (as they ſaid) the ſafety of his kingdom, whatſoeuer became of them: whereunto he could neuer be perſuaded, ſaying, that he would neuer forſake his people, becauſe he would not be forſaken of them, but was reſolued to indure with them whatſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe God to lay vpon him: ſo paſſing the riuer by the ſame foord wherby his brother had not long before vnfortunatly paſſed, and comming to the place where the battell was fought, he might ſee the dead bodies of the Chriſtians pitifully mangled, with their heads & hands cut off: for the Sultan, the more to encourage his ſoldiers, had before the battel proclaimed, that whoſoeuer ſhould bring him the head or hand of a Chriſtian, ſhould haue a great reward for his labor; in hope wherof, they had E ſo diſmembred them. But long he had not there ſtaied, but that the Sultan began ſuddenly to appeare, with a moſt huge great army, as if he would euen with the ſight thereof haue diſcouraged the Chriſtians: againſt whom for all that, the Frenchmen in good order oppoſed themſelues, and for the ſpace of 3 houres made great reſiſtance: but what could one do againſt ten, and he alſo fainting for ſicknes & food? the hard plight wherin the greateſt part of the French army then was. In concluſion, oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies, and no way left to flie, they were all ouerthrowne and ſlain, except ſome few, ſaued in hope of great ranſome.
The king himſelfe, with his two brethren, Alphonſus and Charles, and ſome few others, were taken priſoners, and brought vnto the Sultan: who demanding of him, what had moued him ſo to make war againſt him? was anſwered by the King, that it was for religion, and the defence F of the name of his God. In this vnfortunat battel, fought the 5. of Aprill, in the yere 1250, beſides the common ſoldiers, were ſlain moſt of the nobilitie of France, & all their tents taken.

The gouernour of Caire apprehended.

The Sultan preſently vpon this ouerthrow, ſent of his owne ſoldiers the like number that the French were of, with French enſignes, and diſguiſed in the attire of the ſlaine Frenchmen, to Damiata, where the Duke of Burgundie, the French Queene, and the Popes Legate lay; in hope to haue bin ſo let in for Frenchmen: but they were not ſo wel masked, but that they were G by them of the citie diſcouered for enemies, and ſo kept out and deceiued of their purpoſe.

The Chriſtians thus ouerthrowne, and the French king taken priſoner, Melech-ſala the Sultan taking compaſſion vpon him, and yet minding of his life to make his owne gaine, cheering him vp with comfortable ſpeeches, began to talke with him of his deliuerance, & of a good attonement to bee made betwixt them. The conditions whereof propounded by the Sultan were, That the King ſhould forthwith deliuer again vnto him the citie of Damiata, and moreouer pay vnto him for the ranſome of himſelfe and his, and for the charges of the warre, eight thouſand pound of gold: That all priſoners ſhould on both ſides be frankly ſet at libertie, and ſo a peace to be taken for ten yeres. For the more aſſurance wherof, the Sultan offred to ſweare That if he failed in the performance thereof, to renounce his Mahomet: requiring alſo of the H king to ſweare, If he failed in any thing that he had promiſed, to denie his Chriſt to be God; which prophane oath the King deteſting, and wiſhing rather to die than to giue the ſame; the Sultan wondring at his conſtancie, took his word without any oath at all, and ſo publiſhed the league. But whilſt they were comming together to Damiata, Melech-ſala now in the pride of this victorie, fearing nothing leſſe than the ſudden change of fortune, or the miſchiefe hanging ouer his head, was in the preſence of a number of his noblemen ſuddenly ſlain by two deſperat Mamalukes; and one Turquiminus a ſturdie ſlaue of their owne order and vocation (by whoſe procurement it was ſuppoſed to haue been done) by the conſent of the whole armie created Sultan in his ſtead: who reuoking the league before concluded by Melech-ſala, made another in his owne name with the King, much vpon the ſame conditions that the other was; I which after he had receiued Damiata, he cauſed openly to be proclaimed. Neuertheleſſe after that King Lewis had paied his ranſome, and was with the remnant of his armie by the Genowaies tranſported from Damiata to Ptolemais, the falſe miſcreant performed not the halfe of that he had promiſed, of twelue thouſand Chriſtian captiues that ſhould haue beene ſet free, ſcarce enlarging foure thouſand; and killing all the ſicke ſouldiers whom by his promiſe hee ought to haue relieued, neither ſuffering any Chriſtian to carrie any of his goods with him out of Ægypt, which by the league he ought to haue done alſo.

The French King comming to Ptolemais, and purpoſing to haue returned home, was intreated by the maſter of the Templars and Hoſpitalers, and other the nobility of the Chriſtians, to ſtay, which he did almoſt by the ſpace of foure yeares: in which time he repaired the K cities of Ceſarea & Ioppe, and fortified many ſtrong places for the defence of the Chriſtians agaiſt the Infidels; and ſo commending the protection thereof vnto the Knights of the ſacred war, and ſending his brethren away before him, followed after himſelfe, greatly lamented for by all the Chriſtians in Syria, and ſo arriued in France the ſixt yeare from the time of his departing thence. This was the end of this long and vnfortunat expedition of Lewis the French King, wherein as ſome write, were eightie thouſand Chriſtians loſt: Howbeit the French Chronicles extenuating their loſſe, report, of two and thirtie thouſand French, ſix thouſand to haue returned againe into France. The citie of Damiata in the ſpace of a few yeares twice woon, and twice loſt by the Chriſtians, was ſhortly after the deliuering vp thereof, by the Sultan raſed downe to the ground, because it ſhould no more ſerue the Chriſtians for an entrance L into his kingdome.

The beginning of the Mamalukes and their kingdome.

The late Ægiptian Sultans thus oftentimes inuaded by the Chriſtian princes, and repoſing no great aſſurance in the prowes of the effeminate Ægiptians, a people fitter for merchandize and other baſe occupations than for chiualrie and war, had for the ſtrengthning of their kingdom, bought an infinit number of ſlaues, eſpecially of the poore and hardie Circaſſians, called in antient timed Geta and Zinchi, neere vnto Cholchis and the Euxine ſea, brought vnto Alexandria and other ports of Ægypt out of thoſe bare cold countries, by merchants, and from thence tranſported to Caire & other cities of Ægypt: of which poore ſlaues, the late Ægiptian Sultans taking their choice, & culling out from the reſt ſuch as were like to be of greateſt ſpirit and ability of body, deliuered them vnto moſt ſkilfull and expert teachers; by whome M they were carefully taught to run, to leape, to vaut, to ſhoot, to ride, with al other feats of actiuity, and withal cunningly to handle al manner of weapons, as well on horſebacke as on foot, and ſo inſtructed, and become cunning, were taken out of their ſchooles into pay, and inrolled together as the Sultans choice horſemen, were commonly called by the name of Mamalukes.

A lukes. In whoſe good ſeruice the late Sultans finding great vſe, ſpared for no coſt, both for their maintenance and increaſing of their number; daily erecting new nurſeries ſtored with yong frie, which growing vp and ready, was ſtil ioined to the other. It is wonderful to tel, vnto what a ſtrength and glory this order of the Mamalukes was in ſhort time grown, by the care of the Ægyptian kings: by them they managed their greateſt affaires, eſpecially in time of wars; and by their valour, not only defended their country, but gained many a faire victorie againſt their enemies, as they did now againſt the French: but as too much power in ſuch mens hands, ſeldome or neuer wanteth danger, ſo fell it out now betwixt the late Sultan Melech-ſala, and thoſe maſterfull Mamaluke ſlaues, who proud of their preferment, and forgetful of their duty, and ſeeing the greateſt ſtrength of the kingdom in their hands, traiterouſly ſlew Melech-ſala B their chiefe founder, ſetting vp in his place (as aforeſaid) one Turquiminus, a baſe ſlaue, one of their owne order and ſeruile vocation, but indeed otherwiſe a man of a great ſpirit and valour.
This Melech-ſala murthered by the Mamalukes, was the laſt of the free born Kings of Ægipt; in whom the Turks kingdome in Ægypt, erected by Sarracon and the great Sultan Saladin (as is before ſaid) and in his ſtocke and family euer ſince continued, tooke end, as did alſo all the power of the Turks in that great and rich kingdome. For the proud Mamalukes hauing now got the ſoueraigntie into their hands, & exalted a Sultan out of themſelues, imperiouſly commanded as great Lords ouer the reſt of the people, not ſuffering them to haue the vſe either of horſ or armor, or to beare any ſway in the common-weale: but keeping them vnder with moſt heauie impoſitions, and ſtill preferring their owne ſlaues (wherewith the countrey of Ægypt C now ſwarmed) made the naturall countrey people, of all others moſt miſerable, not daring to meddle with any thing more than Merchandiſe, their husbandrie, or other their baſe mecha-nicall occupations; whereof the greateſt profit ſtill came vnto the Mamalukes, who as Lords of all, with great inſolencie, at their pleaſure tooke it from them as their owne. As for the great Sultan, they ſtill choſe him from among themſelues, not ſuffering any the Sultans children to ſucceed their fathers in the kingdome; for feare leaſt they in proceſſe of time, proud of their anceſtors and parentage, ſhould reckon of them as of his ſlaues (as indeed they were) and ſo at length bring in another more free kinde of gouernment.

The ruine of the Turks kingdom in Ægypt.

Againſt which they prouided alſo, not only by this reſtraint of their Sultans children, but of their owne alſo: taking order and eſtabliſhing it as an immutable law, That though the ſons D of the Mamalukes might enioy their fathers lands and wealth after their death; yet that it ſhould not be lawfull for them in any caſe to take vpon them the name or honor of a Mama-luke: ſo debarring them from all gouernement in the common wealth, to the intent it might ſtill reſt with the Mamalukes. Neither was it lawfull for any borne of Mahomatane parents (which could not be ſlaues) or of the race of the Iewes, to be admitted into that order; but only ſuch as being borne Chriſtians and become ſlaues, had from the time of their captiuitie bin inſtructed in the Mahometan ſuperſtition; or elſe being men growne, and comming thither, had abiured the Chriſtian Religion (as many reprobates did in hope of preferment.) Right ſtrange it is to conſider, vnto what honour and glorie this ſlauiſh empire in ſhort time grew: many of theſe poore ſlaues by rare fortune or ſecret diuine power, exalted out of the E duſt vnto the higheſt degree of honor, prouing moſt excellent and renowned Princes, of ſuch ſtrength and power, as was dreadfull euen vnto the greateſt Princes of the world. In which great glorie, this ſeruile empire (to the worlds wonder) flouriſhed from this time amongſt the greateſt by the ſpace of 267 yeares; vntill that hauing run the appointed race, it was with a great deſtruction by Selymus the victorious Emperour of the Turks, ouerthrowne in the yeare 1517, and the kingdome of Ægypt, with all Syria and the land of Paleſtine, brought into the forme of Prouinces, vnited vnto the Turks empire, as they are at this day, and as in the courſe of this hiſtorie ſhall in due time and place (God willing) at large appeare.

But leauing the kingdome of the Turks thus ouerthrowne in Ægypt, and the Mamalukes there triumphing, the French King returned into France, and the Chriſtians in peace in Syria; F let vs againe returne into the leſſer Aſia, and vnto the imperiall Citie of Conſtantinople, whither the affaires both of the Turkes and of the Chriſtians now call vs. All this while the Greeke empire (for ſo the Greekes will haue it called) flouriſhed both in peace and plentie in the leſſer Aſia, vnder their Emperour Iohn Batazes: the power of the Latines in the mean time declining as faſt at Conſtantinople, vnder the gouernment of the Latine Emperour Baldwin the ſecond. As for the Turks whom we left grieuouſly troubled both with famine G and the often incurſions of the Tartars, they had all this while, and yet alſo, enough and more than enough to doe to withſtand the ſame enemie. At length it fortuned that Iohn Dycas the Greeke Emperour died, being at the time of his death about threeſcore yeares old, whereof he had happily raigned three and thirtie: by whoſe good and diſcreet gouernment the Greek empire before brought low and almoſt to nought by the Latines, began againe to gather ſtrength and to flouriſh both in Aſia and ſome little part of Europe alſo. Of him are reported many notable matters, which as impertinent to our purpoſe I could willingly paſſe ouer, were I not by the worthy remembrance of one of them ſtaied a while by the way.

The Emperor in in loue with Marceſina.

This noble and famous Emperour hauing long lamented the death of the faire Empreſſe Irene his firſt wife, at laſt married another young Lady, the ſiſter of Manfred King of Sicilie, H called Anne, with whom amongſt other honorable and beautifull dames, ſent by the King her brother for the accompanying of her to Conſtantinople, was one Marceſina, a rare paragon, of ſuch a feature as if nature had in her meant to beſtow her greateſt skill. From whoſe mouth alwayes flowed a fountaine of moſt ſugred words, and out of her eyes iſſued (as it were) nets to intangle the amarous in: vpon this ſo faire an obiect, the Emperor not fearing further harme, tooke pleaſure oftentimes to feed his eyes, vntill that at length caught with her lookes, he had loſt his libertie, and was of a great Emperour become her thrall, in ſuch ſort, as that in compariſon of her he ſeemed little or nothing to regard the yong Empreſſe his wife; but ſo far doated vpon her, that he ſuffered her to be attired and honoured with the ſame attire and honour that the Empreſſe was her ſelfe; whom ſhe now ſo far exceeded both in grace and fauor with I the Emperour, and honor of the people, as that ſhe almoſt alone enioyed the ſame, without regard of her vnto whom it was of more right due. Whilſt ſhe thus alone triumpheth, at length it fortuned that ſhe in all her glorie, attended vpon with moſt of the gallants of the court, and ſome of the Emperors guard, would needs goe (whether for her deuotion or for her recreation, I know not) to viſit the monaſterie and faire church, which Blemmydes (a Noble man of great renowne, both for his integritie of life, and learning) had of his owne coſt and charges but lately built in the country, where he together with his monks, as men weary of the world, liued a deuout and ſolitarie contemplatiue life, after the manner of that time, with the great good opinion of the people in generall. This Blemmydes was afterward for his vpright life and profound learning, choſen Patriarch of Conſtantinople: which great honour, next vnto the K Emperor himſelfe, he refuſed, contenting himſelfe with his cell. Marceſina comming thither in great pompe, and thinking to haue entred the church, had the doores ſhut againſt her by the Monks, before commanded ſo to do by Blemmydes their founder: and ſo was to her great diſgrace kept out. For that deuout man deemed it a great impietie, to ſuffer that ſo wicked and ſhameleſſe a woman, againſt whom he had moſt ſharply both ſpoken and written, with her prophane and wicked feet to tread vpon the ſacred pauement of his church. She enraged with this indignitie, hardly by ſo proud a woman to be with patience diſgeſted, and prickt forward by her flattering followers alſo, returning to the court, grieuouſly complained thereof vnto the Emperour, ſtirring him vp by all means ſhe could to reuenge the ſame, perſuading him to haue beene therein himſelfe diſgraced. Whereunto were ioyned alſo the hard ſpeeches of L her pickthanke fauourities, who to currie fauor, ſpared not as it were to put oyle vnto the fire, for the ſtirring vp of the Emperour to reuenge. Who with ſo great a complaint nothing mooued vnto wrath, but ſtrucke as it were to the heart with a remorſe of conſcience, and oppreſſed with heauineſſe, with teares running downe his cheekes, and fetching a deepe ſigh, ſaid, Why prouoke you me to puniſh ſo deuout and iuſt a man? Whereas if I would my ſelfe haue liued without reproach and infamie, I ſhould haue kept my imperiall maieſtie vnpolluted or ſtained. But now ſith I my ſelfe haue bin the cauſe both of mine owne diſgrace, and of the empires; I may thanke mine owne deſerts, if of ſuch euill ſeed as I haue ſowne, I now reape alſo an euill harueſt.

Marceſina the Emperors concubine ſhut out of the Church.

Theodorus Laſcaris choſen Emperour.

After the death of this good Emperor, Theodorus his ſon, borne the firſt yeare of his fathers raigne, being then about three and thirtie yeres old, was by the generall conſent of the people M ſaluted Emperour in his ſtead: who in the beginning of his empire renewed the league which his father had made with Iathatines the Turkiſh Sultan. And ſo hauing prouided for the ſecuritie of his affaires in Aſia, he with a puiſſant armie paſſed ouer the ſtrait of Helleſpontus into Europe, to appeaſe the troubles there raiſed in Macedonia and Thracia, by the King

A of Bulgaria his brother in law, and Michael Angelus the Deſpot of Theſſalia; who vpon the death of the old Emperor began to ſpoile thoſe countries, not without hope at length to haue ioyned them vnto their own: by whoſe comming they were for all that diſappointed of their purpoſe, and glad to ſue to him for peace. But whileſt he was there buſied, he was aduertiſed by letters from Nice, that Michael Paleologus, whom he had left there gouernor in his abſence, was ſecretly fled vnto the Turks: with which newes he was not a little troubled. The cauſe of whoſe flight, as Paleologus himſelfe gaue it out, was, for that he perceiued himſelfe diuers wayes by many his enemies brought into diſgrace, and the Emperors eares ſo filled with their odious complaints, ſo cunningly framed againſt him, as that they were not eaſily or in ſhort time to be refelled: and therefore fearing in the Emperors heauie diſpleaſure to bee ſuddenly B taken away, to haue willingly gone into exile, if ſo happily he might ſaue his life from the malice of them that ſought after it.

At his comming to Iconium, he found Iathatines the Sultan making great preparation againſt the Tartars; who hauing driuen the Turks out of Perſia and other the far Eaſterne countreys, (as is before declared) and running ſtill on, did with their continuall incurſions ſpoyle a great part of their territories in the leſſer Aſia alſo; and now lay at Axara, a towne not far off from Iconium: againſt whom the Sultan now making the greateſt preparation he could, gladly welcommed Paleologus, whom he knew to be a right valiant and worthie captain, commending to his charge the leading of certaine bands of Greekes, whom hee had retained to ſerue him in thoſe wars, as he had others of the Latines, vnder the conduct of Boniface Moline a Nobleman C of Venice: and ſo hauing put all things in readineſſe, and ſtrengthned with theſe forrein ſupplies of the Greekes and Latines, ſet forward againſt his enemies the Tartars: who at the firſt ſight of the ſtrange enſignes and ſoldiers were much diſmaied, fearing ſome greater force had been come to the aid of the Turks; neuertheleſſe, ioining with them in battel, had with them at the firſt a moſt terrible & bloudie conflict, wherein that part of the armie that ſtood againſt Paleologus and his Greeks, was put to the worſe, to the great diſcomfiture of the Tartars, being euen vpon the point to haue fled, had not one of the greateſt Commanders in the Turks army, and a nigh kinſman of the Sultans, for an old grudge that he bare vnto the Sultan, with all his regiment, in the heat of the battel reuolted vnto the Tartars: whereby the fortune of the battel was in a moment as it were quite altred, they which but now were about to haue fled, fighD ting like lyons; and they that were victors now glad to turn their backs & flie: in which flight a great number of the Turks fell, the fierce Tartars moſt eagerly purſuing them. Paleologus, with the Generall of the Turks, hardly chaſed by the Tartars, and glad euery houre to make a ſtand, and to fight for their liues, with much adoe, after many dayes flight recouered a caſtle of the Generals, neere vnto Caſtamona, and ſo ſaued themſelues. The Tartars after this ſo great a victorie (wherein they had broken the whole ſtrength of the Turks, and brought in hazard the whole ſtate of their kingdome) without reſiſtance forraged all the countries and prouinces ſubiect vnto the Turkiſh Sultan, making ſpoyle of whatſoeuer they light vpon: inſomuch that the Sultan diſcouraged, & hauing now no ſtrength left to oppoſe againſt them, fled vnto the Greeke Emperour Theodorus for aid; who moſt honorably entertained him, with all E his train, and comforted him with ſuch ſmall aid as he thought good then to ſpare him: which for his more ſafetie he ſent home with him, vnder the leading of Iſaacius Ducas, ſyrnamed MurtZuſle, a man in great credit with him. In recompence of which kindneſſe, the Sultan gaue vnto the Emperor the citie of Laodicea, whereinto he preſently put a ſtrong garriſon: neuertheleſſe, it was not long before it fell againe into the hands of the Turks, being a place not to be holden by the Greekes. Yet for all this, the Sultan finding himſelfe ſtil too weake to withſtand the continuall inuaſions of the Tartars, and wearie of the harmes he dayly ſuſtained, by the aduice of his chiefe councellors made a league with them, yeelding to pay them a certain yerely tribute, thereby to redeeme his peace. From which time the Tartars accounted of the Turks as of their tributaries and vaſſals.

F Not long after this, Michael Paleologus was by the Emperors kind and gratious Letters called home; with his faith ful promiſe alſo before giuen for his ſecurity: who before his return bound himſelfe alſo by ſolemne oath, to be vnto the Emperour and his ſonne alwayes loyall, and from thenceforth neuer to ſeeke after the Empire, or giue cauſe of new ſuſpect for ſuch matters as he had beene before charged with: but for euer to yeeld vnto the Emperour, his ſonne,or other his ſucceſſors in the Empire,his dutifull obedience and fidelitie. Vpon which conditions he was againe made great Conſtable,and ſo receiued into the Emperors fauor,and liued the reſt of his raigne in great honour and credit with him.

The death of Theodorus the Greek Emperor

Enuie in court.

Now Theodorus the Emperor hauing raigned 3 yeres,fell ſicke & died, leauing behind him his ſon Iohn,then but a child of ſix yeres old,to ſucceed him in the empire: whom he vpon his death bed,together with the empire,commended to Arſenius the Patriarke,& one George Muzalo his faithful councellor,as to his truſtie tutors,to ſee him ſafely brought vp,& the empire wel & peaceably gouerned. This Muzalo was a man of a meane parentage,but for his familiar acquaintance & ciuile behauiour, of a child brought vp in the court with the Emperour as his play fellow:with whom he growing vp,ſo framed himſelfe to his manners & diſpoſition,that he alone was vnto him in ſtead of all,ſtil at hand,readie to ſay or do whatſoeuer might be vnto the Emperor gratious or pleaſing. And the elder they grew,ſo increaſed this their mutual affection and loue alſo: in ſuch ſort,that with him now Emperour,he was of all others in greateſt fauour and authoritie; a wary obſeruer of his delights,a readie miniſter of his affairs, & faithful partaker of his ſecrets : for which he was in ſhort time promoted vnto the greateſt honors of the court,& honorably married vnto one of the Emperors nigh kinſwomen,and now at his death,by his laſt wil,with the reuerend Patriarke appointed tutor to the yong Emperor & his two yong ſiſters. And for the more aſſurance thereof,a ſolemne oath of obedience to the yong Prince,as Emperor,and vnto them as his tutors,was exacted of al ſorts of men,both high and low,of what vocation ſoeuer; and that not once,but firſt a little before the Emperors death, & again after he was now dead: for many of the nobilitie honourably diſcended, ſeeing the ſudden change of Muzalo's fortune, among themſelues murmured thereat,as grieuing at his preferment,ſeeing there were many among them,vnto whom both the tuition of the yong emperor,& adminiſtration of the empire,of better right appertained; inſomuch as they were both neerer of kin vnto the Emperor,& fitter(as they thought)for ſo great a charge than was Muzalo,whom(as they ſaid)they had many cauſes both to contemne & hate: For,beſide that hee was not honorably borne,& had ſerued the late Emperor Theodore,as the miniſter of his wrath againſt ſome of the nobilitie,cauſes ſufficient of the peoples hatred; if he ſhould now alſo in ſo great authoritie affect the empire , it was by his malicious enemies vainly doubted , that hee would not ſpare to commit any manner of villanie for the effecting of his inordinat deſire. Of all which Muzalo was not ignorant,a man at all other times of a moſt quicke apprehenſion for ſuch matters,but as then eſpecially,his wits being awaked with theſe ſo great motiues & dangers. Wherfore ſpeedily calling together all the nobility into the court,he welcommed them one by one,& curteouſly diſcourſing with them,offred to diſcharge himſelfe both of the adminiſtration of the empire,and tuition of the yong emperor,& willingly to yeeld the ſame to any one of them, whom the reſt ſhould thinke fitteſt for ſo great a charge: which though they all with one conſent as it were refuſed,ſaying,That he was of all others to be preferred, vnto whom the emperor,lord both of the empire and the child,had committed the ſame: yet Muzalo earneſtly requeſted them to the contrarie,& ſtifly withſtood their deſire, wiſhing indeed rather to haue led a quiet priuat life in ſecuritie,than to haue bin ſo ouercharged; not ſo much for doubt of the enuy then ariſing,as for feare of ſome great danger therof to enſue. But would he,would he not,remedy there was none,but that as the late emperor had appointed, ſo muſt he take the charge vpon him. And now was euery one,as well of the nobilitie, as of the inferior ſort,again with greater ſolemnitie than before,the third time ſworn,to the vtmoſt of their power to defend the yong emperor in his empire,and Muzalo in the tuition of him, and adminiſtration of the affaires of the State,& faithfully to yeeld vnto them both all due honour and obedience: which if they ſhould faile religiouſly to performe,they wiſhed to themſelues euery man,& to all theirs,a ſhamefull end and deſtruction. Yet notwithſtanding all this ſolemne ſwearing,mixt moſttimes with much forſwearing,there was not fully nine days paſt,but that certain of the chiefe nobility,forgetful,or elſe careleſſe of their oath,and ful of enuy,ſeldome ſatisfied but with bloud,conſpired the vnworthie death of Muzalo the Protector both of the Emperour & the empire. The ninth day appointed for the funerall of the Emperour,was now come; at which time were met together at Soſandra(an abbey by himſelfe built in the honor of the virgin Marie at Magneſia) many great ladies & graue matrons, to mourn as the manner was; all the great princes of the nobilitie,and among them the conſpirators alſo; thither re-

A paired alſo a number of ſouldiers prepared for the ſlaughter, with an infinite number of the common people, as at ſuch ſolemnities is vſual. But what needs many words, while the hymns were yet in ſinging, and the obſequies performing, the ſoldiers as they were before inſtructed, ſuddenly breaking into the church with their drawn ſwords in their hands, ſlew Muzalo (then fled to the altar for refuge) with his two bretheren Andronicus & Theodorus, both men of great account, & diuers others appointed to the maſſacre. So the matrons and the reſt of the multitude breaking off their mourning, & for feare thronging out one in anothers necke, fled as faſt as they could, ſome one way, ſome another, as they thought for their beſt ſafety: but the prieſts & monks thinking to haue done the like, were by the imperious ſoldiers, whether they would or not, again inforced into the church; where tumbling one ouer another, as thronging in with B great force & violence, and ſcarce able to ſtand by reaſon of the ſlipperines of the bloud there ſhed vpon the pauement, they in great feare made an end of thoſe bloudie obſequies. This outrage appeaſed, Arſenius the Patriark, & only tutor of the yong emperor now left, was therwith yet much troubled, as with a thing dangerous both to the perſon of the yong prince, & quietneſſe of the ſtate; but what good courſe to take therein he could not tell: for as he was a man for his learning & integritie of life not inferior to the beſt, ſo in matters of ſtate he was as farre to ſeeke: as it commonly hapneth, the contemplatiue man buried in his meditations, to be vnfit for temporal gouernment; whereas he that ſhould performe both, muſt to his rare vertues and great learning ioyne a ciuil conuerſation, with great experience in worldly affaires, not to be learned but by great and long practiſe. This reuerend father (of no great reach, yet wiſhing C all well) calling together the nobilitie, conſulted with them what were beſt to be done for the gouernment both of the yong Emperor and the empire, now that Muzalo was dead; not conſidering in the mean time, who they were with whom hee conſulted, or, that councel grounded vpon no wiſe foreſight, or approoued experience, was more dangerous vnto him whome hee would haue prouided for, than all the enemies murthering ſwords, as ſhortly after appeared.

Muzalo traiterouſly murdred in the Church.

Michael Paleologus aſpireth.

Amongſt others of the nobilitie called to councel, was Michael Paleologus (of whom we haue before ſpoken) much ſuperior to the reſt, as diſcended of the imperiall houſe of the Comneni, a man of a cheerefull countenance, gracious and curteous, and withall exceeding bountifull and liberall, whereby he eaſily woon the hearts of all men in generall, but eſpecially of the Colonells, captains, and other martiall men, commanders in the armie: of whoſe aſpiring to the Em- D pire, many preſages and common rumors (not always vaine) had in former time paſſed alſo, to the mouing of many: yea the Patriarke himſelfe not conſidering his haughtie and aſpiring nature, made no leſſe account of him than did the reſt, but vpon an eſpeciall fauor, committed to his only truſt the keyes of the common treaſure, at ſuch time as mony was to be deliuered out for payment of the armies, or other like great occaſions of the ſtate; the moſt effectual means for the furtherance of his ſecret practiſes, and the readieſt way for the effecting of that he had ſo long before plotted: for hauing in his fingring ſuch a maſſe of treaſure, as hee might well haue wiſhed, but neuer reaſonably hoped for, hee poured it out as it were by buſhels, amongſt the nobilitie and martiall men, and ſuch others as he thought were able to doe moſt with the people; amongſt whom were many of the clergie alſo: of which his fauorits were made ma- E nie meetings, and by them was the Patriarke continually ſolicited, but yet in generall termes, without delay (according to the neceſſitie of the time) to take order for the good gouernment of the ſtate, which now as a great ſhip in the middeſt of the ſea without a maſter, was (as they ſaid) in danger to periſh, and being once loſt, was not to be againe recouered. At which time alſo the name of Paleologus was in euery mans mouth, as the only man for his wiſdome and experience fit to take vpon him the charge and gouernment of the empire, vntil the yong emperor were come to age. Vnto which common good liking, the Patriarke alſo (ſeeing no more, or peraduenture not ſo much as the reſt) gaue his conſent: and ſo without longer ſtay, to the great contentment both of the nobilitie and people in generall, made him gouernour of the empire, and tutor to the yong Emperor, wanting now nothing of an Emperor himſelfe, more than the F title and imperiall ornaments. This was the firſt ſtep whereby the aſpiring man (twice before in diſgrace with the two late Emperors, Iohn Ducas, and his ſon Theodorus) mounted at laſt vnto the Empire.

It was not many days after, but that his fauorits held another councel, wherein it was alledged, That it was not ſeemly for him that was tutor vnto the Emperour, gouernour of the ſtate and empire,and to giue audience vnto the Embaſſadours of forreine nations, to want the honour next vnto the Emperor,as well for the magnificence of the State,as for the credit of his place: whereupon he was both by the Patriarke and the yong Emperor honored with the title of the Deſpot,another ſtep vnto the empire. But what contentment finde the ambitious euen in the greateſt honours, ſo long as there is one aboue them? Little ſure, or none at all, more than that it ſerueth them to ſtep at next vp to the higheſt: as did this new made Deſpot, who ſhortly after,was by certain of the nobilitie his great fauorits,neere vnto Magneſia, with the great applauſe of the people,hoyſed vp and ſaluted Emperor. Whereof Arſenius the Patriarke hearing, was therewith much troubled, as fearing what would become of the young child,the right heire of the empire. And firſt he was about to haue excommunicated as well him that was made Emperor,as them that had ſo made him: but afterward changing his purpoſe,for feare of greater troubles, he thought it better by ſolemne oath to bind both him and the reſt,that they ſhould not ſeek after the life of the child,or by any force or colour go about to depriue him of the Empire; which was ſo done. Yet it was not full a moneth after,but that euen he that had ſo great a care of the young child,and ſo prouided for his ſafetie, (perſuaded by them of the nobilitie and clergie) with his owne hands,and all the accuſtomed ceremonies, ſet the imperiall crowne vpon this vſurpers head; yet not as vpon him that ſhould ſtill enioy the empire,but as vpon a man according to the preſent neceſſitie of the time and ſtate,thought fitteſt for ſo great a charge, vntill the young child came to age; vnto whom then hee was to giue place,and to reſigne to him the Empire. All which being by more ſolemne oath than before,confirmed,good news (as the certaine ſignes of his fortunate gouernment) were brought vnto him of a great victorie obtained by his captaines, againſt Michael Angelus Deſpot of Ætolia and Epirus: who hauing married the late Emperors daughter,& hearing of his death, with the troubles in Aſia,aided by the King of Sicilia,and the Princes of Peloponeſus and Achaia, his ſonnes in law,had thought in that hurle and perturbation of the State,to haue taken to himſelfe the greateſt part of the Emperors territories in Macedonia and Thracia; and for the ſame purpoſe was with a great armie entred into them,burning and ſpoyling the countrey before him: whereof Michael Paleologus (then but newly made Deſpot) hauing intelligence, ſent his brother Iohn, and ſome other his beſt captaines, with a great armie againſt him, by whom he with his complices were put to the worſe, and not without great loſſe enforced to retyre: the ioyfull newes whereof he receiued euen as he was crowned. Which was ſhortly after confirmed by the comming of the great Commaunders themſelues,bringing with them the Prince of Peloponeſus and Achaia,by them taken priſoner; who for his ranſome was afterward glad to giue vnto the Emperor Paleologus,Monembaſia,Maine,and Sparta,three of the beſt cities of Peloponeſus: whereinto he put ſtrong garriſons vnder the command of Conſtantinus his brother by the mothers ſide,a right valiant captaine. By whoſe good ſeruice,and the commodious ſcituation of the places,he gained diuers other townes and cities, and at length the greateſt part of Peloponeſus,out of the hands of the Latines: for the vtter rooting out of whome, hee ſhortly after with a great Armie paſſed ouer into Thracia, with purpoſe (as was thought) to haue beſieged Conſtantinople: but finding it to bee a matter of more difficultie than was before ſuppoſed,he left that,and laid ſiege to the caſtle of Pera ouer againſt it on the other ſide of the hauen, in hope by winning of that caſtle, to haue become maſter alſo of the towne: where he was notably repulſed,and enforced with loſſe to retyre. So riſing with his armie,he fortified diuers caſtles and ſtrong holds in the countrey about Conſtantinople, and putting into them ſtrong garriſons, charging them with continuall incurſions, to trouble the Conſtantinopolitans, and to cut them ſo ſhort, if it were poſſible, as that they ſhould not dare to looke out at the gates of their citie. Which they ſo well performed, that in ſhort time the Latines in the citie were driuen to ſuch extremitie,that for want of wood they were faine to burne many of the faireſt houſes in the citie,in ſtead of fewell. Which done,he returned again to Nice,the chiefe ſeat of the Greeke Emperors,euer ſince that Conſtantinople was taken by the Latines.

Now raigned in Conſtantinople the Latine Emperor Baldwin the ſecond(as is before declared) a man of ſmall courage, and leſſe power, and therefore not much regarded either of the Greeks or Latines:who for the maintenance of his ſtate,was glad to ſel away the publike ornaments of the citie, and to pawne his ſon vnto the Bruges merchants for money; by whom he

Haalō the Tartar ſent with a great Armie againſt the Turks

About this time Mango, the great Chan of Tartarie, ſtirred by Aitonius the Armenian king, by whoſe perſuaſion he had alſo receiued the Chriſtian religion, ſent his brother Haalon with an exceeding great armie againſt the Turkes and Saraſins in Syria and the Land of Paleſtine. This Haalon (conuerted alſo vnto the Chriſtian faith by his wife) ſetting forward with a world of people following him, in the ſpace of ſix moneths ouerran all Perſia, with the countries adioyning, excepting one ſtrong place in the mountains, (which ſome ſay was Samarchand, afterward the royall ſeat of the great terror of the world, the mightie Tamerlane) which beſieged by ten thouſand horſemen, by him appointed for that purpoſe, and ſo continued by the ſpace B of ſeuen and twentie yeres after, was then at length (as Aiton himſelfe writeth) yeelded by the defendants, only for want of cloathes to couer their nakedneſſe. Haalon (in whoſe armie thoſe ten thouſand left behind were not miſſed, marching on, and as a violent tempeſt bearing all down before him, entred at length into Aſſiria, and there layd ſiege vnto the great citie of Babylon, then the ſeat of the great Caliph; whom all the Mahometan Princes honoured aboue all others, as the true ſucceſſor of their great Prophet Mahomet, and receiued from his mouth the interpretation of their law as moſt diuine oracles. Which great citie Haalon woon, and putting to ſword all he found therein, men, women, and children, with the ſpoile thereof, and the rich treaſures of the Caliph, inriched his ſouldiers. The Caliph himſelfe (reſerued for that purpoſe) he commanded to be ſet in the middeſt of the infinite treaſure which he and his C predeceſſors had moſt couetouſly heaped vp together, and that he ſhould of that gold, ſiluer, and precious ſtones take what it pleaſed him to eat, ſaying (by way of deriſion) That ſo gainfull a gueſt ſhould by good reaſon be fed with nothing but things of greateſt price, whereof he willed him to make no ſpare: in which order the couetous wretch kept for certaine dayes, miſerably died with hunger, in the middeſt of thoſe things whereof he thought he ſhould neuer haue had enough; which though they were in valew great, and with great care laid together, yet ſerued they him not now to ſuffice nature, beſt contented with a little. Babylon thus ſacked, and almoſt raſed, the Tartar marching on through Meſopotamia, by the way tooke the Citie Rhoais, where Aiton the Armenian King, and authour of this the Tartars expedition, came to him with twelue thouſand horſmen, and fortie thouſand foot, as reporteth Aiton D the Armenian Kings Nephew, then there preſent. So entring into Syria, in a few dayes tooke Aleppo, which he ſacked and raſed in the yeare of our Lord 1260. with diuers other ſtrong townes ſometime belonging vnto the Kingdome of Antioch. Then was one Malacneſar Sultan of Damaſco, commanding ouer all Syria and the land of Paleſtine: who terrified with the loſſe of his Cities, and the feare of farther danger, with his wife and children came and humbled himſelfe before the Tartar Prince, in hope ſo to haue ſaued vnto himſelfe ſome good part of his kingdome. Wherein he was much deceiued, beeing (as ſome ſay) carried away afarre off into exile, becauſe hee ſhould not hinder the Tartars proceedings: or as others report, (and happely with more probabilitie) being by him detained as his priſoner, and afterwards to the terrour of his ſonne, cut in pieces in his ſight vnder the walles of Damaſco, after E that it had in vaine been twice aſſaulted by the Tartars: which ſtrong citie for all that hee afterwards tooke by ſtrong hand, and ſacked it, and by the perſuaſion of his wife ouerthrew all the Mahometan temples, as hee had before in euery place where hee came. But purpoſing to haue gone on forward to Ieruſalem, and to haue conquered the whole land of Paleſtine, news was brought him of the death of his brother Mango, the great Chan: whereupon he ſtayd his iourney, and returned backe againe, in hope of that great empire; hauing in this expedition ſpent almoſt ſix yeares.

Thus by the Tartars was the kingdome of the Turks at Damaſco ouerthrowne. At which time, the broken affaires of the Chriſtians in Syria and the land of Paleſtine, might eaſily haue been repaired, and thoſe two goodly kingdomes againe reſtored to the Chriſtian Common- F weale, had the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt then in time put to their helping hand on the one ſide, as did the Tartars on the other: but they then at fatall diſcord amongſt themſelues, and buſied with their wars at home, let ſlip that ſo faire an opportunitie, the like whereof they ſeldome or neuer had ſince. Haalon the Tartar Prince, in token of his good wil toward the Chriſtians and their affaires, at his departure from Damaſco left his ſonne Abaga there with and empire,and to giue audience vnto the Embaſſadours of forreine nations, to want the honour G next vnto the Emperor,as well for the magnificence of the State,as for the credit of his place: whereupon he was both by the Patriarke and the yong Emperor honored with the title of the Deſpot,another ſtep vnto the empire. But what contentment finde the ambitious euen in the greateſt honours, ſo long as there is one aboue them? Little ſure, or none at all, more than that it ſerueth them to ſtep at next vp to the higheſt: as did this new made Deſpot, who ſhortly after,was by certain of the nobilitie his great fauorits,neere vnto Magneſia, with the great applauſe of the people,hoyſed vp and ſaluted Emperor. Whereof Arſenius the Patriarke hearing, was therewith much troubled, as fearing what would become of the young child,the right heire of the empire. And firſt he was about to haue excommunicated as well him that was made Emperor,as them that had ſo made him: but afterward changing his purpoſe, H for feare of greater troubles, he thought it better by ſolemne oath to bind both him and the reſt,that they ſhould not ſeek after the life of the child,or by any force or colour go about to depriue him of the Empire; which was ſo done. Yet it was not full a moneth after, but that euen he that had ſo great a care of the young child,and ſo prouided for his ſafetie, (perſuaded by them of the nobilitie and clergie) with his owne hands,and all the accuſtomed ceremonies, ſet the imperiall crowne vpon this vſurpers head; yet not as vpon him that ſhould ſtill enioy the empire,but as vpon a man according to the preſent neceſſitie of the time and ſtate,thought fitteſt for ſo great a charge, vntill the young child came to age; vnto whom then hee was to giue place,and to reſigne to him the Empire. Aleppo raſed by the Tartars.

About this time Mango, the great Chan of Tartarie, ſtirred by Aitonius the Armenian king, by whoſe perſuaſion he had alſo receiued the Chriſtian religion, ſent his brother Haalon with an exceeding great armie againſt the Turkes and Saraſins in Syria and the Land of Paleſtine. Theſe garriſon ſouldiers hauing by chance fet in ſome bootie out of the Tartars territorie, not onely refuſed to reſtore the ſame againe, but alſo foulely entreated ſuch as the Tartar had ſent for the demanding thereof. Whereupon further quarrels ariſing, it fortuned a nephew of Guirboca's, a valiant young gentleman, to be ſlaine: in reuenge whereof hee beſieged Sidon, and hauing taken it, ſacked it, and burnt it downe to the ground. After which time, hee and his Tartars became vtter enemies vnto the Chriſtians, doing them all the harme they could deuiſe.

The Ægyptian Sultan inuadeth Syria.

This diſcord betwixt the Tartars & the Chriſtians, gaue occaſion vnto Melech the Ægyptian Sultan, now iealous of the Tartars neerneſſe, with a great armie of his Mamalukes & others to enter into Syria, and to ſpoile the countrey of Damaſco; againſt whom Guirboca with his Tartars, although both in ſtrength and number far inferior, went out. But ioyning battell with him at too much odds, and the victorie inclining vnto that ſide where moſt ſtrength was, hee there valiantly fighting was ſlaine, with moſt part of his Tartars: ſuch as eſcaped fled into Armenia vnto the friendly king. By this victorie, all Syria, with the land of Paleſtine, excepting ſome few places holden by the Chriſtians, fell again into the hands of the Ægyptian Sultans; as did ſome of them ſhortly after alſo: for Bandocader ſucceeding Melech in the Mamaluke kingdome, comming into Syria with a great armie, tooke Antioch from the Chriſtians, and with it moſt of the places before by them defended. The citie he burnt, and raſed the Caſtle down to the ground, and afterward entring into Armenia, did there great harme alſo.

Whileſt the Turks kingdome thus goeth to wracke in Syria, ruinated by the Tartars, but poſſeſſed by the Mamalukes; their affairs in the leſſer Aſia, now the whole hope of that Nation, went not at that time much better: for Iathatines the Turks Sultan, there alſo inuaded by the Tartars, and hauing loſt Iconium his regall citie, fled with his brother Melech to the Greek Emperor Michael Paleologus, in hope to be of him relieued, for the kindneſſe hee had not long before ſhewed him in like caſe, when as he fled from the late emperor Theodore; whereof now putting him in remembrance, hee requeſted him either with ſome conuenient force to aid him, or elſe to aſſigne him ſome corner in his large empire, where he might in ſafetie reſt with his wife & children, and other followers, whom with much wealth he had brought with him in great number. The Emperor on euery ſide himſelfe incombred with warres, thought it not good in ſo great newneſſe of his empire, to diminiſh his owne forces: and to aſſigne vnto him any place to inhabit, ſeemed no leſſe dangerous; for that he hauing been a great Prince, and commanding ouer many great countries, and brought vp in all princely royaltie, was not like to content himſelfe with a little: beſide that, his nobility, then diſperſed by the Tartars, were like enough in great numbers to reſort vnto him, as vnto their head, ſo ſoone as they ſhould once heare that he were ſeated in any place: and vnkindly to caſt him off, that had ſo noblely vſed him in like extremitie, the Emperor was loath. And therefore feeding him vp with faire words, & foording him on from time to time with delays, he held him a great while as a man in ſuſpence, betwixt hope and deſpaire. At length in the abſence of the Emperor (though happily not without his priuitie) he was commanded with all his traine, in number about twelue hundred, to get him to Ænus a citie of Thracia, ſtanding vpon the ſea coaſt: where hee much diſcontented, liued like an honorable priſoner at large; but with the watchfull eyes of ſo many vpon him, as that he could by no meanes (as he deſired) eſcape. In which caſe we will for a while leaue him, to feed vpon his owne melancholy thoughts.

1261. Now had Michael Paleologus the Emperor raigned at Nice two yeares, when new troubles began again to ariſe in the Weſt part of his Empire in Europ ſide, by the treachery of Michael Angelus Deſpot of Epirus. For the ſpeedie repreſſing whereof, he ſent one Alexius Strategopulus, a worthie captaine, and a man of great nobilitie (whom for his good ſeruice againſt the ſaid Deſpot, he had in the beginning of his raigne made Cæſar) with little aboue 800 Bythinian Souldiers, and Commiſſion for the taking vp of ſo many mo as hee ſhould for that ſeruice need, in Macedonia and Thracia: commanding him when hee had paſſed the ſtreight, with thoſe

A thoſe ſouldiers to take his wayes thorough the ſuburbs of Conſtantinople, to terrifie the Latines, whom he was loth to ſuffer too long to liue in reſt and quiet, or to ſtirre too farre out of the gates, but to keepe them as priſoners coupt vp within the wals of the citie. This warlike captaine with this handfull of men, paſſing ouer Propontis, encamped at Regium, not farre from Conſtantinople; where by chance lighting vpon certain poore labouring men, Greeks borne in the citie, and there dwelling, hee diligently inquired of them the ſtate thereof, and of what ſtrength the Latines were, with many other things, ſuch as he was deſirous to know: who not onely told him that the ſtrength of the Latines was but ſmall, but alſo that the greateſt part thereof was gone to the ſiege of Daphnuſia, a towne not farre off vpon the ſide of the Euxine ſea: and withall (as Greekes euill affected to the gouernment of the Latines, and deſi- B rous of the libertie of their countrey) offered of themſelues to ſhew him a meanes how to giue him entrance into the citie. Theſe poore men dwelt within the citie, cloſe by one of the gates, neere whereunto by an old ruinous mine almoſt ſwarued vp, was a ſecret vnſuſpected way into the citie, not knowne to any but to themſelues: by this blind hole they promiſed him by night to receiue in fiftie of his beſt ſouldiers; which ſuddenly ſetting vpon the watch faſt by, and diſpatching them out of the way, might preſently breake open the gate, and ſo let in the reſt of the army: whereunto they promiſed themſelues with their friends to put to their helping hands, aſſuring him of the good ſucceſſe thereof. This plot for the betraying of the citie thus laid and agreed vpon, Alexius and Caeſar well rewarding the men, and filling them with greater promiſes ſent them away: who as if they had bin about their countrey work, were C after their wonted manner receiued into the citie, without ſuſpition at all. And within a few daies after according to their promiſe, at an appointed houre receiued in by night the aforeſaid fiftie ſouldiers; who aided by them, preſently ſlew the watch, and brake open the gate, whereby Alexius entring a little before day, in conuenient place put his men in order of battell, and afterward to the greater terror of the Latines, cauſed the citie to be ſet on fire in foure places, which increaſing with the winde, burnt in moſt terrible manner, and was in ſhort time come almoſt vnto the Emperors palace. Who ſcarce well awaked, and ſeeing the citie all on a fire about his eares, and the enemie comming on, was about at the firſt with thoſe few Latines that he had (for Greekes he had none) to haue made head againſt them. But better aduiſed, and perceiuing it to be now to no purpoſe, hee (the laſt of the Latine Emperors that euer raigned D in Conſtantinople) with Iuſtinian the Latine Patriarch, and ſome other of his friends, fled by ſea into Eubœa, and ſo from thence afterwards to Venice, and afterwards to Lewis the French King, in hope to haue beene by him and the Venetians relieued. After whom fled alſo all the reſt of the Latines. Thus the imperiall citie of Conſtantinople by great fortune fell againe into the hands of the Greekes, in the yeare 1261, after that it had beene in poſſeſſion of the Latines about 58 yeares.

The ioyful news of the recouerie of the imperiall citie, was in ſhort time carried vnto Michael Paleologus the Greeke Emperor at Nice; who at the firſt beleeued it not, as thinking it ſcarce poſſible, ſo ſtrong a citie to haue bin by ſo weake a power ſurpriſed, wheras he himſelfe not long before was not able with a right puiſſant army, and much other like prouiſion, to E win the caſtle of Galata ouer againſt it. But afterwards aſſured of the truth thereof, with his hands and eyes caſt vp towards heauen, gaue moſt heartie thanks to God therefore, cauſing hymnes and pſalmes of thankſgiuing to be ſolemnly ſung in euery church, with all the other ſignes of ioy and triumph that could be deuiſed. So ſetting all other things apart, hee wholly buſied himſelfe in making preparation for his going vnto Conſtantinople, now once again the ſeat of the Greeke empire: wherein, and in trauelling hauing ſpent many dayes, hee at length with the Empreſſe his wife and Andronicus his ſonne, then but two yeares old, as if it had been in ſolemne proceſſion, on foot entred into the citie, by the Gate called the Golden Gate; and ſo after prayers and thankes giuen, went to the palace prepared for him neere vnto the Tiltyard: for the other imperiall palaces of greater beautie (ſometime the ſtately dwellings of F the greateſt Emperours of the Greekes) had now of long during the raigne of the Latines, lien ruinous, or altogether defaced. And ſhortly after, becauſe vertue and true deſert ſhould not want their due honour, he cauſed Alexius Caeſar (by whoſe meanes the citie was recouered) in ſolemne triumph in his roabs of honour, with a crowne vpon his head, not much inferiour vnto the imperiall crowne, with great pompe to be carried thorow all the citie: and farther commanded, that his name for one yeare next following, in all ſolemne praiers and hymnes of thanſgiuing, ſhould be ioyned with the name of the Emperor himſelf. And yet not thinking to haue done him honour enough, cauſed his liuely image afterward to be moſt curiouſly made, and as a trophie to be ſet vpon a faire marble pillar, before the great church of the holy Apoſtles, in perpetuall remembrance of him, and that he had done for the deliuerie of his countrey; which ſhortly after ouerthrowne by an earthquake, was by his ſon againe reſtored. Now was this great and famous citie, ſometime the beautie of the world, by theſe ſtrange and fatall mutations, wonderfully defaced, and brought to great deſolation: in euery place was to be ſeene great heapes, or rather (to ſay the truth) great hils of rubbidge, the eternall witneſſes of the ruine thereof; the houſes ſtood ſome quite fallen downe, ſome readie to follow after, and ſome other great and ſtately buildings now the ſmall reliques of great fires: for the great beautie thereof was before, at ſuch time as the Latines tooke it, moſt defaced by fire; who all the time that they had it, ceaſed not night and day to deſtroy ſome part or other of it, as if they had knowne they ſhould not long keepe it; neither did this laſt fire raiſed by the Greeks themſelues to terrifie the Latins, a little deform it: for which cauſe the Emperors chiefe care now was to cleanſe the citie, and in beſt ſort he could to reform ſo great a confuſion of things not to be all at once amended; firſt beginning with the churches, which ruinous or ready to fall, he repaired; and next to that filled the emptie houſes with new inhabitants. And albeit that the chiefe of the Latines were together with the Emperour fled and gone, yet was the moſt part of the artificers and tradeſmen of the citie, Venetians, and of them of Piſa, mingled together; vnto whom alſo to ioyne the Genowaies, and ſo to fill the citie with Latines, he thought it not altogether ſafe, although that by them he reaped great profit: wherefore he aſſigned vnto them the citie of Galatia now called Pera, on the other ſide of the hauen, for them to inhabit; granting them great priuiledges, and euery of thoſe companies to be gouerned by a Conſull or Poteſtate of their owne. As for the imperiall citie it ſelfe, he ſtored it (ſo neere as he could) with naturall Greekes borne.

Now although all things went as Paleologus the Emperor could himſelfe haue wiſhed; yet could he not reſt ſo contented, for feare leſt thoſe which now did eat their owne hearts, and with great griefe ſmouldred their anger, ſhould at length as the rightfull heires of the empire by him vſurped, breake out into open force, and ſo breed him great troubles, yea and perhaps worke his confuſion. For ſuch is the tormenting ſtate of vſurping tyrants, neuer to think themſelues ſafe ſo long as any one liueth, whom they may ſuſpect. Wherefore at once to rid himſelfe of this feare, he thought it beſt ſo to diſpoſe of the children of the late Emperor, Theodorus Laſcaris, as that he ſhould not need of them to ſtand in doubt: to take them out of the way, beſides that it was a thing odious, he ſaw it like to be vnto him dangerous; Mary and Theodora (two of the eldeſt daughters) beeing before by their father married vnto two great Princes, (one the Deſpot of Epirus, and the other Prince of Bulgaria) with whom he had much before to do, and of them yet ſtood in ſome doubt; but theſe was ſafe enough out of his reach. Other two yonger ſiſters there were in his cuſtodie, Theodora and Irene, with their brother Iohn, the only heire of the empire: Theodora he married vnto one Belicurt, a gentleman of Peloponeſus; and Irene to one Vigintimilio of Genoa; both Latines, men of no great birth or power, ſuch as he needed not to ſtand in doubt of. Theſe two Ladies, the daughters of ſo great an Emperour as was Theodorus, thus baſely beſtowed; remained onely their brother Iohn, the onely heire of the empire, then but ten yeare old, whom Peleologus long before euen in the beginning of his raigne, had ſent vnto Magneſia, there to be ſafely kept farre off from the court, for feare leaſt in his right and quarrell ſome diſcontented perſons deſirous of innouation, ſhould now beginne ſome new ſtirres dangerous vnto his eſtate. Which indignitie done vnto the young Prince, Arſenius the Patriarch (put in truſt by his father for the bringing of him vp) tooke in ſo euill part, that he forſooke the court with all his eccleſiaſticall dignitie, and as a man weary of the world, retired himſelfe vnto a little monaſterie of Paſcaſins in the countrey, there to ſpend the reſt of his dayes. From whence for all that hee was after the taking of Conſtantinople from the Latines, almoſt againſt his will drawne thither by Paleologus the Emperour, and made Patriarch thereof, there together with ſo great an honour to finde his greater diſcontent. For Paleologus the vſurper, altogether vnmindfull of his faith ſo ſolemnly before giuen, for the ſafetie of the young Prince, and the reſtoring vnto him of his empire, and

A now fully reſolued to eſtabliſh vnto him and his poſteritie the ſoueraigntie of ſo great an empire, howſoeuer it was got, cauſed the yong Princes eies to be moſt cruelly put out: the vſual practiſe of the tyrants of the Eaſt, vpon ſuch as they are loth or feare to kill, and yet would make them vnfit for gouernment. Of which barbarous crueltie, his ſiſter Theodora (married to Conſtantinus Prince of Bulgaria) hearing, ceaſed not with teares and praiers and all other womanly perſuaſions, to ſtirre vp her husband in reuenge thereof: whereunto alſo Iathatines the Turkes Sultan, gaue no ſmall furtherance; who wearie of exile, and to bee ſo into a corner confined as into a priſon from whence he might not ſtart, by ſecret meſſengers intreated the Bulgarian Prince to make war vpon the vſurping Emperor: promiſing him a great ſumme of mony, if by his helpe he might recouer his former libertie. Wherewith hee the rather moued, B with a great power of his owne, and aboue twentie thouſand Tartars which then lay by the riuer Iſter, ſuddenly brake into the Emperours territories, and in ſhorter time than was to haue beene thought, ouerranne all the countrey of Thracia, euen vnto the Sea ſide, leauing neither man nor beaſt in all that countrey as hee went: in good hope alſo to haue by the way ſurpriſed the Emperour himſelfe, euen then returning from his warres againſt the Deſpot in Theſſalie: who hearing of his ſpeedie comming, beeing got vnto the Sea ſide, and (hauing no way left to haue eſcaped by land) ſhipped himſelfe into a Galley of the Latines, which with another, her conſort bound for Conſtantinople, by good hap put in there for to water, and ſo in two dayes arriued in ſafetie at the imperiall citie. Thus diſappointed of the Emperor, all his care was for the deliuerie of the Turks Sultan. Wherefore marching in haſt C to Ænum, he ſo terrified the citizens with his comming, that they without farther delay deliuered him into his hands, ſo to redeeme their owne peace. In his returne you might haue ſeene the ſouldiers, eſpecially the Tartars, driuing before them infinit numbers both of men and cattell, in ſuch ſort, as that in the open countrey of Thracia for a ſpace, was hardly to bee ſeene either countreyman or beaſt, it was ſo cleane ſwept both of inhabitants, and likewiſe of cattell.

Puleogus cauſeth the young Emperors eyes to be put out.

Iathatines the Sultan by the Tartars carried ouer Iſter, and ſo by them ſet at libertie, ſhortly after dyed. In whoſe kingdome ſucceeded not his ſonne Melikke (as ſome write) but two others (as the Turkes themſelues report) the one called Meſoot, the ſonne of Kei-Cubades, and the other Kei-Cubades, the ſonne of Feramcine, borne alſo of the Selzuccian family, as D were all the other Turkes Sultans, but how neere of blood vnto the late Sultan Iathatines they ſay not. Betwixt which two, as his vaſſals, Gazan the great Tartar Chan (by whome they were ſo preferred) for the payment of a yearely tribute, diuided the Turkes kingdome: apportioning vnto Meſoot the cities of Amida (in antient time called Amiſus, and Aminſus in Galatia, Melatia otherwiſe called Meletine in the leſſer Armenia, Siuaſte) in antient time Sebaſtia, and Harbarie, before Satabrea, both in Cappadocia, with all the countrey about them. And vnto Keicubades, Iconium, the antient ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultans, with all Rumilia, Aſiatica, or the countries of the leſſer Aſia alongſt the Sea coaſt; which theſe two Princes held as the Tartars tributaries, as had the late Sultan Iathatines before them, vntill ſuch time as hee was by the ſame Tartars againe expulſed. So that the Turkes kingdome, E which had of long time flouriſhed in the Selzuccian familie in Perſia, in Syria, Paleſtine, and Ægypt, there quite ouerthrowne by the Mamalukes and Tartars (as is before declared) and now brought vnderfoot in the leſſer Aſia alſo, where onely reſted all the hope of that Nation, was now at a low ebbe, diuided betwixt two weake Princes, raigning but at the deuotion of the Tartar. In which confuſion of the Turkiſh empire, ſo rent, not onely diuers men of greater power and authoritie amongſt them, ſhared vnto themſelues, ſome one corner of the declining kingdome, and ſome another; but many of the obſcure and baſeſt people alſo, bearing with them nothing but their bowes and arrowes, tooke the ſtrait paſſages of the mountaines, and from thence with their dayly incurſions, did much harme in the countries of the Chriſtians ioyning vpon them: which was no great matter for them to doe, the garriſons which were woont to defend the ſame, beeing for want of pay quite disbanded, and the Caſtles vpon the frontiers by them abandoned; which at the firſt, as a thing of ſmall importance neglected, was at length vnto the Greekes a great cauſe of the ruine and decay of the greateſt part of their eſtate in Aſia. Theſe miſchiefes vnregarded, grew dayly more and more, the Turkes ſtill gayning vpon the Greekes what they loſt vnto the Tartars. Whoſe inuaſions (the glorie of their kingdome onely excepted) was not ſo hurtfull vnto them, as the cauſe of their much greater felicitie afterwards. At length it fortuned, that a great power of theſe aduenturous Turks meeting together in Paphlagonia, were about to haue inuaded the territotries of the Chriſtians: againſt whom Michael Paleologus the Emperour ſent out a ſtrong and puiſſant armie to ſtay their further comming on, leaſt breaking in that way, they ſhould without reſiſtance at their pleaſure forrage the countrey before them. Which army conducted by vnskilfull captaines, encountering with the Turks, was by them in a great battel ouerthrowne and vtterly defeated, few or none of all that great multitude eſcaping: for whileſt the Greekes vnaduiſedly purſued the Turks, retiring of purpoſe before them, they were by them drawne into the danger of a greater power lying in ambuſh for them, and ſo entrapped, were ſlaine with an exceeding great ſlaughter. After which ſo great a victorie (the beginning of the miſerie of the Chriſtians in the leſſer Aſia) the Turks without let or ſtay ouerranne all the countrey, vnto the riuer Sangarius: vpon the bankes whereof the Greeke Emperour was glad to fortifie diuers townes and forts to keepe them out of Bithynia. Neuertheleſſe they in ſhort time after ſubdued all the countries, from Pontus and Galatia, vnto the Lycian and Carian Sea, and the riuer Eurymedon, which they diuided amongſt them into diuers Toparchies: little or nothing acknowledging the ſoueraigntie eyther of Meſoot, or Kei-Cubades.

Whileſt the Turks in the leſſer Aſia thus win from the Chriſtians on the one ſide, and loſe to the Tartars on the other, many an hard conflict in the mean time paſſed betwixt the Ægyptian Sultans with their Mamalukes, and the Tartars, for the ſoueraigntie of Syria. The poore remainder of the Chriſtians all that while there, in doubt both of the one and of the other: from whom and from the Armenians (then alſo much infeſted with the Mamalukes) diuers embaſſadors were ſent vnto the Pope and the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to craue their aid and helpe in that their hard eſtate: whoſe prayers little preuailing with the reſt, yet ſo mooued Lewis the French King, and Henry the third, then raigning in England, that they both promiſed them aid. Whereupon Lewis a man of a great deuotion, and alwaies forward in that ſeruice againſt the Infidels, tooke vpon him the Croſſe, the cogniſance of the ſacred war; cauſing his three ſons, Philip that ſucceeded him in the kingdome, ſurnamed the Faire, Peter countie of Alangon, and Iohn Countie of Neuers (ſurnamed Triſtan, for that his mother was in her greateſt heauines for the taking of her husband, deliuered of him in Ægypt) and moſt of the nobilitie of France to doe the like: vnto whom alſo Theobald King of Nauar his ſon in law, Alphonſus his brother, and Guydo Earle of Flanders, ioyned themſelues. And ſo hauing put all things in readines, tooke his way to Marſeilles, and from thence embarking himſelfe with his armie in the Genoway ſhips, hired for that purpoſe, ſet forward the firſt of March, in the yere 1270.

Carthage beſieged by K. Lewis.

But being at ſea, he was by force of weather conſtrained to land in Sardinia, and there to ſtay a while: departing thence, he at length arriued at Carthage, the place by him deſired; where in the entrance of the hauen he ſurpriſed certaine of the enemies ſhips; but landing his men, and aſſaulting the towne, he was there notably repulſed. This is not that antient, great, and famous city, which ſometime mightily ſtroue with the proud Miſtreſſe of the world for ſoueraigntie, but another built long after in the ruines, or at leſt not far from the ruines of the ſame. In the beſieging whereof, the Frenchmen found ſuch reſiſtance, as wel put them in remembrance of the antient glory of the Carthaginians. One day it fortuned as the King thus lay at the ſiege, that the defendants made a great & fierce ſallie out vpon the Frenchmen, who before commanded ſo to do, by little and little retired, to draw their enemies further on; betwixt whom & the citie, the Conſtable with a great power comming in & charging them behind, and they which before retired now ſtanding cloſe vnto them, they were on both ſides hardly beſet; who for al that, as became valiant men, worthily defended themſelues, & made there a great fight, though not without extreame perill: which they in the citie beholding, gaue out a moſt hideous and piteous cry, a certain ſigne of their hard eſtate within; aſtonying with the ſuddennes thereof, both their friends & their enemies. But whilſt they of the town betwixt hope & diſpair ſtood thus beholding the fight at land, the Frenchmen by ſea approching a bulwarke on that ſide of the town, took it without reſiſtance: which ſo diſmaid thē without, that they began forthwith to flie, of whom the greateſt part caſting away their weapons, were by the Kings commandement taken to mercy; and they likwiſe of the town vpon promiſe of their liues, yeelded the

A ſame vnto the King. Carthage thus woon, the King laid ſiege vnto Tunes, the chiefe citie of that kingdome, beeing not far off: where by the way he was encountred by the King of the countrey, who hauing there loſt ten thouſand of his Moores, betooke himſelfe to flight with the reſt. Who thus ouerthrowne, reſolued no more to tempt fortune, but to keepe himſelfe ſafe within the wals of his city, if happily ſo he might (as it oftentimes falleth out) more weaken his enemies by lying ſtill and protracting the time, than by open force and valour. Which their purpoſe King Lewis perceiuing, reſolued not to ſtir from thence vntill that hee were become maſter of the citie, which as it ſeemed, could not hold out for want of victuals, conſidering the multitude of people that were got into it. Neuertheleſſe thus beſieged both by ſea and land, and ſo ſtraitly hemmed in on euery ſide, as that no reliefe could poſſibly be brought B vnto it; yet held it out by the ſpace of ſix moneths. After which time wants daily more and more increaſing amongſt the beſieged, embaſſadours were ſent out to the King, to intreat with him of peace. But whileſt theſe embaſſadours goe to and fro, and reaſon vpon the capi-tulations of the deſired peace, behold a great and furious plague aroſe in the French campe, which began to cut them downe by heapes: there dyed Iohn Triſtan Countie of Neuers, the Kings youngeſt ſonne, borne in the firſt expedition that the ſaid King his father made into the holy Land, euen at ſuch time as he was taken priſoner; which Triſtan dyed the 25 day of Auguſt in the yeare of our Lord 1270. The good King hauing yet ſcarcely performed the obſequies of his ſonne, fell ſicke of the bloudie flix, whereof he there ſhortly after died alſo. About which time arriued there Charles King of Sicilie, the French Kings brother, with a great C number of freſh ſouldiers: whoſe comming lightned ſomewhat the Frenchmens hearts (heauie for the death of their King) and daunted the Moores, before bragge of the ſame. Shortly after whom arriued there alſo Prince Edward, King Henry the third his eldeſt ſonne, who tra-uelling thorough France, and taking ſhipping at Aqueſmort, not farre from Marſeilles, was now in ten dayes with a braue companie of Engliſhmen come to Tunes; and there of the other Chriſtian Princes, namely of Philip the French King (his father Lewis being now dead) of Charles King of Sicilie, and of the two Kings of Nauar and Aragon, ioyfully receiued.
But theſe Princes had a little before his ariual concluded a peace with the Moors King, & the Infidels, vpon condition that hee ſhould pay a yeerely tribute of fortie thouſand crownes vnto the King of Sicilia; and to ſuffer the Chriſtian religion to bee freely preached in his do-D minions, by ſuch deuout perſons as ſhould bee there left for that purpoſe; and that vnto ſuch as ſhould by their preaching be conuerted vnto the faith in Chriſt Ieſus, it ſhould bee lawfull for them to be baptized, and to profeſſe the Chriſtian religion. Of which peace, Prince Edward vnderſtanding, did what hee might to haue diſſuaded them from the ſame; ſaying, that the warre was by them al taken in hand againſt the Infidels, as enemies to the croſſe of Chriſt, with whom they were not to haue peace: and for the recouerie of the Holy Citie. But ſay what he would, and doe what hee could, the peace (to his great diſcontentment) was now concluded, which they might not (as they ſayd) againe breake: and thereupon with the firſt faire winde hoiſed ſaile, and returned towards Sicilia, with purpoſe the next Spring to haue gone into Syria; which their determination was ſhortly after by the hand of God diſappoin-E ted. For beeing come vpon the coaſt of the Iſland not farre from Drepanum, moſt of the great Princes and other Nobilitie, in their long boats went on land, the reſt of the fleet lying at anker about a league off; for that being for the moſt part ſhips of great burthen they were not able to put into the harbour: But as they ſo lay, by force of a ſudden and violent tempeſt then ariſing, ſome were eaten vp with the rough ſea; ſome falling foule one of another, there periſhed together; others driuen vpon the maine, were there beaten in peeces: ſo that of that great fleet before the ſtorme ceaſed, periſhed about an hundred and twentie ſaile, with all the people, as well marriners as ſouldiers left in them, and great ſtore both of armour and munition: In ſuch ſort that moſt of the common ſouldiers and marriners which had eſcaped the plague at Tunes, there vpon the coaſt of Sicilia periſhed by ſhipwracke. Onely Prince Edwards fleet, beeing in number but thirteene ſhips, eſcaped free without loſſe either of ſhip or man. Neither were they that were got to land at Drepanum in much better caſe, the plague ſtill following them; whereof dyed Theobald King of Nauar; and Iſabel his wife, King Lewis his daughter; Elizabeth the French Queene, with a wonderfull number of noble gentlemen, and other common ſouldiers; in ſuch ſort that that Philip the French King Prince Edward arriueth at Ptolemais.

diſcouraged with the greatnes of the mortalitie, and the miſerable loſſe at ſea, reſolued there G to make an end of the intended war, and ſo returned into France, as did the reſt that were left, euery man into his own country. Only Prince Edward hauing paſſed that Winter in Sicilia, with the firſt of the next Spring ſet forward again on his voyage, and in 15 dayes after arriued with his fleet at Ptolemais: where after he had by the ſpace of a moneth reſted himſelfe and his ſouldiers after their long trauell, and fully inquired of the ſtate of the country, he with ſix or ſeuen thouſand ſouldiers marching from Ptolemais about twentie miles into the Land, tooke Nazareth, and put to ſword all them hee found therein, and ſo againe returned. After whom the enemies following, in hope to haue taken him at ſome aduantage, hee vnderſtanding therof, turned backe vpon them, and killing a great number of them, put the reſt to flight. And after that about Midſummer, vnderſtanding that the Saraſins were againe making head H at a place called Cakhow, about fortie miles off, he ſet forwards towards them, and comming vpon them early in the morning before they were aware, ſlew aboue a thouſand of them, and diſperſed the reſt. Ayded alſo by the Nobilitie of Cyprus, hee with like ſucceſſe as before, made a third expedition againſt the Turks & Infidels: inſomuch that his fame began to grow great amongſt them, and they to ſtand of him in no little dread. But whileſt hee thus preuailed, he was by foule treacherie almoſt taken out of the way. The Admirall of Ioppa faigning himſelfe deſirous to become a Chriſtian, and willing to further the Princes proceedings, had by a ſecret meſſenger and letters ſundrie times intelligence with him, as well concerning his owne good entertainment, as the effecting of that which he had promiſed. This meſſenger by the Admirall thus employed, was (though to the Prince vnknowne) one of the Aſſaſines, a I companie of moſt deſperate and dangerous men among the Mahometans, who ſtrongly deluded with the blind zeale of their ſuperſtition, and accounting it meritorious, by any means to kill any great enemie of their religion; for the performance thereof, as men prodigall of their liues, deſperatly aduenture themſelues vnto all kinde of dangers. So now this meſſenger, being reſolued to die, comming the fift time vnto the Prince, and being ſearched for hauing any weapon about him, as the manner was, had acceſſe vnto him, then lying in his chamber vpon his bed, in his ierkin, bare headed, becauſe of the heat of the weather: where after due reuerence done, he pulled out certaine letters from his Lord vnto the Prince, which he read with great delight, as penned of purpoſe for to pleaſe. But as he was further queſtioning with him of many matters, and all the companie voided, the deſperate meſſenger making as though hee K would haue pulled out ſome other ſecret letters, ſuddenly pluckt out an enuenomed knife, which hee had ſecretly hidden about him, thinking to haue ſtrucke him into the bellie as hee lay: for the auoiding of which ſtroke, the Prince lifting vp his arme, was therein grieuouſly wounded. But as the villaine was about to haue doubled the ſtroke, the Prince with his foot gaue him ſuch a blow, that he felled him to the ground, and with that ſtarting vp, caught him by the hand, where in ſtrugling with him for the knife, in wreſting it out of his hand, he hurt himſelfe therewith in the forehead; but getting it from him, preſently thruſt it into the murtherers bellie, and ſo ſlew him. The Princes ſeruants being not farre off, and hearing the buſtling, came running in; where finding the meſſenger dead on the floore, one of them with a ſtoole beat out his braines: whereat the Prince tooke ſome diſpleaſure, for ſo ſtriking a dead L man. This danger of the Princes much troubled and grieued all the Chriſtians in Syria; and the more, for that the wound in his arme, after it had beene certaine dayes well dreſſed by the skilfull Surgeons and Phyſitians, began to mortifie and grow blacke, inſomuch, that they and others about him began to mutter among themſelues, and to looke heauily vpon the matter, as not without danger. Which hee perceiuing, ſayd vnto them, Why whiſper you thus amongſt your ſelues? What ſee you in mee? Can I not be healed? Tell mee the truth and feare not. Whereunto one of them anſwered; And like your Highneſſe, wee doubt not of your healing, but that it will be painfull for you to ſuffer. If ſuffering (ſayd he) may againe reſtore my health, I commit my ſelfe vnto you, worke on mee your skill, and ſpare not. So the next day they cut out all the dead and poyſoned fleſh out of his arme, and in fifteene M dayes after perfectly cured his wouud, to the great reioycing of all his people. The great Sultan to cleere himſelfe of this ſo diſhonourable a treacherie, ſent three of his noblemen vnto the Prince, calling to witneſſe his falſe Prophet, That the ſame was done neyther by him nor his conſent. Which Embaſſadours the Prince honourably vſed, but ſuffered

A them not to come nigh him. So hauing tarried eighteene moneths at Ptolemais, and no ayd comming from the other Chriſtian princes, as was expected, he tooke ſhipping, and returning homeward, landed firſt in Sicilia, and from thence croſſing ouer into Apulia, and ſo trauelling to Rome, was there honorably entertained by Gregorie the tenth, then Pope; and from thence by the way of France arriued in England, where he was ſhortly after crowned king, in the yere 1272. his father the old King, Henrie the third, being a little before his returne dead.

Rodulph the Emperour taketh vpō him the Croſſe.

The yeare following, Gregorie the tenth, not ignorant of the hard eſtate of the Chriſtians in Syria, (as hauing there bin of late himſelfe with Prince Edward, at which time he was in his abſence elected Pope) and now deſirous to procure them ſome reliefe, ratified the election of Rodulphus of Hapſpurge vnto the Empire; vpon condition, That hee ſhould promiſe to take B vpon himſelfe the Croſſe, and to giue them reliefe: for the performance whereof he offered vnto the Emperour two hundred thouſand crownes, with the tenths both of the Clergie and Temporaltie for ſix yeres: and many goodly bleſſings were in his name alſo, by the preachers of that time, promiſed vnto all ſuch as ſhould with him take vpon them that ſacred warre. Whereupon the Emperour with all his familie tooke vpon them the Croſſe, the ſigne of the ſacred expedition intended: as did alſo the Duke of Lorraine ſhortly after, with ſome others. Neuertheleſſe the Emperour, otherwiſe buſied in warres againſt the Bohemians and Bauarians, and delaying ſtill the time, as not greatly willing to take vpon him ſo long and dangerous a journey, and the Pope ſtill threatning his high ſentence of excommunication, the time paſſed, the Pope died, and nothing was as yet done. Vntill that at length the Emperour hauing C happily finiſhed his warres in Bohemia, and finding himſelfe at ſome good leiſure in ſome part to diſcharge his vow, and to ſatisfie the expectation the world had of long conceiued of him, ſent Henrie Prince of Megapolis, or as the Germanes call it, Meckelbourg, with a ſtrong power into Syria, to performe what himſelfe had promiſed. Who comming to Ptolemais, made many notable incurſions into the countrie about Damaſco, with fire and ſword deſtroying all before him as he went, and carrying thence many great and rich booties; vntill that at length hee was by the Mamalukes circumuented and taken priſoner, and ſo carried vnto the Sultan at Caire, where he remained in ſtrait priſon ſix and twentie yeares after; vntill that by chance one of the Mamalukes (a renegate Germane) beeing choſen Sultan, cauſed him to be brought before him, and at his comming demanded of him, If it would not doe him good to D celebrate the remembrance of the natiuitie of his Chriſt with his friends in Germanie? (for now that time of the yere was at hand) And I know (ſaid the Sultan) that thou art ſo addicted vnto thy ſuperſtition, that thou reſpecteſt the ſame more than thy libertie. Truth (ſaid Henry) mightie Prince, for libertie would auaile me nothing, if Chriſt by his moſt mild incarnation had not taken away our captiuitie: and therefore how much all men owe vnto the reuerend remembrance thereof, I would to God thou, ô King, didſt alſo vnderſtand; which as I moſt heartily wiſh, ſo I would I could thereof perſuade thee. God forbid (ſaid the Sultan) for I remember that when as I was chiefe enginer vnto thy father at Kneſe-Fenicke in Liuonia, and there did him good ſeruice, I was altogether of the Chriſtian perſuaſion; but now hauing left that common error, haue therewith alſo changed my priuat fortune. But as for thy Religion E I haue nothing to ſay, my talke is onely concerning thy libertie: Wouldeſt thou therefore gladly be free, and ſo returne home to thy friends? That, Nature craueth (ſayd Henry) although my fortune gainſayeth, which yet dependeth of your pleaſure: I deſire indeed to returne home, which if you ſhould denie me, I muſt as I haue done, take it in good part; aſſuring my ſelf, that my wife Anaſtaſia, with my beloued ſons, Henry, Leo, and Iohn, haue long ſince celebrated my funerals, and ended their mourning. Thou art deceiued, (ſaid the Sultan) for I am ſure that they know thou yet liueſt, and pray moſt heartily for thy returne. Truly I owe much vnto the remembrance of thy father, and therefore this day giue thee thy liberty. And hauing ſo ſaid, furniſhed him with all things neceſſary, and gaue him leaue to depart with one Martin his ſeruant, who taken with him, had borne him companie all the long time of his captiuitie. F So taking his leaue of the Sultan, hee came to Ptolemais: but ſhipping himſelfe for Cyprus, hee was by the way by certaine Pyrats taken at ſea, and as a fugitiue captiue brought backe againe vnto the Sultan: who pittying his hard fortune, ſet him againe at libertie, and by a ſhip ſet out for that purpoſe, tranſported him into Cyprus: where he was by the Queene of that

Henr. the prince taken priſoner, & ſent to Caire

Iſland his aunt (as ſome ſay) honourably entertained, and ſo furniſhed of all things fit for his eſtate. Departing thence he came to Marſeilles, where after he had ſome few dayes refreſhed himſelfe, he from thence trauelled by land home into his owne Countrey: where at the firſt he was not knowne of his owne children and friends, as being grown old in priſon, & by them long before accounted among the dead; but now at laſt found againe, and by them known, he was of his children ioyfully receiued as their father, and of his ſubiects as their Prince. Howbeit he ſhortly after died, and was honorably buried in the monaſterie of Dobran.

Thus in the whole courſe of this hiſtorie it appears, by that which is already written, what notable expeditions euen the greateſt Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to their immortal glory, from time to time vndertooke againſt the enemies of Chriſt, and his moſt ſacred word, & for the reliefe of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria and in the land of Paleſtine: whereof as diuers of them had right glorious ſucceſſe, vnto the great profit of the Chriſtian Commonweale; ſo ſome of them anſwered not with like euent, as vndertaken with too ſmal ſtrength, or otherwiſe ouerthrown by the diſcord or malice of the Chriſtians themſelues, rather than by the enemies force. Which neuertheleſſe how vnfortunatly ſoeuer they fel out in the hands of ſuch worthie men as vndertooke them, yet haue they this glory, commendation, and comfort, That they were taken in hand for the honor of the Son of God, Chriſt Ieſus, and the defence of his veritie, againſt the falſe Prophet Mahomet, & his moſt blaſphemous doctrine; ſo honorable and iuſt a quarrel as might well beſeeme the greatnes of the greateſt Prince, yea of all the Princes of Chriſtendome. Yet could not the worthines therof, euen in thoſe more zealous times, or the dangerous eſtate of that part of the Chriſtian commonweale, euen then like to periſh, (as ſome others be now) or the lamentable complaints of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians, crying out vnto their Chriſtian brethren for aid, any whit mooue the Chriſtian princes of that time, with their combined forces to reach vnto them their helping hands, or to yeeld vnto them any ſuccor or reliefe: for they little feeling thoſe harmes ſo far off, & more regarding their owne hereditarie quarrels, employed thoſe forces one againſt another, vnto the effuſion of ſo much Chriſtians bloud, as might haue ſufficed not for relief of the diſtreſſed Chriſtians in Syria onely, but alſo to haue regained whatſoeuer had been before from them taken by the Turkes or Saraſins. The German Princes were ſtil at a iarre about the choice of their Emperors: the French agreed not with the Engliſh, or them of the Low-countries: neither the Engliſh with the Scots: the Arragonians were at odds with the French: and in Italy were almoſt as many deadly factions as prouinces. Of which diſcord of the Chriſtians (the greateſt occaſion of their ruin and decay) Melechſares the Ægyptian Sultan vnderſtanding by his eſpials, raiſed a great armie of the Mamalukes and others, with a full purpoſe to haue vtterly rooted out all the remainders of the Chriſtians in Syria and the land of Paleſtine, and ſo to haue entirely ioyned thoſe two great countries vnto his owne kingdome. But what he had ſo miſchieuouſly deuiſed, hee liued not to bring to paſſe, beeing in the midſt of thoſe his great deſignes taken away by ſudden death. After whom Alphix (or as ſome cal him, Elpis) ſucceeding him in the Kingdome, & with a puiſſant armie entring into Syria, laid ſiege to Tripolis, which he at length tooke by vndermining of it, and put to ſword all the Chriſtians therein (except ſuch as by ſpeedie flight had in time got themſelues out of the danger) & raſed the city down to the ground: which calamitie betided vnto the Chriſtians the ninth of Aprill in the yeare 1289. Preſently after, he had the ſtrong caſtle of Neleſine yeelded vnto him, whereinto he put a ſtrong garriſon, to hinder the Chriſtians from building againe the late deſtroyed city. In like manner alſo he tooke the cities of Sidon and Berythus, which he ſacked, and laid them flat with the ground. And after that, hee remooued to Tyre, which after three moneths ſtraight ſiege, was by the Citiſens (now out of all hope of reliefe) yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That they might with bagge and baggage in ſafetie depart. With like good fortune hee in good time, and as it were without reſiſtance, tooke all the reſt of the ſtrong Townes and Caſtles which the Chriſtians yet held in Syria and the land of Paleſtine, excepting onely the Citie of Ptolemais; whereunto all the poore Chriſtians fled as vnto a Sanctuarie, to be there defended by the honourable Knights Templars and Hoſpitallers. Nothing now left vnto them more than that ſtrong Citie, the Sultan of his owne accord made a peace with them for the ſpace of fiue yeares, fearing (as was ſuppoſed) to haue drawne vpon him all the Chriſtian Princes Princes of the Weſt, if hee ſhould at once haue then vtterly rooted out all the Chriſtians in thoſe countries together.

The Chriſtians affaires thus brought to the laſt caſt in Syria, and yet faintly as it were breathing, by the benefit of the late obtained peace, Peter Belaiſe maſter of the Templars, with the grand maſter of the Knights Hoſpitallers, ſuddenly paſſed ouer (as Embaſſadors from the reſt) into Europe, vnto Nicholaus quartus then Pope, crauing his fatherly ayd. Who mooued with ſo great miſeries of the poore afflicted Chriſtians, ſolicited the other Chriſtian princes to haue ſent them reliefe; eſpecially Rodolph the Germane Emperour, who then buſied with the affaires of the empire, and his troubles neerer home, (as were the other Chriſtian Princes alſo) gaue good words, but no helpe at all. Yet ſome of them vnder the colour thereof, got from their ſubiects great ſummes of money, which they imployed to their other worſe vſes: onely the Pope ſent fifteene hundred men at armes, whom with deuout perſuaſion, and much earneſt preaching, he had induced to take vpon them that ſacred expedition, and entertained them of his owne charge: vnto whom alſo many others out of diuers countries, vpon a religious zeale, ioyned themſelues as voluntarie men: who meeting together at Brunduſium, and there imbarked with the two graund maſters of the Templars and Hoſpitallers, in ſafetie at length arriued at Ptolemais. There was then in the citie a great number of people of all ſorts; of able men there was about fiftie thouſand, and about fortie thouſand of the weaker ſort: amongſt whom, diuers murders, felonies, rapes, and ſuch other ſhamefull outrages, (all haſting the dreadfull iudgments of God) were dayly committed, and let paſſe vnregarded, more than of them that were iniured. For all the chief commanders were then at variance among themſelues, euery one of them laying claim (not worth a ruſh) vnto the vaine title of the kingdome of Ieruſalem. Henrie King of Cyprus comming thither with a great fleet, charged the Templars to deliuer him the Crowne of that kingdome, which they had (as he ſaid) wrongfully taken from Almericus and Guy his Aunceſtors. And Charles King of Sicilia by his Embaſſadors layd claime vnto the title of that Kingdome, as due vnto the Kings of that Iſland: and vnderſtanding it to be giuen vnto Henrie King of Cyprus, cauſed all the reuenues of the Templars within his dominion, to be brought into his Treaſuries, and their lands & houſes to be ſpoyled. Hugh alſo, Prince of Antioch, laboured with tooth and naile, to defend the outworne right that his father and grandfather had vnto that loſt Kingdome. And the Countie of Tripolis layd in for himſelfe, That hee was diſcended from Raymund of Tholous; and that beſide himſelfe, remained no Prince of the antient Nobilitie, which had woon that kingdome out of the hands of the Saraſins, and that therefore that regall dignitie did not of better right appertaine vnto any other than vnto himſelfe. Neither did theſe foure Princes more ſtriue for the title of the loſt Kingdome, than for the preſent gouernment of the Citie, ſtraightway about to periſh. The Popes Legate pretending thereunto a right alſo, for that King Iohn Brenne had before ſubiected it vnto the See of Rome. As for the claime vnto the Citie of Ptolemais, the Patriarke of Ieruſalem challenged vnto himſelfe the preheminence, for that the Metropoliticall Citie of Tyre (vnder which the Citie of Ptolemais was the third Epiſcopall Seat) was vnder his iuriſdiction, euen by the Decree of the Weſt Church. The Templars alſo, and the Knights Hoſpitallers, whoſe power in the Citie was at that time farre the greateſt, pretended the gouernment thereof of beſt right to belong vnto them, as the iuſt reward of their bloud, alreadie and afterward to bee ſpent in the defence thereof: promiſing great matters if it might be wholly referred vnto them. Neither ſpared the French King, or the King of England, by their meſſengers to claime the ſoueraigntie of the citie, by their predeceſſors ſometimes woon. And they of Piſa hauing ſtill a Conſul therein, and by often marriages with the naturall inhabitants, grown into great affinitie with them, did what they might to get the gouernment into their hands. The Venetians alſo by their authoritie and great wealth, laboured to gaine the good will of the people, ſparing therein no coſt. And they of Genoa, no leſſe cunning than the reſt, ſupplanted the ſtrongeſt factions, by giuing aid both apertly and couertly vnto the weaker; that ſo hauing weakned the faction they moſt doubted and hated, they might by the ioynt fauour of the weaker, aſpire vnto the gouernment of the ſtronger, and ſo conſequently of the citie it ſelfe. The Florentines alſo by their continual traffique thither, were not out of hope, by one fineneſſe or other, amongſt ſo many competitors, to find a meane to ſtep vp aboue the reſt. But the greateſt part of the people for all that were G moſt inclined vnto the Armenians and Tartars, as both for their neerneſſe & power moſt like of all other to ſtand them in ſtead. All theſe aimed at one marke, which was, the gouernment and commaund of the Citie; and moſt of them had in the ſame their owne proper lawes and courts, to decide their cauſes and controuerſies in. Whereby it came to paſſe, that euerie man might without checke or controlement almoſt doe what he liſt, the offendors from one court to another, remoouing their ſuits as beſt ſerued their turnes. Thus were murders (as is before ſayd) dayly committed in the ſtreets, men abuſed, houſes robbed, ſhops broken vp, and many other outrages done, to the haſtning of the wrath of God, and griefe of all good men.

Ptolemais beſieged.

Ptolemais in vain aſſaulted by the Sultan.

1291. Diuiſion and diſſention (the ruine of all Common-weales) thus raigning in the Citie, the ſouldiers of late ſent thither, or in zeale come of themſelues, for the defence thereof, gaue H occaſion for the more ſpeedie deſtruction of the ſame: Such is the power of the Almightie, in his wrath and iudgements for ſinne, euen by thoſe things wherein we moſt truſt and ioy, to worke out vtter ruine and deſtruction. Theſe Souldiers, for want of ſuch pay as was promiſed them, were enforced to ſeeke abroad; and therefore contrarie to the league before made with the Ægyptian Sultan, oftentimes went out in great parties into the frontiers of his territories, taking the ſpoyle of ſuch things as they light vpon. Whereof the Sultan vnderſtanding, demaunded by his Embaſſadors, That reſtitution might be made, and the offendors deliuered vnto him to be puniſhed, according vnto the League. But in that ſo ſicke a ſtate of a dying Commonweale, neither was reſtitution made, as reaſon would, or yet the Embaſſadours courteouſly heard. With which inſolencie the Sultan prouoked, ſent Emilech Araphus a notable I Captaine, (and as ſome ſay, his ſonne) with an hundred and fiftie thouſand men, to beſiege the Citie: who comming thither, and hauing made his approches, had by a mine in ſhort time ouerthrowne a piece of the wall; but in ſeeking to haue entred by the breach, hee found ſuch ſtrong reſiſtance, that hee was glad with loſſe to retyre. Whileſt Araphus thus lay at the ſiege of Ptolemais, Alphir the Sultan died at Damaſco: in whoſe ſtead the Mamalukes made choice of this Araphus for their Sultan; who more deſirous of nothing, than of the glorie of the vtter rooting vp of the Chriſtians in Syria, was ſo farre from raiſing of his ſiege, (either for the death of the Sultan, or the newes of his Kingdome) that he more ſtraitly beſet the citie than he had in the three moneths ſpace that he had there lien before. Now had they in the citie choſen Peter the maſter of the Templars, their gouernor; a man of great expe- K rience and valour: vnto whom, and the reſt of the nobilitie, the Sultan offered great rewards, and vnto the ſoldiers their pay, with free libertie to depart, ſo that they would without more adoo yeeld vnto him the city, which they could not long hold. Which his offer the maſter reiected, and flatly told him, That he had not learned of his anceſtors, to ſel for money vnto the Infidels a Citie bought with ſo much Chriſtian bloud; either did ſo much regard his vaine threats, as therefore to forget his ſeruice due vnto his Sauior Chriſt and the Chriſtian Commonweale. With which anſwer the tyrant inraged, the next day with all his forces aſſaulted the citie, and that in ſuch deſperat and furious manner, as if hee would euen then haue carried it; hauing before filled the ditches, and promiſed the ſpoyle vnto his ſouldiers, the more to encourage them. Yet hauing done what he could, and loſt a number of his men, ſlaine both in L the aſſault, and in a ſallie which the Chriſtians made out at the ſame time, he was enforced to retyre backe againe into his trenches. In this ſo terrible an aſſault, not repulſed without ſome loſſe alſo of the Chriſtians, the grand maſter and gouernour of the citie was wounded with a poyſoned dart, whereof he in three dayes after died: with whom the courage of the Defendants fainted alſo, no man beeing left like vnto him to vndertake ſo great a charge, although many there were, that ouerweening of themſelues deſired the ſame. In the beginning of this ſiege the Chriſtians had ſent away all their aged and weake people, vnfit for ſeruice, into Cyprus, where they in ſafetie arriued. But now many of the better ſort, both Captaines and others, diſcouraged, one after another conueighed themſelues away out of the citie: of whom a great number in paſſing thence to Cyprus, were vpon the Coaſt of the Iſland, together M with the Patriarke drowned. In the citie remained only twelue thouſand, which were thought ſufficient for the defence thereof; who afterwards (as ſome report) fled alſo by ſea after their fellowes, and ſo left the citie emptie vnto the barbarous enemie: ſome others reporting

A of them more honourably, as that they ſhould right valiantly defend the citie againſt the aſſault of their enemies, vntill ſuch time as that moſt of them being ſlaine or wounded, and the reſt by force driuen from the walls into the market place, and there for a while notably defending themſelues, in flying thence vnto the ſhips, were by the way al cut in ſunder, or els drowned. But howſoeuer it was, the Sultan entring the citie (by the Chriſtians abandoned, or by force taken) gaue the ſpoile thereof vnto his ſouldiers; who after they had rifled euery corner thereof, by his commandement ſet it on fire and burnt it downe to the ground: and digging vp the very foundations of the wals, Churches, and other publicke or priuat buildings, which the fire had not burnt, left there no ſigne of any citie at all; but purging the place euen of the very heapes of the ſtones and rubbidge left of the raſed citie, made it a fit place for B husbandmen to plow and ſow corne in; which he did both there, at Sydon, Beritus, and other towns alongſt the ſea coaſt, becauſe they ſhould neuer more ſerue for a refuge vnto the Chriſtians, or giue them footing againe into thoſe countries. Thus together with Ptolemais was the name of the Chriſtians vtterly rooted out of Syria and the Land of Paleſtine, in the yeare 1291, about 192 yeares after the winning of Ieruſalem by Godfrey of Buillon and the other Chriſtian Princes his confederates.

Caſſanes the Emperour inuadeth Syria.

This loſſe, as tending to the great diſgrace of the Chriſtians in generall, mooued not a little euen the greateſt of the Chriſtian Princes; wronged all or moſt part of them in the perſons of the Templars or Knights Hoſpitalers, their ſubiects, ſo ſhamefully now quite caſt out of Syria and the land of Promiſe; howbeit, troubled with their owne turbulent affaires at home C or with their neighbour Princes not farre off, none of them once ſtirred for the redreſſe or reuenge thereof. Onely Caſſanes the great Tartar Prince, hauing of late ſubdued the Perſians, and married the daughter of the Armenian King (a Lady of great perfection, and of a Mahometane become a Chriſtian) at the requeſt of his wife and his father in law, tooke the matter in hand. And for that purpoſe hauing raiſed a moſt puiſſant armie of two hundred thouſand fighting men, and ayded by the Armenians and Georgians, paſſing ouer the mountaine Amanus into Syria, not farre from the citie Hama met with Melcenaſer, the Ægyptian Sultans Lieutenant, with a mightie armie, whome hee ouerthrew in a great and mortall battell, wherein fortie thouſand of the Ægyptians are reported to haue beene ſlaine, and ſo draue him quite out of Syria: ſending Molais, one of his captaines, with part of his armie to D purſue him, who neuer left him vntill hee had chaſed him ouer the deſart ſands into Ægypt. The victorious Tartar after this battell tooke the citie of Hama, where lighting vpon the great treaſures of the Sultan, hee bountifully diuided it, together with the ſpoile, amongſt his ſouldiers, reſeruing nothing thereof vnto himſelfe, more than a ſword and a casket full of ſecret letters. The Ægyptian thus put to flight, hee without reſiſtance tooke in moſt of the cities of Syria, with the citie of Ieruſalem alſo; which in many places by the Turks and Ægyptians defaced, he againe repaired: and together with the Temple of our Sauiour gaue it to the Armenians, Georgians, and other Chriſtians, repairing thither out of Cyprus, Crete, and other places, to inhabit. And hauing himſelfe honoured the holy places with great gifts, returned with his armie to Damaſco, which was forthwith deliuered vnto E him. But lying there, with purpoſe in Autumne following to haue gone into Ægypt, and to haue vtterly deſtroyed that kingdome, he was certified of new troubles ariſing in Perſia, and ſome other parts of his empire: for repreſſing whereof, he with the greateſt part of his army returned himſelfe into Perſia, leauing one Capcapus gouernour of Damaſco; who after the ouerthrow of the Sultans armie had reuolted vnto him; and Molais (of whom wee haue before ſpoken) gouernour of Ieruſalem: commanding them at his departure to re-edifie the citie of Tyre, and to ſend embaſſadours vnto the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt, to ioyne in league with them, for the more ſure holding of thoſe new gained countries. And ſo Tyre was indeed repaired as he had commanded, and deliuered to the Chriſtians, with a conuenient garriſon for the keeping thereof: but the embaſſadors comming to the proud Biſhop Boniface F the eight, then Pope, whom of all others it beſeemed to haue furthered their buiſineſſe, they could of him obtaine nothing, but returned as they came. For hee at the ſame time fallen out with Philip the French King, thundering out his excommunications, diſcharging his ſubiects of their loyaltie, and ſo much as in him was, depriuing him of his kingdome, had giuen the ſame vnto Albertus Duke of Auſtria, whom he had declared Emperour: whereof Ieruſalem taken and repaired by Caſſanes.

ariſe great troubles. Beſides that, he being of the Guelphes faction, was not in any thing more carefull, than of the vtter extinguiſhing of the contrarie faction of the Gibellines, eſpecially of the moſt honorable familie of the Columnij, of whom ſome he had ſlaine, ſome hee had depriued of their honours, ſome he had impriſoned, and driuen other ſome into exile; ſo that thus wickedly buſied for the maintenance of his owne proud eſtate, hee had no leiſure to further the good of the Chriſtian commonweale: which his intollerable pride, and forgetfulneſſe of dutie long eſcaped not the reuenging hand of God; being when hee thought leaſt, ſuddenly taken priſoner at his fathers houſe in the city of Anagnia (where he was borne) by Sara Columnius his mortall enemie; whom but lately before redeemed out of a pirats gally, the French King had ſent for that purpoſe, with one Longaret (or as ſome call him, Nogaret) a French Knight: by whom the proud Prelat brought to Rome, in the caſtle of S. Angelo within fiue and thirtie days after moſt miſerably died, in his madnes (as ſome report) renting himſelfe with his teeth, and deuouring his owne fingers. This worthie Tartar Prince Caſſanes (by whom the Chriſtian commonweale might haue againe riſen in Syria and the land of Paleſtine, had not the pride of the great Biſhop, & the diſſention of the Chriſtian Princes hindred the ſame) was (as Aitonus writeth, who was preſent in this warre, following his vncle the Armenian King) a man of a verie ſhort ſtature, and exceeding hard fauor; but with valor, bountie, and other vertues of the minde, plentifully recompencing what wanted in the feature of his bodie. After whoſe departure into Perſia, Capcapus gouernour of Damaſco, conſidering that the power of the Tartars there left was not great, and that no aid was to be expected from the other Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt; to recompenſe his former treaſon of reuolting from the Sultan, with a new reuolt from the Tartar, roſe vp into open rebellion, drawing after him not onely the citie of Damaſco, but the greateſt part of Syria alſo. Whereof Molais gouernor of Ieruſalem vnderſtanding, was about to haue gone againſt him with his Tartars; but aduertiſed by his eſpials, that Capcapus in this his conſpiracie had compacted with the Ægyptian Sultan alſo, perceiuing himſelfe too weake to withſtand ſo great a power, retyred with his Tartars into Meſopotamia, there expecting new ſupplies both from Caſſanes and the King of Armenia. Of whoſe departure out of Syria the Ægyptian Sultan vnderſtanding, came directly with his armie to Ieruſalem, which he tooke, (being forſaken of the inhabitants) and prophaned the temple, ſparing only the Sepulchre of our Sauiour, at the humble ſuit of the religious, making there a greater ſhew of deuotion, than of crueltie. After that, hee woon all the other leſſer townes, which the Tartars had either kept for themſelues, or giuen to the other Chriſtians, and vtterly raſed all the forts of the Hoſpitallers and Templars, which valiant men, without other helpe, for the ſpace of almoſt a yeare held out againſt the tyrant, in which time moſt of them were honorably ſlain: the reſt that were left aliue being taken by the enemie, had neuertheleſſe leaue giuen with bag & baggage in ſafetie to depart, hauing before by ſolemne oath for euer abiured the country of Syria: and ſo theſe worthie men, the great ornaments of the Chriſtian commonweale, the Hoſpitalers and Templars, which to the vtmoſt of their power had by the ſpace of 300 yeres right worthily defended both the Chriſtians and the Chriſtian religion, againſt the Infidels in Syria and the Holy land, were now for euer driuen out thence about the yeare of our Lord 1300, to the great diſhonour of all Chriſtendome.

The deſcription of Caſſanes.

The city of Ieruſalem, with all Syria again recouered by the Ægyptian Sultan.

1300.

Wherefore with them now taking our leaue of Syria and the Holy land, leauing the ſame in the poſſeſſion of the Ægyptian Sultan and the Mamalukes, although it were ſhortly after like enough to haue bin againe recouered from them by the Tartars, had not the death of the great Tartar Prince Caſſanes, and their domeſticall troubles letted: we will againe returne return to the troubled affaires of the Turks in the leſſer Aſia, whither the courſe of the time had ſomewhat before called vs, with the occurrents thereof, more proper to our purpoſe and the argument we haue in hand, but that al cannot be at once told: and for the better vnderſtanding of the deſirous Reader, I thought it not good abruptly to breake off the courſe of the aforeſaid hiſtorie, drawing ſo neere to an end, but to make him partaker of the heauineſſe thereof.

The death of Meſoot and Ceicubades.

Now had the Turks no kindome left in the leſſer Aſia, and that alſo at the pleaſure of Gazan the great Tartar Chan diuided betwixt Meſoot and Cei-Cubades, as his vaſſals, bound vnto him by a yerely tribute, as is aforeſaid: who both kept in awe by the greatnes of the Tartar, did nothing worth the remembrance, but as they liued, ſo alſo died, almoſt buried in obſcuritie. Of theſe two, Meſoot died without iſſue; but Cei-Cubades departing, left behind him his ſonne

Aladin,

A Aladin, who by the name of Aladin the ſecond ſucceeding in the kingdome, vnited againe the ſame before diuided, yet paying ſtill tribute vnto the Tartar his Soueraigne, as had his father with the other late Sultans of the Turkes before him. Much it was not that this Aladin did, albeit that the power of the Tartars in his time beganne to decline, and not to lie ſo heauie vpon the Turkes as before. Hee was a man of a quiet ſpirit, and therefore much delighted in peace: a great friend vnto Othoman the firſt founder of the glorious and mightie Othoman empire, as in his life ſhall appeare. But this Aladin, the laſt of the Turkes Sultans of the Selzuccian familie, dying without iſſue, one Sabib his Veſir-Azemes or chiefe Counſeller, and then a man of greateſt authoritie, aſpired vnto the kingdome, which he had for moſt part himſelfe ſwayed all the raigne of the late Sultan his maſter: which vſurped ſoueraigntie, no B way vnto him due, hee could neither himſelfe long hold, or deliuer vnto his poſteritie; for that many others of the nobilitie, men of great power, and ſome of greater families than hee, enuying at his honour, and diſdaining to bee gouerned by him, or any other no greater than themſelues, layed hold ſome vpon one countrey or prouince, ſome vpon another, where they were able to doe moſt, erecting vnto themſelues greater or leſſer Satrapies, according to the meaſure of their own ſtrength and power, without reſpect of any ſuperioritie one ſhould haue ouer another, but euery one of them abſolutely commanding ouer ſo much as he was able by ſtrong hand to hold. So that as it had oftentimes before chanced, that the great Monarchies deſtitute of their lawfull heires, had in part, or all, become rich preyes vnto ſuch as could firſt lay ſtrong hand vpon them; euen ſo fell it now out in the great kingdom of the Turks, euery C one of their great Princes, meaſuring the greatneſſe of his territorie, not by the meaſure of his right, but by the ſtrength of his owne power. Wherein they ſhared ſo well for themſelues, that Sabib at firſt in poſſeſſion of all, was in ſhort time thruſt quite out of all: and ſo the great kingdome of the Turkes in the leſſer Aſia, brought vnto a meere Anarchie; no King now left among them, the whole kingdom being now diuided into diuers Satrapies, or other leſſer Toparchies. The greateſt of thoſe Princes that thus ſhared the Turks kingdome amongſt them, was one Caraman Aluſirius; who as ſtrongeſt, tooke vnto him the citie of Iconium, the regall ſeat of the Turkiſh Sultans, with all the great countrey of Cilicia, and ſome part of the frontiers of the countries of Lycaonia, Pamphilia, Caria, and the greater Phrigia, as farre as Phyladelphia, and the citie of Antioch vpon the riuer Meander: All which large territorie, was D of him afterward called Caramania, and by the ſame name is commonly at this day knowne, and by our late Geographers deſcribed. Of this Caraman alſo deſcended the Caramanian Kings, who of long time after vnfortunately ſtroue with the Othoman Sultans for the So-ueraigntie of their empires; vntill that at length they with their kingdome, and all the reſt of theſe Turkiſh Satrapies, were in the fatall greatneſſe of the Othoman empire, ſwallowed vp and deuoured, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall (if God ſo will) in due time and place be declared. Next neighbour vnto him was Saruchan, of the Greekes called Sarchan, of whome the countrey of Ionia-Maritima was and yet is called Saru-Chan-Ili, and Saruchania, that is to ſay, Saruchans countrey. The greateſt part of Lydia, with ſome part alſo of the greater Miſia, Troas, and Phrygia, fell to Calamus and his ſonne Caraſius, of whome it is E called Caraſia, or Caraſi-Ili, (or as wee might ſay) Caraſius his countrey. The greateſt part of the antient Miſia, with ſome part of Lydia, was poſſeſſed by Aidin, and was of him called Aidinia, or Aidin-Ili, as his countrey. Some part of the great countrey of Pontus, with the cities of Heraclea-Pontica, Caſtamona, Synope, and others neere vnto the Euxine, and the countrey of Paphlagonia, fell into the handes of the ſonnes of Omer, or as the Greekes call him, Amur: of whome that countrey tooke not name, as did the others, of ſuch Princes as poſſeſſed them, but is commonly called Bolli, of a Citie in that Countrey by the Turkes ſo named. As was alſo Mendeſia, or as ſome call it Menteſia, a Countrey in the leſſer Aſia, ſo by the Turkes called of Mendos or Myndus, a Citie in Caria. There were beſide theſe, diuers other places and Toparchies in the leſſer Aſia, which in the ren-F ting of this great kingdome, from the Turkes receiued names, before vnto the world vn-knowne; all which to proſecute were tedious. Sufficeth it vs, for the manifeſting of the Turkes Anarchie, and the ruine of their kingdome in the leſſer Aſia, as in part alſo for the more euidence of the heauie Hiſtorie following, to haue remembred theſe as the chiefeſt; red the late Aladinian kingdome, were deſcended of the better ſort of the Turkes, which with the Selzuccian & Aladinian Sultans driuen out of Perſia by the Tartars, had vnder them ſeated themſelues in the leſſer Aſia, as is before at large declared. Now amongſt theſe great men that thus diuided the Turks kingdome, moſt of them that write of the Turks affaires, both Greekes and Latines, reckon vp Othoman (the raiſer of his houſe and familie) for one, who indeed in the latter time of the late Sultan Aladin began to flouriſh, and was of him for his valour extraordinarily fauoured (as in this Hiſtorie ſhall appeare) but of his kingdome held no more than one poore lordſhip, called Suguta in Bythinia, not farre from the mountaine Olympus, (long before giuen vnto his father Erthogrull, for his good ſeruice) with ſuch other ſmall holds there- H about, as he had himſelfe gained from the weake Chriſtians his neighbours. For although he were a Turke borne, yet was hee not of the Selzuccian family, as were the reſt, but of another houſe and tribe; and therefore not of them fauoured or thought to haue ſo good right to any of the late Sultans prouinces or territories, as had they who beeing of his houſe, and holpen with the preſcription of time, enuied at the ſudden riſing of this Oguzian Turk, being to them as it were a meere ſtranger; whoſe fortune for all that (I know not by what ſecret foreknowledge) they ſeemed to feare, as in time to grow dangerous vnto them and their poſteritie; wherin they were no whit deceiued. But of him and his proceedings much more is to be ſaid hereafter: leaue wee him now therefore with the reſt vnto their fortunes in this the Turkes Anarchie, and ſo conclude this part of our Generall Hiſtorie: Glad when I looke backe I to haue waded thus far, yet fearing to be drowned before I get ouer; ſuch a ſea of matter and world of troubles yet remaining, not without much labour and toile, and that in long time to be paſſed through.

THE RISING OF THE GREAT AND MIGHTIE EMPIRE OF THE TVRKES VNDER OTHOMAN FIRST FOVNDER THEREOF: WITH HIS LIFE AND DOINGS.

C WHAT ſmall aſſurance there is in mens affaires, and how ſubiect vnto change euen thoſe things are wherein wee for the moſt part repoſe our greateſt felicitie and bliſſe, (beſide that the whole courſe of mans fraile life, by many notable examples well declareth) nothing doth more plainely manifeſt the ſame, than the heauie euents and woefull deſtructions of the greateſt kingdomes and empires: which founded vpon great fortunes, increaſed with perpetuall ſucceſſe, exalted by exceeding power, eſtabliſhed with moſt puiſſant armies, wholeſome lawes, and D deepe counſels; haue yet growne old, and in time come to naught: So that euen as men, all things elſe belonging vnto man, are ſubiect vnto the ineuitable courſe of deſtinie, or more truly to ſay, vnto the fatal doome of the moſt Higheſt, prefining vnto euery thing that in time begun, a time alſo wherin to take end, being himſelfe without time the great commander thereof, and of all things elſe done therein. The fame of the firſt Aſſyrian Monarchie, is very antient, and was no doubt both great and long, yet hath it neuertheleſſe found an end; and the more to put vs in remembrance of our infirmitie, was neuer with ſo much glorie and valour by Ninus erected, as it was with ſhame and cowardiſe by Sardanapalus ſubuerted. With like neceſſitie fel the great empire of the Medes & Perſians, the time thereof being come. And E after them, the Macedonians alſo. Neither hath the great Roman empire, or the proud citie of Rome it ſelfe (ſometime the miſtreſſe of the world) herein found any exemption, but runne the ſame courſe with the reſt: which grown great with continuall triumphs, and ſo ſtrong as that it was not with forrain power to be ſhaken; conuerted the forces of it ſelfe vpon it ſelfe, to the ouerthrow of the antient liberty thereof, together with the vtter ſubuerſion of the ſtate. After which time that mightie monarchie (of all that euer yet were, the greateſt) vnder the Romane Emperors felt many an hard and perillous ſtorme, and by little and little ſtill declining (though ſometime like a ſick aged bodie, by the valour or vertue of ſome one or other her worthie Emperors, a little relieued, and by and by againe caſt downe by the follie or negligence of ſome others ſucceding) it became at length a prey vnto a fooliſh rude & barbarous nation, which it F had before oftentimes ouercome, and ouer which many the Roman captains had triumphed, and therof taken their glorious ſurnames: which now againe without compaſſion, burning and ſacking it, cauſed it to ſtoope, and to yeld vnto the ſeruile yoake which it had in former time proudly impoſed vpon the necks of others: wherein if any thing be to be blamed, it is not the fortune or folly of this or that man, then ſitting at the helm (although that may alſo much help the matter as a meane) but the inſtabilitie of worldly things neuer permanent, but alwayes changeable,and the ſooner for their height;and that ſo forcibly,as that no man knoweth how to remedie the ſame,either if he did,were he able to performe it; the greateſt means that men could poſſibly deuiſe for the ſtay thereof, being oftentimes by a greater power from aboue, conuerted vnto the more ſpeedie effecting of that,againſt the which they were by mans wiſedome prouided.The like might be ſaid of the Athenians,the Lacedæmonians,the Thebanes, and of whom not? What maruell then,if the antient kingdomes of the Turks likewiſe in Perſia,and the leſſer Aſia,in Syria, Paleſtina, and Ægypt,hauing run their appointed times,mightily impugned by the Chriſtians, oppreſſed on the one ſide by the Tartars, and on the other by the Mamalukes,and at length by themſelues rent in ſunder(their deſtinie ſo requiring) loſt at laſt their wonted maieſtie,and ſo fel into a meere Anarchie,as in the former part of this Hiſtorie at large declared? Yet in this far more than any other people fortunate, That after the ruine of their former kingdomes,ſtraight way out of themſelues ariſe another, namely this Othoman monarchie, the chiefe obiect of this Hiſtorie: which at the firſt ſcarce of the world perceiued,or of themſelues regarded, in ſhort time ſo proſpered,as that the power and glorie thereof obſcured not their former kingdomes only(nothing,in compariſon of this)but euen the greateſt monarchies of the world; ouer a great part of which,it now ſo proudly triumpheth,as if it ſhould neuer haue end: at the beauty wherof the world wondereth,and at the power thereof quaketh: within the greatneſſe whereof are contained no ſmall portions of Aſia, Europe, and Africke, but euen the moſt famous and fruitfull kingdomes thereof: no part of the world left vntouched but America onely; not more fortunate with her rich mines, than in that ſhe is ſo farre from ſo great and dangerous an enemie. The foundation of this ſo great a kingdome (and now ſo mightie an empire, as holdeth the world in awe) was firſt laid by the valiant Othoman, or as the Turks call him, Oſman; not deſcended of the Selzuccian family, as were al the former Turks Sultans,but of the Oguzian tribe and kindred:in whoſe line this glorious empire hath euer ſince,by the ſpace of three hundred yeeres and three, to the aſtoniſhment of the world,wonderfully flouriſhed;and ſo yet doth at this day, vnder the gouernment of Mahomet the third, which now raigneth thirteenth in deſcent from him, knowing none in this world greater than himſelfe. But foraſmuch as both his greatneſſe,and the greatneſſe of the reſt of the Othoman Kings and Emperors his progenitors,tooke their beginning from this worthy and warlike Othoman,with whoſe life and doings we purpoſe to begin this part of our Hiſtorie,it ſhall not be amiſſe both for the continuation of that we haue in hand,with that we haue already written,and for the more manifeſting of that which hereafter followeth, a little farther to fetch his race and deſcent alſo: not meaning with a long and faigned pedegree to ſet him out of Noah his arke,(which continuall ſucceſſion of Princes,no Nation of the world, be it neuer ſo antient,the Iews onely excepted,and they alſo by writings and Hiſtories as much as was poſſible eternized, could truly and iuſtly challenge) but onely ſo farre as ſhall be pertinent vnto our purpoſe,and by the authoritie of good Hiſtories to be auerred.

At ſuch time as the Turks kingdome founded by Tangrolipix in Perſia,flouriſhed in the Selzuccian Princes his ſucceſſors,there was alſo another kingdome of theirs at the citie of Machan,as is before declared,but nothing comparable to the other either in glorie or power. In this citie,and ouer this ſmall kingdom,raigned one Solyman,by his ſubiects honored alſo with the name of a Sultan or King;at the ſame time that the Tartars vnder the leading of old Zingis their great captaine,leauing their owne countrey,and bearing downe the world before them, hauing conquered the fartheſt parts of the Eaſt,and there ſeated their kingdome, turned their forces into Perſia, and there ouerthrew the Turkes kingdome at Balch in Coraſan, and draue the Turks with Curſumes their laſt King, out of the countrey: after that they had there from the time of Tangrolipix raigned about an hundred and ſeuentie two yeares.

Solymon, Sultā of Machan forſaketh his kingdome for feare of the Tartars.

This Solyman of whom we ſpeake, then raigning at Machan,was not of the Selzuccian familie (as were all the other Turks Sultans,the ſucceſſors of Tangrolipix) but of the Oguzian tribe, a familie famous alſo amongſt the Turkes; who ſeeing the Selzuccian Sultan Curſumes (or as ſome call him, Cuſſumes) his countryman, beaten out of his kingdome by the Tartar, and his country ouerrun,and the great Caliph of Babylon alſo ouerthrown; thought it not good longer to ſtay in that country which he could not hold, but by ſpeedie flight betimes to prouide for the ſafetie of himſelfe & of ſuch his ſubiects as would follow him:and hearing that Aladin

A the ſon of Kel-Huſreu, or as the Greeks call him, Cai-Coſroe (a great man of the Selzuccian familie, & neere of kin vnto the late Sultan Curſumes) who for feare of the Tartars but lately come into Romania-Aſiatica, had there by force of armes moſt honourably ſeated himſelfe and the Turks his followers, amongſt the Chriſtians: in hope of like good fortune, and for the zeale towards his ſuperſtition (accounting all wel gotten that was gained from the Chriſtians) tooke his way after him, with ſuch of his kinſmen and ſubiects as would accompany him in his new aduentures. And comming to Artezerum, a citie in the borders of Armenia and Cappadocia, thereabout in the country according to the ſeaſon of the yere ſeated himſelfe with his followers, being in number many; who with their wiues and children, after the manner of the Tartar Nomades their anceſtors, in poore tents and carts couered with a courſe kind of cloth, had B followed him; being indeed nothing elſe but a verie rude and rough kind of ſturdie heardſmen, not wedded to any place, but ſtill remoouing with their tents and carts vp and down, as beſt ſerued for their purpoſe and the feeding of their cattell, as do the Turcoman nation, the true diſcent of the Turks, in many places of Aſia at this day: and were thereof not only called Nomades, that is to ſay, Heardſmen, (by which name the proud Ianizaries will oftentimes in contempt call euen the greateſt of the naturall Turks) but Hamaxophoreti, and Hamaxobij, that is to ſay, people carried or liuing in carts. Solyman hauing ſtayd a while about Erzerum, remouing thence came to Amaſia; and there ſpoyling the country, then inhabited by the Chriſti-ans, did them much harme, oftentimes encountring them in the plain field, and ſometimes ſei-ſing vpon their townes and cities, vntil he had ſubdued vnto himſelfe a right large territory: C yea at length hauing in ſo many battels by him fought, and cities by him beſieged, loſt a great number of his people, and ſo wearied the reſt as that they were not willing farther to follow him; and fearing alſo with ſuch ſmall power as he had left, to be able to defend and keepe the country by him alreadie gotten, in the midſt of ſo many enemies, thought it beſt to depart thence, and to ſeeke his better fortune elſewhere. At the ſame time it was rifely reported, that the affaires of Perſia, after ſo long trouble (for all this was not a while in doing) began to grow againe to ſome good quiet, the furie of the Tartars beeing now well abated, and that ſtorme ouerblowne: wherefore Solyman reſolued now to returne home againe, and to viſit his natiue country, of him and his people aboue all others deſired. So paſſing thorow Syria, (for that was now his way) neere Aleppo he ſeiſed vpon a caſtle called Ziaber-Cala, & there ſtaid D a ſpace for the refreſhing of his people. Afterward ſetting forward againe, he came at length to the great and famous riuer Euphrates, ouer which hee muſt needs paſſe: but finding there neither bridge nor foord, or other means to get ouer, he ſtood ſtill as a man diſmaid, not knowing what to do. Stay there he would not, and go further he could not: his deſire bid him go, but the great riuer ſaid not ſo. In this perplexitie Solyman himſelfe with his horſe oftentimes taking the riuer, in hope to haue found ſome paſſage; but finding none, aduenturing too farre, was with the force of the ſtreame carried away, and ſo together with his horſe drowned. His bodie after long ſeeking being at length found, was with the great lamentation of his people buried neere vnto the caſtle Ziaber, not long before by him taken: whereof they ſay the place is now ni their tongue called Meſari-Zurac, (viz.) the Turks Graue. Some of theſe Oguzian E Turks, after the death of their Sultan, wearie of their long trauell, ſeated themſelues in the country therabouts, vnto whom the Turks that now hold that caſtle do refer their beginning.
The reſt of that great tribe and familie diuerſly diuided, went vnto diuers places as their fortunes led them; ſome of them into the waſt ground and deſarts of Arabia and Syria, and are at this day called the Damaſcene Turcomans: other ſome returned backe againe into Romania, the ſame way that they came; of whom are diſcended the Turcomans of Iconium, & Anatolia: who yet with their wiues and children, as heardſmen in great companies wander vp and downe the countrey, after the manner of their anceſtors.

Romania Aſiatica.

Solyman thus loſt, left foure ſons, Sencur-Teken, Iundogdis, Ertogrul, of ſome called Orthobules (the father of this Othoman founder of the Turks empire that now is) and Dunder. With theſe F. foure brethren, moſt part of theſe Oguzian Turkes that were left, returning into Romania (as is aforeſaid) after they had there reſted themſelues a while, marching vp along the riuer Euphrates, came to a place called Paſin-Ouaſi, about ten miles aboue Arterum, where Ertogrul and his brother Dunder, with foure hundered families, not willing to goe any further, stayed with their tents and carts, their beſt dwellings. Sencur and Iundogdis their other two brethren in the meane time paſſing the riuer, returned with the reſt into Perſia: whom wee there G leaue vnto their vnknowne fortunes. In this place Ertogrul with his brother and his three ſons ſtaid a while, and had diuers conflicts with the country people thereabout, vntill that at length he thought it beſt to returne againe into Romania. So ſetting forward, he came to Ancyra, and from thence vnto the black mountains, and ſo to a plain called of the Turks Sultan Vngi, about 75 miles Eaſtward from the city of Nice in Bithynia, where he had many skirmiſhes with the Chriſtians.

Now a great while before this, Aladin the elder (of whom wee haue before ſpoken in the former part of this hiſtorie) fled out of Perſia, had ſubdued diuers great prouinces & countries in Romania Aſiatica, or the leſſer Aſia, for ſo it is more truly called: ſo that he was of all the people thereabouts accounted for a great Prince, and of the Turks themſelues honored with H the name of their Vlu Padiſchach, that is to ſay, their great King or Emperor. Hauing placed his regal ſeat firſt at Sebaſtia, and afterward at Iconium; which two cities before ruinous, he repaired, and therein raigned, as did ſome few of his poſterity after him, as is before declared. Neither was Ertogrul ignorant of the honour, glorie, and power of this great Sultan: but hauing three ſons, namely Iundus, Serugatin, and Othoman, ſent Serugatin his ſecond ſon (a bold wel ſpoken man) vnto him, to requeſt him in that his ſo large a kingdome, as yet not well peopled by the Turks, to grant vnto them his poore exiled countrymen, of long time oppreſſed with diuers fortunes, ſome ſmall corner for them with their families and cattell to reſt in. Which his requeſt, the Sultan not forgetfull of his own diſtreſſe ſometime in like caſe, graciouſly heard, and with great curteſie vſed the meſſenger. Now for the furtherance of his ſuit it fortuned, I that this Sultan before driuen out of Perſia by the Tartars, and by them alſo much troubled in theſe his new gotten countries in the leſſer Aſia, had with them diuers hot skirmiſhes & ſharp conflicts: in one of which it fortuned the Sultan himſelfe, with all the power he then had, to be hardly beſet by his enemies, and in danger to haue loſt the day: when as Ertogrul, but newly come into the country, & willing to do the Sultan ſeruice, & awaiting al opportunities for the commending of himſelfe and his followers; vpon the ſudden vnlooked for, with foure hundred men came vpon the backs or the Tartars, then almoſt in poſſeſſion of a great victory, and ſo forcibly charged them, that vnable to endure the charge, & to maintain the fight againſt the Sultan, (whoſe men encouraged by this vnexpected aid, as by ſuccour ſent from heauen, began now to fight with greater courage) being both before and behind hardly beſet, they K as men in deſpaire of the victory they had before aſſured themſelues of, turned their backs and fled. After which good ſeruice, the Sultan honorably welcommed this new come Turke, giuing him his hand to kiſſe, as the manner of the nation is; and highly commending his valor, commanded a rich cloake to be caſt vpon him (amongſt thoſe Eaſterne nations a great honor) and all his ſouldiers to be bountifully rewarded; and preſently after gaue vnto Ertogrul and his Turks a country village called Suguta, betwixt the caſtle Belezuga & the mountain Tmolus in the greater Phrygia: in which village they might liue in in Winter, and vpon the aforeſaid mountain, and the mountain Ormenius, betwixt the riuers Sangarius and Licus, feed their cattell in Sommer. And yet not ſo contented thus to haue honored him, in whom he ſaw ſuch approoued valor, committed to his protection that ſide of the countrie wherein he dwelt, be- L ing in the verie frontiers of his kingdome: which his charge he ſo well looked vnto, that all the country thereabout, before much infeſted with the often incurſions of the enemie, was by his vigilant care and prowеſſe well ſecured.

Thus is Ertogrul the Oguzian Turke, with his homely heardſmen, become a petty Lord of a countrey village, & in good fauour with the Sultan: whoſe followers, as ſturdie heardſmen with their families, liued in Winter with him in Seguta; but in Sommer in Tents, with their cattel vpon the mountains. Hauing thus liued certain yeres, and brought great peace vnto his neighbors, as well the Chriſtians as the Turks, before much troubled with the inuaſion of the Tartars; it fortuned that the Chriſtians of Cara-Chiſar (a caſtle thereby, called by the antient Greeks, Melanopyrgon, and of later time, Maurocaſtron, that is to ſay, the blacke tower or caſtle) M wearie of their owne eaſe, and of the peace they had by his cares enioyed, fell out with him, and euil intreated both him & his people. Which their ingratitude he taking in euil part, thereof, and of the wrongs by them done vnto the Turkes, ſo grieuouſly complained vnto the Sultan, that hee therewith mooued, raiſed a great armie, and ſo himſelfe in perſon came and

A beſieged the caſtle. But lying there at the ſiege, news was brought him, that the Tartars with a great armie vnder the leading of one Baintzar, were entred into Caria, and there ſpoiling the country, had taken Heraclea. For the repreſſing of whom, the Sultan was glad to riſe with his armie; yet leauing a ſufficient ſtrength behind him for the continuing of the ſiege, vnder the charge of Ertogrul Beg, for ſo the Turks now called him. The Sultan afterwards encountring with the Tartars at Baga, ouerthrew them in a great battel. Whileſt Ertogrul in the mean ſpace hardly beſieged Cara-Chiſar, wherein fortune ſo much fauoured him, that at length he tooke the Caſtle, the ſpoyle whereof he gaue vnto the ſouldiers, reſeruing only the fift part thereof, as due vnto the Sultan; which he ſent him for a Preſent, together with the Captain of the caſtle, who he had taken aliue: which captaine the Sultan afterward inlarged, and reſtored again B to him his caſtle, for the payment of a yerely tribute, which he truly payed during the life of the Sultan; but he dying about two yeres after, he refuſed any more to pay it, and ſo reuolted from the Turks.

Sultan Aladin, founder of the Aladinian kingdome (for ſo the Turkes call it) being dead at Iconium, after him ſucceeded Azatines his eldeſt ſon; and after him Iathatines his yonger brother: who ſlaine by Theodorus Laſcaris the Greeke Emperour, (as is before declared) after him ſucceeded in that kingdome another Iathatines, the ſon of Azatines, who was by the Tartars expulſed, and his kingdome ſubdued, as in the former part of this hiſtorie it appeareth. After which time the Selzuccian familie there alſo by the Tartars in the leſſer Aſia depreſſed, retained ſcarce the name and ſhadow of their former maieſtie and glorie. In which troubleſome C times, and confuſion of the ſtate, Ertogrul well beaten and wearied in the world, kept himſelfe cloſe in his houſe at Suguta, as well contented therewith as with a kingdome; ſeeking by all meanes to keepe peace on euerie ſide with his neighbours, as well Chriſtians as others. In which quiet kind of life he ſweetly paſſed ouer the troubleſome times of Meſoot the ſonne of Kei-Cubades, and of Kei-Cubades the ſon of Feramuzin, both Sultans, but the great Tartars tributaries, and raigning but at their pleaſure, vntill the time of the ſecond Aladin, the ſole and laſt heire of the Iconian kingdome, before by the Tartars diuided, which was no few yeres. Al which time Ertogrul liued quiet at Suguta, as one amongſt many other of the Iconian Sultans ſubiects, wiſely conſidering the fall of the Selzuccian Sultans, both in Perſia and at Iconium; as alſo the ruine of his owne houſe and familie, both from royall ſtate brought almoſt vnto D nothing: and therefore with patience taking the world as it came, and making a vertue of neceſſitie, contenting himſelfe with a little, bare himſelfe kindly towards all men. In which contented kind of life he grew to great yeres, with his three ſons, great beloued and honored of their neighbours, as well Chriſtians as Turks; and no leſſe fauored by the ſecond Aladin then Sultan, than he had been of all the Sultans before him: whom the yong men his ſons, after the manner of their nation (forbidding them with empty hands to ſalute their Princes) oftentimes viſited with one Preſent or other. In all which his ſons were many good parts to be ſeene, yet ſo, as that in Othoman was eaſily to be ſeene a greater courage and ſpirit than in the other two his brethren: which was the cauſe that he was the more of them of his tribe regarded, but eſpecially of the youthful and warlike ſort, which commonly reſorted vnto him when he went to E hawke or hunt, or to other delights of the field (the counterfeits of war) and was of them commonly called Oſman Gazi, that is to ſay, Oſman the Warlike.

Small things in time of trouble yeeld vnto the wiſe great content.

In this frontier countrey neere vnto Suguta, the dwelling place of old Ertogrul, had Sultan Aladin diuers lieutenants and captains, gouernors of his caſtles and ſtrong holds vpon thoſe frontiers, with whom Othoman was wel acquainted, and vnto whom he for friendſhip ſake oftentimes reſorted: but eſpecially vnto the captaine of In-Vngi, for that he knew himſelf to be of him well beloued, & therefore vnto him verie welcome. So it fortuned vpon a time, that as Othoman, being yet but yong, was going to make merrie with the gouernor of Eski-Chiſar (a caſtle about foure and twentie miles off, called of the Greeks, Palaecaſtron) by the way as hee went, at a place called Itburne (a town in Phrygia) chanced there to ſee, and afterwards to fall F in liking of a faire maiden called Malbatun: vnto whom his affection daily increaſing, he without his fathers knowledge ſent a ſecret friend of his to intreat with her of mariage. Which after long diſcourſe to her made concerning Othomans affectiō & requeſt, gaue him anſwer, that betwixt Othoman & her was great inequality, a thing eſpecially to be regarded and eſchued of ſuch as wiſhed to liue a happie life in wedlock bands: ſhe was (as ſhe ſaid) but meanly borne, Othoman amorous of Malbatun a Countrey Maid.

and therefore was not to expect ſo great a match: whereas he could not want choice of other G maids of more worth,& in all reſpects more anſwerable vnto himſelfe. But among other cauſes why ſhe gaue him this anſwer,one was,for that ſome that wiſhed her well,had put into her head,that Othoman meant not indeed to marrie her,but vnder that color to obtain of her ſome few days pleaſure, and ſo hauing diſhonored her; afterward againe to caſt her off: which was indeed far from his thought; for he the more inflamed with her modeſt denial,the more deſired her for his wife. In the mean time Othoman going again vnto the gouernor of Eski-Chiſar, and curteouſly by him entertained,chanced (as it oftentimes doth among familiar friends in their merriments)to fall in ſpeech of his Loue,with greater affection than diſcretion,commending her beautie,her feature,and gracious perfections,not diſſembling alſo,to her greater praiſe,the repulſe by him receiued at her hands. Which the gouernor hearing,ſeemed greatly H to like of his choice,ſaying,that ſhe was by the diuine prouidence(for ſo the Turks religiouſly vſe to ſpeak)appointed only for him to haue. But in the mean time ſecretly inflamed with the immoderat commendation of Othoman,without reſpect of friendſhip,he began to grow amorous of her himſelfe,whom he had neuer ſeen; ſo light is that fooliſh affection: & that ſo far, as that being otherwiſe a man of good diſcretion,hee was not able to conceale or couer theſe new conceiued flames,but that Othoman by certain coniectures & tokens perceiued the ſame: And yet diſſembling the matter as if he had ſuſpected nothing, being riſen from the banquet, calling vnto him one of his truſtie ſeruants,ſecretly ſent him away vnto certaine of the maids friends,willing them in his name,as they tendred her honour,preſently to ſend her away vnto ſome ſafe place further off, for feare ſhee were not ere long taken from them by a great man I more amorous of her perſon,than reſpectiue of her honour. And by and by after taking leaue of his vnfaithfull friend,& bidding him farwel,took his way to the captain of In-Vngi,whom he knew to be his deere friend. But whileſt he there ſtayed certaine dayes,paſſing the time in hawking,hunting,and other youthfull diſports,with the captain his friend; the gouernor of Eski-Chiſar,who commanded all the country thereabout called Sultan-Vngi,ſent one of his truſtie ſeruants to Iburne,to ſee faire Malhatun,and how all things went there. Who comming thither, and vnderſtanding of her ſecret departure, and that by the aduertiſement from Othoman ſhe was conueyed to certain of her friends afar off,at his returne, from point to point certified his maſter thereof. Who exceedingly grieued with the report, and fretting aboue meaſure to ſee himſelfe ſo deluded by Othoman,preſently ſent vnto the Captaine of In-Vngi, K (being within his iuriſdiction) to commaund him without delay to deliuer Othoman vnto him.
But he louing of him well,as a faithfull man vnto his friend, could with no threats or intreaty be perſuaded ſo to do. Wherefore the gouernour in a great rage preſently raiſing the greateſt power he was able to make,came to the caſtle of In-Vngi, requiring to haue Othoman forthwith deliuered vnto him. Where among the ſouldiers there in garriſon with the captain,began to ariſe diuers opinions; ſome wiſhing, for the auerting of the preſent danger for which they were now vnprouided,to haue him deliuered; & other ſome abhorring ſo treacherous a fact,willing rather to endure al extremities. In the end after much conſultation honeſty preuailed, & it was generally reſolued,that he ſhould be defended,who could not without their great infamie be deliuered. But Othoman terrified with that diuerſitie of opinions,which had L euen at firſt ſhewed it ſelfe; & thinking it not for his ſafety,to commit himſelfe vnto the truſt of ſuch wauering men,entred into a deep conceit of a matter of great aduenture, which was, by a ſudden ſally to make himſelfe way thorow the midſt of his enemies. Wherewith hauing made his brother Iundus and thoſe few his followers there preſent acquainted, and thereupon reſolued; he fiercely ſallied out,and by plaine force brake thorow the midſt of them, and ſo tooke his way towards Suguta,ſtill notably repulſing them that were ſent to purſue him. But being come into the frontiers of his fathers territorie,& the report of his dangers known, & that being but weakely accompanied, he was by a great number of his enemies purſued; preſently all the luſtie youths and ſuch as loued him well, took horſe to come to his reſcue; who meeting with the gouernors ſoldiers,that had Othoman in chace, in a ſharp conflict ſlew diuers M of them,and put the reſt to flight. Of whom ſome were alſo taken priſoners,& among the reſt one Michael Coſſe a Chriſtian,Captaine of a little caſtle in that countrey, called Hirmen-Caia, or the rocke of Ormeni: Of whom Othoman taking compaſſion,freely pardoned him that offence.
With which vnexpected curteſie he was ſo moued, that euer after he tooke part with him,

A folly common vnto Louers.

No friendſhip in loue.

Othoman beſieged,and in danger for his loue.

A him, and did him great ſeruice in his wars: whoſe poſterity hath euer ſince euen vntil this our age continued, next vnto the Othoman family, moſt honorable and famous amongſt the Turks, by the name of Michael Oglies, that is to ſay, the ſonnes or poſteritie of Michael.

Ertogrul now ſpent with age, ſhortly after died, in the yere of our Lord 1289. hauing liued 93 yeres, and thereof gouerned the Oguzian familie after the death of his father Solyman, 52. His death was of all his tribe and kindred generally lamented, and his body after the Turkiſh manner honorably buried at Suguta, where he had of long time liued.

After whoſe death, theſe plaine Oguzian Turks, in a generall aſſemblie conſulting whome they might chuſe for their lord and gouernor in ſtead of old Ertogrul; caſting their eyes eſpecially vpon two, ſtood in doubt of which of them to make choice. For although moſt men B were of opinion, that Othoman for the rare gifts and vertues as wel of bodie as of mind, was to be preferred before the reſt of his brethren the ſons of Ertogrul; yet were there ſome, & they alſo men of great grauitie and experience, who had in ſuſpect the yong mans age, as of it ſelfe ſlipperie, & for the moſt part prone to vice, eſpecially in the liberty of great power: & therefore thought it better to make choice of Dunder (Ertogruls brother and Othomans vncle) a man of far greater grauitie, iudgement, and experience. But Dunder himſelfe being indeed a wiſe man, & far from all ambition, perſuaded them in that choice not to haue any regard at all vnto his honor or preferment, but to conſider what were beſt for their ſtate & welfare in general. For he prouidently foreſaw in what danger the Oguzian ſtate ſtood, expoſed on the one ſide to the mortall hatred and treacheries of the Greeks, grieued to ſee themſelues ſpoiled by the C Turks, & naturally hating them for the Mahometan religion: and on the other ſide not ſurely backt by the Sultans of Iconium, brought in thraldome to the Tartars, and dayly grown weaker and weaker. Vnto which inconueniences & dangers (he ſaid) an old, weake, & ouergrown bodie (as his was) could giue no helpe or remedie at all, but rrequired the helpe of a wiſe, politicke, vigilant, ſtirring, and valiant man, ſuch as they all well knew was Othoman his brothers ſon. Thus before he came vnto the election, he in priuat declared his mind vnto the chiefe of the Oguzian familie: & afterward at their requeſt comming to the generall aſſemblie, all mens minds & eies now fixed vpon Othoman, he firſt of al (by his example to encourage the reſt) for the good of the Oguzian tribe, his antient houſe and family, ſaluted him their great lord & gouernor, promiſing vnto him all loyaltie, with the vtmoſt of his ſeruice: whereunto by and by D enſued the great applauſe of the reſt of the people, as vnto a gouernor ſent vnto them by God; vnto whom they ioyfully wiſhed all happie ſucceſſe, with long long life, and a proſperous gouernment. Thus with all mens good liking was Othoman made the great gouernor of the Oguzian Turks, and ſo become among them a great commander, and honored with the title of Oſman-Beg, or the lord Oſman. Yet was this his honor included in a ſmall circuit, plain & homely, without any great pompe or ſhew, as commanding amongſt rough and rude heardſmen and ſhepheards, not acquainted with the curteſie of other more ciuil nations: for as yet they were the ſame homely Scythian Nomades that they were before, & could not as yet be perſuaded to forſake their woonted rude and vnciuil manners, by long tradition receiued from their anceſtors, and ſo beſt agreeing with their nature and calling. Amongſt which rude heardſmen, E this new gouernor himſelfe, not too far exceeding the reſt in ciuilitie, commanded much like vnto another Romulus; of whom alſo the Turks report many ſuch things as do the Romans of their founder, which for breuitie I thought good to paſſe ouer.

The Oguzian Turks in doubt of whome to make choice for their gouernor.

Now it fortuned that Othoman euen in the beginning of his gouernment fel firſt at ods with one Hagionicholaus, or S. Nicholas (captaine of Einegiol, a caſtle there by) for that he had oftentimes of purpoſe troubled and moleſted theſe Oguzian heardſmen, in paſſing to and fro with their cattell by his caſtle. For which cauſe Othoman was inforced to requeſt the captain of Bilezuga (another caſtle there by, alſo his neighbour & friend) that is people in paſſing that way to the mountains, might with their goods & cattell, as occaſion ſhould require, take the refuge of his caſtle; which the curteous captain (wel acquainted with old Ertogrul, Othomans father) F eaſily granted: yet with this prouiſo, that none ſhould with ſuch goods or cattell haue acceſſe into his caſtle, but the Turks women only: which his curteſie Othoman refuſed not. So was the caſtle of Bilezuga from that time forward a refuge vnto the Turkes women, who paſſing that way, and there ſhrouded with their goods and cattell, vſually preſented the Captaine with ſome one homely countrey Preſent or other, which afterwards was the loſſe of the Caſtle.

Yet was not Othoman vnmindful of the wrong done vnto his people, by his euill neighbor the captain of Einegiol: but purpoſing to be thereof reuenged, made choice of ſeuentie of his G beſt and moſt able men, whom he appointed ſecretly to paſſe the mountain Ormenius, and ſo if it were poſſible, to ſurpriſe or ſet on fire his enemies caſtle. Of which his deſignement the warie captaine hauing intelligence by one of his eſpials, in place conuenient vpon the mountain laid a ſtrong ambuſh for the cutting off of ſuch as were by Othoman ſent to haue ſurpriſed his caſtle: wherof Othoman (no leſſe wary than he) before warned by his ſcouts, & augmenting the number of his men, marched directly to the place where the enemie lay. Where betwixt them (for ſo ſmall a number) was fought a right bloudie and cruell battell, and many ſlaine on both ſides; amongſt whom Hozza, Othomans nephew was one. The victorie neuertheleſſe fel vnto Othoman: after which time his people in much more ſafetie fed their cattel in the Sum- H mer time on the mountains, as the manner was, and ſo in quiet paſſed to and fro.

The Caſtle of Chalce ſurpriſed by Othoman

The Chriſtians complain of the wrong done vnto them by the Turks.

Shortly after, Othoman by night ſurpriſed the little caſtle of Chalce, not far from Einegiol, and there without mercie he put to the ſword all the Chriſtians he found therein, and ſo afterwards burnt the Caſtle. Which outrage was the beginning, and occaſion of great troubles thereof enſuing: for the Chriſtians of the countries adioyning, much grieued therewith, and aſſembling themſelues together, complained vnto the captaine of Cara-Chiſar the greateſt commander thereabout, That theſe Turks, which not many yeres before were of meere pitty receiued as poore heardſmen into that countrey, began now in warlike manner to lay violent hands vpon the antient lands and poſſeſſions of the Chriſtians; which inſolencie (as they ſaid) if it were longer winked at and ſuffered by him, and other ſuch men of account and authoritie I as were to reforme the ſame, they would no doubt in ſhort time driue both them and all the reſt of the Chriſtians out of their natiue countries: wherefore it were now high time, & more than neceſſarie for him, and all the reſt, to awake (as it were) out of the dead ſleep wherein they had long time drowſily ſlept; and ioyning their forces together, to expulſe thoſe vnthankful, incroching, and mercileſſe ſtrangers out of their countries: the miſchief (they ſaid) being now ſpred far, therefore needed ſpeedie remedie; and that repentance would come too late when it was paſt cure. The Captaine mooued with the indignitie of the late fact, and iuſt complaint of the poore country people, ſent with all ſpeed a ſtrong companie of ſouldiers, vnder the leadinh of Calanus his brother; with commandement that they ſhould march vnto the Caſtle of Einegiol, and there to ioyne with the reſt of the Chriſtian forces. K

Othoman vnderſtanding of this preparation made againſt him, gathering his ſoldiers together, marched to a place called Opſicium, neere vnto mount Tmolus in Phrygia; where betweene him and the Chriſtians was fought a ſharpe battell, wherein he loſt his brother Sarugatin (whom the Turks account for a Saint or Martyr at this day) with many other of his ſouldiers. In this battell was alſo Calanus ſlain, whoſe bellie Othoman cauſed to be ripped, and his intrals to be pulled out, naming the place where he was buried, Meſari-Kepec, that is to ſay, The Dog-Graue, by which name the place is at this day known. The bodie of his brother Sarugatin he carried to Sugnta, and there honorably buried it neere to the bodie of his father Ertogrul. Aladin Sultan of Iconium vnderſtanding of this conflict, was very ſorry for the loſſe hapned vnto Othoman, being a Mahometan of his owne religion: wherefore in token of his good L will and fauour, he gaue vnto him the citie of Paleapolis, with all the territorie thereunto belonging, giuing vnto him alſo leaue to beſiege, take or ſpoyle, the ſeigniorie and caſtle of Cara-Chiſar: for accompliſhment whereof he ſent vnto him both ſouldiers and munition. Othoman incouraged with this great bountie of the Sultans, ſtraightly beſieged the caſtle of Cara-Chiſar, which at laſt he woon, and ſlew all the Chriſtians therein: the captain he tooke aliue, whom he cruelly executed: the ſpoile of the caſtle he gaue vnto his ſouldiers, reſeruing only the fift part therof, which he ſent for a preſent to the Sultan. All this hapned in the yere of our Lord 1290. This caſtle of Cara-Chiſar, with the reſt of Einegiol, Bilezuga, Chalce, & others before and hereafter in the life of Othoman to be mentioned, were all ſcituate in the borders of the greater Phrygia, or elſe neere thereunto in the confines of Bithynia and Myſia: In M which pleaſant countries (but lately part of the Conſtantinopolitan empire) the Chriſtians the antient inhabitants thereof, as yet dwelt, intermingled with the Turks at the riſing of the Othoman empire; with whom they liued at continual iars, vntill that at length they were by them altogether vtterly oppreſſed and extinguiſhed.

Othoman conſulteth with his brother Iundus what courſe to take for the oppreſſing of the Chriſtians his neighbours.

A Othoman encouraged with this good ſucceſſe, and ſupported by the great Sultan of Iconium, began now after his ambitious nature to conceit greater matters, for the further increaſe of his honor and territorie: yet not truſting altogether to his own deuice, he entred into conſultation with his brother Iundus, which way was beſt to take to diſtreſſe and bring in ſubiection his neighbours the Chriſtians. In which caſe, Iundus a man of greater courage than diſcretion, aduiſed him with all celeritie to vrge his good fortune, and preſently to inuade the Chriſtians alreadie diſcouraged with the loſſe of Cara-Chiſar. But this counſell altogether pleaſed not Othoman; for (ſaid he) the caſtles and forts by vs gained, muſt bee kept with ſtrong garriſons, otherwiſe they will again be recouered by the enemie; which garriſons cannot be maintained and kept, if we ſpoile or diſpeople the countries adioyning vpon vs; for in ſo doing we ſhal (as B it were) with our owne hands cut our owne throats: wherfore I thinke it better, that we enter into a league of amitie and friendſhip with the Chriſtians round about vs; which league wee will keep with ſome, & breake with others, as ſhall ſerue beſt for our purpoſe. And according to this reſolution, he made peace indeed with al the Chriſtians, but ſpecially with Michael Coſſi, captain of Hirmen-Caia caſtle, of whom we haue before ſpoken, who afterward ſerued him to great vſe in the managing of his wars, & became alſo a renegat of the Mahometan religion. All this Othoman did the rather, becauſe he was then at great variance with one Germean-Ogli (a great man among the Turks, but one of the Selzuccian familie) who enuying at the riſing of Othoman, ſought by all means poſſible to hinder his greatnes, as did alſo the others, his quietneſſe: which diſcord the Chriſtians liked well, as a meane for them to liue in more reſt by.

C In the meane time, Othoman deuiſed with all carefulnes to beautifie and ſtrengthen his new commonweale: and for the greater concourſe of people, built a faire temple in Cara-Chiſar for the exerciſe of the Mahometan religion; appointed markets to be kept in al peaceable maner, in his great townes, granting great priuiledges to ſuch as reſorted thither, as wel Chriſtians as Turks: vſing therin ſuch juſtice, that all ſorts of people without feare, in hope of gaine reſorting thither, furniſhed his country and townes with all things neceſſarie: yet this care of ciuil policie and gouernment, could not ſo withdraw him, but that according to his aſpiring mind, he had alwaies a greater deſire and care to inlarge his poſſeſſions and territorie. Wherefore intending to make a rode into Bythinia, he requeſted Michael Coſſi, the Chriſtian captaine before mentioned, to deliuer his opinion what was beſt to be done: who ſo politickely D directed him in that exploit, that he returned victorious, enriched with great ſpoile and more honor. This road ſo terrified moſt of the Chriſtians thereabouts, that they were loth to giue Othoman any cauſe of offence, for feare leſt they ſhould by him be ſpoiled.

Othoman ſetteth in order his little commonweale.

It fortuned about this time, that the captains of Bilezuga and Cupri-Chiſar falling at ods, he of Cupri-Chiſar firſt taking vp armes fiercely inuaded the captaine of Bilezuga: who therupon ſent vnto Othoman, to pray his ayd, which hee eaſily granted, and ſo without further delay preſently came vnto him with certaine companies of luſtie tall ſouldiers. By whoſe comming, the captaine of Bilezuga not a little encouraged and ſtrengthened, ſet vpon his enemie: where betwixt them was made a ſharpe conflict, and diuers on both ſides ſlaine: but the victorie by the helpe of Othoman the Turke, at length inclining to the Bilezugian, the other E vanquiſhed captaine in all haſt fled vnto his owne caſtle. After whome Othoman following, laid ſiege vnto the Caſtle, which at length he tooke together with th captaine, whom he cauſed to be preſently ſlaine. It is ſtrange to tell, how proud the Lord of Bilezuga was, to haue ſo reuenged himſelfe of his enemie, and to haue gained the victorie: although it were indeed gotten, not ſo much by his owne valour as by the proweſſe of the Turke: for whome and his followers in token of his thankfulneſſe, he cauſed a great feaſt to be prouided in the countrey there, whereby he honorably entertained them: and in the end of the feaſt, cauſed garments of great price (according to the manner of the Eaſterne nations) to be giuen to Othoman, in token of his fauour; and his ſouldiers to be alſo bountifully rewarded: but this was done with ſuch a preſumptious ſtate & grace, as if he had bin ſome great Prince, offring vnto the common F ſoldiers of the Turks, in paſſing by them, his hand to kiſſe, as a great fauour. With which exceeding inſolencie, Othoman was ſo much offended, that hee had much adoe to hold his hands from him: yet repreſſing his anger, hee in ſecret imparted his diſcontentment vnto his coſin Dunder, his vncle Dunders ſonne, grieuouſly complayning of the intollerable pride of the Chriſtian captain, and of the diſgrace by him done vnto the Turks, in offring them his hand to kiſſe; requiring his opinion how he were for the ſame to be corrected: who but a little before, beeing by the ſaid captaine made his lieutenant, franckly told his kinſmam, That as then nothing was to be attempted againſt him: firſt, for that on the one ſide they had Germean Ogli (a great man amongſt the Selzuccian Turkes) their enemie, and round about them beſides they were enuironed with the Chriſtians, whom he ſhould haue all in his neck at once if he ſhould offer the Bilezugian captain any wrong. By which anſwer, Othoman perceiuing his coſins great affection towards the Chriſtian captaine, and doubting to haue the miſchiefe he had imagined againſt him, by him reuealed, or at leaſtwiſe hindered; without more adoe ſuddenly taking vp his bow in his hand, with an arrow ſhot him quite thorow, and ſo ſlew him.

Michael Coſsi inuiteth Othoman to the mariage of his daughter.

Not long after, Michael Coſsi the captaine of Hirmen-Caia, Othomans great friend, hauing concluded a marriage betweene a gentleman of that countrey and his daughter, inuited all the Chriſtian captains of the caſtles thereabouts, requeſting them to come to the marriage; and the rather, that ſo they might grow into acquaintance with Othoman, whoſe power began now to grow dreadfull vnto them: hoping that ſuch means might be found at that merry meeting, that all being made friends, euery man might in more ſecurity poſſeſſe his own without feare of being ſpoiled by him. Vnto this marriage came al theſe bidden gueſts, bringing with them ſuch preſents as they thought good to beſtow vpon the new married folks, according to the maner of the country: but Othomans gifts far exceeded al the reſt, who beſides many other rich things, gaue vnto them whole flocks and droues of ſheep and cattel: which thing drew all the Chriſtian captains into no little admiration of his bountie; inſomuch that they began to ſay among themſelues, that Othomans wealth and good fortune did portend ſome greater matter, to their vtter ruin and fall: which to preuent, they thought it beſt by ſecret meanes to compaſſe his death. The execution of which deuice they referred to the captaine of Bilezuga, as vnto one with him beſt accqainted. This captaine was of great wealth, credit, and authoritie amongſt the Chriſtian rulers thereabouts, but very full of craft and diſſimulation: which his euill diſpoſition, Othoman of longtime well perceiued; yet hauing occaſion to vſe him, in ſubtill manner gaue him (in outward ſhew) al the honour he could, magnifying him in words, and debaſing himſelfe as plaine and poore in compariſon of him. But to giue a beginning to this trecherous deuiſe; the captaine meeting with Othoman, in friendly manner told him, how that he intended ſhortly to marrie the daughter of the captain of Iar-Chiſer, earneſtly requeſting him to honor that his marriage with his preſence, of the time whereof, he ſaid he would giue him farther knowledge afterwards: and al was but a color, to bring Othoman whithin his danger, not fearing any ſuch treaſon. Othoman vnderſtanding that the time of the marriage drew nigh, ſent thither a preſent of certain fat oxen and ſheep, in the name of his brother Iundus, for the captains prouiſion againſt the mariage; certifying him, that Othoman himſelfe, with his ſimple retinue, would be preſent at the mariage, & then preſent him, not with ſuch preſents as were agreeable wito his honor, yet ſuch as his poore abilitie could affoord. This meſſage with the preſents, were wonderful welcome to the captain, hoping aſſuredly that his deuiſed trecherie would take ſuch effect as he wiſhed: and therefore calling vnto him Michael Coſsi, in whom he had repoſed an eſpeciall truſt, declared to him his whole deuiſe (wherof he was not before altogether ignorant) requeſting him to take the pains to go vnto Othoman to bring him to the marriage, the time beeing now certainly appointed and at hand; which hee knew Coſsi might eaſily do, being of his familiar acquaintance: and in token of great friendſhip, he ſent vnto Othoman by the ſame meſſenger, a preſent of gilt plate. Coſsi tooke vpon him this meſſage, which when he had deliuer'd to Othoman, he found him very willing to go, as a man not doubting any harme. But Coſsi inwardly grieuing to ſee ſo braue a man, and his kind friend, by ſuch trecherous maner to be brought to his end, moued with compaſſion, diſcouered vnto him the whole conſpiracy of the captain againſt him, & of the plot laid for his deſtruction, willing him to take heed vnto himſelfe: for which verture, Othoman gaue Coſsi great thanks, as to his friend for ſauing his life, & withall richly rewarded him, promiſing him greater matters if he would continue that his faithfull friendſhip. Now concerning the captaine of Bilezuga (ſayth he) at your returne recommend me vnto him, and tell him, That I thinke my ſelfe much bound vnto him for many courteſies, but eſpecially for that he hath heretofore diuers times in moſt friendly manner protected my goods and cattell, within the ſafegard of his caſtle: which his friendſhip I moſt humbly requeſt him to continue for one yeare more, enforced thereunto by rea-

A reaſon of the dangerous wars betwixt me and the Prince German-ogli, as he well knoweth: wherefore if it might ſo ſtand with his good pleaſure, I would preſently ſend vnto his caſtle ſuch things as I make moſt reckoning of, requeſting him once more to be the faithfull keeper thereof, as he hath bin before: and tell him further, that my mother in law, with her daughter my wife, deſire nothing more than to find opportunitie to be acquainted with the honorable Lady his mother, for which cauſe (if it pleaſe him) I wil bring them both with me to the marriage.
This Othomans requeſt, when the captaine of Bilezuga vnderſtood by Michael Coſsi, he ſent the ſame Coſsi backe againe to haſten his comming, willing him to bring with him what gueſſe he pleaſed; appointing certain time and place when and where the marriage ſhould be ſolemniſed. And becauſe the caſtle of Bilezuga was thought to be too little conueniently to B receiue the multitude of people which were expected at the mariage, there was another open place of greater receipt appointed in the country for that purpoſe, about three miles diſtant from the caſtle. The marriage day drew nigh, wherunto Othoman muſt repaire for his promiſe ſake: and therefore prepared with all diligence to ſet forward, and to put in execution what he had deuiſed for the ſafetie of himſelf, & deſtruction of his enemy. Othoman had of long accuſtomed in dangerous times, to ſend by carriage the beſt of his things, made vp in packs, to be kept in ſafetie in the caſtle of Bilezuga: vnder the colour whereof, he now made great packes in forme as he was wont; but in ſtead of his rich houſhold ſtuffe, & ſuch other things of price, he thruſt in armed men, couering thoſe packs with homely couerings, ſending them by cariages to the caſtle of Bilezuga, giuing charge that they ſhould not come thither before twilight C After that, he apparelled certaine of his beſt ſoldiers in womens apparell, as if it had been his wife and mother in law, with their women: ſo caſting his iourney, that he with theſe diſguiſed ſoldiers, and the other ſent in packs, might at one inſtant meet at the caſtle aforeſaid. The captain being now in the countrey, and vnderſtanding that Othoman was comming in the euening with a great traine of gentlewomen; thought the cauſe of his late comming to be, for that the Turkiſh women vſe to ſhun the ſight of Chriſtian men by all means they can. Othoman beeing now come to the place in the country where the marriage was next day to be ſolemnized, hauing done his humble reuerence to the captaine, requeſted him to do him the honor, that his gentlewomen which were nigh at hand, might by his appointment be ſent to his caſtle, there to haue ſome conuenient lodging where they might alight and beſtow themſelues apart from D others, according to the homely faſhion of their nation; leſt peraduenture the preſence of ſo honorable a companie of noblemen and gallants, might put them out of countenance: which the captaine granted, and hauing ſaluted them a farre off after the Turkiſh manner, commanded them to be conueyed to his caſtle, making reckoning of them all as of a rich prey. At the ſame time that theſe diſguiſed ſouldiers arriued at the caſtle, came thither alſo the other ſouldiers couered in packs in the carriages: which ſo ſoone as they came into the caſtle, ſuddenly leapt out of the packs, and drawing their ſhort ſwords, with the helpe of their diſguiſed fellowes, ſlew the warders of the caſtle, and without more adoe poſſeſſed the ſame: the greateſt part of the captaines people beeing before gone out of the caſtle to the place of the marriage.
Othoman hauing tarried ſo long with the captaine, as he ſuppoſed the caſtle at that time by his E men ſurpriſed, ſo ſoone as the captaine had taken his chamber, ſuddenly tooke horſe, with all his followers, accompanied alſo with Coſsi, taking his way directly to the caſtle of Bilezuga, of whoſe ſudden departure the captaine vnderſtanding, preſently tooke horſe and purſued him with all his traine, which were for the moſt part drunk, and ouertaking him before he came to the caſtle ſet vpon him: in which conflict, he was by Othoman ſlain, and the reſt put to flight.

The captaine of Bilezuga treacherouſly ſeeking the death of Othoman, is by him, himſelfe ſlaine.

The ſame night Othoman vſing great celeritie, early in the morning ſurpriſed the caſtle of Iarchiſar, alſo where hee tooke priſoners the captain therof, with his faire daughter Dulufer, (which ſhould haue bin married to the captaine of Bilezuga the next day) with all her friends, as they were readie to haue gone vnto the marriage, which faire Lady he ſhortly after married vnto his eldeſt ſonne Orchanes; who had by her Amurath, third King of the Turkes, and F Solyman Baſſa.

Othoman omitting no opportunity, preſently ſent one of his captains called Durgut-Alpes, a man of great eſteeme and valour, to beſiege the caſtle of Einegiol: wherein hee vſed ſuch celeritie, that preuenting the fame of that was done at Bilezuga, hee ſuddenly enuironed the caſtle, in ſuch ſort that none could paſſe in or out; vntill ſuch time, as that Othoman hauing brought his priſoners and prey to the caſtle of Belizuga, and there hauing ſet all things in good order, came with the reſt of his men of warre to Einegiol; which he preſently by force tooke, promiſing the ſpoile thereof vnto his ſouldiers. The captaine called Hagio Nicholaus his antient enemie, he cauſed to be cut in ſmal peeces, and all the men to be ſlaine: which crueltie he vſed, becauſe they a little before had vſed the like tyrannie againſt his Turks.

Othoman by adminiſtration of iuſtice ſtrengtheneth his gouernment.

When Othoman had thus got into his ſubiection a great part of the ſtrong caſtles and forces of the greater Phrygia, with the territorie to them belonging, he began with all carefulneſſe to make good laws, and to execute Iuſtice to all his ſubiects, as well Chriſtians as turks: with great indifferencie ſtudying by all means to keepe his country in peace and quietneſſe, and to protect his ſubiects from the ſpoile of others, as well Chriſtians as Turks: whereby it came to paſſe, that the old inhabitants which had for the moſt part forſaken the countrey, by reaſon of the great troubles therein, repaired now againe to their antient dwellings; and not only they, but many other ſtrangers alſo, ſupplying the places of them whom the late warres had conſumed. So that by his good gouernment, that waſted countrey in ſhort time grew to bee againe very populous.

The citie of Nice beſieged by Othoman.

The ciuill gouernment of his countrey well eſtabliſhed, he beſieged the citie of Iſnica, in antient time called Nice, a citie of Bythinia, famous for the generall Councell there holden againſt Arius in the time of Conſtantine the Great. This citie he brought into great diſtreſſe, by placing his men of war in forts new built vpon euery paſſage and way leading vnto the ſame, ſo that nothing could bee brought out of the countrey for the reliefe of the poore citizens. They in this extremitie, by a ſecret maſſenger certified the Emperor of Conſtantinople (vnder whoſe obedience they were) in what diſtreſſe the citie ſtood; and that except he ſent them preſent reliefe, they muſt of neceſſitie either periſh with famine, or yeeld themſelues into the hands of their enemies the Turks. The Emperour moued with the pittifull complaint of this meſſenger, with all expedition embarked certaine companies of ſouldiers from Conſtantinople to relieue his beſieged citie. But Othoman vnderſtanding by his eſpials, where theſe ſouldiers were appointed to land, in ſecret manner withdrawing moſt of his forces from the ſiege, lay in ambuſh neere to the ſame place where the Emperors ſoldiers (caſting no peril) landed; who before they could put themſelues in order of battel were by Othoman & his turks in ſuch ſort charged, that moſt part of them were there ſlaine, and the reſt driuen into the ſea, where they miſerably periſhed. Othoman hauing thus politickely ouerthrown the Conſtantinopolitan ſouldiers, returning to the ſiege, continued the ſame in ſtraiter manner than before. The beſieged citizens driuen into great penurie, and now diſpairing of all helpe, yeelded themſelues with the great and rich citie of Nice into the hands of Othoman, with the ſpoile whereof he greatly enriched his men of warre.

Aladin the great Sultan of Iconium, glad to heare of this good ſucces of Othoman againſt the Chriſtians, in token of his fauour and loue, ſent vnto him a faire enſigne, with certaine drums, and trumpets, a ſword and princely robe, with large charters, That whatſoeuer he tooke from the Chriſtians ſhould be all his owne; and alſo that publicke prayers ſhould be ſaid in all the Turks temples, in the name of Othoman, for his health and proſperous eſtate: which two things properly belonged to the dignitie of the Sultan. Theſe extraordinarie fauours gaue occaſion for many to thinke, that Sultan Aladin (hauing no children) intended to make Othoman his adoptiue ſonne and ſucceſſour in his kingdome.

The preſents and charters ſent him, Othoman humbly accepted, ſending vnto Aladin the fift part of the ſpoile of Nice, taken from the Chriſtians; but the princely honours due to the Sultan only, he vſed not during the life of Aladin: intending not long after to haue gone himſelfe in perſon to viſit the Sultan, and ſo to haue growne into his further fauor. But hauing prepared all things for ſo honorable a iourney, at what time as he was about to ſet forward, he was certainly informed of the death of Aladin, and that Sabib (one of his great counſellors) had taken vpon him the dignitie of the Sulatan (as is before declared:) which news much diſcontented the aſpiring mind of this Oguzian Turk, in good hope to haue ſucceeded him in the kingdom, or at leſtwiſe to haue ſhared the greateſt part thereof vnto himſelfe, whereof he was now altogether diſappointed. Yet immediatly after the death of Aladin, he thought it now fit time to take vpon him the princely honours before granted vnto him by the Sultan in his life time, which he for modeſtie ſake had forborn, Aladin yet liuing; wherefore he made one Durſu ſyr-

A named Fakitche (that is to ſay, a man learned in the Turkiſh law) Biſhop and Iudge of Cara-Chiſar, commanding the publick praiers which were wont to be made for the health & proſperous raigne of the great Sultan, to be now made in his owne name; which was firſt openly done by the ſaid Biſhop in the pulpit of Cara-Chiſar. At the ſame time alſo he began to coin money in his owne name, and to take vpon him all other honours belonging vnto a Sultan or King: which was about ten yeares after the death of his father Ertogrul, and in the yeare of our Lord 1300, vnto which time the beginning of the great empire of the Turks is vnder the fortune of this Othoman, to be of right referred, as then by him thus begun.

When Othoman had thus taken vpon him the maieſty of a King, he made his ſonne Orchanes Prince and gouernour of Cara-Chiſar; promoting his principall followers, to be gouernours B of other ſtrong caſtles and forts, diuers of which places retaine the name of thoſe captaines at this day. He himſelfe made choice of the citie Neapolis, about twentie miles from Nice, to ſeat his regall Palace in; where alſo diuers of his Nobilitie built them houſes, and changed the name of the city, calling it Deſpotopolis, as who ſhould ſay, the city of the Lord or Prince. For all this, Othoman ceaſed not to deuiſe by all meanes he could, to augment his kingdome: and for that cauſe beeing accompanied with his ſonne Orchanes, made many rodes into the countries adioyning vpon him, ſurprzing ſuch places as might beſt ſerue his purpoſe, for the enlargement of his kingdome, all which in particular to rehearſe were tedious.

Neapolis the firſt regall citie of the Othoman Kings.

The Chriſtian Princes, rulers of the countries bordering vpon this new kingdome, fearing leſt the greatnes of Othoman might in ſhort time be their vtter confuſion, agreed to ioyne all C their forces together, and ſo to commit to the fortune of one great battell their owne eſtates with his: according to which reſolution, the Chriſtian confederate Princes, which were for the moſt part of Myſia, and Bythinia, leuying the greateſt forces they were able to make, with fire and ſword inuaded Othomans kingdome. Who hauing knowledge beforehand of this great preparation made againſt him, had in a readineſſe all his captaines and men of warre: and hearing that his enemies had entred his dominion, in warlike manner marched directly towards them; and meeting with them in the confines of Phrygia and Bythinia, fought with them a great and mortall battell, wherein many were ſlaine on both ſides, as well Turks as Chriſtians: and after a long fight, obtained of them a right bloudy victorie. In this battell Caſteleanus, one of the greateſt Chriſtian captains was ſlaine: another called Tekenſis of the country which D he gouerned in Phrygia, chaſed by Othoman vnto the caſtle of Vlubad, not far diſtant from the place where the battell was fought, was for feare deliuered vnto him by the captaine of the ſame caſtle, and was afterward by Othomans commandement moſt cruelly cut in pieces, within the view of his chiefe caſtle: which Othoman afterward ſubdued, with all the countrey thereabouts. The other Chriſtian Princes and captains ſaued themſelues by flying into ſtronger holds farther off. The Prince of Bythinia the chiefe author of this war, fled into the ſtrong citie Pruſa, which the Turks now call Buruſa, whither Othoman not long after led his army, in hope to haue won the ſame: but finding it not poſſible to be taken by force began preſentat one time to build two great and ſtrong caſtles vpon the chiefe paſſages leading to the citie, which caſtles he with great induſtrie finiſhed in one yeare: and in the one, placed as captaine E Actemeur his nephew; in the other one Balaban Zuck, both men of great courage, and ſkilfull in feats of warre: and in this ſort hauing blocked vp the citie of Pruſa, ſo that little or nothing could without great danger be brought into it, he ſubdued the moſt part of Bythinia; and ſo returned home, leauing the two caſtles well manned with ſtrong garriſons, vnder the charge of the captaines before named.

Pruſa beſieged by Othoman.

Othoman returning home to Neapolis, honorably rewarded his ſoldiers, according to their deſerts, eſtabliſhing ſuch a quiet and pleaſing gouernment in his kingdom, that people in great number reſorted from far into his dominions, there to ſeat themſelues: wherby his kingdom became in few years exceeding populous, and he for his politicke gouernment moſt famous. And ſo liuing in great quietneſſe certaine yeares, being now become aged and much troubled F with the gout, his old ſoldiers accuſtomed to liue by the wars, abhorring peace, came to him, requeſting him as it were with one voice, to take ſome honorable warre in hand for the inlarging of his kingdome, with great cheerfulnes offring to ſpend their liues in his ſeruice rather than to grow old in idlenes: which forwardnes of his men of war greatly pleaſed him, and ſo giuing them thanks, for that time diſmiſt them, promiſing that he would not be long vnmindfull of their requeſt. But yet thinking it good to make all things ſafe at home before he tooke G any great wars in hand abroad, thought it expedient to call vnto him Michael Coſsi, the onely Chriſtian Captaine whom for his great deſerts he had at al times ſuffered to liue in quiet with his poſſeſſions, as it were in the heart of his kingdome; and by faire means (if it might be) to perſuade him to forſake the Chriſtian religion, & become a follower of Mahomets, ſo to take away all occaſion of miſtruſt: which if he ſhould refuſe to do, then forgetting al former friendſhip, to make war vpon him as his vtter enemie. Whereupon Coſsi was ſent for, being perſuaded by the meſſenger, that Othoman had ſent for him, becauſe he had occaſion to vſe his wonted faithfull counſell and ſeruice in a great exploit which hee had intended, as he had oftentimes before. Coſsi thinking of nothing leſſe than of that which enſued, came accompaned with ſuch ſoldiers as he thought to vſe in that ſeruice: But comming vnto Othoman, and vnderſtanding H the very cauſe why hee was ſent for, and ſeeing danger emminent on euery ſide, kiſſing Othomans hand, after the manner of the Turks, requeſted him in curteous manner to enter him in the principles of the Mahometan religion, which he promiſed euer after to embrace: And ſo ſaying certain words after Othoman, he turned Turke, to the great diſpleaſure of God, and the contentment of Othoman and his nobilitie. For which his reuolting, Othoman preſently gaue him an enſigne and a rich robe, tokens whereby the Mahometan Sultans aſſure their vaſſals of their fauour and the vndoubted poſſeſſion of ſuch land and liuing as they then hold.

Michael Coſsi turneth Turk.

Oftentimes after this, Othoman for the contenting of his ſoldiers, inuaded the countries bordering vpon him, tooke many ſtrong caſtles and forts, ſubdued the moſt part of Phrygia, Miſia, and Bythinia, and other great regions, vnto the Euxine ſea: and being now very aged and I diſeaſed as is aforeſaid with the gout, and thereby vnable to goe into the field in perſon himſelfe, oftentimes ſent his ſonne Orchanes againſt his enemies; who to the imitation of his father atchieued many great enterpriſes, Othoman his father yet liuing.

Now happily might the conſiderate reader (and not without iuſt cauſe) maruell, what dead ſleep had ouerwhelmed the Greeke Emperors of thoſe times; firſt Michael Paleologus, and afterwards his ſonne Andronicus, both men of great valour, and ſtill reſiant at Conſtantinople, thus to ſuffer the Turks (not Othoman for he as yet bare no ſway; but others the ſharers of Sultan Aladins kingdom) to take their cities, ſpoile their countries, kil their ſubiects, and dayly to incroch vpon them in the leſſer Aſia, and eſpecially in Bythinia, ſo neere vnto them, and as it K were euen vnder their noſes: But let him with me, heere as in a moſt conuenient place but breath a little, and conſider the troubled ſtate of that declining empire, now haſting to an end; and he ſhall plainly ſee the cauſes of the decay thereof, and how like an old diſeaſed bodie quite ouerthrowne and ſicke to death, it became at length a prey vnto the aſpiring Turks. Michael Paleologus hauing by great trecherie obtained the Greeke empire, and by rare fortune recouered alſo the citie of Conſtantinople from Baldwin the Emperor (as is in the former part of this Hiſtorie declared) fearing the power of the Princes of the Weſt, but eſpecially of Charles King of Sicilia, then a Prince of great fame and power, whom he knew Baldwin (the late Emperor) ceaſed not to ſolicite for the reſtitution of him againe into his empire, and to haue alſo ioyned with him a neere bond of affinitie, by marrying his daughter vnto Charles his ſon: to L auert this danger, and to intangle Charles with troubles neere home, by his embaſſadors offred vnto Gregorie the tenth, then Biſhop of Rome, to vnite and conforme the Greeke Church vnto the Latine, and to acknowledge the Biſhops ſupremacie, in ſuch ſort as that it ſhould bee lawfull for any man to appeale vnto the court of Rome, as vnto the higher and moſt excellent court; of which his offer the Pope gladly accepted, promiſing to performe what he had before requeſted, for the keeping of Charles otherwiſe buſied. But when it came to the point, that this reformation and alteration of religion in the Greek church ſhould be made, Ioſeph the Patriarch, to begin withall, gaue vp his place, & ſhortly after forſaking the city, retired himſelfe into a monaſterie neere vnto the ſtrait of Boſphorus, where he at quiet deuoutly ſpent the reſt of his life. The reſt of the clergie alſo diſcontented with this innouation, in their ſermons openly M inuaighed againſt it, perſuading the people not to receiue it; crying out, That now was come the time of their trial, the time of their martyrdome, and the time wherein they were to receiue the glorious crown of their painfull ſuffrings; inſomuch, that great tumults were thervpon raiſed, and all the citie and the country in an vprore: for it was not the clergie only, and the vulgar people by them moued, which diſliked and abhorred theſe the Emperors proceedings, Alteration of religion in the Greeke church.

A dings,& made theſe ſtirs,but many of the better ſort,yea, of the chiefe magiſtrats themſelues alſo. So that Michael Paleologus the Emperor leauing all other forrein buſines,was enforced to conuert all his power and ſtudy vnto the appeaſing of theſe domeſticke troubles, as deeming them of greater danger than thoſe abroad. And firſt to perſuade his diſcontented ſubiects,hee told them,That this alteration was made not for any good liking he had thereunto,but in reſpect of the dangerouſnes of the time: and that it was a point of wiſedome,to foreſee dangers hanging ouer our heads,& not to delay,if any thing were to be altred,for the auerting therof: for if the enemies(as he ſaid)ſhould come,the city yet in many places rent,or but lately repaired,& as it were but newly raiſed from death to life, the preſent miſchiefs would be far greater than thoſe forepaſſed,& that then their enemies would become lords not of their religion B and ceremonies only,but of al at once,their wiues,their children,& whatſoeuer elſe they had: where their libertie changed into bondage, they ſhould be conſtrained to conforme themſelues not with their bodily ſeruice only,but euen with their minds alſo, vnto the wills of the Latines their enemies. And that ſo it would come to paſſe,that no man ſhould be able to keepe the old cuſtoms & manners of their anceſtors,but ſhould ſee euen their moſt ſacred rites and ceremonies changed & quite ouerthrown. Which he carefully foreſeeing,had not(as he ſayd) refuſed to yeeld vnto neceſſity,and as wiſdome would,neglected a little harme in reſpect of a greater benefit; & in the leſſe to haue yeelded vnto his enemies, to enioy the benefit of the greater. With which the emperors perſuaſion ſome were mooued,& ſo held themſelues contented: and ſome others not; againſt whom hee was inforced to vſe other more ſeuere remedies, C as againſt his rebellious ſubiects: of whom ſome he impriſoned, ſome he baniſhed, ſome he tormented,ſome he diſmembred,ſome he bereft of their ſight,or confiſcated their goods, vſing(in briefe)all the means wherby the minds of the reſolute or the weake were to be mooued. All which things, they whoſe zeale was grounded vpon knowledge(in number feweſt) with patience indured: but the greater part void of iudgement, & the refuce of the people in ſimple attire,ranne rogueing abroad,ſome into Peloponeſus,ſome into Thracia,ſome into Achaia,& ſome as far as Colchos,as men perſecuted for their conſcience,not regarding greatly whether,ſo it were out of the emperors iuriſdiction,& ſomthing fitting their owne humors; neither conforming themſelues vnto the religion then commonly by the emperor eſtabliſht, neither yet agreeing among themſelues,but taking vnto them diuers names,ſome as the diſci- D ples of Arſenius,ſome of Ioſeph,& ſome of others,ſome of them, themſelues deceiued,and deceiuing others alſo. Thus for the auoiding of forrein danger out of the Weſt, was the Empire at home no little indangered,& the ſtate thereof ſhaken. Wherewith the Emperor was ſo encombred,as that he had no leiſure to prouide for the tempeſt ariſing by the Turks out of the Eaſt,but was inforced wholly to imploy himſelf & al his indeauors to the keeping of his people & ſubiects in their due obedience at home. All whoſe deep deuices,firſt in aſpiring to the empire,no way vnto him due,& great trauells afterwards for the aſſuring of the ſame to himſelfe and his poſteritie,againſt all right,euen with the alteration of the religion of his fathers, yeelded him in the winding vp of all,not ſo much as credit of an honorable ſepulture: but dying in theſe troubles not far from Liſymachia,as he was making preparation againſt the prince E of Theſſalie,was there by his ſon Andronicus his commandement(for whoſe aduancement he had ſtrained both his faith & honor)obſcurely buried in the field,a good way from his camp, as vnworthie of a better ſepulture,for reuolting from the antient religion of his anceſtors, although his obſequies were for faſhion ſake afterward with ſome ſolemnitie celebrated. This was the end of the great emperor Michael Paleologus,in whoſe time the Turks,the ſucceſſors of Aladin,greatly incroched vpon him in the leſſer Aſia,as is in part before declared: a man greatly adorned with the good gifts both of the bodie and the mind, had hee not for the aduancement of himſelfe and his poſteritie,ſtained the ſame with foule treacherie and apoſtacie: for which(as ſome ſay)he euer after liued in conſcience troubled,and dying was euen by his own ſon not thought worthie of an honorable funerall. A notable example vnto all ſuch as with gree- F dineſſe ſeeke after vaine glorie, and fooliſhly expoſe themſelues vnto ſuch aduentures, as oftentimes ouerwhelme their deepeſt deuices,hauing in themſelues no certaintie, preferring their inordinate deſires (either for themſelues or their poſteritie) before that which is good and vertuous. Twice wretched in ſo doing; firſt in their follie, and then in their indeauors: who beſide that they finde God himſelfe againſt their deſignes and purpoſes,they by & by alſo euidently meet with other things than what they had fore- caſted, contrarie vnto them; and ſo themſelues oftentimes, contrarie to their expectation, caſt headlong into extreame miſerie: for loe, euen he of whom we now ſpeake, otherwiſe a man of great wiſedome, and happie in his doings, ouercome with his affection towards his children, in deſiring to leaue vnto them the empire, when as he ought to haue caſt all the care both of himſelfe and of them, eſpecially vpon the prouidence of God; hee like a blind man following his owne deepe conceits, not grounded vpon the feare of God, but vpon mans wiſdome only, caſt himſelfe before he was aware into miſerable troubles, and became odious euen vnto his ſubiects, and them alſo for whom he had ſo forgot himſelfe. For whereas God had euen from his childhood allotted vnto him the empire (as was by many euident ſignes and tokens to haue bin gathered) if he could haue moderated his vntimely deſires, kept his tongue from periury, & his hands from bloud, and not turned out of the way after ſtrange doctrine; hee had by many degrees excelled euen the beſt Emperors his predeceſſors: wheras now he lieth obſcurely buried, ſhrouded in the ſheet of defame, the report of his foule and faithleſſe dealings far exceeding all his other worthie vertues.

Andronicus ſparing to maintain his nauie, weakneth his empire.

Andronicus Paleologus ſucceeding his father in the Empire, and thinking by reſtoring again the gouernment of the church, together with the rites and cuſtomes of the Greeks, to haue appeaſed all ſuch troubles as were before by his father raiſed, by bringing in thoſe of the Latines; found himſelfe therein much deceiued, and his troubles no leſſe than his fathers: they which had before receiued the Latine cuſtomes, and well liking of them, with great obſtinacie defending the ſame; and the other of the contrarie faction now countenanced by the Emperor, without modeſtie or meaſure inſulting vpon them: whereof aroſe exceeding great ſtirs and troubles, eſpecially in the beginning of his raigne: to the great benefit of the incroching Turks, who in the mean time ceaſed not by all means to increaſe their territories in Aſia; and not only there, but in the iſlands of the Mediterranean ſea alſo. For Andronicus by the death of Charles King of Sicilie, deliuered of the greateſt feare for which both he and his father before him had to their great coſt and charge both built and maintained a ſtrong fleet of gallies; now perſuaded by ſome, whoſe actions and ſpeeches were after the manner of the court, all framed vnto the princes appetite, (as the readieſt way to thriue, without reſpect of the common good) to ſpare that needleſſe charge (as they termed it) which yerely coſt him more than any thing elſe, had diſcharged all his mariners and ſea men, and commanded all the gallies to be laid vp, ſome in one creeke, ſome in another; where neglected and not looked vnto, they in time for the moſt part rotted and periſhed. As for the Marriners, they went ſome one way, ſome another, as their fortunes led them, to ſeeke for their liuings in forreine countries, euen with the Emperors enemies; and ſome gaue themſelues to husbandrie, thinking it better by doing ſomething to liue, than by ſitting ſtill to periſh. Which good husbandrie at the firſt ſeemed to be verie profitable vnto the Emperour, but eſpecially vnto ſuch as beeing neere vnto him, and couetouſly giuen, made ſmall reckoning of all other the moſt neceſſarie defences of the empire, in compariſon of hoording vp of mony, vntil that it was afterward too late by experience found hereof to haue ſprung many great miſchiefes, vnto the great weakning of the Greeke Empire. For beſides that the Turks without let did great harme on the ſea; the Pyrats now out of feare of the Emperours gallies, at their pleaſure tooke the ſpoyle of the rich Iſlands in the Mediterranean, and robbed the towns all along the ſea coaſt, to the vnſpeakable griefe of the poore country people: and yet not ſo contented, came with their gallies, ſometime two, ſometime three, and ſometime more, as it were in contempt, euen cloſe vnto the imperiall citie. Yea the Venetians were ſo bold, as vpon a right ſmall diſpleaſure to rifle and afterward to ſet fire vpon the ſuburbs thereof, which they would hardly haue aduentured, had the Emperors fleet bin preſerued and maintained in the woonted ſtrength.

At the ſame time alſo Andronicus the Emperor (to the great hindrance of the affaires of the empire, and aduantage of the forrein enemie) was not a little troubled with a jealous ſuſpition of his brother Conſtantine (commonly called Porphyrogenitus) as if he had ſought to haue aſpired vnto the empire, ſeeking by all means to win vnto himſelfe the loue and fauor of all men, but eſpecially of the nobility both at home and abroad, & ſo by that means to mount into the height of his deſires: All which (as moſt men thought) were but meere ſlanders, maliciouſly deuiſed by ſuch as enuying at his honor, and taking occaſion by the emperors ſuſpition, ceaſed not to increaſe the ſame, vntill they had wrought his vnworthie deſtruction. The firſt ground of this falſe ſuſpition in the Emperours head, was, for that that this Conſtantine euen from his childhood, was for many cauſes, better beloued of the old Emperour his father, than An-

A dronicus, as better furniſhed with thoſe gifts of nature which beautifie a prince, and of a more curteous behauior than was his brother: inſomuch that had he not bin the yonger brother, his father could willingly haue left him his ſucceſſor in the empire. This was one and the chiefeſt cauſe of the emperors grudge, and the ground of his ſuſpition. Yet was there another alſo, and that not much leſſe than this: for that his father in his life time had of long thought to haue ſeparated from the empire a great part of Theſſalia & Macedonia, and to haue made him abſolute Prince thereof; & had haply ſo done, had he not bin by death preuented: which thing alſo much grieued Andronicus, and the more incenſed him againſt his brother. Which his ſecret hatred he for all that according to his wiſedome, cunningly diſſembled, not onely during the time that his father liued, but three yeres after his death alſo, making ſhew of the greateſt B loue and kindneſſe towards him that was poſſible. Conſtantine in the meane time, of ſuch great reuenues as were by his father aſſigned vnto him, eaping great profit, moſt bountifully beſtowed the ſame vpon his followers and fauorits, and others that made ſute vnto him, as well the meaner ſort as the greater, and with his ſweet behauiour woon vnto him the hearts of all men: for affabilitie and curteſie in high degree eaſily allureth mens minds, as do faire flowers in the ſpring the paſſengers eyes. This was that precept of the wiſe Indians, That the higher a Prince was in dignitie, and the more curteous he ſhewed himſelfe vnto his inferiors, the better he ſhould be of them beloued. He therefore that ſhould for the two firſt cauſes blame Conſtantine, ſhould doe him wrong; as both proceeding not of himſelfe, but of his fathers too much loue: but in the third he was not altogether blameleſſe; for if for want of experience C he prodigally gaue ſuch gifts, as for the moſt part might haue beſeemed the Emperor himſelfe, he ignorantly erred, yet did he no little offend: but if hee knew, that for his too profuſe bounty he could not be vnſuſpected of his brother, & yet without regard held on that courſe, he was greatly to be blamed therin. For if nothing elſe might haue moued him, yet he ſhould haue conſidered, to what end the like doings of others in former times had ſorted, and how many it had brought to vntimely end. So although perhaps that Conſtantine meant no harme vnto his brother, or any way to ſupplant him, yet did theſe things not a little increaſe and aggrauate the former ſuſpitions, and open the eares of the Emperour his brother vnto ſuch calumniation as commonly attendeth vpon immoderat bountie. But to returne to our purpoſe, this honorable Conſtantine then liued in Lydia, but lately married, and in good hope long to D liue, being not paſt thirty yeres old: but pleaſantly ſpending the time with his wife at Nymphea in Lydia, at ſuch time as he was thus ſecretly accuſed vnto his brother, the Emperour thought it good, as vpon other occaſions of buſineſſe, to paſſe ouer into Aſia himſelfe, but indeed with a ſecret reſolution, vpon the ſudden to oppreſſe his brother vnawares, as by proofe it fel out. For at his comming ouer, Conſtantine fearing nothing leſſe, was forthwith apprehended, with all his greateſt fauorits, of whom one Michael Strategopulus (ſometime a man in great authoritie with the emperor his father, and of all other, for wealth, honor, & noble acts moſt famous) was chiefe: who together with Conſtantine were faſt clapt in priſon, where wee will leaue them euery houre looking to die, their lands and goods being before confiſcated. But theſe worthie men, eſpecially Conſtantine and Strategopulus, thus laid faſt; who many times E in great battels diſcomfited the Turks, & notably defended the frontiers of the empire along the Eaſt ſide of the riuer Meander; they now finding none to withſtand them, forraged not only all the rich countrie beyond the riuer, but with an infinit multitude paſſing the ſame, did there great harme alſo: ſo that there was no remedie, but that the Emperor muſt of neceſſitie make choice of ſome other worthie captaine for the defence of thoſe his cities and countries, by the incurſion of the Turks then in danger in that part of Aſia.

Immoderate bounty in great men dangerous.

There was then in the Emperors court one Alexius Philanthropenus, a right valiant and renowned captain, and then in the flower of his youth; of him the Emperour thought good to make choice for defence of thoſe frontiers of his empire in the leſſer Aſia (againſt the Turks) which were before, the charge of his brother Conſtantine & Strategopulus; ioyning to him one F Libadarius, an old famous captain, & a man of great experience alſo: appointing vnto him the gouernment of the cities of Ionia; and vnto the other the frontiers along the winding bankes of Meander. Where Alexius hauing now gotten a charge worthie his valour, & in many great conflicts with the Turks ſtill carrying away the victory, became in ſhort time of great fame: beſides that, he was exceeding bountifull & curteous vnto all men; a coſtly, but a readie way vnto dangerous credit and renown. Thus at the firſt al things proſpered in his hand according to his hearts deſire: yea the Turks themſelues, bordring vpon him, hardly beſet on the one ſide by the Tartars, & on the other by himſelfe; & yet not ſo much feared with their enemies behind them, as moued with his curteſie, came ouer to him with their wiues and children & ſerued themſelues (many of them) in his campe. But as they ſay, That in Iupiters court no man might drinke of the tun of bliſſe, but that he muſt taſte alſo of the tun of wo: ſo fell it out with this great captain, who hauing but taſted of the better tun, had the worſe all poured full vpon his head. For Libadarius ſeeing all to proſper with him, and ſomewhat enuying thereat, began to feare & ſuſpect, leſt he proud of his good fortune, & now grown very ſtrong, caſting off his allegeance, ſhould aſpire vnto the empire, and ſo firſt begin with him, as the neereſt vnto him: which thing many of the nobilitie ſecretly ſurmiſed alſo, but how truly many doubt. But this enuious plot was not yet ripe, but lay as fire raked vp in the aſhes. Now there was with Alexius Philanthropenus, certaine companies of Cretenſians, whom for their good ſeruice and fidelitie he both honored & truſted aboue others, vſing them all for the gard of his own perſon. Theſe men proud of their credit, hearing of the ſurmiſed aſpiring of their General, & in hope by his aduancement to raiſe their own fortunes alſo, ceaſed not continually to ſuggeſt vnto him high conceits of himſelfe, & to perſuade, with al ſpeed to take the matter vpon him; the very conceit whereof (as they ſaid) would be vnto him no leſſe danger, than if he ſhould enter into the action it ſelfe, as he might well ſee by the wofull examples of the noble Conſtantine and Strategopulus, both in extreame perill but for the iealous conceit ſurmiſed againſt them. Which quicke ſuggeſtions wrought in his great mind diuers, & thoſe moſt contrarie motions, ſo that he ſcarce knew himſelfe what he would or would not. For they which are vnto themſelues in conſcience guiltie of any grieuous crime, if any miſchiefe hang ouer their heads therefore, it happeneth vnto them as foreknowing and expecting the ſame euen from the time that they offended: vnto whom, if nothing elſe, yet that ſame verie foreknowledge eaſeth not a little the griefe and miſerie: whereas contrariwiſe, they which are with ſudden miſchiefes, and vnlooked for, ouerwhelmed, not knowing any iuſt cauſe why, muſt needs ſtand as men diſmaid, and almoſt beſide themſelues. But at length after diuers great conflicts with himſelfe, the euill perſuaders of rebellion preuailed with him. Yet did hee at the firſt forbid any mention to be made of him in the army as emperor: which cauſed the Cretenſians, the chiefe authours of his rebellion, almoſt to force him forthwith to take vpon him the imperiall ornaments, thereby to confirme the minds of his followers and fauorits: for that ſuch reſolutions were (as they ſaid) forthwith to be put into execution; neither that any thing required ſo ioynt celeritie and dexteritie both of the minde and the hand; and for that longer delay would but fill his ſoldiers heads with doubts, and diſcourage them with the feare of the vncertaintie of the euent: all which for all that moued him not ſo to do; but whether for feare of the greatnes of the danger, or for that he ſecretly thought how firſt to circumuent Libadarius, of whom he ſtood moſt in doubt, is vncertaine. The report of all which his doings and deſignes were in ſhort time carried firſt vnto Libadarius, as the neereſt, & ſo in poſt vnto the Emperor: who were therewith not a little both diſquieted. And had Alexius (as ſome perſuaded him) at the firſt ſet vpon Libadarius, then vnprouided, no doubt but hee had done much: but God, by whom all princes raign, and whoſe power confoundeth the deuices of the proud, turned him from Libadarius, by whom he was to be oppreſſed, to follow after Theodorus the Emperors brother, of whom he was to haue feared no harm. This Theodorus, the firſt man that Alexius ſhot at, warned by his brother Conſtantines harmes, liued a pleaſant priuat life in Lydia, far from the ambition of the court, and therefore ſo much the more beloued of the emperor: but Alexius fearing leſt in that hurle many ſhould reſort vnto him, as vnto the Emperours brother, and ſo hinder his proceedings, thought beſt firſt to make him ſure, and afterward to oppreſſe Libadarius not aware, that in ſtead of the bodie, hee followed but after the ſhadow. But Libadarius, as a man of great experience, taking the benefit of this his ouerſight, and knowing money to be the ſinewes of warre, gathered together all the coyne he poſſibly could, both of his owne and his friends, ſending alſo for the Emperours Treaſures to Philadelphia, and with all ſpeed raiſed the greateſt power he poſſibly he could out of Ionia, which hee furniſhed with all things neceſſarie, promiſing vnto his ſoldiers great matters, and filling them with greater hopes, and that within ten dayes hee would with a great armie meet the Rebell in the heart of Lydia, and there dare him battell. But withall conſidering that the Cretenſians, men but Alexius Philanthropenus aſpireth.

Libadarius oppoſeth himſelfe againſt the proceedings of Philanthropenus.

A but of a mercenarie faith, had always the gard of Alexius his perſon, he thought good to make proofe if they might with gold be woon to betray him: and ſo well wrought the matter by great ſummes of mony preſently giuen, & promiſes of greater preferments with the emperor, that they (ſomwhat before diſcontented with Alexius his ſlacknes, and now doubting alſo his ſucceſſe) yeelded vnto his deſire, promiſing in the beginning of the battell to deliuer him into his hands; which they ſhortly after in the very ioyning of the battel accordingly performed, deliuering him faſt bound vnto Libadarius his enemie. Who not a little proud thereof, vſed him with great inſolencie, and within three dayes after put out his eyes, for feare the emperor according to his curteous nature ſhould haue giuen his pardon; and ſo kept him in priſon vntill the Emperors pleaſure were further known. Thus through falſe ſuſpect and ambition were B the greateſt champions of the Greeke empire brought to confuſion.

Now after this rebellion of Philanthropenus, Andronicus became ſo iealous of his owne people, as that he wiſt not whom to truſt, repoſing greater confidence in ſtrangers, than in his own ſubiects, to the great hurt of his eſtate. At the ſame time it fortuned, that the Meſſagets (commonly called Alani) which then dwelt beyond Iſter, being Chriſtians, but oppreſſed by the European Tartars, wearie of their ſlauerie, ſent ſecretly vnto the Greeke Emperor Andronicus, offring that if he would aſſigne vnto them a conuenient place for them to dwell in, they would come ouer vnto him with ten thouſand of their families, and faithfully ſerue him in his wars againſt the Turks (who then grieuouſly waſted his countries in Aſia, deſtitute of good captains and commanders:) which their offer he gladly accepted, as ſtanding then in need of aid, & not C greatly truſting his own people. But when theſe Maſſagets, in number aboue 10000, comming ouer with their wiues & children, were to be furniſhed with all things, and eſpecially the men with horſes, armor, and pay, (all which the emperor could not of himſelfe doe) the ſubiects were therewith hardly charged, and Commiſſion ſent out into euery countrey and prouince, for the taking vp of horſes and armor; euery citie, euery countrey towne and village, euerie gentlemans houſe and poore mans cottage, was ſearched and ranſacked, and all things taken from them, that was there found fit for ſeruice, to their great diſcontentment, euery man murmuring and grudging to haue his armes taken from him, and giuen to ſtrangers: but when they were alſo to be contributers vnto their pay, they then openly curſed and banned them euen vnto their faces. Yet at length (though with mnch adoo) theſe ſtrangers well furniſhed with D all things neceſſarie, were with ſome other forces alſo, ſhipped ouer into Aſia, vnder the leading of Michael Paleologus the Emperours eldeſt ſonne, and then his companion in the Empire. Who marching alongſt the country, came and incamped about Magneſia. Where the Turkes at the firſt, after their woonted manner retyred themſelues into the high mountains and thick woods, that from thence they might more ſafely learn what ſtrength their new come enemies were of, and what diſcipline of war they kept: for they knew, that vpon the comming of great armies many falſe reports did run, & that things were made far greater than indeed they were, as did of theſe alſo, as of a people inuincible: and therefore they thought it beſt ſo to protract the time, vntill they might ſee in what ſort beſt to deale with them. But ſo houering ouer their heads, and perceiuing them oftentimes without order to roame abroad into the country E ſeeking after prey, (for why, they after the manner of mercenarie men ſpoiled their friends no leſſe than if they had been their enemies) they came downe in good order from the mountaines, from whence at the firſt they aduentured but a little; but afterwards they came on further, and with greater confidence, in ſuch ſort, as that it ſeemed they would ere long aſſault the yong Emperor in his campe. Wherewith he with the reſt diſcouraged, without any ſtroke giuen retyred; the Turks ſtill following him at the heeles. For neither he, neither the reſt, any thing conſidered the ſmall number of their enemies: but as drunken men, whoſe heads filled with groſſe vapors, are deceiued in the greatneſſe of the obiect that they ſee, and oftentimes thinke one thing to be two; ſo were they alſo in like manner with their owne feare blinded. Beſide that, moſt commonly it falleth out, that the army which inſolencie and iniury forerun- F neth, is appointed to deſtruction, and by the fearefulneſſe of it ſelfe ouerthrowne before the enemie ſet vpon it, they themſelues becomming enemies to themſelues and Gods iuſt vengeance appointing vnto them ſuch an end as their deeds haue deſerued: neither was it like that they ſhould doe any great good, that at their firſt ſetting forth, in ſtead of prouiſion, carried out with them the bitter curſes and execrations of their friends. Michael the Emperor ſeeing

the Maſſagets flie, and not daring with thoſe few hee had left, to oppoſe himſelfe againſt his enemies, retyred himſelfe into the ſtrong caſtle of Magneſia, there to expect what would become of theſe miſchiefes. But the Maſſagets ſpoyling the countrey of the poore Chriſtians as they went, marched directly vnto the ſtrait of Heleſpontus, and there againe paſſed oner into Europe, as if they had been therefore onely ſent for ouer the riuer Iſter, to ſhew the Turks the ſooner the way vnto the ſea in Aſia. For it was not many dayes after, but that Michael the Emperor being returned to Conſtantinople, the Turkes comming down, with a great power, ſubdued all the Countries, euen vnto the coaſt of Lesbos, to the great ruine and weakening of the Greeke Empire.

Ronzerius what he was.

It was not long after theſe great ſtirs made by the Maſſagets, but that one Ronzerius (ſometime a notable pirat, but as then a moſt famous Captaine) hearing of the great entertainment that the Greeke Emperor gaue vnto ſtrangers, by meſſengers ſent for that purpoſe offred vnto him his ſeruice in his wars againſt the Turks, as had before the Maſſagets. This Ronzerius of whom we ſpeake, had out of Catalonia a prouince of Spaine, and out of that part of France which is called Narbonenſis, and ſome other places alſo, gathred together a great number of baſe needie naked men, yet luſtie able bodies, and fit for ſeruice either by ſea or land; with whom hee manned foure tall gallies, and ſo as a notable pirat long time robbed, not onely the merchants trading to and fro in the Mediterranean, but landing his men oftentimes in the rich Iſlands, carried away thence much rich ſpoyle alſo; vntill at length by the miſchiefe hee did being become famous, and great wars then ariſing betwixt Charles King of Naples, and Theodorus King of Sicilia, he was by Theodorus ſent for and requeſted of aid: which hee (liuing of the ſpoyle) eaſily granted, and ſo came vnto him with a thouſand horſe and as many foot, all old expert ſoldiers, whoſe good ſeruice ſtood the King in thoſe wars in great ſtead. But as the end of war is peace, ſo at length vpon the euil ſucceſſe of Charles, a peace being concluded betwixt the two Kings, and confirmed by a marriage betwixt their children; Ronzerius liuing altogether by his fortunes, was to ſeeke for new entertainment, both for himſelfe and his men, as hauing neither houſe nor certain dwelling place to repaire to; but being as needy men met together, ſome out of one place, ſome out of another, in hope of bootie as their fortune led them. In which caſe Ronzerius their Generall thought it beſt to offer his ſeruice to the Greeke Emperor in his wars againſt the Turks; whereof he gladly accepted, and ſo ſent for him: vnto whom he ſhortly after came with two thouſand good ſoldiers, called (after the proud Spaniſh manner) by the name of Catalonians, for that they were for the moſt part Spaniards of the country of Catalonia. Of whoſe comming the Emperor reioycing more than he had cauſe (as afterward by proofe it fell out) in token of his great fauor, honored him with the name of the Great Captaine, and afterwards gaue him his neece Marie in marriage. But within a while after, when as one Tenſa another Catalonian captain ſent for by Ronzerius, was come thither alſo with more aid, the Emperor to gratifie them both, gaue vnto Ronzerius the name of Cæſar, and vnto the other the name of the Great Captaine. But when theſe new captains with their followers were to be tranſported into Aſia, it is not to be ſpoken what harm they did by the way vnto the countrey people, and in the villages alongſt the ſea coaſt; abuſing the men and women as their ſlaues, and ſpending their ſubſtance at their pleaſure, for which they had many a bitter curſe: and this was their firſt yeares entertainment. The next Spring they ſet forward to relieue the great Citie of Philadelphia, being as then long beſieged by the Turks, and hardly beſtead without with the enemie; and within, with extreame penurie and famine: which good ſeruice they moſt valiantly performed, and raiſed the ſiege. For the Turkes beholding the good order of theſe Latine ſouldiers, their bright armour, and couragious comming on, roſe preſently and departed, not only from the citie, but quite out of the Emperours territorie. Beſides that, in this armie were ioyned vnto theſe Catalonians great numbers of the beſt ſouldiers of the Greeks, and all the power of the Maſſagets: ſo that had not the Emperor expreſſely before commaunded, not to purſue them too farre, it was by many thought, all thoſe cities and countries might then againe haue beene in ſhort time recouered from the Turkes, which they had before taken from him. But in Kingdomes appoynted vnto ruine, faire occaſions helpe not for the ſtay thereof; yea the greateſt helpes prouided by the worldly wiſe, by a ſecret commaunding power aboue, beeing oftentimes conuerted to the deſtruction of that they were prouided for the ſafegard of; as it now fell out with the

A Emperour and theſe Spaniſh ſouldiers: for this ſeruice done, the Greekes returned home, as did the Maſſagets alſo. But theſe Catalonians with Ronzerius their Generall, roaming vp and downe the Emperours territories in Aſia, did there great harme, turning their forces (as enemies) vpon them whom they were ſent for to relieue: alleadging that they had not their pay according to the Emperors promiſe, and that therfore they muſt liue vpon them that had ſent for them and deceiued them. So were the poore people in euery place ſpoiled, their wiues and daughters rauiſhed, their Prieſts and aged fathers tortured to confeſſe ſuch ſecret ſtore as they had: all was ſubiect vnto theſe diſſolute ſoldiers rage and luſt; yea many of them that had nothing to redeeme themſelues, vpon the greedie ſouldiers imagination, hauing their hands or feet, or ſome other part of their bodies cut off, lay by the high waies ſide begging an B halfepenie or a peece of bread, hauing nothing left to comfort themſelues with, more than their miſerable voice and fountaines of teares: with which their wrongs and miſeries, worſe than thoſe they had ſuſtained by the Turks, the Emperour much grieued, and well the more, for that they were done by him whom he had entertained to relieue them: but what remedy, his coffers were ſo bare as that he was not able to doe any thing for the redreſſe thereof. Ronzerius hauing thus ſpoiled the Emperours countrey in Aſia, and left nothing that pleaſed either him or his, with all his power paſſed ouer into Europe: and leauing all the reſt of his armie at Calipolis, with two hundred of his men went vnto the yong Emperor Michael (then lying with a ſmall power at Oreſtias in Thracia) to demand of him his pay, or if neede were to extort it from him with threats: with whoſe inſolency at his comming, the Emperor more offended than before, his ſouldiers there preſent perceiuing the ſame, with their drawne ſwords C compaſſing him in, faſt by the court, ſlew him, with certaine of his followers, the reſt fled in al haſte to Calipolis to certifie their fellowes what had happened.

Ronzerius for want of pay ſpoileth the Emperors ſubiects.

Ronzerius ſlain.

Thus by the death of Ronzerius, the young Emperor had thought to haue diſcouraged the Catalonians and abated their pride, as like enough it was to haue done; yet in proofe it fell not out ſo, but was the cauſe of far greater euils. So when God proſpers not mens actions, the beſt falleth out vnto the worſt, & their wiſeſt deuices turn to meere follies: for the Catalonians at Calipolis hearing of the death of Ronzerius their Generall, firſt ſlew al the citizens in the city, and notably fortifying the ſame, tooke that as their refuge. Then diuiding their ſoldiers into two parts, with the one part of them manned out eight gallies, which vnder the leading of the D great captaine Tenza, robbed and ſpoiled all the merchants ſhips, paſſing the ſtraits of Helleſpontus, to or from Conſtantinople: the other part left in the citie, in the mean time forraging the countrey all about them. But Tenza ſhortly after encountering with a fleet of the Genowaies, wel prouided for him, was by them ouerthrowne, & moſt of his Gallies ſunk, and himſelfe taken; but yet afterwards redeemed by his fellows, and ſo again inlarged. Now the Catalonians at Calipolis ſomwhat diſcouraged with the loſſe of their fleet and ſo many of their men, for certain dais kept themſelues quiet in within their wals, not knowing wel what courſe to take, for they feared both the Maſſagets and Thracians: them for that they had vpon light cauſes abuſed them, & ſlain diuers of them in the late Aſian war; and theſe, for that they had but euen the other day burnt their houſes & ſpoiled their labors in the country there by: for E which and other their outrages, they vtterly deſpaired of the Emperors fauor, whom they had ſo highly offended. But that which moſt of al terrified them, was, for that they looked for euery day, when Michael the yong Emperor, who as then lay not far off, ſhould with a great power come to aſſault them: for feare of whom they caſt a deepe ditch about the city, with a ſtrong counterſcarfe; ſo preparing themſelues, as if they ſhould haue beene euen preſently beſieged.
But the time ſo paſſing, and the Emperor delaying his comming, they began to think of other matters: for being brought to that ſtrait, that they could not wel tel which way to turn them, but that they were on euery ſide beſet with danger, they vpon a malicious reſolution, and vnto the Greekes moſt fatall, by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, craued aid of the Turks that dwelt on the other ſide of the ſtrait ouer againſt them, in Aſia; who preſently ſent them fiue hundred F good ſoldiers, after whom followed alſo many other fugitiues and looſe companions, in hope of ſpoile; with whom the Catalonians for the preſent ſtrengthned, & being themſelues three thouſand ſtrong, iſſued out of the city, and forraged the country therabouts, bringing in with them great heards & flocks of ſheep and other cattel, together with their keepers: wherewith both the Emperors & their ſubiects incenſed, prepared themſelues for reuenge. This was the

The Turks firſt called into Europe by the Catalonians.

firſt calling in of the Turkes into Europe (that I read of) and the beginning of thoſe endleſſe miſeries wherewith the Chriſtian commonweale hath beene euer ſince moſt grieuouſly afflicted, and a great part thereof ouerwhelmed; few or none greeuing thereat, but ſuch as themſelues feele the heauineſſe thereof, whom God in his mercie comfort.

The Turcopuli.

The vnfortunat battel of Michael the Emperor againſt the Catalonians and Turks.

The Catalonians and Turkes now lying about Cypſella and Apri in Thrace, Michael the Emperour with his Macedonian and Thracian ſouldiers, the Maſſagets and the Turcopuli, encamped at Apri. Theſe Turcopuli were Turks, alſo in number about a thouſand (who as is in the former part of this Hiſtorie declared) beeing fled with their Sultan Iathatines vnto the Greeke Emperour, and left behind him at ſuch time as he was by the Europian Tartars deliuered, had forſaken their Mahometane ſuperſtition, and ſo being become Chriſtians, were inrolled amongſt the Greeke ſouldiers. Shortly after the Emperour (aduertiſed by his ſcouts of the approch of his enemies) commanded euery man to be in a readineſſe, and his captaines to put his armie in order of battell: who ſeeing the enemies battell diuided into three parts, put theirs alſo in like order, placing the Turcopuli and Maſſagets in the left wing, the Macedonian and Thracian choice horſemen in the right wing, and the reſt with the footmen in the maine battell. At which time the Emperour himſelfe riding from place to place, with comfortable ſpeeches encouraged his men to fight valiantly againſt their enemies. The Sun riſing, the enemies battell began to come on, in number much inferiour vnto the Emperours, yet in like order; the Turks being placed in both wings, and the Catalonians wel armed in the midſt. But the ſignall of battell being giuen on both ſides, the Maſſagets, whether it were by agreement ſo before made with the enemie, or vpon a ſudden conceiued treaſon, preſently withdrew themſelues aloofe off, and ſo ſtood as idle beholders, giuing aid neither to the one nor to the other, as did alſo the Turcopuli their companions; which greatly diſmaied the Grecians, and encouraged their enemies: for the Greekes diſmaied with that ſudden defection of their fellowes, were euen in the ioyning of the battell diſcouraged. Which the Emperour perceiuing, with great inſtancie intreated the captaines and commanders of his armie, calling them oftentimes by name, not to bee ſo ſuddenly diſcouraged: but they in ſo great a danger little regarding his words, and ſtil ſhrinking from him, when as the greateſt part of his footmen were troden vnderfoot and ſlaine, turning himſelfe vnto them that were left, which were but few, hee ſaid, Now worthy men is the time wherein death is better than life, and life more beter than death. And hauing ſo ſaid, valiantly charged the enemie: in which charge his horſe was ſlain vnder him, and he in dauger to haue bin taken, had not one of his faithful followers remounted him vpon his owne horſe, and ſo ſaued his life with the loſſe of his own. The Emperor flying to Dydimotichum, where Andronichus his father then lay, was of him ioyfully receiued, but ſharply reproued for aduenturing his perſon ſo far. The enemies purſuing the chace, ſlew ſome, tooke others, vntill that by the comming on of the night, & weary with the long fight, they retired: and the next day diuiding the ſpoile, afterwards at their pleaſures forraged the country. The renegat Turks, called Turcopuli, within a few daies after reuolting to the Catalonians, were of them ioyfully entertained, and inrolled into the regiment of Chalel, the Turks Generall.

Shortly after this victorie, the Catalonians began to mutinie among themſelues, the great captaine Tenza, and Pharenza his companion, diſdained to be commanded by Recafort their General: in which tumult, the matter comming to blowes Tenza was ſlaine, and Pharenza for ſafegard of his life glad to flie vnto the Emperor Andronichus; of whom he was, contrary to his expectation, right honorably entertained. About this time alſo the Maſſagets hauing done the Greekes more harme, than the Turkes againſt whom they were entertained, and enriched themſelues with the ſpoile of their friends both in Aſia and Europe, were about with their wiues and children, and wealth, to returne againe vnto their old dwellings beyond Iſter. Which the Turcopuli, with the Catalonians vnderſtanding, and bearing vnto them a ſecret grudge, for that they (as the weaker) had by them oftentimes bin wronged in the diuiſion of the ſpoile of the Greekes, lay now ſecretly in wait for them, as they ſhould paſſe the ſtraits of the great mountain Hemus, which bounded the Greek empire frō the Bulgarians: where ſetting vpon them, fearing no ſuch danger, they ſlew them almoſt al; and with the ſpoile of them, recompenced themſelues for all the wrongs they had from them before receiued.

The Catalonians proud of their victorie at Apri, and well ſtrengthened by the reuolt of the Turcopuli with continuall rodes ſpoiled not onely all alongſt the Sea coaſt of Thracia, but al the inland country alſo, as farre as Maronea, Rhodope, and Bizia, laying al waſte before them. And hauing forraged moſt part of Thracia, brake into Macedonia, and there wintred about Caſſandria, ſometime a famous citie, but as then all deſolate and ruinous. But the Spring being come, they remoued thence, with purpoſe to haue ſpoiled the cities of Macedonia, and eſpecially the rich citie of Theſſalonica, where the empreſſe Irene then lay: wherein they were by the Emperors good care and foreſight preuented; who doubting ſuch a matter, had fortified his cities in that countrey, and furniſhed them with ſtrong garriſons, and all other things needull for their defence: which they quickly perceiuing, and finding the country al deſolate and forſaken by the inhabitants, were about to haue againe returned into Thracia: but as they were therupon reſoluing, they were informed by one that was with them captiue, how that the Emperor by a mightie ſtrong wall built at a place called Chriſtopolis, from the ſea ſide euen vnto the top of the mountaines, had ſo ſhut vp the paſſage, as that it was not poſſible for them that way to enter. With which vnexpected news they were at the firſt exceedingly troubled, as foreſeeing, That if they ſhould there long ſtay in that ſpoiled country, they ſhould in ſhort time be driuen to exceeding wants (for they were now in number aboue eight 1000 fighting men) and afraid alſo by a general conſpiracie of the people about them, to be oppreſſed. Thus beſet, and not well knowing what to doe, or which way to turne themſelues, they deſperately reſolued, no longer there to ſtay, but forthwith to ſet forward, and to breake into Theſſalie, with the plentifulneſſe thereof to relieue their wants, or into ſome other country further off, towards Peloponeſus, and there to ſeat themſelues, and to end their long trauels: or at leaſtwiſe, if they could not ſo do, to enter into league with ſome that dwelt vpon the ſea coaſt, and ſo returne againe into their owne countrey. Wherefore leauing Theſſalonica, and deliuering the Emperour of a great feare, they in three dayes came to the Theſſalian mountaines, Olympus, Oſſa, and Pelius; where they at the foot of them found ſuch plentie of all things neceſſarie for their reliefe, that they there wintred. But Winter paſt, and the Spring being come, they paſſed ouer thoſe high mountaines and the pleaſant vallies called Tempe, and ſo at laſt came downe into the fruitfull plaines of Theſſalie, where they ſpent that yeare at their pleaſure without reſiſtance, deuouring the labours of the poore country people, and making hauocke of whatſoeuer thing came in their way: for as then the ſtate of that countrey was but weake, the Prince thereof being but yong, and withall very ſicke and like to die, and the ſucceſſion ſo ending in him, as that it was feared, who after his death ſhould lay hand thereon, and euery man therefore more carefull of his own priuat than of the common good. Yet to auert theſe forraine enemies, who like a conſuming fire deuoured the country before them, the nobilitie thought it good, with great gifts to ouercome their captains and commanders, and then to offer them guides to conduct them into Achaia and Bœtia, countries more pleaſant and fruitfull than was theirs, and more commodious for them to dwell in: promiſing alſo to giue them aid for the ſeating of them there, if they ſhould ſo need. Of which their offers the Catalonians accepted, as thinking it better with their hands ful of gold ſo eaſily gotten, to go ſeeke their better fortunes, with their power yet whole and ſtrong, and helpe alſo if need were, than to hazard al vpon the ſucceſſe of a doubtfull victorie, and ſo fooliſhly to preferre an vncertain hope before a moſt certain benefit. So making peace with the Theſſalians, and the Spring being come, receiuing of them their promiſed rewards, and guids to conduct them, paſſing ouer the Mountaines beyond Theſſalie, and the ſtraits of Thermopile, they encamped neere vnto Locris and the riuer Cephiſus: which riſing out of the mountain Pernaſſus, and running towards the Eaſt, hath on the North ſide of them Locris and Opus; and on the South the inland countrey of Achaia and Bœtia: and beeing a great riuer vntill it come to Lebadia and Haliartes, is there diuided into two riuers; the one called Æſopus, and the other Iſmenus; whereof the former runneth thorow the countrey of Attica, vntill it come into the Sea; and the other neere vnto Aulis (where the noble Grecians, as they ſay, beeing about to goe vnto Troy, met, and there ſtayed) falleth into the Euboean Sea. But the Duke of Thebes and Athens, and of all that countrey, hearing of their comming, and (as hee thought well) prouided alſo for them (as hauing all the Winter and Spring time before put his forces in readineſſe) with great pride and contempt denied them paſſage thorow his countrey, at ſuch time as they asked the ſame, making no more reckoning of them, than as of a ſort of looſe wandering rogues that could find no place to reſt or thriue in: wherewith they inraged, reſolued Caſſandria.

among themſelues,either there to ſeat themſelues in his country, or to die therefore. And ſo paſſing the riuer into Beotia, not far from the ſame encamped themſelues, beeing in number about 3500 horſe,and 4000 foot. But ſo lying and expecting the comming of their enemies, they cauſed all the plaine ground about where they lay and meant to fight, to be plowed vp, which they with certaine ſmall cuts out of the riuer ſo watered,as that it differed but a little from a deepe mariſh or bog. Hither about the middle of the Spring commeth the Prince of the countrey, with a gallant armie raiſed out of Athens, Thebes, Platea, Locris, Phocis, and Megara, in number about 6400 horſe, and 4000 foot, an armie too ſtrong he thought for ſo contemptible an enemie. But the weakeſt enemie not feared, doth oftentimes the greateſt harme, as here by proofe was to be ſeene: for the Prince comming vnto the aforeſaid plaine, now growne greene with graſſe,and caſting no perill,encouraging his men, came brauely on with all his horſemen to haue charged his enemies: who ſtood faſt vpon the firme ground, a little without their trenches,as readie to encounter him. But before he was come to the middle of the plaine,his horſes ſinking deepe into the rotten and new ploughed ground, and there intangled as in a mariſh,lay for the moſt part tumbling in the mire, together with their riders; or elſe plunging in the deepe, and hauing caſt them, ran vp and downe the plaine, as fortune led them; otherſome ſticking faſt, ſtood with their riders vpon their backs,as if they had bin very images,not able for to moue. Which the Catalonians beholding, and therewith encouraged,ouerwhelmed them with all manner of ſhot,and ſlew them at their pleaſure,vntill they had almoſt made an end of them: and with their horſemen ſo ſpeedily purſued the reſt in chace,euen vnto the cities of Thebes and Athens, that they without more adoe euen at that inſtant ſurpriſed them both,with all that was in them. So the Catalonians hauing as it were at a caſt at dice won a moſt goodly countrey,garniſhed with faire townes and cities, which they neuer built; and ſtored with all manner of wealth, which they neuer ſweat for, there ended their long trauels,and ſeated themſelues: not ceaſing (as ſaith Nicephorus Gregorias, the reporter of this hiſtorie,ſpeaking of the time wherein theſe things were done, and wherin he himſelfe liued in Conſtantinople) vnto this preſent day, by little and little to extend the boundes of their territorie. Where leauing them,with whom we happily haue too long ſtrayed from our purpoſe,let vs againe returne vnto the Turks and Turcopuli their companions.

A notable ſtratagem of the Catalonians.

In the armie of the Catalonians, at ſuch time as they were about to haue beſieged Theſſalonica, were three thouſand Turks,of whom eleuen hundred were of them(as we ſaid)which remained with Melech at Ænum,after the flight of Iathatines their Sultan vnto the Tartars,and renouncing their ſuperſtition, became Chriſtians; and ſo beeing baptized,and hauing wiues and children,were enrolled among the Emperors ſouldiers; but at the battell of Apri reuolted vnto the Catalonians,and were commonly knowne by the name of Turcopuli: the other being the greater part, were ſuch Turks,as with Chalel their captaine came out of Aſia, beeing ſent for by the Catalonians. Now all theſe Turks,as well the one as the other,at ſuch time as the Catalonians were about to inuade Theſſalia, and to ſeeke their new fortunes in the countries more weſtward, and ſo farther off from Aſia: partly diſtruſting the ſocietie of them,as dangerous vnto them; and loath alſo further to follow their vncertaine fortunes into countries further off,amongſt people to them vnknowne, began to riſe in mutinie, and to refuſe to goe. Whereupon their captaines Melech and Chalel requeſted of the Generall of the Catalonians to giue them leaue with quietneſſe to returne: which their requeſt he eaſily granted,(as now not greatly needing their helpe, after that he was departing out of the Emperors dominion) and ſo they gladly departed; proportionally diuiding all the captiues and ſpoiles they had taken in that long warre, according to the number of both parts.

The Turks diuided into two factions.

Theſe Turks after their departure from the Catalonians,diuided themſelues into two parts, the Turcopuli or renegat Turks following Melech, & the reſt Chalel their General. But Melech being before becom a Chriſtian,as were his followers alſo;& after that hauing receiued moſt honorable entertainment at the Emperors hands, and yet againe moſt ſhamefully breaking his faith before giuen, and violating his religion, had reuolted to his enemies; deſpairing of the Emperors further friendſhip, which he had ſo euill deſerued,made choice rather to goe vnto Crales Prince of Seruia,by whom he was ſent for,than to come againe into the ſight of Andronicus the Greeke Emperour. And ſo going vnto him with a thouſand horſe, and fiue hundred foot,was there of him well entertained himſelfe: but his ſoldiers all commanded to deliuer

A vnto the Prince both their horſes and armour, and to fall to other trades; and not to beare armes but at ſuch time, and ſo many of them as ſhould ſeeme good vnto the Prince, that had receiued them into his countrey.

But Chalel with the Turkes his followers, in number about 1300 horſe and eight hundred foot, ſtaying at Macedonia, offered vnto the Greeke Emperour quietly to depart his country, ſo that he would giue him paſſage by the ſtraits of Chriſtopolis by him fortified; and in ſafetie tranſport him and his ſouldiers with all their ſubſtance, ouer the ſtrait of Heleſpontus into Aſia: vnto which his requeſt, the Emperour conſidering the great harme done in his prouinces, and deſirous alſo to be diſcharged of ſo great a burthen, eaſily granted; and ſo ſent Sennacherib, one of his moſt valiant captaines, to conduct them out of Macedonia into Thracia, vnto B the ſtraits of Heleſpontus. Where the Greeke captaines and ſouldiers ſeeing the great multitude of horſes, and aboundance of money and other ſpoiles, which they hauing taken from the Greekes, were now about to carrie away with them into Aſia; they thought it a great indignitie to ſuffer them ſo to doe: and allured alſo with the hope of ſo rich a prey, as had bin of long in gathering, they entred into a deuice far different from that which was vnto the Turks before promiſed, neither prouiding them of ſhipping, neither careful of their ſafety but purpoſing vpon the ſudden by night deſtroy them. Whereof the Turks hauing got vnderſtanding, ſuddenly riſing, ſurpriſed a caſtle in the country there by, which they notably fortified for the defence of themſelues, to the great aſtoniſhment of them that had purpoſed their deſtruction; who now not able to force them, were glad to get them farther off, and to C certifie the Emperor what had happened: who (after I wot not what receiued cuſtome of the Greek Emperors his predeceſſors) ſlowly diſpatching things requiring greateſt haſt, careleſly delaid the time, to the great trouble of his ſtate, and aduantage of his enemies. For they wiſely conſidering the danger and diſtreſſe they were in, by ſpeedy meſſengers ſent ouer the ſtrait, craued aid of the Turks their countrymen in Aſia, which they preſently ſent them; wherwith they not a little both encouraged and ſtrengthned, with their often & ſudden incurſions grieuouſly waſted the country round about them, to the great diſcontentment of the Greeke captains, not able without greater help to remedy the ſame. Who thereof certified the yong Emperour Michael Paleologus, requeſting him with all the power hee could make, to come and beſiege the caſtle, and to ſuppreſſe theſe ſo dangerous enemies. For the performance whereof D not only the captains with their ſoldiers, but the country people in generall with their ſpades and mattocks came flocking vnto the Emperor; not as if they would haue beſieged the caſtle, but haue digged it downe and ouerthrowne it together with the Turks their enemies.

The vnfortnate battel of the Emperour Michael Paleologus with the Turks in Cherſoneſus.

Now the Emperor with his captains and ſouldiers, and a multitude of thoſe countrey people, being come thither, who all gladly followed him, moſt part of them fooliſh, thinking of nothing, but of the ſpoile of their enemies, not conſidering with what danger the ſame was to be gained: ſo that the more the enemies prouided for the neceſſary defence of themſelues, as in number but few, & ſhut vp in their enemies country, the more careleſly & neglegently, and without al order, the Greeks proceeded in their ſiege, for that they were in number far more, and better prouided of al things than their enemies: not reputing with themſelues, nothing in E this world to be firm and ſure, and al wordly things (as ſaith the diuine Philoſopher) to be but the mockerie of God, and to be haſtily turned vp ſide downe, and with moſt vncertain courſe this and that way to wander. But their enemies, who before feared euen the very fame of their comming, accounting themſelues rather among the dead than the liuing, ſeeing their confuſed and diſordered raſhneſſe; therewith much more than before encouraged, beſtowed all their wealth, their women, and other things vnneceſſarie for battel, in good ſaftie within their trenches: but themſelues, with eight hundred choſen horſemen only, and they very well armed, ſallied out, euen to the place where the imperial enſigne ſtood, being neither of any great ſafety, neither guarded with any ſuch ſtrength or carefulnes as beſeemed: with which ſudden and deſperat eruption of the enemies, the Grecians terrified, eſpecially that ruſtical and vplandiſh F company, began to flie: after whom by little and little others followed, vntil at length all the reſt without further reſiſtance fled alſo: which the Emperor ſeeing, did what he might to haue ſtaid their flight: but in ſo generall a confuſion and feare, when euery man was to ſhift for one, who regarded him: wherefore wearied and ſeeing no other remedie, he was glad to take the ſame courſe & to flie with the leſt, yet many of the more expert captains, aſhamed of ſo foule a flight,made diuers ſtands : and ſo ſtaied the barbarous enemie from further purſuit of the Emperor and the other flying Greeks. In which doing, many of them incloſed by the Turks, were of them taken priſoners : vnto whom all the Emperours treaſure became a prey alſo,and whatſoeuer honorable enſignes of the empire elſe that were found in the Emperors tent ; yea the imperiall Crowne it ſelfe, richly ſet with pearle and precious ſtones, was there taken alſo, which (they ſay) Chalel putting vpon his head, pleaſantly ſcoffed at the Greeke Emperor that but late before wore it.

Thracia ſpoiled by the Turks.

Philes Paleologus requeſteth of the Emperor that he might goe againſt the Turks.

After this victorie, the Turks with great pride ſpoiled almoſt all Thracia , in ſuch ſort as that the people for two yeres together durſt ſcarcely go out of their ſtrong walled townes to plough and ſow their land; which exceedingly grieued both the emperors, the father and the ſon : for in their own power they had no great confidence, God hauing(as it were) taken from their people, both their hearts and courage, ſo that all their hope was to entertaine forraine aid (the miſerable ſhift of the great diſtreſſed ones) wherin alſo they found many difficulties and lets, whilſt they conſidered the greatnes of their charge, their coffers being then, if euer, empty by reaſon their territories were ſo long and grieuouſly by their enemies waſted : yet need admitting no law, Andronicus the old Emperour was glad to ſend to Crales Prince of Seruia, his ſon in law, to pray his aid. But in the meane time he making no haſt (as men in relieuing others commonly doe) and the miſerie more and more increaſing, it pleaſed God to ſtir vp the heart of one Philes Paleologus the Emperours neere kinſman, to vndertake the protection and deliuerance of his Prince and countrey ; and was afterward for his great valour by the Emperour worthily made Lord great martial of the empire. This Philes of whom we now ſpeake, had all his life time bin brought vp in the court, and was for his vpright dealing and integritie of life beloued of al men, but ſpecially of the old Emperor his kinſman, whom he with like affection honored; but was a man altogether vnskilful of the wars, as being by nature of a weake conſtitution of body, and ſo very ſickly; and withal more giuen to deuotion and the ſeruice of God than the affaires of the world , oftentimes ſpending moſt part of the day at his prayers in the church. He now grieued to ſee the perplexed Emperor, and the miſerie of his country, requeſted of him that he might with ſome ſmall power, and ſome few captains of his owne choice, goe out againſt theſe proud Turks: hoping (as he ſaid) by Gods grace to reuenge the wronge by them done, and to returne to him againe with victory. Vnto which his reqneſt, the Emperor eaſily yeelded; ſaying, that God was iuſt, which delighted not in many legs, neither in the greatnes of any mans ſtrength, but in a contrite heart and humble mind : not ſo giuing his help vnto Michael the Emperour, his ſon, for the offences of his parents : as happily he might vnto this ſo vpright and deuout a man, regarding more his integritie of life, than his skill in armes: for turning me about, I haue ſeen in this world (ſaid he) I haue ſeene, the ſwift not to gaine the prize, neither the valiant the victorie ; wiſe men to want bread , and men of vnderſtanding, wealth ; the ſimple to gain fauor, and the ſubtill to fall into diſgrace : ſuch alteration wordly things in time find. So the Emperor (as is aforeſaid) yeelding to his requeſt, furniſhed him with mony, horſes, and armor, and ſuch a conuenient power, as he himſelfe deſired. Which he hauing receiued, firſt of al incouraged his captains and ſoldiers with all manner of courteſie and kindnes, giuing vnto them mony, horſes, armour, iewels; yea ſometime hee gaue vnto one his purſe, vnto another his cloke, his rapier, or ſome other ſuch thing, as he had about him, to encourage them in their forwardnes: after that, he perſuaded them to an honeſt temperate courſe of life, & valiantly to play the men, promiſing according to their deſerts to reward euery one of them, the war once happily ended: & before his ſetting forth, vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that Chalel with a thouſand foot & two hundred horſe was forraging the country about Bizia, he haſted his departure, that ſo he might by the way encounter them, laded with the ſpoil of the country : and ſo ſetting forward, came the third day to a little riuer, which the inhabitants call Xerogipſum, & there in a great plain neere vnto the ſame, encamped. Where after he had ſet al things in order fit for battel, he with cheereful ſpeeches as a great commander, encouraged his captains and ſouldiers; leauing nothing vnſaid or vndone, that might ſerue for the animating of them to fight. But he had not ſo lien two daies, but that his ſcouts about midnight comming in, brought him tidings, that the enemy laden with ſpoile, was euen faſt by at hand: who by the riſing of the Sun were come within ſight, and had themſelues a far off alſo diſcouered the Chriſtian army, al gliſtering in bright armor. Wherefore ſtaying a while to prepare

A themſelues for battell: and firſt of all, compaſſing themſelues round with their waggons and other carriages, they beſtowed in them all their captiues faſt bound together, with the bootie they had taken: and afterwards as the manner was, caſting duſt vpon their heads, & their hands vp towards heauen, they came on. And now the Christian armie came on forward alſo, Philes ſtill encouraging both the horſemen and footmen, and right wel conducting them, as the time and place required. So it fortuned, that he that had the leading of the right wing of the army, gaue the firſt charge vpon a ſquadron of the enemies, and at the firſt onſet vnhorſed one of the enemies, and by and by after him another: But hauing his horſe ſore wounded vnder him, hee haſtily retyred out of the battell; which ſomewhat troubled the Chriſtians, and encouraged the Turks, who now with a barbarous outcrie began moſt fiercely to preſſe vpon the retyring B Chriſtians. Philes in the mean time with many cheerefull words and comfortable perſuaſions ſtill encouraging them to play the men; and with his eyes oftentimes caſt vp to heauen, with teares running down his face, moſt heartily beſought God, the giuer of all victorie, no longer to ſuffer thoſe his enemies, and the miniſters of his wrath, to triumph ouer his people: as did alſo the poore captiues that lay bound, doubtfully betwixt feare & hope expecting the euent of the battell. The Chriſtian footmen at the ſame time encountering hand to hand with the Barbarians, aſſailed them, and were aſſailed, ſlew of them, and were themſelues of them ſlaine; ſo that there was a cruell fight made on both ſides. But Philes with the multitude of his men hauing almoſt incompaſſed the Barbarian horſemen, with a companie of his moſt valiant ſoldiers broke in vpon the ſide of the enemies battell, and ſo made way thorow the midſt of it; C and ſo troubled the Turks, as that they well knew not how to ſtay, or what to do. So being on euery ſide circumuented and hardly charged, moſt of them there fell, excepting ſome few horſemen, whom the Greeke horſemen purſued vnto the entrance of Cherſoneſus, with purpoſe there to ſhut them vp. Philes comming thither alſo, there vpon thoſe ſtraits encamped: at which time the Emperor preſently ſent out fiue gallies to keepe the ſtraits of Helleſpont, ſo that no aid might be brought vnto thoſe Turks out of Aſia. Whileſt theſe things thus went, two thouſand choice horſemen came to the aid of Philes out of Seruia, and the Poteſtate of Pera came by ſea alſo with eight gallies moe into Heleſpontus, to the aid of the Chriſtians: wherefore when the Grecians and the Seruians had thus on the one ſide ſhut them vp by land, D and they that were in the gallies on the other by ſea, Philes with all his power came and incamped about the towne and the trenches wherein the Turks lay, planting his batterie againſt the caſtle, wherewith he greatly ſhooke the ſame, and made great ſlaughter of the Turkes and of their horſes, and that not only by day, but by night alſo. But the Turks ſeeing death now preſent before their eyes, and no way left for them to eſcape, for that they were ſo on euery ſide both by ſea and land incloſed, thought good thus to aduenture their liues, reſoluing by night to ſet vpon the Grecians rather than vpon the Seruians, whom they had hitherto accuſtomed to ouercome, and whom they had with often ſlaughters terrified; that ſo the reſt by them alſo happily diſcouraged, they might ſo delay the aſſault: but in attempting the ſame they perceiued themſelues much deceiued, finding them euen at their firſt ſallying out readie in armes to receiue them: wherefore hauing in vaine giuen the attempt (as againſt a ſtrong fortreſſe) they E were ſhamefully enforced to retyre. Yet were they not therewith ſo diſcouraged, but that the ſtrait ſiege ſtill continuing, they gaue the like attempt vpon the Seruians; but beeing alſo by them in a like manner with loſſe repulſed, they began now vtterly to deſpaire. Wherefore the next day about midnight caſting away their armes, they with their boſomes and pockets ful of coyne ran downe vnto the ſea ſide, towards the gallies, with purpoſe to yeeld themſelues vnto the Genowaies that were therein; as fearing of them leſſe harme, as of men whom they had neuer hurt. But the night being darke and miſtie, and the Moone giuing no light, many of them vnawares came vnto the Greeke gallies, and there flying the ſmoke, fell into the fire: for being lightned of their mony, they were by them forthwith without any pittie ſlain alſo. But the Genowaies ſlew not all their priſoners, but only ſuch as had brought with them the moſt F coyne; leſt afterwards bewraying the ſame, it ſhould haue been ſought after by the Greekes: the reſt they caſt into bonds, of whom ſome they ſent vnto the emperor, otherſome they kept to themſelues as their owne priſoners. Thus by the valour and good conduct of this worthie deuout captaine, the Turks were for that time againe chaſed out of Europe, and the country of Thracia deliuered of a great feare.

The battell betwixt Philes & the Turks.

The Turks ouerthrowne.

The cauſes of the decay of the Greeke Empire.

Now by that we haue alreadie written, is eaſily to be ſeene the chiefe cauſes of the decay and ruin of the Greek empire, to haue bin, Firſt, the innouation & change of their antient Religion and ceremonies, by Michael Paleologus, whereof enſued a world of woe; then, by Couetouſnes, couered with the name of good husbandry, the vtter deſtruction of the chief ſtrength of the empire; next vnto that, by Enuy, the ruin of the Great; falſe Suſpect, the loſer of friends; Ambition, honors ouerthrow; Diſtruſt, the great minds torment; & Forrein aid, the empires faithleſſe porter, opening the gate euen vnto the enemy himſelf: wherunto foule Diſcord joyned (as ſhall be forthwith declared) what wanted that the barbarous enemy could deſire, for the helping of them in the ſupplanting of ſo great an empire? But againe to our purpoſe, Michael companion with his father Andronicus in the empire, had by his wife Mary two ſons, Andronicus who was afterward Emperor, and Manuel ſyrnamed the Deſpot; and two daughters, Anne married vnto Thomas Prince of Epirus, and Theodora married to the Prince of Bulgaria: of all theſe, the old Emperour Andronicus their grandfather ſo entirely loued Andronicus his nephew, as that in compariſon of him hee ſeemed little to regard either his owne children, or the reſt of his nephews, wiſhing them all rather to periſh than him: which many ſuppoſed him to do, as purpoſing by him the better to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion of the empire in his houſe; as alſo for his excellencie of wit, and comlineſſe of perſon; the likeneſſe of name alſo happily furthering his kind affection. For which reaſons, he cauſed him to be honorably brought vp in his court, as not willing to ſpare him out of his ſight either day or night. But when hee was out of his childehood, and growne to be a luſtie youth (at which time mens hot deſires are commonly moſt vehement) he began to contemne all chaſtiſement and gouernment; eſpecially in ſo high a calling, and in the prime of his youth. Beſides that, his companions became vnto him the miniſters and perſuaders of all thoſe vaine delights which vnſtayed youth moſt deſireth: and at the firſt began to lead him forth to walke the ſtreets, to hawke, to hunt, and to haunt plays, and afterwards to night walkes alſo, not well beſeeming his ſtate: which riotous courſe of life, when as it required great expence, and his aged grandfather gaue him but a certaine ſpare allowance for his conuenient maintenance; he acquainted himſelfe with the rich merchants of Genoway which dwelt at Pera. Heereof aroſe hard taking vp of money, great debt, fine deuices how to come by coyne, with ſecret conſultations and purpoſes of flight. For when he ſaw his grandfather old Andronicus long to liue, & his father Michael like to ſucceed him, he had no hope of aſpiring vnto the empire; wherupon his ambitious thoughts and impotent deſires long time tormenting his haughty heart, ſuggeſted vnto him ſuch purpoſes. For when as he would not obey his grandfather as his tutor, nor follow other mens councels, as a child, he ſought after the Imperiall libertie, and abundance of wealth, that he might haue that was ſufficient for himſelfe, and wherwith to reward others, as the followers of an Emperour. Which ſeeing he could not do, his grandfather yet liuing, and his father raigning; hee ſought after the ſoueraignty of other principalities and countries: one while after Armenia, as belonging vnto him in the right of his mother the King of Armenia's daughter; another while after Peloponeſus, and ſometime hee dreamed of Lesbos and Lemnus, and other the fruitfull Iſlands of the Ægean ſea: which when it was ſecretly told, ſomtime to his father, and ſomtime to his grandfather, he was now croſſed and reproued of the one, and afterwards of the other. And to paſſe ouer many other his youthfull prancks, he vſed in his night walks ſecretly to repaire vnto a certaine gentlewomans houſe, more honourably borne, than honeſtly qualified: which woman, a certain gallant (and another Adonis) no leſſe affected than himſelfe: wherwith hee highly offended, as with his Riuall, appointed certaine ruffians and fencers to watch her houſe. But vpon a certaine time about midnight, Manuel the Deſpot (his younger brother) ſeeking after him, chanced to paſſe that way where theſe watchmen lay: who ſeeing him haſten by, and not knowing him in the darke, and ſuppoſing him to haue beene the man they looked for, (the gentlewomans beſt beloued) ſet vpon him, and ſo wounded him, that he fell downe for dead from his horſe: but being by and by after knowne by others comming in, he was taken vp, and halfe dead carried vnto the Court. Which outrage in the morning being knowne vnto the Emperour, caſt him into a great heauineſſe, as beholding not the time preſent onely, but wiſely conſidering what was like to enſue in the time to come alſo. But Manuel the Deſpot being dead of the wounds there receiued, and the report thereof brought vnto Michael the young Emperour his father, then lying at Theſſalonica, ſtrooke him to the heart with ſo great a griefe, that falling ſicke with the conceit thereof, he ſhortly after died.

Andronicus the vnſtayed Youth neuertheleſſe holding on his woonted courſe, with a ſecret purpoſe to haue fled, became thereby ſtill more and more ſuſpicious to his aged grandfather, not a little carefull vnto what end thoſe his violent paſſions would at length tend. And therefore appointed one Syrgiannes (a man of great credit and authoritie in the court, in whom, as in a reconciled enemie, hee had moſt vnaduiſedly repoſed too much truſt) to inſinuate himſelfe into the youthful princes acquaintance and fauor; that ſo ſounding him & his ſecret deſignes, he ſhould not poſſibly be able without his knowledge to ſtep aſide; which of all things the old Emperor feared moſt, as the beginning of greater troubles. This Syrgiannes being a man of great place, and of a ſubtill wit, was ſomtime himſelfe ſuſpected of aſpiring, and therefore as vpon the miſpriſion of treaſon, was by the old Emperor impriſoned: but afterwards by him againe inlarged and receiued into fauor, was now put in truſt warily to obſerue the doings of the yong prince. But he not vnmindfull of the wrong before done vnto him, and in hope by troubling the ſtate either to aſpire vnto the empire himſelf, or at leaſtwiſe to ſome good part thereof; thought now a fit occaſion to be miniſtred vnto him for him to worke vpon, both for the one and the other, by ſetting the old Emperor and his ambitious nephew together by the eares: which opportunity he not minding to let ſlip, taking the yong prince one day aſide, diſcouered vnto him all his grandfathers deuice, in briefe, as followeth:

Your grandfather, noble Prince (ſaid he) hath ſet me as a watch ouer your actions, or more truly to ſay, as a bloud-hound, to ſeeke after not your doings onely, but if it were poſſible, euen after your moſt ſecret thoughts alſo: and ſo whileſt hee maliciouſly prepareth for you ſnares and fetters, you not aware thereof, fooliſhly follow your ſhallow and childiſh conceits. For what ſhall it auaile you ſecretly to flie away? whereas, if the beſt chance, yet muſt you (as the common ſaying is) put your feet vnder another mans table, and liue of his charge; if it fall not out worſe, that you be ſlaine or made away by them you flie vnto for reliefe, or elſe fall into the ſnares by your grandfather layd for you. But if ſo be that caſting behind you theſe your fond deuices, you will hearken vnto my councell, I will ſhew you a readie way, how you ſhall in ſhort time, and without any danger, aſpire vnto the Imperiall Seat and dignitie; the onely way whereunto is this, if you leauing the Citie of Conſtantinople, ſhall flie out into the Cities and Prouinces of Thracia. For ſeeing men are moſt commonly by nature deſirous of change, and the miſerable Thracians are with often exactions grieuouſly vexed; if you ſhall but once proclaime a redreſſe of their grieuances, with immunitie for euer, they will all with one accord follow you whetherſoeuer you will, your grandfathers long and heauie yoke beeing caſt off, as if it were Siſiphus his heauie ſtone, which they had long rolled, and neuer the neere. If you like of this aduice, I will be vnto you both the author and the leader of this exployt, and will eaſily bring to good effect the whole matter: ſo that you againe on the other ſide promiſe vnto me vpon your faith, to reward this my trauell according to my deſert therein. But what rewards ſhall theſe be? Honorable preferments, large poſſeſsions, great reuenues, the firſt place in your fauor, and that no great matter be done or concluded without my conſent & knowledge. For you ſee how willingly I make my ſelfe partaker of your calamitie, and companion of your dangers, no neceſsitie enforcing me thereunto; forgetting euen my very faith, in compariſon of the loue and zeale I beare towards you; wherein if any miſhap ſhall by the mutabilitie of fortune betide me, I haue ſet downe my ſelfe with patience to endure it. All which conſidered, you need not to grudge to yeeld vnto my requeſts, if you tender your owne ſafetie. And foraſmuch as the ſhortneſſe of the time will ſuffer no long conſultations, and that delay bringeth extream danger, let vs without longer ſtay impart the matter vnto ſuch others, as for the hatred of the Emperor are like to keepe our councell, and may yet much further our deſignes.

The yong Prince mooued with this ſpeech as if it had bin with a charme, eaſily granted to his deſire, confirming the ſame by his oath conceiued in writing: at which time were preſent ſuch as were eſpecially to be acquainted with the plot of the conſpiracie, namely John Catacuzene, and Theodorus Synadenus (both men of great honour, and the old Emperors antient ſuppoſed friends, and of him beloued, much of like age vnto himſelfe) and Alexius Apocaucus the third (not of like honor with the other, yet a man of great place, and of a moſt ſubtill and deepe wit:) who all vnderſtanding the matter, ſhewed themſelues not as miniſters, but as ringleaders and captains of the intended rebellion. This conſpiracie with moſt ſolemne oaths and promiſes on euery part confirmed, they began right cunningly to attempt the matter: and to begin withall, Syrgiannes & Catacuzenus, by corrupting diuers of the great and moſt gracious courtiers, procured to themſelues the gouernment of ſuch cities and prouinces in Thracia, as they thought fitteſt for them to begin their rebellion in. Syrgiannes hauing the gouernment of the ſea coaſt, & the inland country euen from the ſea ſide to the top of mount Rhodope; and Catacuzenus the gouernment of the country about Oreſtias. In all which places they muſtred ſoldiers, prouided armor, entertaining alſo ſtrangers, and other vagrant and maſterleſſe men, as for ſome great war: beſides that, in the cities for the gouernment therof, they placed their truſtieſt friends, remouing ſuch others as they had in ſuſpect. All which they colored by rumors falſly raiſed, one while of the comming of the European Tartars from Danubius, and another while by the comming of the Turks out of Aſia: againſt whoſe inuaſions theſe preparations were giuen out to be made, for auoiding of ſuſpition; and the traitors for their prouident care highly commended euen by the Emperor himſelfe, againſt whom they were intended. All which things Syrgiannes notably diſſembled, oftentimes withall certifying the young Prince what he had done, and what was likewiſe of him to be performed.

But the old Emperor ſeeing his youthfull nephew not to hearken to his graue aduice, but ſtill to proceed in his diſſolute kind of life, was about ſolemnly to haue reprooued him before the Patriarch & ſome others of the chiefe nobilitie: if happily ſuch open reproof might haue wrought in him ſome change of manners; if not, then to haue committed him to priſon, & like enough he was to haue ſo done, had he not bin otherwiſe perſuaded by Theodorus Mitochita, (who of all others was able to do moſt with him) by reaſon of the liberty of the time; for then it was almoſt Shrouetide, when as the people diſtempred with exceſſe of meat & drinke, were of all other times moſt fit, vpon any light occaſion to be drawne into a tumult or vprore: for feare whereof, he was contented for that time to let him alone. But Shrouetide paſt, & a good part of Lent alſo, the old Emperor ſeeing no amendment in his nephew, calling vnto him Geraſimus the Patriarch, and the reſt of the reuerend Biſhops then preſent in the citie, ſent for his nephew, openly before them all to chide him, and to ſchoole him for his diſordred life; but eſpecially for his purpoſed flight; that aſhamed of ſuch open reproofe before ſuch reuerend fathers, he might either amend his life, or at leaſtwiſe of all men be thought iuſtly puniſht for the ſame, if he ſhould ſtil proceed therein. So the yong prince being ſent for, came, accompanied with many of his fauorits & followers, moſt of them being ſecretly armed, and hee himſelfe not altogether vnprouided: for it was agreed amongſt them, that if the Emperour ſhould vſe gentle and fatherly admonition towards him, that then they ſhould be quiet, without any ſhew of inſolencie or diſcontentment; but if he ſhould in anger reprooue him, or threaten to puniſh him, then vpon a ſigne giuen, forcibly with their ſwords drawn to breake in vpon him, and to kill him in the imperial ſeat, & without more ado to place yong Andronicus his nephew in his ſtead. But comming in, and (as his manner was) taking his place next vnto his aged grandfather, his diſperat followers attending without, he was indeed of him grieuouſly blamed and reproued for his former follies and euil courſe of life; yet with ſuch moderation & grauity, as that all ſeemed (as it did) to come of a moſt fatherly care and regard: ſo that at that time no ſuch outrage was committed, as was by diuers his followers wiſhed, but the aſſembly quietly diſmiſſed, & a ſolemne oath taken on both ſides: of the grandfather, That hee ſhould not appoint any but his nephew to ſucceed him in the empire: & of the yong prince, That he ſhould neuer go about to attempt any thing to the ſhortning or hurt of his grandfathers life or Empire. But the conſpirators thronging about him at his comming out, fretted & fumed at him, as if he had broken his faith & oath before giuen them; ſaying, What greater wrong couldſt thou do vs, than being by vs made ſtrong, and become dreadfull vnto thine enemies, to diſpoſe of thine affairs at thy pleaſure to thine owne ſafetie, and to leaue vs thy moſt faithfull friends and ſeruants in the diuels mouth to be deuoured? For now they both doubted and feared, leſt their conſpiracie was diſcouered. With which ſpeeches he both diſcouraged and aſhamed, ſent for Theodorus Metochita his grandfathers chiefe Councellour, requeſting him to deale with his grandfather, for the pardoning of all his followers, as hee had done for himſelfe: of which motion hee diſliking, told him, That he was to giue God thanks, that he had himſelfe eſcaped ſo great a danger; and to him alſo, as a meane for the ſafegard of his life, although he treated not for ſuch

A traiterous perſons, with whom, if he were well aduiſed, he would haue nothing to doe, either thinke that they would euer be faithful vnto him, that reſpecting neither God nor man, had ſo fouly broken their faith before giuen vnto the Emperor his grandfather. With which vnexpected anſwer of ſo great and graue a Councellor, the prince not a little troubled, and withall diſcontented, ſtood a while as in a muſe all ſilent, reaſoning as it were with his owne paſſions: but afterwards commanding him without further replie to depart, and the old companions of his follies reſorting vnto him, hee by their perſuaſion entertained againe his former diſloyall thoughts & deſignements: which his grandfather vehemently ſuſpecting, and therewith not a little grieued, would (as if it had been by inſpiration) oftentimes in his heauines ſay vnto them that were about him, In our time is loſt the maieſty of our Empire, and the deuotion of the Church. Yet B to preuent the worſt, he thought it good betime to lay hands vpon his ſuſpected nephew, and ſo to detain him in ſafe keeping: acquainting none therewith but Geraſimus the Patriark & his ghoſtly father; who preſently acquainted the Prince therwith, & was the cauſe that he haſtned his flight, flying himſelfe before. For he now certainly vnderſtanding the danger he was in, the night before he ſhould haue been apprehended, with all the reſt of the conſpirators his complices, in the dead time of the night fled out of the City, by the gate called Gyrolimnia; which gate (all the reſt being ſhut) was ſtil at his command, for that he vſed commonly therby at his pleaſure very early to go out on hunting, as he now pretended to doe; but the next day after came to Syrgiannes and Catacuzenus campe, who then both lay with a great power at Hadrianople, expecting his comming. The old Emperor, before the riſing of the Sun aduertiſed C of the flight of his nephew, the ſame day commanded him to be proclaimed traitor, and proſcribed, with all his conſpirators, and whoſoeuer elſe ſhould take his part. And for the more ſuretie, euery man in the city was ſworne to be loyall and faithfull vnto the old Emperour, and enemies vnto his nephew and his adherents. But he on the other ſide, proclaiming liberty and immunitie abroad in all the cities and villages in Thracia, ſo woon the hearts of the countrey people in generall, that they reſorted vnto him from all places in great numbers, readie armed to do whatſoeuer he ſhould command them. And to begin withall, they firſt laid hands vpon the collectors of the Emperors mony (then abroad in the countrey) whom they ill intreated, taking from them their mony. After that, and yet ſeuen days not expired, almoſt an incredible number of horſemen, footmen, archers, and others, departed from Hadrianople toward Conſtantinople, D vnder the leading of Syrgiannes, in good hope at their firſt comming to take the citie, being at diſcord in it ſelfe, and moſt part of the meaner ſort, in hope of gaine, fauouring their rebellious proceedings, ſuch as the ſeditious find in ſuch rebellious tumults. So hauing marched foure days, they came and incamped at Selyrbia: but as they were about to haue gon on farther, the old Emperor doubting leſt the citiſens, ſeeing ſo great an army before the city, ſhould therein raiſe ſome tumult or ſtirre, to the indangering thereof; thought good before to ſend Embaſſadors vnto his nephew, to proue if happily theſe ſo dangerous troubles, might by their means in ſome good ſort be appeaſed. The chiefe of theſe Embaſſadors was one Theoleptus Biſhop of Philadelphia, a man no leſſe famous for his vertue than his wiſedome, and yet for both of all men honored; and with him alſo was ſent Syrgiannes his mother, as of all E others moſt fit to appeaſe her ſon, and to perſuade him not to approch the city, for that thereof might enſue much bloudſhed, and the deſtruction of the city, or at leaſtwiſe the vtter vndoing of many; whereof if he ſhould be the author, how could he euer after liue in conſcience quiet, but that the torment thereof would follow him euen into his graue; and therefore to requeſt him to retyre a little, and ſo to come to talke, and to demand what he pleaſed. Syrgiannes moued as well with the preſence of the reuerend Biſhop, as the prayers of his mother, retyred to the young Prince, which lay then about Oreſtias; whither the Emperors Embaſſadors came alſo: with whom (after long debating) it was agreed, That the young prince ſhould in all royall manner hold all Thracia, from Criſtopolis vnto Rhegium, and the Suburbes of Conſtantinople: and withall, That ſuch lands as the young Prince had already F giuen vnto his followers, in Macedonia, ſhould ſtill remaine vnto them (which were ſuch as yeerely yeelded vnto them a right great reuenue:) And that the old Emperour ſhould hold vnto himſelfe the imperiall Citie, with all the Cities and Prouinces of Macedonia beyond Criſtopolis: and that hee alone ſhould haue the honour to heare the Embaſſadors ſent from forreine Princes, and to giue them their diſpatch; for that the young Prince tooke no pleawhileſt the Grecians are at diſcord amongſt themſelues, Othoman layeth the foundation of the Turkes Empire, & the other Turks incroch vpō them alſo.

The Greeke empire in Europe diuided.

The Iſland of the Rhodes was by the knights hoſpitalers recouered from the Turkes in the yeare 1308.

ſure in thoſe waightie affaires, as by nature more delighted in hawking, hunting, & his other G youthfull pleaſures. Vpon which conditions a peace was concluded, better liked of the young Prince than of the old Emperor; who although he was deſirous otherwiſe to haue redreſt ſo great wrongs, yet wanting power, was glad to yeeld to what his nephew would requeſt. Thus was the Greeke empire in Europe (as then all or the moſt part incloſed within the bounds of Macedonia and Thracia) now diuided betwixt the grandfather and his nephew: Aſia in the meane time (wherein the Greeke Emperors their predeceſſors ſomtime held great kingdoms) being left for a prey to the greedie Turks. Othoman on the one ſide euen in the heat of theſe troubles laying the foundation of his empire in Phrygia & Bythinia; and the other the Turks Princes the ſucceſſors of Sultan Aladin, encroching as faſt vpon the emperours territories and countries on this ſide the riuer Meander. And not ſo contented, at the ſame time alſo built H great ſtore of gallies, wherewith they robbed the Chriſtian Merchants trading to Conſtantinople, and ſpoiled the coaſts of Macedonia and Thracia, and the Iſlands of the Ægeum, and among others tooke the famous Iſland of the Rhodes; which they held not long before they were againe driuen out of the ſame by the Knights Hoſpitallers, vnder the conduct of William Willaret, aided by the Genowaies and the King of Sicilia, which they from that time held (to the great honor and benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale) by the ſpace of 214 yeres, known by the name of the Knights of the Rhodes: vntill that in the memorie of our fathers it was (I ſay no more, but grieue therefore) ſhamefully loſt vnto the Turke, for want of reliefe; neuer place being more honourably defended, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall appeare: euer ſince which time thoſe honorable men (the flower of Chiualrie) haue ſeated themſelues I in the Iſle of Malta, which they to their immortall glorie, and the comfort of all good Chriſtians, haue moſt notably defended againſt the mightie Sultan Solyman, and all the furie of the Turks, as ſhall be alſo in due place declared.

But to returne again vnto the troubled eſtate of the Greeke empire. Syrgiannes the Greeke captain, & author of all the aforeſaid ſtirs betwixt the old Emperor and his nephew, had euen from the beginning thought, as a companion to the yong Prince, to haue ruled all with him at his pleaſure, and that nothing either great or little ſhould haue bin done without him: but ſeeing it now to fall out far otherwiſe than he had before expected, and the Prince to be wholly ruled by Catacuzenus, and himſelfe of all others leaſt regarded, & not ſo much as called to any councel; inwardly tormented with griefe and enuie, he began ſecretly with himſelfe to deuiſe K how he might be reuenged of the vngratefull Prince, which vnmindful of his former promiſes, had ſo vnthankfully caſt him off. Wherefore he reſolued again to reuolt to the old Emperor, not doubting but ſo in ſhort time to ouerthrow all the councels and deuices of the young Prince, together with his ſtate alſo, by himſelfe before raiſed. For he, as worldly wiſe, excluding God from his councels, had ſuch an opinion of himſelfe, that which way ſoeuer he went, thither muſt all things follow alſo. Wherefore by one of his truſtieſt friends he ſecretly made the old emperor acquainted with his purpoſed reuolt, and how all things ſtood: for the greater credit thereof alledging, That he could not abide the ſight of him that ſought to corrupt his wife, meaning the yong Prince. This news from Syrgiannes was vnto the old emperor moſt welcome: for it grieued him (as an old man of a great ſpirit) to ſee himſelfe ſo contemned and L deluded by his nephew, his empire rent, and his old ſeruitors of all ſorts, by him ſpoyled of their lands and poſſeſſions in Macedonia and Thracia. So a ſolemne oath in ſecret paſſed from the one to the other, Syrgiannes without longer ſtay ſecretly fled to Conſtantinople: which there bruted abroad, reioyced many, now well hoping the whole gouernment would againe come vnto the old emperour, and that ſo they ſhould againe recouer their poſſeſſions wrongfully taken from them by his nephew. But God not ſeeing it ſo good, all this hope was but in vaine, as ere long it appeared: for the yong prince, who of long knew how much he was beloued of the Conſtantinopolitans, and by them ſecretly ſent for; taking occaſion vpon the flight of Syrgiannes, with all the power he could make, marched towards the city: and being come within ſight thereof, encamped, laying ambuſhes vpon euery way and paſſage thereabout, for M to haue intercepted Syrgiannes; who was then at Perinthus, and the third night after, with three hundred ſelect ſouldiers, deceiuing them that lay in waight for him as if they had bin all aſleepe, before the riſing of the Sun came to Conſtantinople: and if the old Emperour would haue giuen him leaue, he had ſuddenly charged them that did lie in wait for him, before they were

A were aware of his comming. But as ſoone as it was day, the Prince hearing of the eſcape of Syrgiannes, and no ſuch tumult in the citie as he had expected, preſently without more adoe retired with his armie the ſame way he came, backe againe into Thracia.

By and by after, Conſtantine the Deſpot was by the old Emperor his brother ſent by ſea to Theſſalonica, to take vpon him the gouernment of Macedonia, and by the way to apprehend Xene the Empreſſe, the young Princes mother; and after with all the power he could make to inuade the yong Prince in Thracia: that ſo ſetting on him on the one ſide out of Macedonia, and Syrgiannes with the Turkes (for the Emperour in this ciuill diſcord was glad to vſe their helpe alſo) and the Bythinian ſoldiers on the other, they might ſo ſhut him vp betwixt them and take him. According to which reſolution, the Deſpot comming to Theſſalonica, there B tooke the Empreſſe, whom with all her familie he thruſt into a gallie, and ſo ſent her to Conſtantinople, where ſhee was in the palace kept cloſe, as too much fauouring the proceedings of the Prince. And afterward raiſing all the power hee could in Macedonia, inuaded the Prince in Thracia, breaking by force thorow the wall of Criſtopolis.

The yong Prince ſeeing himſelfe by this means, now like to be driuen to a great ſtrait, ſent Synadenus with his Thracian armie, to defend the frontiers of his empire towards Conſtantinople, againſt Syrgiannes with his Turks and Bythinians: in hope himſelfe by many ſubtle deuices & ſlights, to be able to encounter his vncle the Deſpot. And firſt he cauſed diuers edicts and proſcriptions to be written in haſt, wherin great rewards and preferments were with great ſolemnity of words promiſed to whomſoeuer could bring vnto him the Deſpot either quick C or dead: which were of purpoſe giuen to the country people paſſing to & fro, to be diſperſed abroad in the high waies, and about in the country neere vnto the Deſpots campe. And after that, he cauſed the death of the Emperor his grandfather to be euery where proclaimed, and how that he was by the Conſtantinopolitans in a tumult ſlaine: which the deuiſers thereof, in euery place reported. Yea ſome there were, that ſwore they were themſelues preſent at his wofull death, and ſaw it with their eies: otherſome, more certainly to perſuade the matter, ſhewed long white goats haire, or ſuch like gathered out of white wooll, as if they had bin by the furious people pluckt from the old Emperors head or beard, at ſuch time as he was ſlaine. Which things being commonly reported in euery town and village, but eſpecially in the Deſpots campe, wonderfully filled mens heads with diuers ſtrange and doubtfull thoughts; then D diuers alſo of the diſperſed edicts being found, and brought to the Deſpot, ſtruck him (and not without cauſe) into a great feare; inſomuch, that by the perſuaſion of his beſt friends, he without longer ſtay retired in haſt to Theſſalonica. Whither ſhortly after came a gallie from Conſtantinople, with ſecret letters from the Emperor to the Deſpot, for the apprehenſion of fiue and twentie of the chiefe citizens, vehemently ſuſpected for the ſtirring vp of the people to rebellion, and ſo to haue deliuered the citie to the Prince: al whom the Deſpot ſhould haue ſent bound in that gallie to Conſtantinople: but they in good time perceiuing the danger they were in, ſecretly ſtirring vp the people, and by and by after ringing out the bels (the ſignal appointed for the beginning of the rebellion) had in a very ſhort time raiſed a wonderful tumult in the citie; inſomuch, that all the citizens were vp in armes, who running headlong vnto the E houſe of the Deſpot, found not him (for hee forewarned of their comming, was fled into the caſtle) but ſlew al they met of his, or elſe robbing them, caſt them in priſon. As for the Deſpots houſe, they took what they found therin, and afterwards pulled it down to the ground. Then comming to the caſtle, they fired the gates: which the Deſpot ſeeing, & not able to defend the place, tooke horſe and fled to a monaſterie not far off, where being taken by them that purſued him, he ful ſore againſt his wil, for the ſafegard of his life, took vpon him the habit of a Monk: neuertheles, he was from thence caried priſoner to the yong Prince his nephew, who ſhewed himſelfe much more courteous to him, than al the reſt of his nobilitie & waiters; for they, as if they would haue eaten him vp, were euen forthwith ready to haue torn him in pieces, had not the Prince embracing him in his armes, ſaued his life. Yet the next day after, by the perſuaſion F of his counſell, he ſent him to Didimotichum, where he was caſt into a moſt lothſome priſon, being very deepe and ſtrait, in manner of a well, no bodie to attend vpon him but one boy, where he lay in miſerable darknes and ſtinke; they which drew vp his ordure from him and the boy, whether by chance or of purpoſe, pouring it oftentimes vpon his head. Where after he had lyen a great while in moſt extreame miſerie, wiſhing to die and could not, he was at length by the Princes commandement(entreated thereunto by certaine religious men)remoued into a more eaſie priſon, where we will for euer leaue him.

Andronicus the old Empeour ſeeketh for counſell of the Pſalter, as of an heauenly Oracle, and ſo ſeeketh to make peace with his nephew. Pſal. 68. verſ. 14.

Things falling out croſſe with the old Emperor, and although they were neuer ſo well deuiſed, ſtill ſorting out vnto the worſt, he became very penſiue and doubtfull what to do. So it fortuned, that one day in his Melancholie mood, hauing a Pſalter in his hand, to reſolue his doubtfull minde, he opened the ſame, as if it were of that heauenly Oracle to aske counſell: wherein the firſt verſe that he light vpon was, Dum cæleſtis diſſociat Reges, niue conſpergentur in Salmon: When the Almightie ſcatered Kings (for their ſakes) then were they as white as ſnow in Salmon. Which he applying to himſelfe, as it all thoſe troubles, and whatſoeuer elſe had happened in them, proceeded from the will of God, although for cauſes to him vnknowne: hee by and by ſought to reconcile himſelfe vnto his nephew; contrary to the mind of Syrgiannes, deſiring nothing but trouble. For (as we haue before ſaid)the young Prince although he was deſirous of the power and libertie of an Emperor, yet he left the ornaments and care thereof vnto his grandfather: and had he not oftentimes and earneſtly beene egged forward by his companions to affect the whole empire, happily could and would haue contented himſelfe with the former pacification: for being now ſent for, hee came firſt to Rhegium, and there viſited his mother (now ſet at liberty, and ſent thither for the furtherance of the deſired pacification) where hee with her and by her counſel did whatſoeuer was there done. So within a few dayes the matter was brought into ſo good tearmes, that an attonement was made, and he himſelfe went and met the Emperour his grandfather before the gates of the citie: the old Emperour ſitting then vpon his horſe, and the Prince lighting from his, a good furlong before he came at him: and although his grandfather was very vnwilling, and forbad him ſo to doe, yet hee came to him on foot, and kiſſed his hand and foot as he ſate on horſebacke; and afterward taking horſe, embraced him, and there kiſſed one another, to the great contentment of the beholders: and ſo hauing talked ſome few words, departed; the old man into the citie, and the young man into his campe, which then lay neere vnto Pega: where ſtaying certaine dayes, he came diuers times into Conſtantinople, and ſo went out againe; for as then his mother, partly for her health, partly for the loue of her ſonne, lay at Pega.

But Syrgiannes nothing glad of the agreement made betwixt the Emperor and his nephew, walked vp and downe ſicke in mind, with a heauie countenance, eſpecially for that in time of peace his buſie head ſtood the common weale in no ſtead. Wherefore in al meetings & aſſemblies, he wilingly conuerſed with them which moſt diſliked of the preſent ſtate, & ſpake hardly as wel of the Emperor as of his nephew, wronged as he thought by them both; whereas in the time of their greateſt diſtreſſe he had (as he ſaid)ſtood them in good ſtead. But ſeeing one Aſanes Andronicus walking melancholie vp and downe, as a man with heauineſſe oppreſſed; who hauing done good ſeruice for the young Prince, & not of him regarded, had fled to the old Emperor, and there found no ſuch thing as he expected for the eaſe of his griefe, although he were a man honorably born, and otherwaies endued with many good parts: with him Syrgiannes acquainted himſelfe, as grieued with the like griefe that he himſelfe was; with whom as with his friend, without any diſſimulation hee plainly diſcourſed of all ſuch things as his griefe deſired. But Aſanes handling him with great wiſedome, did himſelfe with like words ſpeak hardly both of the Emperor & his nephew; but yet curiouſly noted whatſoeuer Syrgiannes ſaid, for he had before hated him for his ambition, & as then, took it in diſpleaſure, that he was enemy vnto Catacuzanus, his ſon in law, who was all in all with the yong Prince, and did oftentimes comfort him. But the ſong being throughly ſet, Aſanes came ſecretly vnto the old Emperor, and told him the whole matter; and in fine, that except he betime laid hold on Syrgiannes, affecting the empire, he ſhould in ſhort time be by him brought to his end. Wherupon Syrgiannes was forthwith clapt faſt in priſon: whoſe houſe with all his wealth, the common people took the ſpoile of; and not contented to haue raſed it down to the ground, conuerted the ſite thereof, together with the pleaſant vineyards adioining vnto the ſame, into a place to feed goats and ſheep in: a worthy reward for his manifold trecheries. The yong Prince ſhortly after going to Conſtantinople, was there crowned Emperour, as fellow in the empire with his grandfather: vnto which ſolemnity in the great temple of Sophia, both the Emperours riding, it fortuned the old Emperor by the ſtumbling of his horſe to be ouerthrown, & fouley beraied in the mire, the ſtreets being then very foule by reaſon of much rain but a little before

A fallen: which many tooke as ominous, and portending the euill fortune which ſhortly after befell him. During the time of this peace, it fortuned that as the yong Prince was a hunting in Cherſoneſus, ſeuentie Turks aduenturers, were by force of weather driuen on ſhore: who before they would yeeld themſelues priſoners, made a great fight with the Emperors men, and ſlew diuers of them; in which conflict the young Emperour himſelfe was wounded in the foot, wherewith he was a great while after exceedingly tormented.

Andronicus the late Prince, and now fellow in the empire with his aged grandfather, held not himſelf elong ſo contented, but after the manner of ambitious men (and continually prickt forward by his aſpiring fauourites) longed to haue the whole gouernment to himſelfe, which hardly brooketh any partner: and therefore wearie to ſee his grandfather liue ſo long, B reſolued no longer to expect his naturall death, (although it could not by courſe of nature be far off) but by one deuice or other to thruſt him from the gouernment; or if that might not be wrought, at once to diſpatch him both of life and ſtate together. And the ſurer to lay the plot whereon ſo foule and horrible a treaſon was to be built, he by the councell of his mother and others, by whom he was moſt directed, ſent for Michael the Prince of Bulgaria, his brother in law (though before to him vnknown, as was his wife his ſiſter alſo) to make with him a firme league, to the intent by him to prouide, that if the Prince of Seruia (who had but lately married the old Emperors nigh kinſwoman, and ſo to him much deuoted) ſhould take part with him, he ſhould by the Bulgarian his neighbour be intangled. Who ſo ſent for, with his wife, the old Emperors daughter, came to Dydymotichum, where they were many dayes moſt C honourably entertained both by the yong Emperor and his mother: for why, this meeting plotted vpon great treaſon, was finely coloured, with the deſire the yong Emperor had to ſee his ſiſter and her husband, as before vnto him vnknowne; and the Empreſſe her daughter, whom ſhe had not ſeene in three and twentie yeares before. But the ſecret concluſion betwixt them was, that the Bulgarian Prince ſhould to the vttermoſt of his power aid the young Emperour againſt his grandfather, and he likewiſe him againſt the Seruian, as he ſhould haue need; and further, that if his grandfather beeing depoſed, he ſhould recouer the whole empire, then to giue him a great ſum of mony, with certaine ſpecial cities and prouinces confining vpon him, as in dowrie to his kind brother in law, and companion in his labours. So Michael the Bulgarian Prince honorably entertained by the yong Emperor and the old Empreſſe his mother in D law, loaded with rewards, and promiſes of greater, returned home into his countrey.

A treacherous meeting.

This matter thus diſpatched, the yong Emperor therewith encouraged, & knowing alſo the Conſtantinopolitans, beſides the other cities of Thracia, exceedingly to fauour him and his proceedings, by whom alſo he was ſecretly inuited to haſten his comming thither (as wearie of the long life and lazines, as he termed it, of his grandfather) thought it beſt cunningly to go about the matter; that ſo his grandfather beeing with as little ſtirre as might be depoſed, he himſelfe might alone inioy the empire. But needing mony for the effecting of ſo great matters he by force tooke all the money from the collectors, whom the old Emperour had ſent into Thracia for the taking vp of mony there, telling them that he was an Emperor alſo, and in need of money, and that the common charge was likewiſe by the common purſe to be diſcharged. E After that he tooke his way towards Conſtantinople, pretending that vpon ſpeciall cauſes he had occaſion to ſend embaſſadours vnto the Sultan of Ægypt: for the tranſporting of whom he was there to take order for the ſetting forth of a great ſhip, and other things neceſſarie for the iourney. Neither went he ſlenderly appointed, but with a great power; and the cities of Thracia before well aſſured vnto him, ſuch as he ſuſpected being thruſt out of office, & others more aſſured vnto him placed in their ſteads. But whileſt he thus beſtirreth himſelfe, one of thoſe that were moſt inward with him, deteſting ſo foule a treaſon, ſecretly fled from him vnto his grandfather, from point to point diſcouering vnto him all the intended trecheries; and withall, how that his nephew had determined to depoſe him from his empire, or otherwiſe to bereaue him of his life if he ſhould ſtand vpon his guard: but if in the attempt he ſhould find eaſie ſucceſſe, then to ſpare his life; and depriuing him of the imperiall dignitie, to thruſt him as a Monke into a monaſterie: and therefore aduiſed him to beware how he ſuffred him after his wonted manner to come into the citie, for feare of a generall reuolt, but rather by force to keepe him out. Which the Emperour hearing, and comparing with other things which hee had heard of others, yet ſounding in his eares, deeming it to be true, ſtood vp, and in the an-guiſh of his ſoule thus complained vnto God : Reuenge my quarrell ô God, vpon them that doe G me wrong, and let them be aſhamed that riſe vp againſt me : and preſerue thou vnto me the imperiall power, which by thee giuen vnto me, he commeth to take from me whom I my ſelfe begot and aduanced.

After, he began to conſider what courſe to take for the aſſurance of himſelfe and his ſtate in ſo great a danger. And firſt he ſent vnto his nephew (come halfe way) to forbid him from entring the citie, and to tell him, that it was a great follie for him, being ſo manifeſt a traitor, both vnto his grandfather and the ſtate, to thinke his traiterous purpoſes to be vnknown vnto the world.
And beſide in way of reproofe to rehearſe vnto him, how many occaſions he had giuen for the breaking of the league with his grandfather : firſt in taking away the mony from the collectors, whereof the ſtate neuer ſtood in more need, by reaſon of the diuiſion of the empire, which required double charge ; then in that he had in the citie euery where diſplaced ſuch H gouernors and magiſtrats as his grandfather had ſent thither, and placed others at his pleaſure, with many other like facts, declaring his trecherous aſpiring mind, for which he was not without cauſe by his grandfather forbidden to enter the citie. After that, the old Emperor by ſecret letters craued aid of Crales Prince of Seruia, and Demetrius the Deſpot his ſon, who was then gouernor of Theſſalonica and the countries adioining ; commanding him with Andronicus and Michael his nephews (gouernors of Macedonia) with all the forces they were able to raiſe, and ſuch aid as ſhould be ſent vnto them out of Syria, with all ſpeed to ioyne together and to go againſt the yong Emperor. But theſe letters thus written vnto the Prince of Seruia, the Deſpot, and others, (as is before ſaid) were for the moſt part intercepted, by ſuch as the young Emperour had for that purpoſe placed vpon the ſtraits of Criſtopolis, and the other I paſſages ; eſpecially ſuch as were written in paper, yet ſome others in fine white linnin cloth, and ſecretly ſowed in the garments of ſuch as carried them, eſcaped for all their ſtrait ſearch, and ſo were deliuered. And in truth nothing was done, or about to be done in Conſtantinople, but that the yong Emperor was by one or other aduertiſed thereof : whereas the old Emperor on the other ſide, vnderſtood nothing what his nephew did abroad, or intended. For all men of their own accord inclined to him, ſome openly both bodie and ſoule (as they ſay) and ſuch as could not bee with him in perſon, yet in minde and good will were euen preſent with him ; and that not onely the common ſort of the citizens of Conſtantinople, but the chiefe Senatours, the great courtiers, yea and many other of the Emperors neereſt kinſmen alſo : who K curiouſly obſeruing whatſoeuer was done in the citie, forthwith certified him thereof. Amongſt whom was alſo Theodorus the Marqueſſe, one of the old Emperours owne ſons : who many yeres before by the Empreſſe his mother ſent into Italy, and there honourbly married, was by his prodigall courſe of life there, growne far in debt ; ſo that leauing his wife and children behind him, he was glad after the deceaſe of his mother, to flie vnto his father at Conſtantinople, and there now liued ; who be ſide that he moſt honourably maintained him in the court, and beſtowed many great things vpon him, paid alſo al his debts, which were very great. Al which fatherly kindnes he forgetting, went about moſt Iudas like to haue betraied his aged father. For he alſo dreaming after the empire, & for many cauſes (but epecially for that he was in mind, religion, maners, and habit, become a Latin) by him reiected, thought L he could not do him a greater diſpight than by reuolting vnto the yong Emperor : ſo that the neerer he was in bloud, the more he was his fathers vnnatural enemy. Shortly after, Demetrius the Deſpot, hauing receiued the Emperours letters at Theſſalonica, called vnto him Andronicus and Michael his nephewes, the gouernors of Macedonia ; with whom ioyning all his forces, & daily expecting more aid out of Sernia, he firſt ſpoiled the young Emperours friends and fauourits in Macedonia, giuing the ſpoile of them in all the cities and townes of Macedonia, vnto their ſoldiers, who made hauock of whatſoeuer they light vpon : and whoſoeuer ſeemed any way to withſtand them or diſlike of their proceedings, their goods and lands they confiſcated, and draue the men themſelues into exile. Neither was the yong Emperor Andronicus in the meane time idle, but ſecretly ſent out his edicts, into all parts of the M empire, yea into the very cities of Conſtantinople and Theſſalonica, and ouer al Macedonia : whereby hee proclaimed vnto the people in generall, a releaſement of them from all tributes, impoſitions, and paiments ; and franckly promiſed vnto the ſoldiers and men of war, the augmenting of their penſions and pay : which were no ſooner bruited, but that moſt men were therewith moued, both in word and deed to fauour his proceedings, doing what they

they could to further the ſame, and by ſecret letters inuiting him to haſten his comming into the citie; who thereupon comming to Rhegium, by his embaſſadours ſent from thence, requeſted the old Emperor, either to giue him leaue according to the league betwixt them, to come into the citie, or elſe to ſend him certaine of the chiefe of the nobilitie and clergie, with ſome of the better and more vnderſtanding ſort of the Burgers and citizens alſo, vnto whome he might frankly ſpeake his mind, for them fathfully to deliuer the ſame againe vnto the Emperor his grandfather, and the people. Which requeſts the old Emperor perceiuing to be full of deceit and trecherie, for a good ſpace anſwered thereunto nothing at al, but ſtood al ſilent, as doubting which to grant: for, to ſuffer his nephew to come into the city, he ſaw was dangerous, the citizens (as he well knew) being for the moſt part inclined to reuolt to him ſo ſoone as they ſhould once ſee him within the gates; and to ſend any forth vnto him, as hee deſired, might be (as he feared) an occaſion of ſome tumult to be after raiſed in the citie: for he knew that his nephewes drift therein was, openly by faire words, and ſecretly with great gifts and large promiſes, firſt to gaine them, and by them the reſt of the citizens. Both which things being dangerous, hee made choice of the eaſier, and ſent forth vnto him two of the moſt Noble Senators, two of the moſt reuerend Biſhops, two other graue Prelates, and foure of the chiefe Burgeſſes of the citie: vnto whom at their comming vnto him, hee in the open hearing of all men deliuered this premeditated and craftie ſpeech:

It is not vnknowne vnto the world, you my ſubiects, to haue alwaies beene vnto mee more deare than I haue beene vnto my ſelfe: and how that I haue not vpon any ambitious conceit, or deſire of the ſole gouernment, againſt my grandfathers good will, gone out. For you ſee how that I neither ſpare mine owne life, or attend my pleaſure, for the care I haue of you: I come not vnto you compaſſed about with a guard of armed men, as is the manner not of Kings onely, for the enuie of their high place, but of others alſo of farre meaner calling, whom diſaſter fortune, baniſhed from their parents and kinred, hath enforced to wander heere and there, with death alſo before their eyes. Let any man tell mee how I came by theſe wounds which I yet beare in my bodie, but in fight with the enemies of my countrey which paſſe ouer out of Aſia into Thracia; or elſe dwelling neere vnto Iſter, doe with their incurſions from thence miſerably waſte that ſide of Thracia which is next vnto them? For I (to tell you the very truth) ſeeing the old Emperour by reaſon of his great yeares to become ſlothfull and blockiſh, and not poſſible to bee awaked out of his drowſie ſleepe, neither any whit to grieue, when as the poore Chriſtians his ſubiects were both by day and night, ſome as ſacrifices ſlaine by the barbarous enemies, ſome carried away into moſt miſerable captiuitie, and the reſt poore and naked to bee driuen out of their houſes and cities; not to ſpeake in the meane time of the greater miſchiefes in Aſia, and how many cities haue beene there loſt through the old Emperours ſloth and negligence: when I ſaw theſe things (I ſay) ſtrucken with a piercing griefe, which my heart could not indure, I went out for two cauſes, either by ſome kinde of honourable death to end my griefe together with my life, or elſe to the vttermoſt of my power to ſtand my countrey in ſome ſtead. For by no meanes it can come to paſſe, but that a man, and he that hath of long time raigned, muſt at length become loathſome vnto his ſubiects, and incurre their deadly hatred. For why, God hath made nothing in this life immutable and firme: whereby it commeth to paſſe, as we ſee, that all worldly things ioy and delight in change. But if a man will as it were force fortune to his deſire, and ſtriue to bind things vnto a certaine firme and conſtant courſe, hee ſhall but loſe his labour, and in vaine ſtriue againſt nature. But whatſoeuer is contrary vnto nature, or exceedeth the iuſt bounds thereof, hath in it neither comfort nor delight. This was it that cauſed the wiſe men to ſay, and to leaue to vs as rules, Not to dwel too long vpon any thing; and a meaſure to be the faireſt vertue. For you ſee how that my grandfather being growne to great yeares, and hauing raigned ſo long (I may almoſt ſay) as neuer did any but hee, is become hatefull vnto all his people; and yet regardeth not either how to diſcharge himſelfe of ſo great a burthen, or how to releeue the declining ſtate of the empire, or ſo much as grieueth to ſee the ſucceſſours of the empire to die before him: For my father is dead without any fruit of the empire, except the bare title onely; and others alſo neereſt to him of bloud, and farre younger than he, are dead likewiſe: and happily I my ſelfe may die alſo before I ſhall receiue any profit thereof: for what can more eaſily happen, eſpecially vnto a man that ſhunneth no danger, and regardeth not his life? But ſome perhaps will ſuſpect me of ambition, for departing from the Emperour my grandfather, and for refuſing to be ruled by him. Which thing I neither flatly denie, or altogether confeſſe: For might I ſee the Empire increaſe, and the bounds thereof inlarged, I could willingly content my ſelfe, and at my eaſe take my reſt; cheering my ſelfe vp with ſuch hope as doe they that beare with their cookes, making them to ſtay long for their dinner, in hope thereby to fare the better. But ſeeing the ſtate of the empire dayly to decline from euill to worſe, and the miſerable people carried away captiues, or ſlaine by their enemies euen at the gates and vnder the wals of the imperiall Citie: what deeme you mee then to thinke? For moſt men eaſe their preſent griefe, with the hope of future good, although the ſame be but vaine: But vnto mee is not left euen ſuch vaine hope vnto my falſe comfort. And can you maruell at the impotent affection of the Great Alexander of Macedon, grieued and diſpleaſed to ſee his father to heape victorie vpon victorie, and to cut off all the hope of his ſonnes glorie, by leauing him ſo few occaſions of warre; and not thinke mee (to whom you ſee the quite contrarie is chanced, and from whom not onely the hope of the empire is cut off, for the waſting thereof, but euen the courſe of a quiet life) to fret and grieue thereat? Mooued herewith, and not able longer to indure it, at length I riſe vp, and requeſted of the Emperour my Grandfather, but a thouſaud men at armes, promiſing him by the power of God with them to preſerue the Cities in Bythinia, and to driue his enemies further off, (before that hauing them), they ſhould paſſe ouer the ſtrait, and beſiege the imperiall Citie of Conſtantinople: which ſo ſmall a requeſt hee not onely denyed mee, but hath euer ſince taken mee for his mortall enemie. But this and many other things elſe let paſſe: I huae now another requeſt vnto him by you, which is, That hee would giue mee eight thouſand duckats to content my ſouldiers withall, who of long haue from plac to place roamed vp and downe with mee, following mine vncertaine fortune: Which granted, I will no more bee vnto my Grandfather troubleſome, but diſmiſſing my forces, hold my ſelfe right well contented.

Hauing thus ſaid, hee roſe out of his ſeat, and taking them a part one after another, courteouſly diſcourſed with them, and ſo filling them with great hopes, ſent them away: who departing from him and comming into the citie, became as it were the open proclaimers of his praiſes, enflaming the people with a greater deſire of him than before. Which the old Emperour hearing, and perceiuing almoſt all his friends in the citie to bee in heart reuolted from him; and withall fearing to bee of them in ſome ſudden concourſe ſlaine, was therewith exceedingly vexed. Yet hee thought it beſt before any ſuch thing ſhould happen, to proue their mindes, and to heare the counſell of the Patriarch, and Aſanes, and the other Biſhops alſo: vnto whome; being by one of the Senators called together, he declared his mind, as followeth:

The ſpeech of the old Emperour vnto the Patriarch and the reſt of the Biſhops and Nobilitie, concerning the young Empeour his nephew.

Were I aſſured, that hauing depoſed my ſelfe of the imperiall dignitie, I ſhould my ſelfe liue in ſafetie, and ſee my people wel gouerned, I would I ſhould neuer be of the companie of the faithful, if I did not by much prefer a pleaſant quiet contented life before an Empire. For if a man would ſeeke for the pleaſure of the mind, what can be mor pleaſant, than to be disburdened of all cares, & free from ſuch dangers as attend high eſtates? But if for my ſinne and the ſinnes of my people, as alſo for the ſinne of mine anceſtors, the vengeance of God in manner of a violent tempeſt raging againſt vs, ſubuerteth our empire: and I yet but a youth, by the helpe of God reformed and quieted the ſtate of the Empire, grieuouſly troubled with diſcord in the Church, and the often inuaſion of the enemie; and taught by long experience know not how in ſo great hurle and tempeſt which way to turne my ſelfe: How can I with ſafetie commit vnto my nephew ſo great a charge, who as yet is both an vnſtayed youth, and ſo careleſſe of his owne good, as that hee knoweth not how well to gouerne his owne priuate affaires? For giuing ouer his power to young vnskilfull men, and hauing flung away his imperiall poſſeſſions amongſt them, hee himſelfe liueth in penurie and want; neither regardeth any thing more than his dogges and kites, of whome hee keepeth few leſſe than a thouſand currres, and as many hawkes, and not much fewer men to looke vnto them. Wherefore vnto ſuch a man, how may I ſafely commit eyther my life, or the adminiſtration of mine Empire, by God committed vnto mee? But I will neuer witting and willingly caſt away either my ſubiects or my ſelfe. For my nephew I haue loued, not onely more than my wife and children, but (to ſay the truth) more than my ſelfe alſo; as you well know how tenderly I haue brought him vp, how carefully I haue inſtructed and adniſed him, as purpoſing to haue left him the heire and ſucceſſour both of my wiſedome and mine Empire, that ſo hee might the better pleaſe both God and man. But hee, contemning my good counſell, hath ſpent whole nights in banquetting, and riot, and brothelhouſes; wherein hee hath alſo ſlaine his owne brother: and to bee breefe, hee hath riſen and lifted vp his hand againſt mee his grandfather, and a grandfather that

A had of him ſo well deſerued, attempting ſuch a villanie as the Sunne neuer ſaw. Wherefore you ought alſo to hate and deteſt his wickedneſſe, and to riſe vp to reſtraine his impudent diſloyaltie, and by your Eccleſiaſticall cenſure to denounce him vnworthie of the Empire and the communion of the faithful, as one ſeperated from God; that ſo aſhamed and corrected, he may louingly thither returne from whence he is ſhamefully departed, and againe be made heire both of myne empire and ſtaidneſſe: for there is no man aliue whom I had rather haue promoted vnto the Empire, ſo that he would heare my precepts, and obey my councell. As for the concluſion he vſed in his former ſpeech, it was altogether feigned, craftie, and malicious: for you haue heard how many reproches he hath giuen me in all that Speech, wherewith his concluſion agreeth not; but the more to ſtirre vp the hearers thereof againſt mee, did of purpoſe ſo conclude his Speech.

B Vpon this, moſt of the foreſaid graue and learned Biſhops agreed, that the young Emperor ſhould no more be named in the prayers of the Church, vntill he had better conformed him-ſelfe. Howbeit the Patriarch and ſome others ſecretly fauoring both him & his proceedings, liked not thereof, and therefore ſaying nothing therunto, returned home vnto their own houſes. But meeting once or twice afterwards in the Patriarchs houſe, they there conſpired together againſt the old Emperor; with whom alſo diuers of the nobilitie conſented: and thereupon an oath was conceiued in writing, whereby they bound themſelues to continue conſtant in that their wicked reſolution. Whereupon, about three days after, the Patriarch cauſing the bels to be rung, and a great number of the common people flocking together, pronounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt al ſuch as ſhould in their publike prayers omit the name C of the yong Emperor, or refuſe to do him all honour due vnto an Emperor. Which thing not a little grieued the old Emperor, as appeared by his ſpeech, in ſaying, If the Doctor of peace be ſo mad againſt vs, in hope of reward promiſed by my nephew, that caſting off all ſhame and grauitie, hee doubts not to be the author of ſedition; who ſhall repreſſe the raſh attempts of the vulgar people againſt vs, if we reſpect but mans helpe? for the Patriarch ſo much as in him lieth is, I ſee, the murderer of vs.
So the Biſhops of the contrary faction, moued with the notable impudencie of the Patriarch, excommunicated him likewiſe, as he had done them, with his mad followers, as the authors of ſedition and faction, and incited with bribes to the troubling of the ſtate: for which cauſe alſo he was by the Emperors commandment committed vnto ſafe keeping in the Monaſterie cal-D led Manganium. But about two dayes after, the young Emperour came to the walls of Conſtantinople, to know how his grandfather had accepted the meſſengers ſent vnto him; earneſtly requeſting, that it might be lawfull for him alone to enter into the city, to do his duty to his granbdfather. But neither hee, neither his words were any whit at all regarded, but was by ſuch as ſtood vpon the wals himſelfe with ſtones driuen away; who could not abide to heare him ſpeake, but ſhamefully railed at him, ſaying all his talke to be nothing elſe but deceit and fraud: and ſo for that time he retyred a little from the wals. But night being come, certain bu-ſie heads among the common people (and they not a few) ſecretly meeting together gaue him knowledge, that about midnight, when as all the citiſens were aſleepe, and the watchmen in ſecuritie, he ſhould come vnto the walls, where they would be readie with ropes to draw him vp vnto the top of the bulwarks; which done, the matter (as they ſaid) were as good as diſpatched: for that they were perſuaded, that the citiſens ſo ſoone as they ſhould once ſee him in the midſt of the city amongſt them, would forthwith all reuolt vnto him. So he according to this appointment, about midnight approching the wals, found there no ſuch matter as he had well hoped, for the receiuing of him into the city; But contrariwiſe the watchmen carefully watching all alongſt the wall, and calling one vnto another. Wherefore finding there no hope, he with Catacuzenus and Synadenus, his chiefe councellors, leauing the South ſide of the city, in a little boat rowed ſoftly all along the wal that is toward the ſea, if happily they might there finde their friends, and ſo be receiued in: but there the watchmen alſo deſcrying them from the walls, and calling vnto them, but receiuing no anſwere, began to caſt ſtones at them, and to make a noyſe: ſo that deceiued of their purpoſe, and out of hope, they were glad to get them further off, and to depart as they came.

The Patriarch with diuers of the Biſhops conſpire againſt the Emperor.

But the euil ſucceſſe of this exploit was ſhortly after with his better fortune recompenced: for by and by after, ſecret letters were ſent vnto him from Theſſalonica, requeſting him with all ſpeed to come thither, aſſuring him in the name of the Biſhop, with diuers of the Nobili-Theſſalonica yeelded vnto the yong Emperour.

tle,and the good liking of the people in general,at his comming to open the gates of the city vnto him: wherupon he leauing a great part of his army with Synadenus,to keep ſhort the Conſtantinopolitans, hee himſelfe with the reſt of his power ſet forward towards Theſſalonica, where he in the habit of a plain country man entred the city vnſuſpected: but being got within the gate,and there caſting off that ſimple attire wherewith he had couered his rich & royal garments,and preſently known to be the yong emperor,the people came flocking about him, and with many ioyfull acclamations receiued him as their Lord and Soueraigne: yet ſome few,more fauoring the old Emperour,fled into the caſtle,and there ſtood vpon their guard: which after they had for a ſpace notably defended,was at length taken from them. G

Theſſalonica thus yeelded, Demetrius, Andronicus,and Aſan Michael,the old Emperors chiefe captains,then lying with his armie not far off,and not well truſting one another, fled; moſt of whoſe ſoldiers preſently went ouer vnto the yong Emperor: who departing from Theſſalonica,came to Serre,which by compoſition was deliuered vnto him alſo,but not the caſtle: for that was by Baſilicus Nicephorus(the captain thereof) ſtill holden for the old Emperor. This Baſilicus was a man honorably diſcended,but of no great capacity or wit,as the finer ſort ſuppoſed,and therefore not of them much regarded,or thought fit for the taking in hand of any great matter: whom yet the old Emperor for his plain ſinceritie,more than for any thing elſe, had made captain of that caſtle,and gouernor of the country thereabouts; which he yet ſtill held, and in theſe moſt troubleſome times ſhewed himſelfe wiſer than them all that had ſo thought of him: of whom ſome died in diſpaire,ſome fled,ſome were taken priſoners,and ſo ſuffred a thouſand euils; the reſt with the loſſe of their honor,traiterouſly reuolting from the old Emperor to the yong: whereas he alone, looking but euen forward vpon his allegeance, with his truſt in God,ſo long as the old Emperour liued oppoſed himſelfe againſt theſe troubles,and ſtood faſt for him,and was not to be moued with any faire promiſes or cruell threats of the yong aſpiring Emperor,whereof he lacked none. But hauing ſtrongly fortified the Caſtle committed to his charge,there kept himſelfe, vntill that hearing of the death of the old emperor,he then reconciling himſelfe to the young,as vnto his right Soueraigne,deliuered vp vnto him the caſtle: who in reward of his fidelitie,gaue it him again to hold for him,in as ample manner as he had before held it for his grandfather. For wiſe men honour vertue euen in their enemies,as did king Philip in Demoſthenes,when as he ſaid, If any Athenian liuing in Athen, doth ſay that he preferreth me before his countrey, him verily would I buy with much money; but not thinke him worthy my friendſhip: but if any for his countries ſake ſhall hate mee,him will I impugne a a caſtle,a ſtrong wall,or a bulwarke; and yet admire his vertue,and reckon the city happy in hauing ſuch a man. And ſo in few words to conclude a long diſcourſe, the yong Emperor in ſhort time hauing romed thorow all Macedonia,and without reſiſtance taken all the ſtrong towns & cities therein,he there tooke alſo Demetrius the Deſpots wife and children,with all his treaſure,as alſo the wiues of Andronicus & Aſanes,and of al the Senators that followed them: after whom the great commanders their husbands were alſo for the moſt part taken & caſt in priſon,ſome at Theſſalonica,ſome at Didimotichum,ſome of the reſt afterward moſt miſerably periſhing in exile. Wherewith the old Emperor diſcouraged,was about to haue ſent his Embaſſadors vnto his nephew for peace, whileſt hee was yet thus buſied in Macedonia: and had indeed ſo done, had not another hope ariſing in the meane time, quite altered that his better purpoſe. It fortuned at the ſame time,whileſt the old Emperour was thus thinking of peace, that Michael the Bulgarian Prince, in hope of great profit thereof to ariſe, ſecretly offered his ayd vnto him againſt the yong emperor his nephew: of which his offer the old Emperour gladly accepted,and Embaſſadors were ſent to and fro,about the full concluſion of the matter, no man beeing acquainted therewith, more than two or three of the Emperour his moſt ſecret friends and truſtie Councellours. Yet in the meane time diſdaining to be ſo coupt vp as he was,by Synadenus one of his Nephewes Captaines, euen in the Imperiall Citie; ſent out one Conſtantinus Aſſan, with the greateſt part of his ſtrength againſt him: who encountering him at the Riuer Maurus,was there by him in plaine battell ouerthrowne and taken priſoner, the reſt of his diſcomfited Armie flying headlong backe againe to Conſtantinople. All things thus proſperouſly proceeding with the young Emperour, and the Countreys of Macedonia and Thracia now almoſt all at his command, he returned in haſte with all his Power vnto Conſtantinople, to preuent the comming of the Bulgarians thither: as fearing

A leſt that they finding the city weakely manned, ſhould treacherouſly kill the old Emperour, with ſuch as were about him,and ſo ſeiſe vpon the citie themſelues : or at leaſtwiſe giue him ſuch aid as might keep him out,and ſo cut off all his hope for obtaining of the ſame. At which time alſo there was great want of victuall in the city, he with his armie hauing ſhut it vp on the one ſide by land,and the Venetians with their galleys on the other ſide by ſea: who then at odds with the Genowais dwelling at Pera, kept all that ſtrait ſea betwixt Europe and Aſia, in ſuch ſort, as that neither victuals nor merchandiſe could be brought that way, either to Conſtantinople or Pera. The yong Emperor comming to Conſtantinople, attempted at his firſt comming to haue entred the city,in hope without any great reſiſtance to haue been recei-ued; but repulſed by the defendants, was glad to get him further off. About this time came B alſo vnto the citie three thouſand horſemen, the appointed aid of the Bulgarian Prince, vnto the old Emperor: who although he wanted men,and was right glad of their comming,yet re-membring the harms he had before receiued by forrein aid, and not now daring to truſt them too far,ſuffered not them to come into the city,more than their General and ſome few others of their commanders with him. Now the yong Emperor vpon the comming of this aid, leſt ſome great harme might betide either the old Emperor or himſelfe,to the vtter ſubuerſion of their ſtate; ſecretly ſent vnto his grandfather,requeſting him to be well aduiſed how hee truſted thoſe forrein people too far; offering himſelfe to do whatſoeuer he ſhould command,rather than ſo great a harme ſhould happen vnto either of them,as was from them to be feared.
But the truſt the old Emperour had conceiued of this Bulgarian aid, had ſo confirmed his C mind,as that he little liſtned vnto his nephews requeſt: beſides that,how could hee well truſt him that had ſo oftentimes deceiued him? Wherewith the young Emperor much grieued, and now againe almoſt diſpairing of his further ſucceſſe,diſlodged, and drew neere vnto the place where theſe Bulgarian horſemen lay encamped: from whence he ſent certaine Embaſſadors with great gifts and Preſents vnto the Generall,and the reſt of the chiefe commanders: promiſing them far greater,if they would without further troubling themſelues return home againe: whereunto they willingly granted, and ſo were of him honourably feaſted, and the next day after conducted vpon their way homewards.

Conſtantinople betrayed vnto the yong Emperour.

It fortuned,that the yong Emperor returning backe again from the Bulgarians,and incam-ped in the ſame place where he before lay; two of the watchmen of the city, the one called D Camaris,& the other Caſtellanus,both ſmiths,fled ſecretly vnto him: who admitted to his pre-ſence,and all others commanded to depart,excepting Catacuzenus,offered to betray the Citie vnto him,ſo that he would vnder his hand writing aſſure them of ſuch a ſumme of mony,and ſuch poſſeſſions as they required: which he eaſily granting, and the houre & manner of performing of the ſame,being by them declared and agreed vpon,they by & by without longer ſtay,for feare of ſuſpition,returned again into the city.But the Emperor ſtaying foure days in the ſame place,cauſed certain ladders to made of great ropes, ſuch as they vſe in great ſhips: But the appointed night being come,the two traitors hauing before prouided great ſtore of good wine,liberally gaue the ſame by way of curteſie vnto the watchmen their companions neere vnto them: who dranke ſo plentifully thereof,that not able any longer to hold vp their E heads,they fel into ſo ſound a ſleep,as that but for breathing they diffred not much from dead men.About midnight came certain ſoldiers of the yong Emperors,with the foreſaid ladders; which the traitors by and by drawing vnto them by a rope caſt downe, and making them faſt vnto the top of the wall,receiued by the ſame eighteene armed men: who being got into the city,without more ado brake open the Roman gate,whereby the yong Emperor with his Armie preſently entred,no man letting him. But it is worth marking, how things appointed to befal vs,are by no means to be auoided,although we be thereof before neuer ſo plainly forewarned: For the ſame night the city was ſurpriſed,immediatly after the ſetting of the Sunne, the gates being ſhut,a certain country man came running in all haſt from out of a village there by,and knocking hard at the gate called Girolimna,required to ſpeake with ſome of the ſoul-F diers; who being come,he told them,how that a little before he had ſeen, a great number of the young Emperours men marching towards the citie, by the way that leadeth vnto the Roman gate: which being told vnto the old Emperor, did not a little trouble him. And therefore thought it good to ſend out certain ſcouts, to ſee if al were cleere along the wals toward the land,from ſea to ſea: which his purpoſe Metochita his chiefe Councellor letted, ſaying, it not to beſeeme a couragious mind to be vpon ſo light an occaſion ſo much moued; for that G either the rumor was falſe, or the endeuour of ſo few vaine, the wals and gates of the citie being ſo filled with armed men: which happily he ſaid not ſo much vpon ignorance of martiall affaires, as blinded by a certaine commanding power, that the ſupernall decree giuen by God himſelfe againſt the old Emperor, might at length take place. And again, the third part of that night yet ſcant paſt, diuers other countrymen came running vnto the ſaid gate Gyrolimna, and told the watchmen vpon the wals, that a great number of men were met together at the Roman gate: whereof the Emperor hearing, was therewith much more troubled than before; inſomuch that ſharply rebuking Metochita, he ſaid vnto him, Thou ſeemſt to be ſtrangely metamorphoſed into a man of yron, which art become ſo ſecure, as not to haue any feeling of the danger wherwith we are incloſed: Seeſt thou not that the matter requireth, not that we ſhould H thus ſit ſtill and take our reſt? For the noiſe of my nephew ſoundeth in mine eares as the ſound of a great drum, and diſquieteth my minde. I feele a ſea of calamitie broken out againſt mee, which ouerwhelmeth and drowneth my heart and courage. Neuertheles he, firme in his former opinion, made no reckoning of thoſe reports: and therefore roſe to go to bed, to ſhew indeed that he accounted nothing of them, but as falſe alarmes. But the Emperor left alone, and no bodie with him vnto whom he might breake his griefe, laid him downe vpon a pallet, not putting off his clothes; but as if he had together with them put on extreame deſperation, lay tumbling too and fro as a man in mind troubled with diuers many and heauy thoughts. In the mean time he heard a great noiſe at the court gate, and the report of the entring of the young Emperor his nephew, with a great clattering of armour; for there were aboue eight hundred I ſoldiers entred with him, and withal they of the city on euery ſide ſaluted him with moſt ioifull acclamations. But the old Emperour hearing the great tumult and outcrie, roſe from his pallet, exceedingly troubled; and deſtitute of all the helpe of his captaines and ſouldiers, (for why, his palace was altogether deſolate, except of ſuch as were his ordinarie waiters) betooke himſelfe vnto his praiers, beſeeching God not to forſake him in ſo great a danger, but in his mercie to defend him from the fury of thoſe wicked men. Who preſently heard him, & ſent him preſent reliefe: for whilſt he was thus praying in the palace, the yong Emperor without, calling together all his captaines and lieutenants, ſtraitly charged them vpon paine of death, neither by word nor deed to violate the maieſtie of the old Emperor his grandfather, nor any other about him: for this victorie (ſaid he) God hath giuen vs, and not we our ſelues; his wil K ordereth all things, whereunto all things obey; the ſtars, the aire, the ſea, the earth, men, flouds, tempeſts, plagues, earthquakes, ſhoures, dearth, and ſuch like, ſometimes to our bliſſe, & ſometime to our correction and deſtruction: wherefore vſing vs as the inſtruments of his chaſtiſement, he hath giuen vnto vs this preſent victorie, which peraduenture tomorrow he wil giue to others to vſe againſt vs, and then as we hnue been vnto them we haue ouercome, ſuch will they alſo ſhew themſelues vnto vs again: wherefore if neither nighnes of bloud, neither that we be all of one country, may moue vs, yet in reſpect of our ſelues let vs vſe mercie, that wee feele not the hand of God vpon vs in like caſe. In the meane time a courtier opened a wicket vnto the young Emperour, with this meſſage from his grandfather.

Foraſmuch as God this day (my ſonne) hath giuen vnto thee the imperiall ſcepter, taken from mee, I requeſt of thee this one good turne, for many which I haue euen from my birth beſtowed vpon thee, (for in this my hard eſtate I let paſſe, that I next vnto God haue beene the authour of thy natiuitie and increaſe) giue mee my life, ſpare thy fathers head, and with violent weapon ſpill not that bloud from which thou thy ſelfe haſt taken the fountaine of life. Man truly beholdeth heauen and earth, and heauen and earth behold mens actions: wherefore make not the heauens and the earth beholders of ſo wicked an outrage as neuer man euer committed. If brothers bloud long agoe cryed out vnto the Lord againſt Cain, how much louder ſhall the fathers bloud crie vnto the Lord, and declare ſo great a wickedneſſe vnto the earth, the ſunne, and ſtars, and make it abhorred of all the Princes of the world? Regard my miſerable old age, which of it ſelfe promiſeth vnto mee ſhortly death, but vnto thee a reſt after M long cares. Reuerence the hands which haue oftentimes moſt louingly embraced thee, yet crying in thy ſwathing clouts. Reuerence thoſe lips which haue oftentimes moſt louingly kiſſed thee, and called thee my other ſoule: Haue pittie vpon a bruiſed reed, caſt down by fortune, and doe not thou again tread vpon it. And ſeeing thou art thy ſelfe a man, be not too proud of thy preſent fortune, but conſider the vn-

A certaintie and varietie of worldly things,taking by me example: ſee in me the end of long life,and meruaile,how one night hauing receiued me an Emperor of many yeares, leaueth me now ſubiect vnto another mans power for euer.

The yong Emperor Andronicus moued with this ſpeech,and taking great care of his grandfathers ſafetie, ſcarce abſtaining from teares, entred the palace, and comming to his grandfather,humbly ſaluted him,embraced him,and with chereefull words comforted him. Straitway after he went vnto the Monaſtery Manganium,where(as is aforeſaid)the Patriarke Eſaias was by the old emperors commandment kept in ſafe keeping; whom the yong emperor now tooke from thence,and carrying him away in one of the emperours richeſt chariots, reſtored B him again vnto his Patriarchal dignitie; wherein he afterwards ſpared not to reuenge himſelf to the full,and moſt cruelly to perſecute the old emperors friends. That day from morning vnto night,a man might haue ſeene all the riches and wealth of ſuch noblemen as had taken part with the old emperor,carried away,and their goodly houſes ouerthrown and made the ſcorn of the baſe common people: but eſpecially the houſe & wealth of Theodorus Metochita,a man but the day before in greateſt fauor with his Prince,and of all others next vnto the Emperour himſelf,of greateſt authoritie and credit,whoſe whole wealth(not that only which was found in his houſe,but that alſo which he had laid vp in truſt with his friends, diſcouered by Notes found in his ſtudie)became moſt part a prey vnto the common people, & the reſt confiſcated vnto the Prince. Thus he which earſt of all others next vnto the Emperor was accounted moſt C fortunate,was now vpon the ſudden,with his wife and children brought vnto extream beggerie; and after many yeares felicity, in one day caſt into the bottome of deſpaire and miſerie: where a man might haue heard many complaining, ſay, All that wealth and treaſure to haue bin the bloud and teares of the poore oppreſſed ſubiects, brought vnto him by them whome he had made rulers and gouernors of the prouinces & cities of the empire; to the intent that when they had dealt cruelly with the people,as with their ſlaues,he might ſtop them for comming to complaine of their griefes vnto the emperour: and that the eye of the Reuenger had not always ſlept,but was now at length awaked,& had of him yet ſcarcely taken ſufficient puniſhment: which euery where to heare,increaſed not a little his griefe. As for himſelfe,he was confined vnto Didymotichum, as the place of his exile and baniſhment; where after he had a D certain time poorely liued, he was ſent for backe again to Conſtantinople: where hauing nothing left to relieue himſelfe (for his houſe at the comming of the yong emperour, was in the furie of the people pluckt down to the ground,and the very pauement thereof digged vp) he went vnto the monaſterie of Chora there by,which long before built by the Emperor Iuſtinian,and become ruinous,he in the time of his proſperitie had with great charge repaired,and therein now (hauing made ſhipwracke of all that he had) quietly ſhrouded himſelfe, to the great comfort both of his bodie and afflicted mind,where he not long after died.

Niphon inten-ſeth the young emperor againſt his grandfather

But to return again vnto the old Emperor,as yet in doubt what ſhould become of himſelf: it fortuned that the ſame day that the city was taken, the yong emperor at night returning to the palace,by the way met with Niphon ſometime Patriarch,who asked him how they meant E to deale with his grandfather. Wherunto the yong emperour anſwering,That he would deale with him honorably and emperor like; he was by him therefore blamed and reproued. For this Niphon being of a craftie ſubtill wit and malicious nature, beſides that hee ſecretly hated all them vpon whom fortune greatly either fauned or frowned,bare an eſpecial grudge againſt the old Emperor: Firſt, for that at ſuch time as he was right worthily for his ſhamefull couetouſneſſe & extortion, by the reſt of the Biſhops and clergy thruſt out of the Patriarkſhip, hee was not by him(as he looked for)defended: & ſecondly, for that dreaming again after the Patriarchal dignity,he thought it one good ſtep thereunto,to haue him(as his greateſt enemy)taken out of the way. Wherefore he ſaid now vnto the young Emperour, If thou deſire to raigne without feare, giue not thyne honor vnto another; but taking all the ornaments of the Empire from the F old man, caſt haire-cloath vpon him, and ſo clap him faſt in priſon, or thruſt him out into exile. This miſchieuous councel this wicked man gaue againſt the poore old diſtreſſed Emperour,not remembring how vnworthily he had by him been before preferred vnto the higheſt degrees both of honour and wealth,if he could there haue kept himſelfe: vnto which vngracious councell,diuers others of the nobilitie alſo conſenting,ſo wrought the matter amongſt them, that

that although they could not quite draw the yong Emperors mind from his grandfather, yet they much changed the ſame, ſo that he could no longer indure to take him for his companion in the empire. Whereupon after many meetings and conſultations had, it was decreed, That the old man ſhould ſtill retaine the name and ornaments of an Emperour, as before, but not to meddle in any matters, nor to come abroad, but to ſit ſtill quietly in his Chamber, with the yerely maintenance of 10000 duckats, for the maintenance of himſelfe and ſuch as tended vpon him; to be raiſed of the fiſhing before the city of Conſtantinople: a poore penſion for the maintenance of ſo great an Emperor. Of which ſo ſhameful a decree, Eſaias the Patriarke was alſo a furtherer: who ſeeing an Emperor that had raigned ſo long, caſt downe, and ſhut vp as it were in priſon, was ſo far from grieuing thereat, that fooliſhly reioycing, hee in token thereof abſurdly wreſted this Text of Scripture, ſaying in his merriment, Latabitur juſtus, cum viderit vltionem; The juſt ſhall reioyce when he ſeeth the reuenge: calling himſelf, Iuſt, and the emperor, Reuenge. But the old Emperor thus ſhut vp in his chamber (differing in nothing but in name, from a priſon) not long after, the ſtate of his bodie ouerthrown with griefe and corrupt humors diſtilling out of his head, firſt loſt one of his eyes, and ſhortly after the other alſo: and ſo oppreſſed with eternall darknes, mingled (as ſaith the Scripture) his drinke with teares, and ate the the bread of ſorrow, being oftentimes (to his great griefe) moſt bitterly mocked and derided, not of them only which were by his enemies ſet to gard him, but of his own ſeruants alſo. Not long after, the young Emperour falling ſicke, in ſuch ſort as that it was thought hee would not recouer, Catacuzenus, and the reſt of his greateſt fauorits and followers carefull of their own eſtate, and yet doubtful of the old blind Emperor, deuiſed many things againſt him, but all tending to one purpoſe, for the ſhortning of his days. But in the end all other deuices ſet apart, they put him to his choice, either to put on the habit of a religious, and ſo for euer to bid the world farewell, or elſe to take what ſhould otherwiſe enſue; the beſt whereof was either death, exile, or perpetuall impriſonment in the loathſome caſtle of forgetfulneſſe: For the putting whereof in execution, Synadenus (of all others to him moſt hatefull) was appointed. At which hard choice, the old Emperour as with a world of woes ſuddenly oppreſſed, lay a great while vpon his bed as a man ſpeechleſſe: for what could he do elſe, except he had an heart of ſteele or adamant? beeing then compaſſed about with many barbarous and mercileſſe ſoldiers, and his domeſticall ſeruants kept from him, and no man left that would vouchſafe to direct him (being blind) whither to go, or where to ſtand. But to make the matter ſhort, would he, would he not, they made choice for him themſelues, polling and ſhauing him, and caſting a Monks habit vpon him, changed his name, after the name of the religious, and called him by the name of Anthonie the Monke. Glad was Eſaias the falſe Patriarch, of this the hard eſtate of the old Emperor: for that now that he was profeſſed a religious, there was left no hope for him to recouer againe the empire, either cauſe for himſelfe to feare. Yet he thought it good to be aduiſed, in what ſort remembrance ſhould be made of him in the church prayers, if any were at all from thenceforth to be made. Whereof to be by the old Emperor himſelfe reſolued, hee (ſeeming to be very ſorie for that which was done, but purpoſing indeed therein to deride him) ſent vnto him two Biſhops, to know what his pleaſure was to haue done therein. Vnto which their demand, he oppreſſed with heauineſſe, and fetching a deepe ſigh euen from the bottome of his heart, anſwered:

The old Emperor becommeth blinde.

Andronicus the old Emperor againſt his will made a Monke, and called Anthonie.

The notable anſwer of the old Emperor, to the catching queſtion of the proud Patriarch.

As in poore Lazarus appeared a double miracle, that being dead, he roſe; and being bound, walked: euen ſo was it to be done in me, though in quite contrary manner: for lo, being aliue, I am dead, as ouerwhelmed with the waues of calamity and woe; and being looſe, I am bound, not my hands and feet only, but my tongue alſo; wherewith vnable to doe any thing elſe, I might yet at leaſt bewaile my woes and wrongs vnto the aire, and ſuch as by chance ſhould heare me, and vnto this moſt wofull darknes wherein I muſt for euer ſit. But ſhame hoth cloſed my mouth, my brethren abhor me, and my mothers ſons account me for a ſtranger vnto them, and the very light of myne eys is not with him, my friends & neighbors ſtood vp againſt me, and all that ſaw me, laughed me to ſcorne: my feet had almoſt ſlipped, and my footſteps were almoſt ouerthrown: for I fretted againſt the wicked, when I ſaw the peace of the vngodly. The Emperors long ago gaue great priuiledges vnto the Church, euen thoſe which it at this day inioyeth: and the Church gaue to them again power, to chuſe whom they would to be Patriarks. Now concerning him that ſent you, I not only nominated him vnto the Patriarkeſhip, but I my ſelfe made choice of him,

A and preferred him before many other right worthy and moſt famous men, being himſelfe a man growne old in a more priuat life, neuer before preferred, or for any other thing famous : I will not ſay how often I haue holpen him and done him good. But now when he ſhould againe haue relieued me in my calamity; he ioyneth hands with mine enemies againſt me, more cruel vpon me than any other bloudie handed executioner; not aſhamed to aske me how I would be remembred in the Church : faigning himſelfe to be ignorant and ſorrie for mine eſtate, much like vnto the Ægyptian crocodile of Nile, which hauing killed ſome liuing beaſt, lieth vpon the dead bodie and waſheth the head thereof with her warme teares, which ſhe afterwards deuoureth together with the bodie. But what to anſwere him vnto this his catching queſtion, I know not : for if I ſhall ſay, As an Emperour, I ſhall forthwith be ſlaine by them which for that purpoſe haue me in hold : but if I ſay, As Anthonie the Monke, it ſhall be taken as the franke confeſſion B of mine eſtate, by them which haue craftily contriued mine ouerthrow ; as if I had not by hompulſion, but euen of mine owne free will put on this monaſticall habit, which God knoweth was neuer in my thought.

Hauing thus ſaid, he ſent them away without any other anſwer vnto their demand : but ſit-ting downe vpon his bed ſide, ſaid, My ſoule return againe into thy reſt, for the Lord hath dealt wel with thee: neither ſpoke any one word more in declaration of his griefe, his tongue there ſtaid by his ſingular wiſedome, or elſe with the greatnes of his griefe; & ſo againſt his wil in ſilence paſſing ouer his ſorrow, his mind with the greatnes of his woes ouercome, and as it were aſto-niſhed, before the humors gathered into the brain could be diſſolued into tears: for as the Sun ſending forth his moderat beames, draweth vnto it many exhalations and vapours, but caſting C the ſame forth more plentifully, doth with his immoderat heat conſume the ſame before they can be drawne vp, ſo the moderat affections of the mind may haue their griefes by words and tears expreſſed; but ſuch as exceed all meaſure, & with their vehemency as it were ouerthrow the mind, commonly make men to ſtand ſtill mute and ſilent, or if they ſpeake at all to ſpeake idly, & nothing to the purpoſe, as men beſide themſelues, or in an extaſie: but for the reſolution of the queſtion by the Biſhops demaunded, the deuout Patriarch decreed, That in the church-praiers he ſhould be remembred before the Emperor his nephew, by the name of the moſt religious & zealous Monke Anthonie: which was done (God wot) for no good zeale to the poore blind man, but the better to colour the matter with the common people, as if hee weary of the world, had voluntarily taken vpon him that ſilly profeſſion. Neuertheles, within D foure daies after, Synadenus, vnderſtanding them in euery place to whiſper among themſelues, & ſecretly to mutter againſt the hard dealing with the old Emperour, who had long raigned ouer them, & ſo by right was again to do, if his nephew ſhould chance to die, and that the Ec-cleſiaſticall laws enforced no man againſt his wil to enter into religious orders; he therewith enraged, ſent to him certain of his own confederacy, to exact of him an oath in writing, That he ſhould neuer more after that time, ſeek after the empire, or yet accept of the ſame if it were offred him, neither to ſubſtitute any other: which if he refuſed to do, to put him in feare of his life: and the more to terrifie him, ſet a guard of inſolent barbarous ſoldiers ouer him; for feare of whom, he yeelded to do whatſoeuer they required; and ſo his oath being ſolemnly conceiued into writing) another man leading his hand, becauſe he was blind) he ſigned the ſame with E a red croſſe aboue, & a blacke croſſe beneath, after the maner of the religious. Hauing thus liued in darknes diſgraced, ſhut vp in his chamber as a man forſaken of the world, with an vnſure guard euer to attend him, by the ſpace of two yeares, it fortuned that the 12. of February towards night (a day in the Greek church dedicated to the vigill of S. Anthony, whoſe name they had geuin him certain of his friends that were ſuffred to haue acceſſe vnto him, going as their manner was, once in three or foure days to viſit him (among whom was his daughter, ſomtime the Prince of Seruia his wife, but as then a widow, & Nicephorus Gregoras, author of this Hiſtory) he entred with them, as with his friends, into a familiar diſcourſe of many matters, wher-in he ſo deceiued the time, that it was paſt midnight before they perceiud how the time paſ-ſed. But the cocks crowing, he brake of the talke, & bidding them farewel, gaue them leaue to F depart, pleaſantly ſaying, that tomorrow they would make an end of their diſcourſe; who all thereupon took their leaue and departed, no ſigne of any ſicknes as then appearing vpon him: and after they were gon, called for meat & did eat: the meat he eat, was certain ſhel-fiſh, for it was with them a faſting day, & he had not eat any thing: after which, when as he ſhould haue drunk a cup of wine, for the comforting of his old ſtomack, & diſgeſting of that ſo hard meat,

The death of the old Emperour.

hee

he drunke could water, as his manner was, when he felt any inward heat, to drink the ſame immoderatly G: which hurtfull manner of diet he then vſing alſo, began by and by to feele a great paine in his ſtomack, and ſo preſently after became very ſicke, falling withall into a great looſneſſe of bodie, ſo that in the ſpace of one quarter of an houre he was glad oftentimes to ariſe, and to goe vnto an homely houſe of office in an inner chamber thereby to diſcharge natures burden; where after many euacations, ſitting downe vpon an homely bed faſt by, and not able to recouer his owne bed, hauing as then none to helpe him, there before it was day, died, aſ he had raigned 43 yeares. His death was by many ſtrange ſignes and accidents as it were foretold: firſt a great eclipſe of the Sunne appeared, iuſt ſo many daies before his death as he had liued yeares: and after that, another eclipſe of the Moone; and with it an earthquake, the day before he died at night, being S. Anthonie his euen, whoſe name his enemies had thruſt vpon H him: at which time alſo, the ſea with a great tempeſt riſing aboue the wonted bounds, made diuers breaches in the wals of the citie towards the ſea, as if it had been ſome violent enemie, and ouerflowed alſo diuers houſes in the citie. Many croſſes and pinacles were then alſo from the tops of churches and other high buildings ouerthrown; and with them a great pillar, ſomtime one of the ornaments of the city, ſtanding before the church, commonly called the church of the fortie martyrs; which being very high, and below burnt and worne away with time, had put many in feare as they paſſed by it, leſt it ſhould haue fallen vpon them; inſomuch that the Emperor vpon a time paſſing that way, was requeſted by ſome of the nobilitie there preſent, to ride farther off from it, for feare of falling vpon him: who ſmiling at their vaine feare, by chance anſwered, ô would to God I might liue ſo long as this pillar will ſtand: which now falling I out according to his ſpeech gaue many of them that had heard him ſo ſay, occaſion to maruel. His dead bodie was honorably buried in the monaſterie of Libe, which his mother Theodora the Empreſſe had not long before new built, and his obſequies there (after the manner of that time) yearely ſolemnly kept by the ſpace of nine dayes.

The Turks kingdome founded by Othoman in Aſia, at ſuch time as the Greeke Emperors were at variance betwixt themſelues in Europe.

Thus at length hauing paſſed through the troubled ſtate of the Greeke empire, during the long raigne of the old Emperor Andronicus, the conſiderat Reader may eaſily ſee the cauſes of the declining and ruine alſo of this famous empire; and how that the Greeke Emperors, troubled with their tempeſtuous affaires neerer home in Europe, yea in the very imperiall citie it ſelfe, and in their owne palaces, were not at leaſure to looke ouer the ſtrait into Aſia, but glad to leaue their territories there vnto the weak defence of themſelues. At which time, and euen K in the middeſt of the aforeſaid trouble, Othoman on the one ſide, with great induſtrie laid the foundation of his Empire in Phrygia and Bythinia, now the greateſt terror of the world: and then did thoſe things which we now haue of him written. The other Princes of the Turks alſo, the ſucceſſours of Sultan Aladin, at the ſame time on the other ſide, alongſt the Riuer Meander encroaching on as faſt: vntill that at laſt amongſt them they had thruſt the Greeke Emperours quite out of Aſia, and in fine became themſelues, together with the Greeke empire, a prey vnto the Othoman Kings, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall more at large appeare.

Pruſa yeelded vnto the Turkes.

But againe to returne vnto Othoman himſelfe, who all this while (that old Andronicus the Greeke Emperor was thus troubled) had with his ſonne Orchanes ſought by all means on euery L ſide to inlarge his kingdome: the garriſons by him left in the two late built caſtles neere vnto the great citie of Pruſa, vnder the charge of the two valiant captains Actemur and Balabanzuck (as is before declared) hauing now continued there certaine yeres, had by ſhutting vp the paſſages, and ſpoiling of the countrie, brought the city into ſuch diſtreſſe and penurie, that many of the citizens and other the poore Chriſtians fled into the citie, there died of famine. The reſt now out of all hope to be relieued by the Greeke Emperour, not then able to relieue himſelfe, came to compoſition with Orchanes (for Othoman was then ſicke of his old diſeaſe the gout) couenanting with him, that they might in ſafetie with life and libertie depart, and ſo much of their goods as they themſelues could carrie: and ſo yeelded to him the citie. Which conditions (as moſt write) were on the Turks behalfe well and faithfully performed: yet ſome M there be that report them to haue bin in moſt part by Orchanes broken. Thus was Pruſa, one of the greateſt cities of that part of Aſia, yeelded vnto the Turks, in the yere of our Lord 1327: and was afterwards by Orchanes made the royall ſeat of the Othoman Kings.

About this time, or very ſhortly after, Othoman in the eight & twentieth yere of his raigne dyed,

The death of Othoman. Othoman buried at Pruſa.

A died, at the age of 69, in the yeare of our Lord 1328, and lyeth buried at Pruſa, where his tombe is yet at this day to bee ſeene, in a certaine chappell of an old monaſterie in the caſtle, ſtanding in the midſt of the citie ; couered with a mantle of greene chamlet, and a little Tulipant or Turkiſh hat (ſuch as he vſed to wear) lying ouer his head, differing from thoſe which he Turkes now weare, eſpecially the better ſort of them, ſo great that they can therewith ſcarcely come in at a door. There is alſo another monument of him to be ſeene at Suguta, faſt by the Sepulchre of his father Ertogrul, there made by his ſonnes in remembrance of him ; whereof ſome haue reported him to haue bin there buried. Howbeit the Turks themſelues generally ſuppoſe the true monument wherein he is interred, to be at Pruſa, as is aforeſaid. He was wiſe, politicke, valiant, and fortunat, but full of diſſimulation, and ambitious aboue meaſure ; B not raſh in his attempts, and yet very reſolute ; what hee tooke in hand, he commonly brought to good effect : to all men he was bountifull and liberall, but eſpecially to his men of war, and the poore, whom he would many times feed and cloth with his owne hands. Of a poore lordſhip he left a great kingdome, hauing ſubdued a great part of the leſſer Aſia : and is worthily accounted the firſt founder of the Turks great kingdome and empire. Of him, the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors euer ſince haue beene called the Othoman Kings and Emperors, as lineally of him deſcended : and the Turks themſelues Oſmanidæ, as the people or ſubiects of Othoman, or Oſman, for ſo he is of the Turks commonly called.

NOte, that in the reckoning vp of certaine of the great Chriſtian Princes and Prelates of the ſame time, at the end of euery the Turkiſh Kings and Emperours liues, the firſt and greateſt number following their names, ſheweth the yeare of our Lord, wherein ſuch an Emperour, King, or Biſhop began to raigne, or ſit : and the number following, how long hee raigned or ſate : as for example, Andronicus the elder began to raigne in the Eaſt, in the yeare of grace 1282, and raigned 43 yeares : and ſo of the reſt. Wherein wee ſeeke not the exact computation vnto a moneth or day (as not much materiall to our Hiſtorie, or any part of our purpoſe) but onely the reaſonable view of the great Princes of the forepaſſed times, as they liued in ages together.

FLORVIT ANNO 1328 ✠ ORCHANES OTHOMANNI FI SECVNDVS TVRCARVM REX 1603

Suſcipit Orchanes defuncti ſceptra parentis: Maior vt ingenio, ſic magis arte valens.
Bithynos, Phrygiamque domat, Pruſamque ſuperbam:
Et populos late (Marte fauente) premit.
Sic latus tantis Aſiam turbaſſe ruinis; Tranſit in Europam, Callipolimque capit.
Rident interea Græci ſua damna: ſed ecce, Dum ſua contemnunt, in ſua fata ruunt.

Rich. Knollevs.

His father dead, Orchanes takes his ſcepter vp in hand;
As one of deeper wit and reach his foes for to withſtand.
The Phrygians and Bythinians he by force of armes brought low; Proud Pruſa, with faire Nicomede, and many cities moe.
And glad in Aſia to haue made ſuch hauocke and ſuch ſpoyle;
His forces into Europe ſends, the Grecians there to foyle.
Who meane while laughing at their loſſe, did make thereof a game;
Not thinking what a world of woe was to enſue the ſame.

THE LIFE OF ORCHANES, OR VRCHAN, SECOND KING OF THE TVRKES.

AFTER the death of Othoman, his two ſonnes, Orchanes (whom the Turks call Vrchan) and Aladin his brother, hauing with great ſolemnitie enterred their father at Pruſa, immediatly ſummoned a Parliament, whereunto both the brethren came accompanied with the chiefe of their nobilitie. This Parliament was called eſpecially, for the eſtabliſhing of the ſucceſſion in this new Kingdome, and for the diuiſion of Othomans treaſure and goods, betwixt them two, his ſonnes. But vpon view taken, there was no money, plate, or iewels found in the Kings coffers, for that he had in his life time moſt bountifully beſtowed it vpon his men of warre; ſo that all the wealth he left vnto them his ſonnes, was, the honourable remembrance of his life for them to imitate, large dominions for their poſſeſſions, ſtore of ready horſes and armour fit for ſeruice, with great heards of beaſts and cattel for houſhold prouiſion. Whereupon Orchanes demanded of his brother Aladin, what order he thought was beſt to be taken with thoſe things by their father ſo left? To whom Aladin anſwered, That it was moſt requiſit, firſt to eſtabliſh a King in their fathers kingdome, which like a good ſheepheard might gouerne and defend his ſubiects, rule and maintaine his men of warre, prouiding all things meet for defence of his kingdome: And that vnto him of right belonged all theſe other things by their father left, as the patrimonie of his ſucceſſour, for the common good and maintenance of his eſtate. As for mine owne part (ſaid Aladin) I claime no intereſt therein, you being my elder brother, and ſo vnto me in ſtead of a father: by whom alſo you haue bin theſe two yeares, as it were alreadie put in poſſeſſion of the kingdome, all things being committed to your gouernment, during the time of his late ſickneſſe. This modeſty of Aladin was greatly commended of all the antient counſellors, by meanes whereof, the kingdome in all peaceable manner deſcended to Orchanes. In regard of which courteſie, Orchanes would gladly haue made Aladin his brother Preſident of his counſell: which honor he would in no wiſe accept, but requeſted rather that hee would giue him the lordſhip of Fodore in Tekences countrey; waich Orchanes frankly granted. In which lordſhip of Fodore, Aladin moſt part liued a priuate and quiet life, and afterwards built two Mahometan churches, and an Abbey at Pruſa, there yet at this day to be ſeene.

The wealth that Othoman left vnto his two ſons, Orchanes and Aladine

Some Latine Hiſtoriographers otherwiſe report this beginning of Orchanes his raigne; as that Othoman ſhould haue three ſonnes, and that Orchanes the yongeſt obtained the kingdome by murthering of his other brethren. A practiſe of late much vſed amongſt the Turkiſh Princes, but not before the time of BaiaZet the firſt of that name, who firſt of the Turkiſh Monarchs embrued his hands with his brothers bloud: where before, they vſed all brotherly loue one to another, as the moſt probable hiſtories collected out of the Turks owne Chronicles affirme.

When that barbarous manner of murthering their brethren firſt began among the Turkiſh Sultans.

The citie of Nice with diuers other caſtles recouered from the Turks after the death of Othoman.

The Chriſtian Princes and captains, preſently vpon the death of Othoman recouered the citie of Nice, with diuers other caſtles and forts, out of the hands of the Turks: as it commonly chanceth, that dominions lately woon with great perill, are ſoone againe loſt, the conqueror dying before there be a firme gouernment eſtabliſhed. Amongſt other forts by the Chriſtians repoſſeſſed, the caſtle of Tzuprichiſer, ſcituate vpon the paſſages of the riuer Sangarius, moſt grieued the Turks, for thereby their paſſage into that part of Bythinia was much impeached. Wherefore Orchanes deſirous to recouer this caſtle, diſguiſed himſelfe with a few other of his beſt ſouldiers, in the apparell of Chriſtian marchants, and came to the caſtle, crauing leaue to paſſe as marchants: the warders of the caſtle verily ſuppoſing them by their attire to be marchants, opened the gates, and let them into the caſtle: who preſently drew their ſwords, ſlew the warders, and ſo by force poſſeſſed the caſtle, to the great benefit of the Turks, and the hurt of the poore Chriſtians yet left in the countrey of Bythinia. For they now hauing opened a way ouer the riuer Sangarius, and as it were broken down the ſtrongeſt defence of that ſide of the Greek empire, at their pleaſure forraged the countrey in ſuch ſort, as that the great city of Nice (for want of victuals to relieue ſo great a multitude as for feare of the Turks was fled out of the country into it) was brought to great extremitie and want. For the reliefe whereof, and for the repulſing againe of the Turks, Andronicus the young Emperor, who then all commanded, with ſuch an armb as he was then able to raiſe, paſſed himſelfe in perſon ouer the ſtrait of Conſtantinople, into Aſia: the greateſt ſtrength of his army conſiſting in two thouſand choice horſemen; the reſt as well horſe as foot, being for the moſt part artificers taken vp in the city, men altogether vnaquainted with armes (who in token of their cowardiſe, and that they were more mindful of flight than of fight, carried ouer with them almoſt as many long boats and ſuch other ſmall veſſels, as they were men, to be readie to receiue them at ſuch time as they ſhould flie) or elſe abiect raſcals, taken vp here and there, men of whom no great thing was to be expected, & of all others moſt vnfit for ſo great a prince (as was the Emperour) to commit the defence of his perſon and honor vnto. But Orchanes heating of his comming, ſent certain of his moſt expert captaines, to forelay the ſtrait paſſages of the country whereby the Emperor was to paſſe; following alſo himſelfe after with his army, of purpoſe to encounter the Emperor. Who in thre daies march after his landing in Aſia, being come to Philochrene, a little towne in Bythinia, and vnderſtanding that Orchanes hauing before taken the ſtraits, lay not far off encamped with his army; he there at Philochrene pitched his tents, and ſtaied that night alſo. But the next morning, the Sun as yet ſcarcely riſen, he ſeeing diuers companies of the Turks comming down from the mountains faſt by, put his armie into order of battell, and ſo ſet forward to meet them: where to begin the fight, the Turks archers freely beſtowd their piercing ſhot amongſt the Chriſtians, ſtill keeping themſelues aloofe off, ſo to doe the more harm. Which the Emperor miſtaking, and ſuppoſing that their keeping off to haue proceeded of feare, encouraged therwith, commanded certain looſe companies diſorderly to march forward, & to skirmiſh with them: which his more expert captains not liking, would haue otherwiſe perſuaded him, as to haue kept his ſtrength together againſt the danger of the battel. Neuertheles, ſuch was his youthfull heat, as that he could by no means be otherwiſe intreated, but that forward needs they muſt. But al the forenoon ſpent in this light and tumultuarie kind of skirmiſhing, and the Sun at the higheſt now ſhining very hot, Orchanes from the top of the mountains perceiuing the Chriſtians wel wearied with the heat of the day and long skirmiſhing, came down from the hils with a world of men following him; who with a moſt hideous cry, charged the Chriſtians on euery ſide, ſome a far off with their arrowes, and ſome hand to hand with their ſwords & other weapons: whoſe aſſault the Chriſtians at the firſt moſt valiantly receiued, and a great while right worthily defended themſelues, hauing wounded and ſlain a number of their enemies. Which hard fight was on both ſides couragiouſly maintained, vntil the approching of the night, with great ſlaughter on both ſides: at which time, the Chriſtians weary of the long fight, & oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies, diſorderly retiring toward their trenches, & hardly purſued by the Turks, receiued there a great loſſe, as wel of their horſmen, as of their foot: but by the comming on of the night, the battel was at length ended with vncertain victory. Among others there hurt, the Emperor himſelfe was wounded in the foot with an arrow. That night hapned a wofull miſhap, and a manifeſt token of God his wrath: for Orchanes hauing to his coſt made proofe of the ſtrength and valor of the Chri-

The Emperour wounded.

ſtians,

A ſtians, & doubting they would the next day come on further into the country, left three hundred horſemen as ſcouts, to attend the enemies remouing: and himſelfe with his army retired before hand to take aduantage of ſuch places as the Chriſtians were to paſſe by. But the Emperor in the euening leauing his campe, and going to Philocrene, a little town faſt by, the better to haue his wound dreſſed; the reſt of the armie vnderſtanding of his departure, and ſuppoſing him to haue fled for feare (as if Orchanes with a great armie would that night haue ſlain them all) fled themſelues alſo out of the campe, euery mothers ſon; ſome to their long boats and other little veſſels they had for that purpoſe brought ouer the ſtrait; ſome haſting toward the town gates, were by the multitude of others running headlong after them, ouerborne and trodden to death; other ſome hanging one at anothers taile, like a chain, got ſome part of them B vp to the top of the rampiers of the towne; other ſome drawne backe by them that hung vpon them, falling down together by heaps, and trod vpon by others, there periſhed; ſome (as is reported) died there for verie feare, no man either chaſing or hurting them, ſo weake is mans courage, when God withdraweth from him his ſtrength. But in the morning the Sun ariſing, the three hundred Turks left for ſcouts, perceiuing the flight of the Chriſtians, entred the forſaken campe, where they found horſes, armor, and emptie tents, yea the Emperours owne furniture, and his horſes ready ſadled: of all which, two hundred of theſe Turks tooke the ſpoile at their pleaſure, and the other hundred purſuing the diſperſed Chriſtians, like heartleſſe men wandring here and there, ſlew a great number of them. The Emperor himſelf ſeeing his armie thus (as it were by the hand of God) ouerthrown and diſperſed, tooke ſhipping alſo, and ſo returned to Conſtantinople. After whoſe departure, the Turkes ſeiſing vpon many ſea townes C alongſt the coaſt of Bythinia, & there ſeating themſelues, layd heauy tributes vpon the other country townes and villages; for the benefit whereof they ſpared to deſtroy them, together with the inhabitants, which they might at their pleaſure full eaſily haue done.

Now lay the great city of Nice in the ſuds, the enemie commanding all the country about it, liuing as ſicke men doe by hope, and holding out onely vpon hope of a thouſand horſemen which the Emperour (notwithſtanding his late diſcomfiture) had promiſed forthwith to ſend, there to lie in garriſon for the ſuppreſſing of the Turks. Of which aid ſo promiſed Orchanes vnderſtanding, furniſhed eight hundred of his horſemen after the manner of the Chriſtians; & fetching a great compaſſe about, came at length into the high way that leadeth from Con- D ſtantinople to Nice, and ſo trouped directly towards the city, as if they had come from Conſtantinople. At the ſame time he ſent 300 of his other horſemen in the habit of Turks, to forrage and ſpoyle the country as much as they could within the view of the city, now for want of victuals brought into great extremitie; which whileſt they were a doing, the other eight hundred horſemen in the attire of Chriſtians, following vpon them, as if it had bin by chance, charged them, and in the ſight of the citiſens put them to flight: which done, theſe counterfeit horſemen returned directly again towards Nice. The citiſens, which with great pleaſure had in the mean time from the wals ſeen the moſt part of the skirmiſh, and how they had put the Turks to flight, ſuppoſing them to be the Conſtantinopolitan horſemen, whom they dayly expected, with great ioy opened the gates of the city to receiue them as their friends. But E they being entred the gates, preſently ſet vpon the Chriſtians, fearing no ſuch matter: & being ſeconded with the other three hundred, which in diſſembling manner had fled before, & were now ſpeedily returned, bringing alſo with them other companies of Turkes, before laid in ſecret ambuſh not far off, they woon the great and famous city of Nice, which they haue euer ſince vntill this day poſſeſſed: the ſpoyle whereof was giuen vnto the ſouldiers for a prey, and the citiſens all lead away into miſerable captiuitie & thraldome. Whileſt Orchanes was thus buſied, his other captains did with great courage & ſucceſſe inlarge his dominions on al ſides, dayly incroching vpon their weake neighbors the Chriſtians. Cunger-Alpes one of his valiant captains, ſubdued the country of Mudurn, or Modrin, in Phrygia; and Bolli in Paphlagonia: appointing one Abdurachman a man of great valour, to gouerne the country. And at the ſame F time another of his old captaines called Accecozza, brought Candara in Paphlagonia, and Ermeni, a country neere vnto the mountain Horminius, into the Turkiſh ſubiection, placing garriſons in all the Caſtles and forts which he had woon, of whom ſome part of thoſe Countries was after his name called Cozza Ilini, that is to ſay, The old mans country. So that Orchanes his kingdom grew dayly greater & greater, as wel by the induſtry of his chieftains, as of himſelf.

The citie of Nice ſurpriſed by the Turks.

Abydus beſieged by the Turks.

About this time it fortuned, the captains ſonne of Scamandria (a town not far from the ruines of the antient city of Troy, & about a days journy from the renowned caſtle of Abydus) to depart out of this world: vnto whoſe funerals, being kept in the country, whileſt his woful father the captaine with his friends out of Scamandria reſorted, the old craftie Turke Accecozza lying always in wait, as a fox for his prey, ſuddenly ſet vpon thoſe heauie Chriſtians, wherof he ſlew the moſt part, and tooke the reſt priſoners. Amongſt whom he alſo tooke the Captain of Scamandria, with his caſtle and countrey: whom he afterwards led priſoner vnto the caſtle of Abydus, which is one of the moſt famous caſtles ſcituate vpon the ſea coaſt of Aſia, ouer againſt Seſtus in Europe; where the ſea of Helleſpontus by the narrow ſtrait falleth into the ſea of Ægeum: two caſtles much renowned by reaſon of their nigh ſcituation, and yet placed in diuers parts of the world, eterniſed alſo by the euer liuing wits of Poets, for the aduenturous paſſage of Leander ouer that fret of the ſea, to his loue Hero: which caſtles are now called Dardanelly. Accecozza hauing brought the captiue captaine of Scamandria (lately a man of great account in that country) ſo neere as he could vnto the caſtle of Abydus, offred to ſet him at libertie if they would ſurrender their Caſtle, otherwiſe they ſhould ſee him cruelly ſlain before their faces. Theſe Turkiſh threats nothing moued them of Abydus, more than to ſay, That they might if they would cut off his head, ſeeth him and eat him, but the caſtle they intended not to deliuer. The ſame captaine was afterward by the commandment of Orchanes profered to the Emperor of Conſtantinople to be redeemed, which he refuſed: yet at the laſt he was ranſomed by the gouernor of Nicomedia, and againe ſet at liberty. Accecozza of long time held the caſtle of Scamandria; yet ſo continually moleſted with the gariſon of Abydus, and men of war ſent from Conſtantinople, that he with his followers were glad for the moſt part to liue on horſebacke, to be always in more readines againſt the attempt of their enemies. The captain of the caſtle of Abydus had at that time a faire yong gentlewoman to his daughter, who (as ſhe ſaid) chanced to dream (what ſhe had happily waking for the moſt part wiſhed) That being fallen into a deep myrie ditch, out of which ſhe could by no means help her ſelfe, a luſtie yong gallant comming by, did not only help her out, but alſo in friendly manner made her cleane, and afterwards apparelled her in rich and coſtly attyre. The danger of this dreame much troubled the tender gentlewoman, but the image of the young gentleman was ſo well phantaſied in her brain, that waking, ſhe thought ſhe ſtill ſaw him, and ſleeping longed ſore for what ſhe ſaw not. Thus whileſt this yong gentlewoman with great deuotion entertained this imaginarie man, the old gray headed Turke Accecozza came, and with a ſtrong companie beſieged her fathers caſtle of Abydus. During which ſiege, this gentlewoman oftentimes went vp into the high turret of the caſtle, from whence ſhe might at pleaſure ſee the martiall deeds on both ſides, and take full view of all the enemies campe. But ſee the chance, as Abdurachman with great courage & no leſſe brauerie, approched neere to the ſiege of the caſtle, ſhe thought (vpon the firſt ſight of him) that he was the verie man whom ſhe had before dreamed of, and whoſe Idea was in her heart ſo deepely imprinted: wherefore ſhe fully reſolued to performe what ſhe had without witneſſe with her ſelfe determined. And waiting another time when Abdurachman approched the caſtle, ſhe caſt downe to his feet a letter written in Greeke, and made faſt vnto a ſtone: which letter he taking vp, deliuered the ſame to the general Accecozza. Wherein after ſhe had diſcouered her paſſionate affection, ſhee promiſed to deliuer the caſtle into Abdurachmans power, if the Turkes would raiſe their ſiege, and Abdurachman himſelfe with ſome few would ſecretly returne to the caſtle in the dead time of the night, and then follow her direction. Accecozza like an old foxe, which is ſeldome taken in the trap, gaue ſmall credit to theſe louing lines, for feare of treaſon; yet for ſo much as you are the man (ſaid hee to Abdurachman) whom ſhe vpon ſpeciall liking hath made choice of for the purpoſe, wil you aduenture your perſon? And he armed with a manly courage, a ſurer defence than any armor of proofe, incited alſo with hope of honour, riches, and beautie, all worthie prizes for martiall minds, ſaid he would vndertake the atchieuement of that exployt, if it were his pleaſure ſo. Whereupon Accecozza, becauſe nothing ſhould be ſuſpected by his ſudden departure, gaue a ſharpe aſſault to the caſtle, as if hee would haue taken it by fine force, yet in the end retyred, and preſently brake vp his ſiege, as deſpairing of the winning thereof. The Defendants of the Caſtle thinking themſelues deliuered of a great danger, greatly reioyced: and as in the like caſe it oftentimes falleth out, in their great jolitie ſurcharged themſelues that night with exceſſe

A exceſſe both of meat and drink. But Abdurachman at the time in the letter appointed,put him-ſelfe vpon the way with certaine ſelect ſouldiers, and about midnight came to the appointed place of the caſtle,where the yong gentlewoman was attending his comming: and hee by her means was conueyed into the caſtle, and ſo by her directed to the porters lodge; where hee ſlew the porter being faſt aſleepe,and opening the gates, let in his followers; which went directly to the captains lodging,and there took him priſoner,being before their comming ouer-taken with wine,and faſt aſleepe. Thus was the caſtle of Abydus ſurpriſed by the Turks,from whence they had a faire proſpect out of Aſia into Europe. The captaine with his faire daughter,and the greateſt part of the rich ſpoyle of the caſtle,was deliuered to Abdurachman, to be preſented to Orchanes at his court,then lying at Neapolis. Who wonderfull glad of ſo good B news,gaue the faire gentlewoman,with the greateſt part of the prey to Abdurachman. The po-ſteritie of this man (as they ſay) yet remaine among the Turkes. Amongſt others of the warlike captaines there was alſo one Cararachman,whoſe name was ſo dreadfull to them of Conſtantinople,that when their children cried,they would terrifie them to make them hold their peace,by ſaying,Cararachman comes. Not long after,the two valiant aforenamed worthy captains,Cunger-Alpes and Accecozza died. After whoſe death,Orchanes made his ſons,Solyman & Amurath,lords and gouernors of thoſe countries and prouinces. And intending(by the perſuaſion of Abdurachman)to beſiege Nicomedia,he leuied a great armie,wherewith he tooke di-uers ſmall caſtles and forts as he marched towards the citie. Nicomedia was at that time go-uerned by an honorable ladie, kinſwoman vnto Andronicus the Emperor of Conſtantinople: C but ſhe ſeeing her citie beſieged by the Turks,and doubting her own forces not to be able to hold out the ſiege, by a truſtie meſſenger offered to yeeld the city vnto Orchanes, vpon condition,That ſhe with ſo many citiſens as would,might in ſafetie depart with their liues,liberty, and goods: which being granted,ſhe with ſo many as would follow her, departed out of the citie by night,taking ſhipping for Conſtantinople.

Nicomedia yeelded vnto Orchanes.

Orchanes hauing taken Nicomedia,made his ſon Solyman gouernor of the ſame. The churches of the Chriſtians he conuerted vnto Turkiſh Meſchitas or temples. The greateſt church (being of wonderfull beauty) he couerted into a colledge or ſchoole, for the learned profeſ-ſors and ſtudents of Mahomets law,which is yet called in Nicomedia,Orchanes his ſchoole or colledge. And becauſe the Countrey neere vnto Nicomedia,lying vpon the ſea,was euer in D danger to be ſpoyled by the gallies of Conſtantinople,he placed in thoſe countries diuers of his moſt experienced ſoldiers to defend the ſame,appointing to euery of them poſſeſſions & penſions,according to their degrees and merit. After this,Orchanes by the councel of his brother Aladin,commanded all his men of war to weare white caps, thereby to be knowne from others,which commonly wore red. Such manner of caps the Ianizaries vſe at this day. The Turks alſo in Orchanes raigne,and long time after,vſed not to cut or ſhaue their beards,but did weare them long: ſo that if the King would diſgrace any man, hee would in his diſpleaſure command his beard to be cut or ſhauen. The maner of cutting and ſhauing their beards which they now vſe, they learned of the Italians; of whom they haue alſo borrowed many other faſhions,not only differing,but quite contrary to their antient manners & cuſtomes. Orchanes E about this time remoued his court to Nice,where hee lay a long time after. There he built a ſumptuous church,appointing a Preacher to preach to the people euery Friday: he erected in Nice alſo two faire abbies,in the one of which,he with his own hands ſerued the ſtrangers & poore the firſt dinner. He was the firſt that builded abbies or monaſteries among the Turks; whoſe example moſt of his ſucceſſors haue imitated,and is amongſt them vſed vnto this day.

Orchanes remoueth his Court to Nice.

The gouernment of Nicomedia Orchanes committed to his eldeſt ſon Solyman (as is before ſaid) a prince of great towardlineſſe; giuing him in great charge to haue a vigilant eye to the towns of Taraxa,Gouinuca,and Mudurne,which were nigh vnto Nicomedia,yet in poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians: all which townes, with the countries adioyning, Solyman in ſhort time got without force,by compoſition. This Solyman was of a princely diſpoſition,ſo tempring juſtice with clemencie in his gouernment,that many Chriſtians allured with his vertues, became of his religion,& gladly put themſelues vnder his ſubiection: the politicke lawes of the country he neither abrogated nor changed,but maintained as they had beene of antient time accuſtomed,whereby he greatly woon the hearts of the people. Amurath his younger ſonne, Or-chanes made lord and gouernour of Pruſa,after he had remooued his court to Nice. And the caſtle of Chara-chiſar, with the ſeigniorie thereto belonging, he gaue to his couſin Artemure, G the ſonne of his vncle Iundus.

Orchanes inuadeth the Countrey of Caraſina

There was at this time in Orchanes court a noble yong gentleman called Turſon-beg, the ſon of Dharaſis King of Charaſia; by whoſe perſuaſion Orchanes in perſon himſelfe with a ſtrong armie, made an expedition into that country: for that his fathers ſubiects after the death of the King his father, denied their obedience to his elder brother, wiſhing rather to haue Turſon for their ſoueraign. In whoſe behalfe Orchanes taking that journy, ſurpriſed by the way many caſtles and townes to his own vſe. Orchanes was no ſooner entred the countrey of Charaſia, but Turſons elder brother fled to Pergamum, whither the Turks ſhortly purſued him: where Turſon deſirous to ſpeake with his brother, vnwarily approching the city, was wounded with an arrow ſhot from the walls, and there ſlaine. With whoſe death Orchanes was ſo greatly offended, H that he threatned to deſtroy the whole country with fire and ſword, if they did not by a day prefixed, generally ſubmit themſelues to his mercie. The people terrified with this proclamation of ſo great a Prince alreadie in armes, yeelded themſelues vnto his ſubiection. The Kings ſonne alſo that was fled into Pergamum, vpon reaſonable conditions yeelded himſelfe vnto Orchanes, who ſent him to Pruſa, where after he had there liued two yeres, he died of the plague: after whoſe death Orchanes made his ſon Solyman Prince of Caraſina. Neither is this taking in of the country of Caraſina to be accounted a ſmal conqueſt; one of the greateſt houſes of the Turks the ſucceſſors of the Iconian Sultan Aladin, now thereby taking end, & their dominions (which were not ſmall, as containing almoſt Lydia, with ſome good parts of Miſia, Troas, and the leſſer Phrygia) now vnited vnto the Othoman kingdome. Orchanes vpon his returne, I for the good ſucceſſe of this journy, built a Church and Monaſterie at Pruſa, placing therein religious men, with all diligence ſought for out of all his kingdome: of which religious the Turks write many fables, better worth the ſmiling at, than the ſerious reporting. Hitherto the kingdome of Othoman and Orchanes his ſon, was contained within the bounds of the leſſer Aſia, which the Turks call Anatolia.

The countrey of Caraſina yeelded vnto Orchanes.

Now it reſteth to be ſhewed, vpon what occaſion Orchanes, or rather his ſon Solyman Baſſa, as it were fatally, with a ſmall power firſt paſſed ouer Helleſpontus into Europe; where they and their ſucceſſours haue by little and little ſo enlarged their dominions, that they haue now long ago quite ouerthrown the Grecian empire, with many other great kingdomes, and are at this preſent a terror to all Chriſtian Princes bordering vpon them: to the perpetuall infamie K of the Greekes, who for want of courage, and buſied with ciuil diſcord, neuer ſought in time to impeach their greatneſſe.

Orchanes hauing now ſo augmented his kingdome, that he might from many parts therof out of Aſia take view of the pleaſant borders of Europ, from whence he was excluded only by the narrow ſea of Helleſpontus; and continually incited with the inſatiable & reſtles deſire of ſoueraigntie, began to deuiſe how he might poſſibly paſſe that ſtrait ſea, and ſet foot into Europ another part of the world. Which his conceit one day he imparted to his ſon Solyman: who preſently anſwered his father, That if it would pleaſe him to giue him leaue, hee would not doubt to paſſe the ſtrait of Helleſpontus, & in time to plant the Mahometan religion in thoſe countries of Europe poſſeſſed by the Chriſtians. Which anſwer of Solyman much pleaſed his L father, who gaue him leaue to depart into his country, and in that matter to proceed further, as he thought beſt, & as occaſion ſhould beſt ſerue. Solyman taking leaue of his father, tooke his journy into Caraſina, where riding vp & down the country, as it had bin for his pleaſure only, he made his way to the place where it is thought the famous citie of Troy ſometime ſtood; where yet (as the Turks and ſome others ſay) are to be ſeen the wonderful ruins of that vnfortunate citie by the ſea ſide. In this place Solyman ſtood ſtill a great while, as it were in a ſtudie, forecaſting (as it ſeemed) ſome great matter, without ſpeaking one word to any of his followers. When one of his chieftains called Ezes-beg, to put him out of his deepe thoughts, boldly ſaid vnto him, My lord and great ſoueraign, what ſtrange thing is this, that you are ſo deepely drowned in theſe your melancholy thoughts? vndoubtedly it is ſome great matter that you M are ſtudying vpon. Truth it is, (ſaid Solyman) for I was thinking how it were poſſible to paſſe ouer this ſea of Helleſpontus into the borders of Europ, and to take view of that country, and ſo to returne vndiſcouered. If this be the matter, (ſaid Ezes-beg, ioyning vnto him one Fazil-beg, a man of no leſſe valour than himſelfe) wee two will by the power of God performe vnto you this enterpriſe. Then was Solyman deſirous to know of them, about what place they would paſſe ouer: which they well knowing the ſea coaſt, ſhewed him not far off. Wherefore Solyman giuing them leaue, they departed: and ſhortly after making a little boat, or rather as ſome ſuppoſe a raffe, paſſed ouer Helleſpontus by night, and arriued in Europe ſide, neere vnto a caſtle of the Turks, called Zemenic or Zembenic, but of the Greeks Coiridocaſtron, that is to ſay, The hogs caſtle, not farre from Seſtus: where going aſhore, they tooke priſoner a Greeke in a vineyard neere vnto the caſtle, whom they finding to be a good ſenſible fellow, without delay put him into their boat or raffe, and returning backe againe, preſented him to Solyman. This Chriſtian captiue Solyman entertained courteouſly, giuing him great gifts, & rich apparel, to diſcouer vnto him the eſtate of his countrey: and in fine, learned of him a means to take the caſtle Zembenic, before the Chriſtians ſhould thereof be aware. For atchieuement wherof, certaine boats were ſpeedily made ready by Solymans commandement, and he with eightie choſen ſoldiers eaſily paſſed ouer in them by night, with theit Chriſtian guid the Greeke: for in that place, the ſtrait betwixt Aſia and Europe, is not paſt an Italian mile ouer. This guid brought Solyman directly to the aforeſaid caſtle, where was a great dunghil, ſo high, that from the top thereof Solyman with his ſouldiers eaſily got into the caſtle, which they woon without any great reſiſtance; for it was then harueſt time, and moſt part of the people were in the vineyards, or treading out of their corne al night, as the vſe of thoſe countries is. Solyman thus poſſeſſed of the caſtle of Zembenic, vſed no extremity againſt the inhabitants therof, ſeeking rather by courteſie to gaine their good wils, than by extremitie to force them to his: yet ſuch gentlemen as he took, with ſome others alſo of the better ſort, he ſent by ſhipping into Aſia, and by the ſame ſhips returned ſouldiers as faſt as he could into Europe: ſo that he had in one day two hundred ſouldiers more brought ouer vnto him: and manning ſuch ſmal veſſels as he had left about the caſtle, ſent Ezes-beg alongſt the coaſt on Europe ſide, to burne ſuch ſhipping or veſſels as hee could find, leaſt the Chriſtians ſhould by them hinder his paſſage vpon the ſtrait of Helleſpontus. So in a few dayes Solyman had tranſported into Europe two thouſand good ſouldiers of the Turks, whom he ſo gouerned, that they did not in any violent ſort iniurie the vulgar Chriſtians, by reaſon whereof the common people began to like reaſonable well of the Turks, and to conuerſe with them without feare. This was the firſt comming ouer of the Turks into Europe, with purpoſe there to conquer and inhabit, vnder the fortune of the Othoman kings. For albeit that ſome of that nation had at ſundry times before come ouer, as men ſeeking after ſpoile, or otherwiſe ſent for, yea ſometimes by the Greek Emperors themſelues; yet neuer ſtaied they long, but hauing done what they came for, or els loſt themſelues, returned backe againe into Aſia; vntil that now conducted by Solyman, and poſſeſſed of the little caſtle of Zembenic (as is aforeſaid) they there tooke ſo faſt footing, as that they and their poſteritie after them, were neuer thence to be ſince that time remoued; but ſtil more and more encroching vpon the Chriſtians, haue vnto their Aſian kingdome ioyned a great part of Europe alſo, to the terrour of the reſt that yet remaineth, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall (if God will) at large appeare.

About two miles from Zembenic in Cherſoneſſus was another caſtle called Maito, or more truly Maditus, which Solyman alſo tooke: ſo that now hee had gotten two caſtles in Europe, both which he ſtrongly manned. After which time, the Turkes in great numbers came out of Aſia into Europe ouer that narrow ſtrait of Helleſpontus, to dwell in Cherſoneſſus: and Solyman inſtead of them, to make roome for his Turkes, ſent Chriſtians out of Europe to bee placed amongſt the Turkes in Aſia. The report of this comming ouer of the Turkes into Cherſoneſſus, and of the taking of the caſtle of Zembenic, carried in poſt to Conſtantinople, was ſufficient to haue ſtirred vp any prouident or carefull men, preſently to haue taken vp armes for the recouerie of the loſt caſtle, and the driuing out againe of the barbarous enemies out of Europe, before they had gathered any greater ſtrength, or ſetled themſelues in thoſe places: but ſuch was the careleſſe negligence and great ſecuritie of the proud Greekes, that inſtead thereof, they to extenuate the greatneſſe of the loſſe, commonly ſaid, That there was but a hogſtie loſt; alluding vnto the name of the caſtle: and vainely (as ſaid a graue father of their owne) ieaſting at that was not to be ieaſted at, and laughing at that was not to be laughed at but lamented for, as in few yeres it proued; their fooliſh laughter beeing not without good cauſe conuerted into moſt bitter teares.

The caſtle of Maditus taken by the Turks.

Callipolis taken by the Turks.

Solymans ſtrength ſo ſtil increaſing by the daily comming ouer of the Turks, he proceeded further to ſpoyle the country of Cherſoneſus, almoſt as far as Calipolis, diſtant from the caſtle Zembenic about two and twentie miles: after which pleaſant citie the proud Turk began now to long. Which the gouernor thereof perceiuing by the Turks continuall incroaching vpon him, raiſed what power he was able to make, and ſo went out againſt them; all the reſt of the Greeks in the mean time lying ſtill, as if they had bin aſleepe, or that the matter had not concerned them: but meeting the Turks, he was by them (after a great conflict) ouerthrown, and for ſafegard of his life glad to flie into his city: after whom the Turks following, ſpoiled the country round about, and in their returne, by plain force tooke the city, together with the caſtle alſo: which hapned in the yere of our Lord 1358. Where the madneſſe of the Greeks was againe more than before to be wondred at; for the newes of the loſſe of Callipolis beeing brought to Conſtantinople, the people there made ſmall account thereof, although it was indeed a right great loſſe, and much concerned the ſtate: but to extenuate the matter, when they had any talke therof, in jeſting wiſe commonly ſaid, That the Turks had but taken from them a pottle of wine. But by taking of ſuch hogſtyues and pottles of wine (as they termed it) the Turks in a few yeres after had gone ſo far in Thracia, that Amurath (the ſame Solymans nephew which now tooke from the Greeks the city of Callipolis) euen in the heart as it were of the Greeke Empire, placed his royall ſeat at Hadrianople: and immediately after him, Baiazet his ſonne (hauing ſubdued all the countrey euen to the walls of Conſtantinople) for certaine yeares layd hard ſiege vnto the Imperiall citie it ſelfe; and had no doubt then carried it, had not the great expedition of the mightie Tartar Prince Tamerlane (vnto Baiazet fatall) in the meane time happened: whereby (God ſo appointing it) the proſperous ſucceedings of the Turkes were for a ſpace well ſtayed, that they ſhould not before the time by him prefined, deuoure the reliques of the Greeke Empire. And it were to be wiſhed, that the Chriſtians of our time alſo (by their example warned) would at length awake out of their dead ſleepe: who of late hath loſt vnto the ſame enemie, not the caſtle of Zembenic, or the city of Callipolis, but whole kingdomes, as Hungarie and Cyprus, and are ſtill faire in the way: I ſay no more for griefe, and foreboding of euill fortune. But againe to our purpoſe: Solyman hauing made this proſperous entrance into Europe, and there got ſtrong footing, by ſpeedie meſſengers certified his father what he had done, and that it was expedient for him with all ſpeede to ſend vnto him a great ſupplie of men of warre, as well for the ſure defence and keeping of thoſe caſtles and forts by him alreadie gotten, as for the further inuaſion of the Countrey. This meſſage was wonderfull welcome vnto Orchanes, and whereas many families of the Saraſins at that preſent were come into the countrey of Caraſina, to poſſeſſe the dwellings and places of them, which in hope to better their eſtate were before gone ouer into Europe; all theſe Saraſins hee commaunded to paſſe ouer into Europe likewiſe: which they did accordingly, ſeating themſelues for a time in the country neere to Callipolis. In the meane time Solyman omitted no opportunitie to enter further into the country, winning ſmall forts and Holds, and ſtill peopling the ſame with his Turks. And on the other ſide, they of Caraſina paſſed ouer into Europe, placing themſelues as it were in a new world. For which cauſe, and for the great deſire they had to extend the Turkiſh Dominion and Religion, they refuſed no paines of warre: ſo that all things at that time proſpered with the Turks, and went backward with the Chriſtians.

In the time of theſe wars, not far from Callipolis was a little caſtle called Congere, the captain whereof was by a Greeke name called Calo Ioannes, a valiant and painfull man: this captain continually moleſted and troubled the Turkes which lay on that ſide of Callipolis, vnder the leading of Ezes-beg, many of whom he ſlew and tooke priſoners, as he could find them at any aduantage. Solyman much angred herewith, by craftie and ſecret eſpials learned a certaine time when he was gone out of his caſtle to do ſome exployt vpon the Turks. Whereupon he preſently ſo beſet the Caſtle with ſouldiers, that he could by no means returne thither, but he muſt firſt fall into their hands; and for more aſſurance placed others alſo in by-wayes, leſt he ſhould by any way eſcape. The Captaine ignorant of all this, proſecuted his enterpriſe, and hauing taken a Turke priſoner, thinking to returne to his caſtle, was haſtily purſued by Fazil-beg; for which cauſe making the more haſte, hee ſuddenly fell into the danger of the Turks layd in ambuſh: where his men were all ſlaine, and himſelfe taken and brought before his own caſtle, and had there his head preſently ſtrucke off: whereupon the caſtle was forthwith by them that were therein (hauing now loſt their captaine) ſurrendred, and Chazi Ili Beg, a valiant captaine of the Turks, placed therein: who from thence neuer ceaſed to trouble the country, euen to the walls of Didymotichum, as did Solyman alſo out of Callipolis.

Thus in the ſpace of one yere the Turks got ſtrong footing in Europe, poſſeſſing diuers Caſtles and towns, with the country about them, which Solyman gaue in reward vnto his captains and ſoldiers, as appeareth by the graues and tombes of Ezes-beg and Fazil-beg, the two which firſt came ouer into Europe, which are there yet well knowne.

The death of Solyman Baſſa, Orchanes his eldeſt ſonne.

The death of Orchanes.

About this time it fortuned, that as this martial Prince Solyman was for his diſport hawking in the fields of Bolayre on Europe ſide, galloping in to his faulcon, was with his horſe ouerthrowne in a ditch, of which fall hee being ſore bruiſed, ſhortly after died. The newes of his death being brought to Orchanes his father, gaue vnto him (then beeing ſicke) iuſt occaſion of great ſorrow: ſo that within two months after he died alſo, being foureſcore yeres old, when he had raigned thereof 31 yeres, and died about the yere of our Lord 1359. Some hiſtories report otherwiſe, both of his death, and of the time wherein hee liued: as that hee ſhould be ſlaine in a battell againſt the Tartars: or as others write, with an arrow at the ſiege of Pruſa, in the yere of our Lord 1349. But Ioannes Leunclauius in his hiſtorie collected out of the Turkes owne chronicles (whom we follow as moſt probable) reporteth it as before.

This Orchanes was wiſe, curteous, and bountiful, more ingenious than his father in deuiſing warlike engins. He built diuers princely Churches, Abbies, Colledges, and Cels, and was in his ſuperſtitious religion verie zealous: in ſo much that hee appointed penſions to all ſuch as could in the Church ſay the book of Mahomets law by heart: and appointed competent maintenance for all Iudges of his Courts, becauſe they ſhould not take any thing in reward of his ſubiects, for the peruerting of iuſtice. He greatly inlarged his kingdome in Aſia, and not content to be incloſed with the ſeas of Euxinum & Helleſpontus, ſet faſt footing in Europ, which ſome attribute to his ſonne Amurath. He was to the Chriſtians always a moſt mortal enemy, and ſo died.

1350 ✠ AMVRATHES PRIMVS TERTIVS TVRCARVM REX FLORVIT AN 1603

Scæuus Amurathes, animo dum maxima verſat: Diſcordes Græcos ſternere Marte parat.
Totus & intentus fines extendere regni: Europam penetrans, obuia quæque rapit.
Atoniti trepidant, nimia formidine Thraces:
In medio quorum, ſceptra ſuperba locat.
Hinc Mæſos premit ille feros, miſerumque Dynaſten* Coſſoni in campis, obruit atque necat.
Sed non longa fuit ſceleris tam dira voluptas:
A ſeruo cæſus, concidit enſe ferox.

Rich. Knollivs.

Whileſt Amurath in his deepe thoughts, of greatneſſe plots the ground:
The wrangling Greekes by force of armes he ſeekes how to confound.
And wholly bent for to extend his kingdome, with his power, Piercing the confines of Europe, doth what he meets deuoure.
As men diſmaid, the Thracians quake, to ſee their foule diſgrace: Amiddeſt whom, the tyrant ſtout his ſcepter proud doth place.
The fierce Bulgarians he did meet, and in the field ſubdue:
And in Coſſou'as fatall plaines, the wofull Deſpot ſlue.
But long is not the wickeds ioy, which they in miſchiefe take:
Stab'd by a ſlaue, the wretch his end in that ſame place did make.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THIRD KING OF THE TVRKS, AND THE GREAT AVGMENTOR OF THEIR KINGDOME.

Amurath ſucceedeth his father Orchanes in the Turkiſh kingdome.

AMurath the younger ſonne of Orchanes ſucceeded his father in the Turkiſh kingdome, his elder brother Solyman being dead a little before his father. This Amurath with greater zeale than any one of the Turkiſh Kings aduanced the Mahometan religion, and had therein wonderfull ſucceſſe. In the beginning of his raigne, he gathered a great armie out of all parts of his kingdome, to Pruſa; purpoſing to paſſe ouer Helleſpontus, to inuade the Chriſtians in Thracia. But vnderſtanding, that the other Mahometan Princes in Aſia had combined themſelues againſt him, he was thereby inforced to leaue his former determination for Europe, and to turne his forces vpon them. In which warres hee mightily preuailed againſt them, and returned with victorie to Pruſa. But hauing ſo ſubdued thoſe confederate Princes, hee the next yeare after proſecuted his warres before intended againſt the Chriſtians in Europe. For which purpoſe hauing leuied a ſtrong armie in Aſia, he paſſed ouer to Callipolis, accompanied with his tutor, whom the Turkes call Lala Schahin: whoſe graue aduice and counſell hee moſt followed in all his waightie affaires, beeing at that time one of his chiefe counſellors. From Callipolis hee marched to the caſtle of Benutum, which was by compoſition yeelded vnto him. From thence he went to Tzurulus, where the Chriſtians gaue him a ſharpe encounter: but in the end he woon the towne, and carried away the victorie. And ſo proceeding farther, tooke diuers other ſmall caſtles and townes in that part of Thracia, which of the antient Romane colonies was then called Romania, and now of the Turkes Rumilia, namely Meſine, Burgos, and others; whereof ſome he vtterly raſed, and into the reſt put ſtrong garriſons. At this time alſo, Chaſi-Ilbeg and Eurenoſes, two of his moſt valiant captaines, tooke certaine forts ſtanding vpon the Riuer Meritza, in antient time called Hebrus: whereby they much troubled the inhabitants of the countrey thereabouts. Wherewith the captaine of Didymotichum offended, gathered his ſouldiers together, intending to haue intercepted the great captaine Chaſi-Ilbeg: in which attempt he loſt moſt of his followers, and was himſelfe there taken priſoner. For whoſe ranſome and certaine other conditions, the citizens of Didymotichum yeelded the citie vnto the Turkes.

Didymoticum yeelded vnto the Turks.

Shortly after, Amurath ſent his tutor Lala Schahin to beſiege Hadrianople, now called Andrianople, but in ancient time Oreſtias: of whoſe comming the Chriſtians hearing, encountred him vpon the way, and fought with him a great battell, wherein many were on both ſides loſt: but in the end the Chriſtians being put to the worſt, retired againe to the citie. Of this victorie Schahin ſent news vnto Amurath, with certaine of the heads of the ſlaine Chriſtians: who therupon ſending Chaſis and Eurenoſes before, he himſelfe with a great army followed after to the ſiege of Hadrianople: of whoſe comming, the gouernor of Hadrianople vnderſtanding, fled ſecretly out of the citie by night to Ænus. The citizens ſeeing themſelues ſo forſaken of their gouernour, yeelded their citie vnto Amurath, in the yeare of our Lord 1362.

Hadrianople yeelded vnto the Turks.

The taking of theſe ſtrong cities in Thracia, eſpecially of Didymotichum and Hadrianople, is (by ſome of the Turks owne Hiſtories) otherwiſe reported: which, becauſe it is neither improbable nor diſagreeing from the ſubtil dealings of the Truks, & of themſelues alſo receiued, I haue thought good to ſet downe as their owne Hiſtoriographers report the ſame.

The Turkiſh King Amurath had (as they ſay, and as truth was) in the beginning of his raigne concluded a peace with the Chriſtians of Thracia: during which peace, the gouernor of Didymotichum intending to fortifie his city with new and ſtronger fortifications againſt the aſſaults of the Turks, entertained all the maſons, carpenters, and other workemen he could by any meanes get: which Amurath vnderſtanding, ſecretly cauſed two hundred good and luſtie workemen and labourers to come out of Aſia, to offer their ſeruice vnto the gouernour, who gladly entertained them, vſing their help in that his great and haſtie worke. Which thing ſome of the wiſer ſort of the citizens diſliking, wiſhed the gouernor to beware of thoſe Aſian workmen, as by them ſuſpected. But he preſuming vpon the peace made with Amurath, and conſidering they were but baſe workemen and no ſoldiers, had the leſſe care of them: neuertheles (vſing their worke all day) he commanded them to lodge without the wals of the citie euery night. Amurath vnderſtanding that theſe workemen were thus by the gouernor entertained, ſent for the valiant captaine Chaſis-Ilbeg, and requeſted him with thirtie other good ſouldiers diſguiſed as poore labourers, to goe to Didymotichum to ſeeke for worke, and in doing therof to eſpie if any opportunitie might be fonnd for the ſurpriſing of the citie. Chaſis with theſe thirtie according to Amurath his direction, comming as poore men lacking worke, found entertainment at Didymotichum, where they carried ſtones, morter, and ſuch like things, euer ſhewing themſelues very diligent in their worke: Chaſis with vigilent eye ſtill awaiting what might beſt ſerue his turne for the ſurpriſing of the citie. When night was come, the Turkiſh workemen and labourers after their accuſtomed manner, and as they were by the gouernour appointed, went out of the citie into the ſuburbs to their lodgings: from whence Chaſis ſecretly departing in the night, came to Amurath and ſhewed him how one of the gates of the citie might vpon the ſudden be taken, if it would pleaſe him to place a ſufficient number of Turks in ambuſh neere vnto the citie, to ioyne with him and the other Turkiſh labourers when occaſion ſhould ſerue. Which being reſolued vpon, Amurath ſent him backe againe to put this his deuice in execution: So Chaſis returning to Didymotichum, brake the matter to ſo many of the Aſian workemen as he thought conuenient, fully inſtructing them what was to bee done. The next day (according to his appointment) the Chriſtians being then at dinner, theſe Turkiſh workemen and labourers fell at words among themſelues, and from words to fained blowes: in which counterfeit brawle and tumult, they ſuddenly ran to one of the gates of the citie faſt by (as was before appointed) and there laying hands vpon the warders weapons, as if it had beene to defend themſelues againſt their fellowes, ſuddenly ſet vpon thoſe warders, being in number but few, and then at dinner alſo, and ſo preſently ſlew them: which done, they opened the gate of the citie, and let in the other Turks which lay in wait not farre off: who with great celeritie entring the citie, preſently tooke the ſame, and there put the chiefeſt of their citizens to the ſword, ſparing the reſt of the meaner ſort.

Rhodeſtum ſurpriſed by the Turks.

The citie of Rhodeſtum (of the old writers called Rhœdeſtum) was by Amurath his commandement, in this time of peace, by ſudden aſſault giuen in the night by the Lord Eurenoſes, taken alſo.

With this foule dealing & breach of league, yet in force, the Chriſtians hardly charged Amurath; who turned it ouer to the vnrulines of his captains and men of war, whom he threatned with great ſeuerity to puniſh: & to giue the better color that it was done without his priuity, he had fained himſelf ſick al the while theſe things were in doing: but being requeſted to reſtore thoſe cities ſo wrongfuly taken from the Chriſtians, he vtterly refuſed ſo to do, ſaying That it was againſt the law of his great Prophet Mahomet, to deliuer againe to the Chriſtians, any towne or citie wherein the Mahometan religion had bin once openly taught. Whereupon wars began again to ariſe on freſh betwixt the Chriſtians and him, wherein ſometime the one preuailed, and ſometime the other: in ſuch ſort, as that thoſe warres at length became vnto them both very tedious. Wherefore Amurath made peace againe with the Chriſtians of Hadrianople, Selybria, and Conſtantinople: yet deſiring nothing more in heart, than to take the citie of Hadrianople: which the better to bring to paſſe, hee cauſed Chaſis-Ilbeg as a diſcontented captaine to flie to Hadrianople, pretendiug himſelfe to haue beene hardly vſed by the tyrant his maſter: where hauing in his company other ſuch diſſembling fugitiues as was himſelfe, he oftentimes iſſued out of the citie and valiantly skirmiſhed with the Turks, which ſo greatly pleaſed the gouernour of Hadrianople, that he thereby grew into his great fauour. Many other Turkes alſo vnder pretence of like diſcontentment, reſorted vnto Chaſis: wherewith finding himſelfe well ſtrengthned, he writ letters ſecretly vnto Amurath, That he would deliuer one of the gates of Hadrianople vnto him at a certaine appointed time, if hee would againſt the ſame time be readie to ſend him preſent ſuccors. Al things being agreed vpon, Chaſis at the appointed time came in the dawning of the day to one of the gates of the city, accompanied but with ten of his followers, as if he would haue gone forth to hunt, as he had before accuſtomed. But ſo ſoone as the gates were opened, he with the other ten well appointed for the purpoſe, furiouſly ſet vpon the warders, whom they ſlew; and being aided by the reſt of the fugitiue Turks (which with all ſpeed by appointment before made, reſorted vnto them) they poſſeſſed the gate; vntill a great power of the Turks, whom Amurath the night before had placed in ambuſh neere vnto the city, hauing knowledge what was done, and hearing the alarme, ſpeedily came on, and by that gate entred the citie: where was fought a cruell fight all that day, euen from morning vntill night. But in the end the Turks preuailing, tooke the citie, which they haue euer ſince poſſeſſed vnto this day.

These great cities of Thracia thus taken, or otherwiſe as aforeſaid (for that I leaue for the Reader to thinke of as he pleaſeth) Amurath appointed the ſeat of his royall court at Hadrianople, as a place of all others moſt fit for the further inuaſion of the Chriſtians, and inlarging of his kingdome in Europe: from whence ſuch a world of miſchiefs and woe hath ſince that time ouerflowed a great part of Chriſtendome, & drowned ſo many goodly kingdoms in Europe, as that both they, and moſt part of the reſt that yet remain (daily in dread of like deſtruction) might iuſtly accurſe and deteſt the wofull careleſneſſe and degenerate cowardiſe of the Greeks, were not they themſelues together with the glorie of their church and empire, ſwallowed vp in the ſame gulfe of calamity & wo, and ſo become of al others moſt miſerable: but what auail vain complaints, but to increaſe old griefs? wherfore again to that we haue in hand

Hadrianople the royal ſeat of the Turkiſh kings in Europe

The proud Sultan Amurath (hauing to his great content thus ſeated himſelfe at Hadrianople, in the middeſt of Thracia) preſently ſent out his tutor Lala Schahin with a great power to inuade the countrey about Philippopolis with the countrey of Zagora, which lyeth towards the great mountain Hœmus, where the beſt Turkiſh Scimitars were made; giuing like charge vnto Eurenoſes, for the ſubduing of the territorie of Ipſala; who both notably performed what he had commanded, and in ſhort time brought all thoſe countries vnder his ſubiection, wherein he ſhortly after placed diuers ſanzacks or gouernours, for the better aſſurance thereof, being ſo lately gained.

About this time (by the ſuggeſtion of Cara Ruſtemes a doctor of the Mahometan law) Zinderlu Chelil, then Cadeleſher or chiefe Iuſtice among the Turks, but afterwards better knowne by the name of Catradin Baſſa, by the commandement of Amurath, took order, hat euery fifth captiue of the Chriſtians, being aboue ſifteen yeres old, ſhould be taken vp for the King, as by law due vnto him: and if the number were vnder fiue, then to pay to the King for euery head 25 aſpers, by way of tribute: apointing officers for collecting both of ſuch captiues and tribute mony, of whom the aforeſaid Cara Ruſtemes himſelf was chief, as firſt deuiſer of the matter. By which means great numbers of Chriſtiā youths were brought to the court as the kings captiues, which by the counſell of the ſame Zinderlu Chelil, were diſtributed among the Turkiſh husbandmen in Aſia, there to learn the Turkiſh language, religion, & maners: where after they had bin brought vp in all painfull labour and trauell by the ſpace of two or three yeares, they were called vnto the court, & choice made of the better ſort of them to attend vpon the perſon of the prince, or to ſerue him in his wars: where they daily practiſing all feats of actiuity, are called by the name of Ianizars (that is to ſay, new ſoldiers.) This was the firſt beginning of the Ianizars vnder this Sultan Amurath the firſt, but had great increaſe vnder Amurath the ſecond, inſomuch that Iouius with ſome other Hiſtoriographers, attribute the beginning of this order to him: which neuertheles (as appeareth by the Turks own hiſtories) had the beginning as is aforeſaid; & hath euer ſince bin continued by the Turkiſh kings & emperors, by the ſame and ſome other greater means; ſo that in proceſſe of time they be grown to that greatnes as that they are oftentimes right dreadful to the great Turke himſelfe: after whoſe death they haue ſomtimes preferred to the empire ſuch of the Emperors ſons as they beſt liked, without reſpect of prerogatiue of age, contrary to the wil of the great Sultan himſelf; & are at this day the greateſt ſtrength of the Turkiſh empire, and not vnlike in time to be the greateſt cauſe of the ruin thereof: the finger of the Higheſt oftentimes (as wee haue before ſaid) turning euen thoſe helps which were by mans wiſedome prouided for the eſtabliſhing of kingdomes, vnto their more ſpeedie deſtruction: and eſpecially theſe continuall garriſons of martiall men, no leſſe to be feared than truſted, as in the courſe of this Hiſtorie may appeare.

When Amurath had thus a great while continued at Hadrianople, determining now to returne vnto Aſia, hee made Schahin his tutor Beg-Lerbeg or viceroy of Romania; and Eurenoſes lord gouernor of the marches; Zinderlu Chelil he made Vezir Azemes or lord preſident of his counſell, and changing his name, called him Cairadin Baſſa, that is to ſay, The Baſſa that had wel deſerued, his name witneſſing his good deſert. After this he returned into Aſia, where he ſpent that winter at Pruſa. Theſe two great men Cairadin Baſſa and Cara Ruſtemes before named, ſometimes two doctors of the Mahometan law, were (as the Turkiſh Hiſtories report) the firſt that corrupted the Turkiſh court with couetouſneſſe and briberie, and are therefore of them euen yet much blamed.

Whileſt Amurath thus wintred in Aſia, news was brought vnto him, That the Chriſtians of Seruia and Bulgaria had gathered a great armie for the beſieging of Hadrianople: which cauſed him to prepare great forces in Aſia, to aid his captaines in Europe. But in returning out of Aſia, he by the way tooke the towne of Boga; where he put to ſword all the Chriſtians that were therein able to beare armes, leading the reſt into captiuitie, and with the ſpoile rewarded his ſouldiers. This ſtrong towne was not long after againe recouered by the Chriſtians, who requited the Turkes with like meaſure, and doubting the keeping thereof, raſed it downe to the ground: yet was it afterwards reedified by the Turks, as it is at this preſent to be ſeene: which was done in the yeare of our Lord 1365.

Boga taken by Amurath and recouered again and raſed by the Chriſtians.

Boga new built by the Turks.

In the meane time, the Chriſtian armie of Seruia and Bulgaria, in number betwixt fortie and fiftie thouſand, marching towards Hadrianople, and now come very neere the ſame, fel in mutinie among themſelues. Whereof the Turks by their eſpials hauing intelligence, ſuddenly in the night ſet vpon them: who blinded with inward hatred, and no leſſe fearing one another, than their enemies, neglected to ioyne their forces againſt them, but were readie to turn their weapons one vpon another; and ſo by their owne diſcord, more than by the enemies force, were made a prey to the Turkes, by whom they were put to flight, and ſlaine with ſo great a ſlaughter, that the place wherein they fell, not far from Germia, is thereof at this day called Zirf-Zindugi, that is to ſay, the place wherein the Seruians were ouerthrown. The news of this ſo notable a victorie, with the fift part of the ſpoile, & a great number of the heads of the ſlaine Chriſtians, were (after the barbarous manner of the Turks) ſent to Amurath into Aſia, being now readie with a great power to haue come ouer to Callipolis: who ioyful therof, and glad to ſee ſuch a preſent, the aſſured witneſſe of the victorie, returned againe to Pruſa. This was done in the yeare 1366. In which yeare alſo Amurath with wonderfull triumph circumciſed his two ſons, BaiaZet, & Iacup. At which time he alſo built a temple, with a monaſtery & a colledge, at Bilezuga: & another faire church at Neapolis: at Pruſa he alſo built a ſtatly pallace in the caſtle, with a great church at the gates thereof: in which citie he alſo founded an abbey and a colledge. Germean Ogli, a great Mahometan prince in Aſia (whoſe territorie for the moſt part lay in the greater Phrygia, and the countries thereabout, bordering vpon the Othoman kingdome) hauing alwaies enuied at the riſing of the Othoman kings (as did al the reſt of the Mahometan princes of the SelZuccian familie) and fearing that their greatnes might after his death grow dangerous to his ſon Iacup, being now himſelfe very aged, thought good for the more ſafetie of his ſtate to ioyn in alliance with Amurath. And for that purpoſe ſent Iſaac (a learned doctor of the Mahometan law) embaſſador to him, with many rich preſents, & to offer his daughter, the Lady Hatun, in marriage vnto his ſon Baiazet: promiſing with her in dowrie diuers great cities and townes, with their territories in Phrygia and Bythinia, adioyning vpon the Othoman kingdom; namely Cutaie, Simau, Egregios, Tauſanle, & others. Neither was this a ſmall dowrie, but well beſeeming ſo great a prince: the citie of Cutaie being at this day the place whereat the Turkiſh emperors great lieutenant or viceroy in Aſia is alwaies reſiant, as in the heart of his kingdome in the leſſer Aſia. Of which match ſo offered, Amurath liking well, contracted his ſon Baiazet vnto the ſaid ladie: and for ſolemniation of the mariage, prepared al things with great magnificence, ſending his embaſſadors to moſt of the Mahometanc kings and princes both far and neere,to inuite them thereunto:commanding alſo moſt of the nobilitie of his kingdome,to honor the ſame with their preſence. The time of this marriage drawing neere,Embaſſadors came to Amuraths court,from all the Princes before inuited: amongſt whom,the Embaſſador from the Ægyptian Sultan had the higheſt place. Theſe Embaſſadors brought with them many great and rich gifts,ſuch as well beſeemed the great princes their maſters,which they with all reuerence preſented vnto Amurath. At length amongſt the reſt of his own nobilitie came the lord Eurenoſes, whom he had before left gonernour of the frontiers of his kingdome in Europe: who beſides many other rich gifts not eaſily to be valued,preſented vnto Amurath a hundred goodly boyes, with as many beautifull yong maidens,all Chriſtian captiues,ſutably attired in garments richly embroidred with gold & ſiluer, euery one of them carrying a cup of gold in the one hand,and a cup of ſiluer in the other; the cups of gold hauing in them diuers precious ſtones of great value,and the cups of ſiluer being filled with gold. The richnes of this preſent was ſo great,that all the embaſſadors of the forrein princes much wondred thereat. All which rich gift Amurath moſt bountifully beſtowed vpon the ſtrange Embaſſadors; and the Preſents which were ſent vnto him from other princes,he liberally gaue to Eurenoſes. The learned and religious which came to that marriage he ſo bountifully rewarded alſo,that none came to the ſame poore, but hee went away rich. He had before ſent diuers of his nobilitie, with an hundred ladies and gentlemen, and a guard of three thouſand horſemen,to attend the comming of the bride. On the other ſide,the old prince Germean-Ogli meeting this honorable companie vpon the way,ſaluted euery man of account according to his degree: and bringing them to one of his cities, in moſt royall manner feaſted them, beſtowing vpon them many rich and princely gifts: all which things with great ſolemnitie performed,he deliuered his daughter the bride to two of the moſt antient ladies,wherof the one had bin Baiazets nurſe; and ſo taking leaue of his daughter,ſent her away,accompanied with his wife Ienſes,and other of his courtiers: who conueying her to Pruſa, ſhe was there in moſt royal manner married to Baiazet. The cities and townes promiſed in dowrie,were accordingly deliuered into the poſſeſſion of Amurath,who ſhortly after tooke poſſeſſion of the ſame,and furniſhed them with his own garriſons.

At this marriage Chuſen-Beg prince of Amiſum in Galatia,by his Embaſſador ſold his territorie of Amiſum vnto Amurath,with many faire cities & towns; doubting,as it was thought, how to be able to keepe them,now that Amurath was come ſo neere him,whom hee ſaw not to let ſlip any occaſion offered vnto him for the inlarging of his kingdome. When Amurath had in this ſort ſpent great time in Aſia,he gathered a ſtrong armie to returne into Europe: but before his departure,he committed the gouernment of his kingdom in Aſia (which the Turks call Anatolia) vnto his ſonne BaiaZet, ioyning with him Temurtaſes a valiant man of great experience: and hauing ſet all things in order in Aſia, paſſed ouer Helleſpontus, to Callipolis; from whence he marched towards Hadrianople: and becauſe he would take ſomething in his way,he beſieged Magalgara,which he in ſhort time woon: where Lala Schabin and Eurenoſes with all their forces came to him; which two captaines hee ſent to beſiege the citie Pherœ, which was by them after a few days ſiege taken. But he himſelfe to be reuenged vpon Lazarus the Deſpot,led his armie into Seruia: where after he had without reſiſtance forraged the countrey fourteene days,vnderſtanding by his captaines, That the ſtrong citie of Niſſa,being the metropoliticall citie of Seruia,was as it were the key of that kingdome,he preſently marched thither,and layd ſiege to the ſame; and by the aduice of Iaxis-Beg the ſonne of Temurtaſes,in ſhort time woon it. Which thing ſo daunted Lazarus Deſpot or Lord of Seruia,that he diſpairing in his own forces,hauing ſo ſoon loſt one of his ſtrongeſt cities,forthwith ſent Embaſſadours to Amurath to intreat a peace; offering to pay him a yearely tribute of fifty thouſand pounds,and to aid him with a thouſand men in his warres,whenſoeuer he ſhould require: vpon which conditions Amurath granted him peace, and ſo departed out of Seruia. In this expedition hee alſo with much adoo woon the great Citie of Appolonia, neere vnto the mount Athos,and gaue leaue vnto moſt of the Chriſtians, with their wiues and childeren to depart, and ſuch part of their goods as was not in the taking thereof ſpoyled by the ſoldiers. This done,he returned backe to Hadrianople, leauing Eurenoſes vpon the marches, who ſhortly after tooke Berrhea, with diuers other towns. At which time alſo Lala Schabin woon Zichne and Seres,in the confines of Macedonia, with many other ſtrong towns vpon the frontiers of Theſſalia and Thrace. In the Citie Seres Eurenoſes made his abode, as in a chiefe frontier town: and becauſe the Chriſtians for feare of the Turks were all fled out of the country about Seres, great numbers of people were ſent for out of Aſia, to inhabit that country by the Chriſtians forſaken in the confines of Macedonia. Amurath had not long continued at Hadrianople, but that he was aduertiſed out of Aſia, That Aladin his ſon in law king of Caramania, did with fire and ſword inuade his dominions in Aſia: with which news he was exceedingly troubled. And for that cauſe ſending for his councellors and nobility to the court, told them, how that Aladin forgetting all the bonds of religion, faith, peace, and alliance, with all hoſtility inuaded his prouinces in Aſia, whileſt he with great danger of his perſon, and greater terrour of his enemies, ſought with honour to increaſe the Mahometan ſincere religon (as he termed it) in Europe: from which godly war (ſaid he) I am againſt my will enforced to turn my ſword, in iuſt defence of my ſelfe, againſt men ioyned with vs both in religion and alliance. And hauing thus declared his mind, he appointed Chairadin Baſſa his lieutenant generall in Europ, and alſo made his ſonne Alis Baſſa one of his Councell, although hee were by ſome thought too yong for ſo great a place. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order according to his minde in Europe, tooke paſſage from Callipolis into Aſia, and ſo to his court at Pruſa, where he ſpent that Winter. In which time Embaſſadors came vnto him from the Sultan of Ægypt, for the renewing of their former amitie and friendſhip; which Amurath tooke verie thankefully, and ſent them backe againe loden with kind letters and princely rewards.

Amurath and Aladin prepare themſelues for warre.

When the Spring was come, in the yere 1387, he leuied a mightie armie to make war vpon the Caramanian king his ſon in law. Whereof Aladin certainly informed, prepared no leſſe power to meet him, aſſociating vnto him all the leſſe Mahometan Princes of Aſia, which were not vnder Amuraths obeiſance, to whom the Othoman kings were now grown terrible; which princes brought with them great ſupplies to ioyne with Aladin.

Aladin thus aided by his friends, thinking himſelfe now ſtrong enough for Amurath his father in law, ſent an Embaſſador vnto him, certifying him, That he was nothing in power inferior to him, & therfore nothing feared him: yet if it pleaſed him to haue peace, that he could for his part be content to hearken vnto the ſame vpon reaſonable conditions: but if he had rather haue war, he ſhould find him readie to dare him battel in the field, whenſoeuer he ſhould come. For anſwere of which embaſſage, Amurath willed the Embaſſadour to tell the periured King his maſter, That he had of late, contrarie to his faith before giuen, in moſt cruell manner inuaded his dominions, whileſt he was buſied in moſt godly wars (as he termed it) againſt the misbeleeuing Chriſtians: from proſecuting whereof, he was by his violence (as he ſaid) withdrawn, contrarie to the law of their great Prophet: for which outrages and wrongs he would ſhortly come and take of him ſharpe reuenge; and that therefore he was to expect nothing at his hands but war, for which he willed him ſo to prouide, as that at his comming he might not find him wanting to himſelfe. Aladin by his Embaſſadour hauing receiued this anſwer from Amurath, aſſembled all the confederat Princes his allies, with great perſuaſions & greater promiſes encouraging them to this war: and they againe kiſſing the ground at his feet, as the manner of that nation is before great princes, promiſed with ſolemne oathes neuer to forſake him, but to do all things which Princes deſirous of honour or fame, ought by their oath to doe for their Soueraigne, to whom they ought homage and dutie.

The death of Chairadin Baſſa

In this great preparation for wars in Aſia, Charaidin Baſſa general gouernor in Europe died: which Amurath vnderſtanding, appointed Alis Baſſa his ſonne to go into Europe, there to be gouernor in his fathers ſtead. But hee was ſtayed in his journey by vrgent occaſions; which Amurath vnderſtanding, ſent for him backe againe in poſt.

Aladin forecaſting the great dangers like to enſue of this war, ſent another Embaſſadour to Amurath, with reaſonable conditions of peace: to whom Amurath anſwered, That if Aladin had made that offer one month before, he would perhaps haue accepted thereof: but for ſo much as he had done him great wrong, and that he had now to his infinite charge drawn him into the field ſo far from home, he would not make any other end than ſuch as the chance of war ſhould appoint: And wheras he in diſgrace had called me a heardſman or ſhepheard (ſaid he) if he be not ſuch a one himſelf, as he ſaith me to be, let him meet me in the field & there try his valor. Hereunto the Embaſſador replied, ſaying, That the King his maſter made this offer of peace not for any feare, but to ſaue the effuſion of innocent bloud; which conſideration ſet apart, he ſhould find him not inferior to himſelfe, either in number of moſt expert ſoldiers, or other warlike prouiſion: and that therefore if he reiected this offer of peace, hee needed not to doubt but to meet with men of courage, which would beare themſelues ſo valiantly in the field againſt his Turks, as that he ſhould haue no great cauſe to reioyce of his comming thither. Which words of the Embaſſador ſo netled Amurath, that in great rage hee commanded him to depart, & to wil his maſter, if he were a man of ſuch courage & valor as he ſaid, to ſhew himſelfe in the field with all his forces, there to make an end of all quarrels; where he doubted not but in ſhort time to chaſtice him according to his due deſerts. So after the Embaſſador was departed, marching forward three days, Alis Beg came vnto him: of whoſe comming he not a little reioyced: for why, he loued him deerly, and although he was yet of yeares but yong, relied much vpon his councell.

The Embaſſador returning, recounted vnto Aladin all that Amurath had ſaid, not onmitting his hard ſpeeches and proud threats, and how that he hoped ſhortly to take from him Iconium and Larenda (the principall cities of Caramania) with many things more, leauing nothing vntold. Which Aladin hearing, ſaid vnto the confederate Princes that were with him, Verily Amurath threatneth to take from vs the cities of Iconium and Larenda; but let him take heed that we take not from him his faire citie of Pruſa. Then demanding of the Embaſſadour, of what ſtrength Amurath might be; it was anſwered by him, that hee deemed him to be about ſeuentie thouſand ſtrong. Whereat Aladin not a little reioycing, ſaid, Aſſuredly when hee ſhall ſee our armie, he will not dare to giue vs battell; or if he do, he ſhal fight vpon great diſaduantage, his men being both fewer in number than we, and ſore wearied with long and painfull trauell.

In the mean time Amurath held on his way towards Caramania, dayly encouraging his ſoldiers with perſuaſions and gifts bountifully beſtowed vpon them, filling their heads with promiſes of greater, the wars once happily ended. At length he came to the great plaines in Caramania, called the French plains, becauſe in former time the Chriſtians (whom the Turks for moſt part cal Franks) in thoſe places incamped their great armies, as they went to the winning of Ieruſalem (as in the former part of this Hiſtorie is declared.) Into theſe plaines alſo came Aladin with his armie, and was now incamped within one days march of Amurath, and ſo reſted that night.

The next morning Amurath put his armie in order of battell, appointing the leading of the right wing to his youngeſt ſonne Iacup, with whom he ioyned Cutluzes Beg, Ein Beg Subbaſſa, Egridum Subbaſſa, Seraze, and Cuſtendil, two Chriſtian Princes, all captains of great experience. The left wing was led by Baiazet his eldeſt ſon, with Ferize and Hozze both valiant captains: in which wings were alſo placed the Chriſtian ſoldiers ſent by Lazarus out of Seruia, according to the late conuention of peace: in the maine battell hee ſtood himſelfe; the vauntgard was conducted by Temurtaſes; and the rereward by the Subbaſſa of Oxyllithus (called alſo Temurtaſes) and Achmetes. Aladin on the other ſide, with no leſſe care and diligence ſet his men likewiſe in order of battell, placing himſelfe in the maine battell, as did Amurath; and the Princes his allies, with his other expert captaines, ſome in the right wing, and ſome in the left, as he thought moſt conuenient: in ſuch ſort, as that in all mens iudgment he was in force nothing inferior to his father in law.

Theſe great enemies thus ranged, with enſignes diſplaid came on couragiouſly, one directly vpon the other: where approching together, the confuſed noiſe of trumpets, drums, fifes, with other inſtruments of warre, the neighing of horſes, and clattering of armour, was ſo great, that whileſt warlike minds thereat reioiced, cowards thought heauen fel. But the ſigne of battel on both ſides giuen, Samagazes one of the confederat Princes, with exceeding courage firſt charged Temurtaſes in the vantgard, and broke his ranks: at which time Teberruſes a Tartar Prince, and Varſacides another of the confederats, deliuered their arrows alſo vpon the vantgard, as if it had been a ſhoure of haile. Which Baiazet ſeeing, and how hardly Temurtaſes was charged, hauing before obtained leaue of his father, brake in vpon the enemie with ſuch violence, as if it had been the lightning; whereof he was euer after ſyrnamed Gilderun, which is to ſay, The lightening. Ferizes and Hozza, with the other valiant Captaines in that wing, following Baiazet, with inuincible courage entred the battell; where for a great ſpace was made a moſt dreadfull and doubtfull fight. A man would haue thought two rough ſeas had met together, ſwaying one againſt the other, doubtfull which way the current would at length fall. In this conflict many thouſands were on both ſides ſlain, ſo that the field lay couered with the dead bodies of worthy men and valiant ſouldiers: yet at length theſe confederate Princes, finding themſelues ouermatched by Baiazet and his ſoldiers, reſeruing themſelues to their better fortunes, turned their backes and fled; when Aladin ſeeing a great part of his armie thus ouerthrowne, and himſelfe now ready to be charged with Amurath his whole power, deſpairing of victorie, ſped himſelfe in all haſt to Iconium, his ſtrong citie. The ſpoile which Amurath got in this battel was great, moſt part whereof he gaue in reward to Temurtaſes and his ſouldiers, which had indured the greateſt furie of the battell. Amurath after this victorie with all ſpeed marched to Iconium, and there beſieged Aladin the Caramanian King, in his ſtrongeſt citie, giuing out proclamation in the meane time, That none of his ſouldiers vpon paine of death ſhould vſe any violence to any of the countrey people, or take any thing from them: to the intent it might appeare vnto the world, that he made that warre againſt that Mahometane King, rather to propulſe iniurie and wrong, than for deſire of ſoueraigntie or ſpoile. Which his ſo ſtrait a proclamation, the Chriſtians ſent by Lazerus, amongſt others, tranſgreſſed; and therefore by his commandement ſuffered (many of them) exemplarie puniſhment; which was the cauſe of the Seruian warre which not long after enſued, fatall both vnto Amurath and Lazarus the Deſpot, as hereafter ſhall appeare.

Aladin flieth to Iconium.

Iconium beſieged by Amurath.

Aladin now on euery ſide beſieged in Iconium, and without all hope of eſcape, ſent to the Queene his wife, Amuraths daughter, bewailing vnto her his deſperate eſtate, and requeſting her by all the loue that ſo honourable a minded Ladie might beare vnto her miſerable husband, to aduenture her ſelfe to goe to her angrie father, and to craue pardon for his great treſpaſſe & offence. The Queen forthwith attiring her ſelfe, as was fitteſt for her husbands preſent eſtate, came to her father: where falling downe at his feet vpon her knees, with words wiſely placed, and teares diſtilling down her faire cheeks from her fairer eies, as if it had bin from two fountains, in moſt ſorrowful manner, craued her husbands pardon, imputing to the heat of youth whatſoeuer he had done: and would not be comforted or taken vp, vntil ſhe had obtained grace. Amurath moſt entirely loued this his daughter, and therefore for her ſake not only granted vnto her, her husbands life (which in ſhort time was like to haue bin in his power to haue ſpilt) but alſo his kingdom, which he as a victorious conqueror might by law of armes haue of right detained. She now aſſured of her fathers promiſe, ſent vnto her husband Aladin, wiſhing him the next day without feare to come out of the citie, & in humble ſort to acknowledge his fault before her father. Who the next morning accordingly came out, and proſtrating himſelfe before Amurath, acknowledged his vndutifulnes: of whom (for his wiues ſake) he obtained pardon, and reſtitution to his kinkdome, with many other great gifts, contrary to his euell deſert. The Latine hiſtories miſtaking the man, report this Caramanian war, to haue bin fought againſt the king of Caramania, Amurath his own grandfather by the mother ſide; and that hee was by Amurath then ſpoiled of a great part of his kingdome: but it agreeth not with the Turkiſh hiſtories, which make Amurath to be the ſonne of Orchanes and Luluſer, the daughter of the gouernour of the caſtle of Iarchiſer, as is before declared in the life of Othoman; which Luluſer lieth buried by her husband Orchanes in Pruſa.

This great victorie gotten by Amurath againſt the Caramanian King, and the other confederat Princes, was the true beginning of the greatneſſe of the Othoman kingdom in Aſia: wherwith the other Mahometan Princes of the Selzuccian family were ſo diſcouraged, that they were glad to ſubmit themſelues thus firſt vnto Amurath, and after that vnto his ſonne Baiazet: vntill that Tamberlaine the great Tartarian Prince, ſome few yeares after, taking Baiazet priſoner in a great battell at mount Stella, abated the Othoman pride, and reſtored the other oppreſſed Mahometane Princes to their old poſſeſſions and kingdomes.

Amurath returning homewards, by the way tooke the city of Deſpotopolis, and comming to Cutaie brake vp his armie, and ſo in triumph returned to his court at Pruſa.

Lazarus, Deſpot of Seruia (in old time called Myſia) had ſent a thouſand armed men to Amurath in this the late Caramanian warre, according to the conuention of the peace not long before made betwixt them: ſome of which ſouldiers, were with great ſeueritie (to the terror of others) executed in Caramania, for tranſgreſſing Amurath his commandement. This great war being ended, and the army broken vp at Cutaie, they with others were licenſed to depart into their owne country. Whoſe General (whom they call the Vayuod) returning home, reported vnto Lazarus the Deſpot, the ſucceſſe of that war, and withall in what cruell and tyrannicall manner the men he had ſent were in that ſeruice vſed by the commandment of Amurath. With whom (ſaid this Generall) you without cauſe haue made a moſt diſhonourable peace: firſt, by giuing your faith to ſuch a miſcreant, and then in ſending your loyall ſubiects, in recompence of their good ſeruice, to be ſo butchered at his pleaſure; beſide the ſhamefull tribute which you yerely pay vnto him. Whereas if it would pleaſe you in the depth of your wiſedome but to know your owne ſtrength, you ſhould find your ſelfe in warlike force and power nothing inferiour to the tyrant: for we your ſeruants beeing in number but a handfull, were in theſe his late wars a terror vnto his enemies, and by our valor, and not his own, he got the victorie ouer them. What cauſe is there then, that you ſhould ſubiect your ſelf vnto your inferiour? I know hee cannot of himſelfe bring into the field aboue fiftie thouſand fighting men: but admit he were able to bring a hundred thouſand, are not you (if you ſo pleaſe) able to leauie a far greater power? and for all other warlike prouiſion you are ten fold better prouided than he. Beſides that, the mightie Chriſtian Princes wil ſend you ſuch aid againſt this hatefull and common enemie, that being vnited with yours, his Barbarian forces will be nothing in compariſon of thoſe which you ſhall then be able to bring into the field againſt him: which no doubt the Chriſtian Princes will the rather do, as men deſirous to quench this deuouring fire in another mans houſe, rather than in their owne.

Theſe words of the Vayuod ſo much moued Lazarus, that hee determined in himſelfe to breake that ſeruile league which he before had made with Amurath. And for that cauſe ſent his Embaſſador with ſecret inſtructions to the King of Boſna (in time paſt called Illyria) his neighbour: whereof the chiefe point was, to craue his aid againſt the Turke their common enemie. By whom the King of Boſna returned this anſwere, That it had beene much better ſuch conſideration had bin thought vpon before the foule contract (full of diſgrace both to himſelfe and all other Chriſtian Princes) was vpon a vaine feare by him raſhly made with the Turkiſh tyrant: yet for ſo much as things done could not be vndone, letting that paſſe which was remedileſſe, he promiſed to ioyne with him his whole forces againſt ſo dangerous an enemie. And therupon appointing a place for an interuiew, met accordingly, and there fully concluded all the articles of their confederation.

There was in the confines of Boſna a caſtle called Alexandria, the captaine whereof being a Chriſtian, was yet tributarie vnto the Turk; wiſhing vnto him ſuch good, as men oppreſſed vſe to do to them by whom they are ſo wronged. This captain vnder the colour of friendſhip went to Amurath, & in great ſecrecy opened to him the whole ſtate of the kingdom of Boſna, and withall, that the King thereof intended ſome great matter againſt him: for the preuenting whereof he offered his owne ſeruice, and ſhewed ſome probable meanes how that kingdome might be brought into his ſubiection, if hee would but ſend ſome worthie Generall with a conuenient power for the vndertaking thereof. This wonderfully pleaſed the ambitious old tyrant, who therefore commanded a rich garment to be caſt vpon the captain (which amongſt the Turks is taken for a ſure token of the kings great fauor) and forthwith appointed his tutor Lala Schahin, according to this captains direction, to inuade the kingdome of Boſna. Who ioining himſelfe with this deceitfull captaine of Alexandria, with an armie of twentie thouſand men entred into Boſna; where ouerrunning a ſide of the country, he without reſiſtance tooke great booties: and ſeeing no apparant cauſe of feare, to doe the more harme, by the aduice of the ſame captain diuided his armie, which he ſent into diuers parts of the country, the more to burne and ſpoyle the ſame. Of all whoſe proceedings the King of Boſna by ſecret meſſengers from the captain aduertiſed, had in conuenient places layd ſtrong ambuſhes for the intercepting of his enemies. So that as Schahin was returning homeward with a rich bootie, hauing then with him but a thouſand men, ſuddenly appeared in his way thirtie thouſand Chriſtians well armed: which Schahin ſeeing, thinking it follie to oppoſe ſo few againſt ſo many, would haue preſently fled; but the reſt of the gallants that were with him, preſuming of their good fortune, and loth to loſe their rich prey, would needs firſt skirmiſh with the Chriſtians: in which deſperat conflict they were almoſt all ſlaine, and the ſpoyle they had taken, all recouered by the Chriſtians. As for Schahin, he was glad by ſhameful flight to ſaue himſelfe. The like miſhap befell the other Turkes in the other parts of Boſna, who for the moſt part were likewiſe intercepted and ſlaine: ſo that of twenty thouſand, ſcarce fiue thouſand returned home.

Amurath marrieth the Emperor of Conſtantinoples daughter.

Whileſt theſe things were doing in Europe, Amurath in great triumph at Neapolis married the Emperor of Conſtantinople his daughter: whoſe two ſiſters were alſo giuen in marriage to his two ſons: at which time he with great ſolemnity circumciſed three of Baiazets ſons. At this time alſo returned Iazigi Ogli, whom he had before ſent Embaſſador to the Sultan of Ægypt, in requitall of the honorable embaſſage before to him ſent from the ſaid Sultan. Now Amurath vnderſtanding of the loſſe of his men in Boſna, with the reuolt of Lazarus Deſpot of Seruia, was therewith much diſquieted. Wherefore he commanded Alis Baſſa his chiefe councellor, with all ſpeed to ſend forth commiſſions into all parts of his kingdome, for the leuying of a royall armie: which was done in ſuch poſt haſt, that it was thought he would haue taken the field before the beginning of the Spring. At which time alſo the other Mahometan Kings and Princes of Aſia, Caraman Ogli, Teke Ogli, and the reſt, bound vnto him by homage, with diuers others of ſmaller power, were ſent for, to aid him in this warre: who partly for feare, and partly mooued with the zeale of their Mahometane ſuperſtition, brought their forces with great deuotion. Vnto this war againſt the Chriſtians, came alſo great numbers of the Mahometans from far countries, as voluntarie ſoldiers. Baiazet his ſonne alſo, then gouernor of Cutaie, with a great part of Galatia, gathring all his forces, came to aid his father in this religious war (as it was by them termed.) The Chriſtian tributarie Princes were not then forgotten; of whom two came, namely Cuſtendil and Seratzil: other two forſaking Amurath, came not, which was Saſmenos Prince of Bulgaria, and the Prince of Varna and Dobritza; with whom Amurath was highly offended. In the time of this ſo great preparation, old Lala Shahin, Amuraths tutor and faithfull ſeruitor, died, being a man of great yeres: and Temurtaſes was appointed gouernor in his place.

The reuolting of the two Chriſtian Princes, Saſmenos and the Prince of Varna, much grieued Amurath: Wherefore he commanded Alis Baſſa, with an armie of thirtie thouſand to inuade and ſpoyle Saſmenos his countrey, now called Bulgaria, and in antient time the lower Myſia. Alis Baſſa according to that was giuen him in charge, calling vnto him Iaxis Beg the ſon of Temurtaſes, Vlu Beg, Suratze Baſſa, with other captaines and commanders of the Turkes prouinces in Europe, aſſembled an armie of thirtie thouſand for the inuaſion of Bulgaria. With this armie the Baſſa tooke many ſtrong townes and caſtles in Bulgaria, as Pirauade, Venuzina, Madra, Suni, and others.

In the mean time, whileſt Alis Baſſa had thus begun the wars againſt the Chriſtians in Bulgaria, Amurath hauing gathered a great Armie in Aſia, determined in the beginning of the Spring to paſſe ouer with the ſame into Europe: commending the gouernment of his Countries in Aſia, to Temurtaſes Baſſa, Ferices Beg, Temurtaſes Subbaſſa, Cutlu Beg, & Haza Beg: and ſo all things ſet in order in Aſia, he drew downe his Aſian forces toward Helleſpontus, where he was a while ſtayed with contrarie winds, but was afterwards tranſported to Callipolis, by Ienitze Beg Sanzack there. This was the third time that Amurath brought his armie out of Aſia into Europe. But whileſt he ſtayed at Callipolis, Baiazet his ſon with a great power came vnto him thither: Alis Baſſa alſo vnderſtanding of Amuraths arriuall in Europe, retyred out of Bulgaria, and came to him at Alcide, recounting vnto him the whole ſucceſſe of his expedition into Bulgaria.

Saſmenos Prince of Bulgaria, ſeeing his countrey ſpoyled, his ſtrong cities and caſtles taken by the Turks, and withal hearing of their great preparations for war; by the aduice of his nobilitie thought it beſt betimes againe to ſubmit himſelfe vnto Amurath: wherefore tying a winding ſheet about his necke, in token that he had deſerued death (after the manner of the Barbarians) he came to Amurath at Calcide, where falling flat vpon the ground, at the horſes feet whereon Amurath ſate, he in moſt humble wiſe craued pardon; offring by a certain day to deliuer Siliſtria the chiefe city of his dominion, into Amuraths poſſeſſion, as a pledge of his fidelitie: who thereupon granted him pardon, and to aſſure him of his fauor, commanded a rich garment to be caſt vpon him, after the manner of the Turkes, ſending Alis Baſſa at the time appointed, to take poſſeſſion of Siliſtria. But Saſmenos repenting himſelf of that he had ſo largely promiſed, would not deliuer his citie, but in ſtrongeſt manner hee could preſently fortified the ſame. Wherewith Amurath more offended than before, commanded the Baſſa with fire and ſword againe to ſpoyle and waſt his Countrey: who according to his commaundement entred againe into Bulgaria, and ſtrucke ſuch a terrour of his comming into the hearts of the people, that many ſtrong places were voluntarily yeelded into his power, namely Diritze, Coſſoua, with the citie Ternoua, the ſeat of the Princes court; Tzerneui, Nouakeſtri, Ziſtoua, with diuers others; and proceeding farther, he layed ſiege to Nicopolis, the ſtrongeſt city of Bulgaria, vpon the ſide of the great riuer Danubius, whether Saſmenos was for feare himſelfe fled. Who finding himſelfe vnable to hold out the ſiege, once againe (with ſhame enough) tying a winding ſheet about his necke, as he had done before, and taking his ſonne with him, went out of the citie, and in moſt abiect manner falling downe at the Baſſa his feet, craued pardon: which the Baſſa, moued with compaſſion to ſee the miſerie of ſo great a man, and hauing alreadie taken from him the greateſt part of his dominion, and now out of feare of further reſiſtance, eaſily granted. And hauing thus ended the Bulgarian warre, returned to Amurath, of whom he was right ioyfully receiued.

Amurath had now made great preparation for the inuading of Seruia, for which purpoſe hee had drawne ouer into Europe the greateſt forces he poſſibly could out of Aſia: ſending alſo for his yongeſt ſonne Iacup, gouernor of Caraſia, who vnderſtanding his fathers pleaſure, repaired vnto him with all the power he could make. This army by Amurath thus aſſembled, was the greateſt that euer was before that, brought by the Turkes into Europe. Lazerus not ignorant of this great preparation made by Amurath, had drawne into the ſociety of this war, the King of Boſna (as is aforeſaid) with Vulcus Prince of Macedonia, his ſonne in law, who both brought vnto him great ayd; he had alſo by his embaſſadours procured great ſupplies from other Chriſtian Kings and Princes, out of Valachia, Hungaria, Croatia, Sclauonia, Albania, Bulgaria, and Italie, beſides great numbers of other voluntarie deuout Chriſtians, which all aſſembled and met together, did in number farre exceed the great armie of the Turkes.

With this army Lazarus the Deſpot encamped vpon the ſide of the riuer Morouа the greater, not farre from whence ſtood the ſtrong caſtle of Sarkiue, which Alis Baſſa had of late taken from Saſmenos the Bulgarian Prince, ſtanding as it were betwixt Bulgaria and Seruia: this caſtle being now poſſeſſed of the Turkes, was thought by Lazarus dangerous to his country, who therefore ſent one Demetrius, a right valiant captaine, with certaine companies of ſelect men to take in the ſame. The name of this captaine Demetrius, was a generall terrour vnto the Turks, for the harme he had done them: ſo that they in the caſtle hearing that he was come, without further reſiſtance yeelded the ſame vnto him. Whereof Amurath vnderſtanding, ſent Eine, and Sarutze Baſſa to recouer the ſame: but Lazarus doubting that the caſtle would hardly bee kept in that dangerous warre, ſent Vulcus his ſonne in law with twentie thouſand men, to bring away all that was therein, and in the citie neere vnto it, leſt it ſhould become a prey vnto the greedie Turks; which he accordingly did, and at the ſame time raſed both the caſtle and the city, before the comming of Iaxis Beg, ſent from Amurath to haue done the ſame exploit; which he comming thither, found alreadie done to his hand by Vulcus.

The caſtle of Sarkiue with the city ioyning vnto it, taken by the Chriſtians and raſed.

As Amurath was marching towards Seruia, Seratze and Cuſtendyl, two Chriſtian Princes his tributaries, met him with their forces, whom hee cauſed to march before him, as his guides: and paſſing thorow Cuſtendyl his countrey, was there refreſhed with plenty of all things neceſſarie: vntill at length paſſing the riuer of Moroua the leſſe, he drew ſo neere to the plaines of Coſſoua (where the Chriſtian armie lay) that he with his ſonne Baiazet from a little hil tooke full view of the Chriſtian campe, which was ſo great, that it couered all thoſe large plaines from ſide to ſide, and ſo daunted Amurath, as that returning to his armie, he preſently entered into a great conſultation with his greateſt captaines and commaunders, what courſe to take againſt ſuch a puiſſant enemie.

Theſe great armies being now come ſo nigh together, as that they might the one wel deſcry the other, Amurath had purpoſed the ſame day to haue giuen the Chriſtians battel: but being diſſuaded by Eurenoſes, both for that it was extream hot, & his ſoldiers wearied with trauell, he reſted that night. The next morning as ſoone as it was day, he put his armie in order of battell, placing his ſonne Baiazet with Eurenoſes and Eine Beg Subbaſſa, in the right wing; his youngeſt ſon Iacup, with Sarutze Baſſa in the left wing; the maine battel he led himſelfe. Lazarus in the meane time had alſo ſet his army in good order: giuing the charge of the right wing to Vulcus his ſon in law; the left wing was led by the King of Boſna, and his ſons; in the maine battell ſtood Lazerus himſelfe; the Italians, Valachians, Hungarians, Bohemians, and Bulgarians, he placed in both wings. It is thought, greater armies than thoſe two had ſeldom before met in Europe. Lazarus as the Turkiſh Hiſtories report (but how truly I know not) hauing in his armie fiue hundred thouſand men; and Amurath ſcarce halfe ſo many.

To begin the battel, Amurath had drawne a thouſand of his beſt archers, vnder the leading of Malcozzeus, out of the right wing of his armie, & the like number of archers out of the left, vnder the conduct of one Muſtapha: which ſo placed on both ſides of the army, as he thought beſt, Eurenoſes a man of great experience, told Amurath, That the Chriſtians were for the moſt part wel and ſtrongly armed, & ſhouldring cloſe together in their charge, would be like a rock of yron, vnable to be pierced: but if in ioyning the battell, he would a little retire, the Chriſtians following vpon good hope, would ſo looſe their cloſe ſtanding (the chiefe part of their ſtrength) and leaue an entrance for his men. Vpon which reſolution, Amurath commanded the archers to giue the firſt charge: which they couragiouſly performed. At which time, the Turks army gaue ground a litle: which the Chriſtians perceiuing, with great force aſſailed the left wing of their armie, and after a hard & cruell fight put the ſame to flight: which Baiazet ſeeing, with ſuch fury renewed the battel, that the Turks wich before as men diſcouraged fled in the left wing, began now to turn again vpon their enemies; & the Chriſtians, hauing as they thought already got the victory, were to begin a great battell. In which bloudy fight many thouſands fel on both ſides: the brightnes of the armor & weapons, was as it had bin the lightning: the multitude of launces and other horſemens ſtaues, ſhadowed the light of the ſun: arrows and darts fell ſo faſt, that a man would haue thought they had powred down from heauen, the noiſe of the inſtruments of war, with the neighing of horſes, and outcries of men was ſo terrible and great, that the wild beaſts in the mountains ſtood aſtonied therewith: and the Turkiſh hiſtories, to expreſſe the terror of the day (vainly ſay) that the Angels in heauen amaſed with that hideous noiſe, for that time forgot the heauenly hymns wherwith they alwaies glorifie God. About noon time of the day, the fortune of the Turks preuailing, the Chriſtians began to giue ground, & at length betooke themſelues to plaine flight; whom the Turks with all their force purſued and ſlew them down right, without number or mercy. In which battel Lazarus the Deſpot himſelfe was alſo ſlain. Howbeit ſome hiſtories report otherwiſe, as that he with his ſon were taken priſoners, and by and by afterwards (in reuenge of Amurath his death) cruelly ſlain: otherſome alſo reporting that he died in priſon. Amurath after this great victorie, with ſome few of his chiefe captains taking view of the dead bodies, which without number lay on heaps in the field like mountaines; a Chriſtian ſouldier, ſore wounded and all bloodie, ſeeing him, in ſtaggering manner aroſe (as if it had bin from death) out of a heape of ſlain men, and making towards him, for want of ſtrength fell down diuers times by the way as he came, as if he had been a drunken man: at length drawing nigh vnto him, when they which guarded the Kings perſon would haue ſtayed him, he was by Amurath himſelfe commanded to come neerer; ſuppoſing, that hee would haue craued his life of him. Thus the halfe dead Chriſtian preſſing neere vnto him, as if he would for honor ſake haue kiſſed his feet, ſuddenly ſtabbed him in the bottome of his bellie with a ſhort dagger, which he had vnder his ſoldiers coat: of which wound that great King and conquerour preſently died. The name of this man, (for his courage worthy of eternall memorie) was Miles Cobelitz: who before ſore wounded was ſhortly after in the preſence of Baiazet cut into ſmall pieces. The Turks in their Annales ſomewhat otherwiſe report of the death of Amurath: as that this Cobelitz, one of the Deſpot his ſeruants, in time of the battell, comming to Amurath as a fugitiue, offering him his ſeruice and admitted to his preſence, in humbling himſelfe to haue kiſſed his feete (as the barbarous manner of the Turks is) ſtabbed him into the bellie and ſo ſlew him: being himſelfe therefore ſhortly after (as is aforeſaid) in the preſence of Baiazet moſt cruell hewen into ſmall peeces. Whereupon euer ſince that time, the manner of the Turks hath been, and yet is, that when any Embaſſadour or ſtranger is to come to kiſſe the Sultan his hand, or otherwiſe to approch his perſon, he is as it were for honours ſake, led by the armes vnto his preſence, betwixt two of the great courtiers: but indeed by ſo intangling him, to be ſure that he ſhall not offer him the like violence, that did this Cobelits vnto Amurath.

The dead bodie of Amurath was preſently with all ſecrecie conueyed into his tent by the Baſſaes and captaines preſent at his death: whether Baiazet was alſo brought with an enſigne

A before him, as the ſucceſſour in his fathers kingdome. His yonger brother Iacup, ſyrnamed Zelebi (or the noble) yet ignorant of that had hapned, was by the great Baſſaes ſent for, as from his father: who caſting no perill, but comming into his fathers tent, was there preſently by them ſtrangled, by the commandement of Baiazet, as moſt hiſtories report: howbeit the Turks annales charge him not therewith. This was the beginning of the moſt vnnaturall and inhumane cuſtome, euer ſince holden for a moſt wholeſome and good policie among the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors, in the beginning of their raigne moſt cruelly to maſſacre their brethren and neereſt kinſmen, ſo at once to rid themſelues of all feare of their competitors.

This Amurath was in his ſuperſtition more zealous than any other of the Turkiſh Kings; a man of great courage, and in all his attempts fortunate: he made greater ſlaughter of his enemies, B than both his father and grandfather: his kingdome in Aſia he greatly inlarged by the ſword, marriage, and purchaſe: and vſing the diſcord and cowardiſe of the Grecian Princes, to his profit, ſubdued a great part of Thracia, called Romania, with the territories thereto adioyning, leauing vnto the Emperour of Conſtantinople, little or nothing more in Thracia, than the imperiall citie it ſelfe, with the bare name of an Emperour, almoſt without an empire: he woon a great part of Bulgaria, and entred into Seruia, Boſna, and Macedonia: hee was liberall, and withall ſeuere: of his ſubiects both beloued and feared: a man of very few wordes, and one that could diſſemble deeply. He was ſlaine when he was threeſcore and eight yeares old, and had thereof raigned thirtie one, in the yeare of our Lord 1390. His dead bodie was by Baiazet conueied into Aſia, and there royally buried at Pruſa, in a faire chappell at the Weſt C end of the citie, neere vnto the Bathes there: where, vpon his tombe lyeth his ſouldiers cloake, with a little Turkiſh tulipant, much differing from thoſe great turbants which the Turks now weare. Neere vnto the ſame tombe are placed three launces, with three horſe tailes faſtened at the vpper end of rhem, which he vſed as guidons in his wars: a thing in ancient time not ſtrange. There ſtandeth a caſtle with a tombe, made in remembrance of him, in the plaines of Coſſoua, where hee was ſlaine and his entrailes buried: which giueth occaſion for ſome to report that he was there alſo himſelfe enterred.

His yonger brother Iacup, ſyrnamed Zelebi (or the noble) yet ignorant of that had hapned, was by the great Baſſaes ſent for, as from his father: who caſting no perill, but comming into his fathers tent, was there preſently by them ſtrangled, by the commandement of Baiazet, as moſt hiſtories report: howbeit the Turks annales charge him not therewith. This was the beginning of the moſt vnnaturall and inhumane cuſtome, euer ſince holden for a moſt wholeſome and good policie among the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors, in the beginning of their raigne moſt cruelly to maſſacre their brethren and neereſt kinſmen, ſo at once to rid themſelues of all feare of their competitors.

This Amurath was in his ſuperſtition more zealous than any other of the Turkiſh Kings; a man of great courage, and in all his attempts fortunate: he made greater ſlaughter of his enemies, B than both his father and grandfather: his kingdome in Aſia he greatly inlarged by the ſword, marriage, and purchaſe: and vſing the diſcord and cowardiſe of the Grecian Princes, to his profit, ſubdued a great part of Thracia, called Romania, with the territories thereto adioyning, leauing vnto the Emperour of Conſtantinople, little or nothing more in Thracia, than the imperiall citie it ſelfe, with the bare name of an Emperour, almoſt without an empire: he woon a great part of Bulgaria, and entred into Seruia, Boſna, and Macedonia: hee was liberall, and withall ſeuere: of his ſubiects both beloued and feared: a man of very few wordes, and one that could diſſemble deeply. He was ſlaine when he was threeſcore and eight yeares old, and had thereof raigned thirtie one, in the yeare of our Lord 1390. His dead bodie was by Baiazet conueied into Aſia, and there royally buried at Pruſa, in a faire chappell at the Weſt C end of the citie, neere vnto the Bathes there: where, vpon his tombe lyeth his ſouldiers cloake, with a little Turkiſh tulipant, much differing from thoſe great turbants which the Turks now weare. Neere vnto the ſame tombe are placed three launces, with three horſe tailes faſtened at the vpper end of them, which he vſed as guidons in his wars: a thing in ancient time not ſtrange. There ſtandeth a caſtle with a tombe, made in remembrance of him, in the plaines of Coſſoua, where hee was ſlaine and his entrailes buried: which giueth occaſion for ſome to report that he was there alſo himſelfe enterred.

Regni Hadrianopolim ſedes ſibi legit vt eſſet,

Proud Baiazet moſt falſe of faith, and loathing bleſſed peace, His warlike troupes like lightning, to ſhake he doth not ceaſe.
Of Hadrianople he makes choice for his imperiall ſeat, That Europes kingdome he might ioyne vnto his Empire great.
Conſtantinople he diſtreſt twice with ſtrait ſiege and long:
And vainly thought to haue poſſeſt the Grecians wealth by wrong.
But ouercome by Tamberlane, faſt bound in fetters ſure, Trod vnder foot, and cloas'd in cage, great ſhame did there endure.

THE LIFE OF BAIAZET, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, THE FOVRTH AND MOST VNFORTVNATE KING OF THE TVRKES.

Baiazet, or as the Turks call him, Baiaſit, of his violent and fierce nature ſyrnamed Gilderun, or lightning, ſucceeded his father Amurath in the Turkiſh kingdome, his younger brother Iacup being ſtrangled immediatly after his fathers death, as is before declared. He in the firſt yeare of his raigne inuaded Seruia, and there beſieged Cratoua, a citie of the Deſpots: whereunto the ſiluer mines of Seruia (not the leaſt cauſe of that warre) belonged. Which city was yeelded vnto him, vpon condition, That the Chriſtian inhabitants might with life and libertie depart. Who were no ſooner gone out of the city, but that by his commandement they were all moſt cruelly ſlaine by his men of war, for that purpoſe ſent out after them. At this time he alſo woon Vſcupia, with diuers other caſtles in the countrey neere vnto Cratoua.

Baiazet inuadeth Seruia.

Sigiſmund at the ſame time king of Hungarie (a young Prince of great hope, and brother to Wenceſlaus, then Emperour of the Weſt) aduertiſed from the Seruians his allies and confederates, of theſe proud proceedings of Baiazet; by his embaſſadours ſent of purpoſe, requeſted him, That as he was a iuſt Prince, and wiſhed to liue in quiet with his owne, to deſiſt from doing of ſuch open wrong, and from inuading of ſuch countries of his friends and confederates, as he had no right in. Which Embaſſadours ſo ſent, Baiazet detained without anſwere, vntill ſuch time as hee had ouerrun a great part of the Deſpot his countrey, and therein done what he thought good. Then calling the ſaid Embaſſadours vnto him into one of the ſtrong towns which he had in euery corner filled with his owne ſouldiers, told them that they might there ſee, that his right both vnto that towne and the reſt by him taken, was good enough, for as much as the very wals acknowledged the ſame: And ſo giuing them leaue to depart, willed them ſo to tell their maſter. Which his proud anſwer, by the ſame embaſſadours reported vnto the young King, no leſſe troubled him, than if open warre had by them beene denounced vnto him, ſeeing the tyrant (as it ſhould ſeeme) pretended right vnto whatſoeuer he could by force get: neuertheles, being himſelfe not yet wel ſetled in his kingdom, and in doubt of the contrary faction (that altogether liked not of his election into Hungarie for their King) hee was glad at that time to put it vp, and ſo to hold himſelfe content.

The next yeare, Baiazet by Feriſes Beg, tooke the citie of Vidina, with many other ſtrong townes and caſtles in Seruia, and afterwards returned to Hadrianople. But whileſt that hee thus raged in Europe, the Caramanian King inuaded and ſpoiled the frontiers of his countries in Aſia: which although hee was not then at leiſure, hee forgot not afterwards to reuenge to the full. At the ſame time Eurenoſes, Lord gouernour of the marches of his kingdome in Europe towards Grecia, departing from Seres (where hee then lay) tooke the Citie of Sitros in Theſſalia. And Feriſes Beg, not content to haue taken Vidina (as is aforeſaide) paſſed ouer the great Riuer of Danubius, and grieuouſly ſpoiled Valachia: From whence hee returned loaden with a great prey. This was the firſt time (that I read of) that the Turks euer paſ-ſed ouer the Riuer Danubius. At this time alſo Iegides Baſſa entred the kingdome of Boſna, G from whence he carried a great number of captiues to Hadrianople, where Baiazet ſpent that Winter.

Philadelphia beſieged by Baiazet.

In the beginning of the next Spring Baiazet paſſed ouer Helleſpontus to Pruſa, where hee built a faire Mahometan temple, with a colledge, and an almes-houſe: which works finiſhed, he returned againe into Europe, and built a monaſterie at Hadrianople: and ſo returned againe into Aſia, leauing Temurtaſes, Begler-Beg (or his viceroy) in Hadrianople. After he was come into Aſia, he laid ſiege to the ſtrong city of Philadelphia in Lydia, which was at that time the onely citie in the leſſer Aſia, yet holden by the Chriſtians in the middeſt of the Mahometane Princes: for now was the Greeke Emperour by the Othoman Kings & the other Turks quite driuen out of the leſſer Aſia. In the beginning of this ſiege, Baiazet gaue ſtraight commandement H to his ſouldiers, That they ſhall not ſpoile or hurt any thing in the countrey belonging to the citizens: hoping by ſuch faigned courteſie to make them the more willing to yeeld themſelues vnto his obedience. But diſappointed of his expectation, and finding them reſolued to hold it out vnto the laſt, he forthwith gaue out contrarie commandement, not to ſpare any thing they could waſte or deſtroy: which was accordingly by his greedie ſouldiers performed. After long ſiege, the citizens ſeeing the country about them vtterly waſted, & themſelues vnable longer to indure, and out of all hope of reliefe, yeelded their citie vnto the pleaſure of Baiazet. It is written by ſome, that this famous citie was not beſieged without the conſent of the Emperor of Conſtantinople: and that the Greeks themſelues, moued with enuie to ſee that citie ſo long hold out, did helpe the Turkes in the winning thereof. I

In time of this ſiege Aidin Ogli Prince of Caria, a Mahometane, came to Baiazet, and yeelded himſelfe into his power as his vaſſale: vnto whom Baiazet reſtored certain places which he had in this expedition a little before taken from him: yet vpon ſuch condition, as that hee ſhould not from that time coine any mony in his own name, either be remembred in publick praiers as a prince in their Mahometan temples, as he had before bin: but that all ſuch things ſhould be done in the name of Baiazet, as his dread Lord & Soueraigne. With which diſgrace the poore Prince was glad to content himſelfe, and to liue as his vaſſale. From Philadelphia he led his armie into the country of Saruchania, in ancient time called Ionia Maritima, which he ſubdued vnto himſelfe vpon like conditions. After that, he paſſed farther to Menteſia, or Mentz, ſometime called Myndos in Caria; the Prince whereof for feare fled to Cutrun Baiazet, K Prince of Caſtamona and part of Pontus, leauing his countrey to the pleaſure of the Tyrant. And foraſmuch as the young King of Caramania had inuaded his countries whileſt he was buſied in Europe, Baiazet in reuenge thereof entred with his armie into Caramania, and tooke Ceſaria, with diuers other places there: ſo that the young King diſcouraged with the loſſe of his townes, and fearing Baiazet his greatneſſe, was glad to hold himſelfe content with his loſſe, and to make peace with him as it pleaſed him to grant it. As Baiazet was making this expedition into Caramania, another young Mahometan Prince, the ſonne of Prince Germian, came vnto him with one of his chiefe counſellors, and were both by him ſent priſoners ouer the ſtrait to the caſtle of Ipſala, where they lay in durance many yeares after. Thus Baiazet hauing oppreſſed & wronged moſt of the Mahometan Princes, the ſucceſſors of Sultan Aladin in L the leſſer Aſia, at laſt returned againe himſelfe in triumph to Pruſa.

The Prince of Menteſia, who for feare of Baiazet was fled out of his countrey, as is aforeſaid, had now incited Cutrun Baiazet, Prince of Caſtamona, with a great power to inuade that ſide of Baiazet his kingdome which bordered vpon him. Which Baiazet vnderſtanding, gathered a great armie to goe againſt this Mahometane Prince. At which very time the Vayuod of Valachia, hearing of Baiazet his troubles in Aſia, with a ſtrong armie paſſed ouer Danubius into thoſe parts of Seruia and Bulgaria that were by the Turks as then poſſeſſed; where he ſpoyled the countrey, and ſlew great numbers of the Turkes, making Mahometan Saints and martyrs by heapes: for ſo the Turkes account all them whom the Chriſtians kill in their warre: which done, hee retired backe againe into Valachia, carrying with him alſo many of M the Turkes priſoners. Baiazet thus at once inuaded both in Aſia and Europe, deferred his warres purpoſed againſt the Prince of Pontus, vntill a more conuenient time, conuerting his forces againſt the Valachians. Wherefore paſſing ouer the ſtraite to Hadrianople, hee ſent his armie from thence to Nicopolis, and there paſſing the Riuer of Danubius, entered into Valachia, burning and ſpoiling the countrey before him as he went. Where the Vayuod to repreſſe his furie, met him in the field and gaue him battell, but was therein ouerthrowne, and many of his people ſlaine; ſo that at laſt he was glad to ſue for peace, which he obtained, by ſubmitting himſelfe to Baiazet, and yeelding to pay him a yearely tribute.

Whileſt Baiazet was thus buſied in Valachia, news was brought vnto him, That the Chriſtians of the Weſt with a fleet of Gallies did great harme alongſt the coaſts of his dominions in Aſia. In reuenge whereof, he entred with his armie into Theſſalie, deſtroying all the countrey vnto Theſſalonica: in which expedition he tooke the Citie of Neapolis in Greece, and Ioannina in Ætolia, and after that returned into Aſia, where he ſpent that Winter.

Theſſalia inuaded by Baiazet.

In the beginning of the next Spring, he with a great power paſſed the ſtrait of Callipolis to Hadrianople, intending to haue inuaded Hungarie. But as he was vpon the way, it chanced that a Conſtantinopolitan ſpie was by the Turks intercepted, with letters from the Greeke Emperor to the King of Hungarie, giuing him warning both of the Turks preparation & comming. By which ſpie Baiazet alſo vnderſtood of another meſſenger before ſent into Hungarie for like purpoſe. Whereupon Temurtaſes (then his great lieutenant in Europe) perſuaded him to deſiſt from his intended wars in Hungarie, and to beſiege the imperial city of Conſtantinople, as a thing of more honour, and leſſe danger; the city being alreadie (as he ſaid, and as in truth it was) ſurrounded with the Turkiſh prouinces: bringing in Philadelphia (but a few yeres before woon) for example of the like exploit. Of whoſe councell Baiazet liking well, returned with his armie, and ſhortly aftet came & ſate downe therewith before Conſtantinople, laying hard ſiege thereunto, firſt by land, and after by ſea, with his gallies ſent from Callipolis. Which hard ſiege continued (as moſt hiſtories report) the ſpace of eight yeres: in which long time he draue the Emperor Emanuel Palæologus to that ſtrait, that he was glad to leaue his city, & himſelfe in perſon to craue aid of Wenceſlaus the Germane Emperour, and Charles the ſixth the French King, and other Chriſtian Princes alſo. At which time the Citiſens were at length brought to ſuch extremitie, that they were euen at the point to haue yeelded vp the city; and happely had ſo done, had not Sigiſmund King of Hungarie (aſſiſted with a great armie of the French, & other voluntarie Chriſtians almoſt out of euery patt of Chriſtendome, to the number of an hundred and thirty thouſand, vnder the leading of Iohn Countie of Niuers, and after Duke of Burgondie) for the reliefe of the beſieged Emperour, paſſed ouer Danubius into the Turkiſh dominions; and there hauing recouered Vidina, with certaine other ſtrong Holds in Bulgaria, layd ſiege to Nicopolis: out of which citie the Turkes oftentimes ſallied, and gaue him many an hot skirmiſh. It is reported, That the yong King Sigiſmund beholding the greatneſſe of his armie, in his great jollitie hearing of the comming of the Turkes Armie, ſhould proudly ſay, What need we to feare the Turke, who need not at all to feare the falling of the heauens; which if they ſhould fall, yet were we able with our ſpeares and halberts to hold them vp for falling vpon vs. But Baiazet vnderſtanding what ſpoyle the Hungarian King had made in his late gained Countries, and of the ſiege of Nicopolis; commanded the ladders and other great prouiſion now in readineſſe for the ſcaling and aſſaulting of the citie of Conſtantinople, to be burnt, becauſe they ſhould not come into the hands of the Chriſtians; & ſo raiſing his ſiege, marched with a right puiſſant armie to Nicopolis, ſending Eurenoſes before, of purpoſe to intercept ſome of the Chriſtians, thereby to learne the ſtate of their campe and armie. But they hearing of his comming, ſo well looked to themſelues, that he with ſhame returned to his maſter as he came, without any one priſoner taken. Which thing much troubled Baiazet, as fearing he ſhould haue to doe with a warie enemie. Sigiſmund vnderſtanding of the approch of Baiazet, leauing a ſufficient power for the continuing of the ſiege, roſe himſelfe, and with the reſt of his Armie went to meet his proud enemie. Of whoſe comming and approch Baiazet vnderſtanding, diuided his Armie into two parts; and being now come within the ſight of the Chriſtian Armie, made ſhew but of the one halfe, keeping himſelfe cloſe in ſecret ambuſh not farre off with the other. The Chriſtians deeming themſelues (as they were) fat more in number than the Turkes which they ſaw, diuided their Armie alſo into two parts, purpoſing betwixt them to haue incloſed the Turks. Of all the Chriſtians that were there preſent, the French deſired to haue the honour of the firſt charge to be giuen vpon the Turks, and in their heat vpon good hope ſet forward (the Hungarians, with a great part of the Armie, not yet ſet in order) and ſo began the battell: where betwixt them and the Turkes was fought a right Conſtantinople eight yeares beſieged by Baiazet.

cruell fight, and in a little time many thouſands ſlaine. But this fight had not long endured, when Baiazet with the other halfe of his armie ſuddenly ariſing, came on with ſuch violence, as well became his ſyrname of Gilderun or lightning; and ſo hardly charged the French, that they amaſed at the ſuddenneſſe of the danger, and oppreſſed with the furie and multitude of the vnexpected enemy, ſtood at the firſt as men diſmaid; but ſeeing no remedie, encouraging one another, valiantly fought it out vntill they were almoſt all either ſlaine or taken priſoners; ſtill in hope to haue been relieued by the Hungarians and the reſt. In this hard conflict diuers of the French horſemen hauing forſaken their horſes, fought on foot, as their manner was: which horſes running backe without their riders, vpon the Hungarians, cauſed them to doubt that the French were quite ouerthrowne; wherewith diſmayed, they without further comming on, all turned their backs and fled, in ſo great haſt, as that it booted not the King or any other great commander to goe about to ſtay their flight. The French thus by their too much haſt ouerthrowne, the Turks purſuing the Hungarians and the reſt of the Chriſtians, made of them a great ſlaughter: of whom alſo many were drowned in the great riuer Danubius. At which time alſo the Turks tooke ſo many priſoners, that it was thought euery ſeuerall Turke had his priſoner. King Sigiſmund himſelfe, who but a little before had deſpiſed euen the falling of the heauens, had then alſo vndoubtedly fallen into his enemies hands, had he not in a little boat by good hap got ouer Danubius: not vnlike another Xerxes, who hauing couered the ſeas with his ſhips, & with a world of men paſſed ouer into Grecia, was afterwards by the ſtrange change of fortune, himſelf alone in a ſmal fiſher boat glad to get back again into Aſia. Sigiſmund beeing thus got ouer Danubius, and fearing the violence of the Hungarians for the loſſe of the battell, fled by ſea into Thracia vnto Conſtantinople, from whence he ſailed vnto the Iſland of the Rhodes; and from thence ſailing thorow the Ægean and Ionian ſea, landed at length at Dalmatia; and ſo hauing wandred from place to place, toſſed with many fortunes, after eighteene moneths long and painefull trauell returned againe into Hungary. Where hee found the ſtate of his kingdome in his abſence much troubled, the contrarie faction in the meane time hauing made choice of Ladiſlaus King of Naples for their King; who was euen then with a great armie going to haue taken poſſeſſion of the kingdome, had not Sigiſmund in good time, by the helpe of certaine of the chiefe of the Hungarian nobilitie preuented him. In this battell, called the battell of Nicopolis, were of the Chriſtians twentie thouſand ſlain, and of the Turks three ſcore thouſand. The Countie of Niuiers the French Kings neere kinſman, was there taken priſoner, with three hundred great commanders more: where after hee had endured great contumelie and reproch in the preſence of Baiazet, he was commanded to make choice of fiue other of the captaines, ſuch as he liked beſt, all the reſt beeing cut in pieces before his face, and hee with the other fiue left aliue, ſent priſoners to Pruſa, from whence they were afterwards ranſomed for two hundred thouſand Duckats. This bloudie battell of Nicopolis was fought in the yere of our Lord 1396.

Conſtantinople the ſecond time beſieged by Baiazet.

Baiazet after this great victorie, hauing worthily relieued his beſieged citie, returned againe to the ſiege of Conſtantinople, laying more hardly vnto it than before, building forts and bulwarks againſt it on the one ſide towards the land; and paſſing ouer the ſtraight of Boſphorus, built a ſtrong caſtle vpon that ſtrait ouer againſt Conſtantinople, to impeach ſo much as was poſſible, all paſſage thereunto by ſea. This ſtreight ſiege (as moſt write) continued alſo two yeres, which I ſuppoſe by the circumſtance of the hiſtorie, to haue been part of the aforeſaid eight yeres. Emanuel the beſieged Emperor wearied with theſe long wars, ſent an embaſſador to Baiazet to intreat with him a peace: which Baiazet was the more willing to hearken vnto, for that he heard newes, that Tamerlane the great Tartarian Prince intended ſhortly to warre vpon him. Yet could this peace not be obtained, but vpon condition, that the emperor ſhould grant free libertie for the Turks to dwell together in one ſtreet of Conſtantinople, with free exerciſe of their owne religion and lawes, vnder a judge of their owne nation; and further, to pay vnto the Turkiſh King a yeerely tribute of ten thouſand duckats. Which diſhonourable conditions the diſtreſſed Emperor was glad to accept of. So was this long ſiege broken vp, and preſently a great ſort of Turks with their families were ſent out of Bithynia, to dwell in Conſtantinople, and a church there built for them: which not long after was by the Emperor pulled downe to the ground, and the Turks againe driuen out of the citie, at ſuch time as Baiazet was by the mightie Tamerlane ouerthrowne and taken priſoner.

Baiazet in the beginning of his raigne, preſently after the death of Lazarus the Deſpot, ſlain in the battell of Coſſoua, woon part of Seruia, (as is aforeſaid) the other part beeing ſtill holden by Lazarus his ſon, called Stephen the Deſpot; who about this time ſent an honorable embaſſador to Baiazet with louing letters, and royall Preſents: by which embaſſador alſo the old Princeſſe Lazarus his widow, offred her faire daughter Deſpina, Stephens ſiſter, a lady of incomparable beauty, in mariage to him, if it ſhould pleaſe him to vouchſafe his handmaid (as ſhe termed her) ſo high a place. This lady was long before promiſed him, whileſt his father Amurath yet liued. Of this embaſſador Baiazet was verie glad, but eſpecially for the faire ladies ſake: which being known to the Princes her mother, & the Deſpot her brother, ſhe was forthwith honorably ſent to Baiazet, and ſo to him with great ſolemnitie and triumph ſhortly after maried. Of all his wiues he held her deereſt, and for her ſake reſtored to her brother Stephen the citie & caſtle of Semendre (otherwiſe called S. Andrew) and Columbarium in Seruia: ſhe allured him to drink wine, forbidden the Turks by their law; and cauſed him to delight in ſumptuous banquets, which his predeceſſors, Othoman, Orchanes, and Amurath, neuer vſed.

Baiazet marrieth Deſpina the faire daughter of Lazarus the Deſpot.

As the Turkiſh kingdome grew in greatneſſe, ſo corruption, the canker of great ſtates and commonweales, increaſed likewiſe; but eſpecially in the men of law, and judges of his courts. Wherewith Baiazet grieuouſly offended, commanded diuers of the ſame judges to be apprehended, determinig (to the terror of others) to haue executed them; whoſe dangerous eſtate was much pittied, and alſo fauoured of Alis Baſſa, and other the Kings great Councellors: yet for ſo much as Baiazet was of a furious nature, and in his anger dangerous to be ſpoken vnto, none of them durſt aduenture to intreat him in their behalfe; no not Alis Baſſa, Charadyn Baſſa his ſonne, ſometime Iudge of Pruſa, although he were a man in ſuch ſpeciall fauour with him, that he was therefore of the common people not onely reuerenced, but as the King himſelfe honoured.

There was at that time in the court an Æthiopian jeaſter, who vnder ſome couert pleaſant jeaſt, would many times bolt out that to the king in his greateſt heat, which his graueſt councellors durſt not once ſpeake to him of in ſecret: this jeſter, Alis Baſſa requeſted to deuiſe ſome means to intreat with the angrie King in the behalfe of theſe Iudges; promiſing to giue him what he would reaſonably deſire, if he could appeaſe the Kings diſpleaſure. The Æthyopian without feare vndertooke the matter, & preſently putting vpon his head a rich hat al wrought ouer with gold, after the manner of the Turks embaſſadors, and fitting himſelfe with other apparell better beſeeming an embaſſador than a jeaſter; thus attired preſented himſelfe before the King, with a great counterfeit grauitie. Whereat Baiazet maruelling, asked him the cauſe why he was ſo gay. I haue a requeſt vnto your Maieſty (ſaid he) and wiſh to find fauor in your ſight. Baiazet more deſirous than before to know the matter, asked what his requeſt was. If it ſtand with your pleaſure (ſaid the jeaſter) I would faine go as your embaſſador to the emperor of Conſtantinople, in hope whereof I haue put my ſelfe in this readineſſe. To what purpoſe wouldſt thou go? (ſaid Baiazet) To craue of the Emperor (ſaid he) ſome forty or fifty of his old graue Monks and Friers to bring with me hither to the court. And what ſhould they doe here? (ſaid Baiazet) I would haue them placed (ſaid the jeaſter) in the roomes of the old doting judges, whom you intend (as I heare) to put to death. Why (ſaid Baiazet) I can place others of my own people in their roomes. True (ſaid the Æthyopian) for grauitie of look and countenance, and ſo would the old Monks and Friers ſerue as well; but not ſo learned in your laws and cuſtomes of your kingdome, as are thoſe in your diſpleaſure. If they be learned (ſaid Baiazet) why do they then contrary to their learning, peruert juſtice, and take bribes? There is a good reaſon for that too (ſaid the jeaſter.) What reaſon? (ſaid the King.) That can hee that there ſtandeth by tell better than I, (ſaid the jeaſter, pointing to Alis Baſſa:) who forthwith commanded by Baiazet to giue the reaſon; with great reuerence before done, ſhewed, That thoſe Iudges ſo in diſpleaſure, were not conueniently prouided for, and were therefore inforced many times for their neceſſarie maintenance to take rewards, to the ſtaying of the due courſe of juſtice. Which Baiazet vnderſtanding to be true, commanded Alis Baſſa to appoint them conuenient ſtipends for their maintenance, and forthwith granted their pardon. Wherevpon the Baſſa ſet downe order, That of euerie matter in ſuit exceeding one thouſand Aſpers, the Iudge ſhould haue twentie Aſpers fee for judgment; and for euery writing and inſtrument out of the court, twelue Aſpers: which fees they yet take in thoſe courts at this day.

Not long after, Baiazet in his furie ſent for certain of his captaines and commanders of his men of war, with whom he was for ſome ſmall occaſion grieuouſly offended, intending in his rage to haue put them all to death, which was with him no great matter. Theſe captains being brought before him, the councellors ſeeing him al in choler, ſat looking on the ground, hanging down their heads, as the manner of the Turks is, not daring to looke him in the face, nor to ſpeak a good word for them. When ſuddenly the aforeſaid Æthiopian jeaſter ſtept forth, earneſtly requeſting the king, not to ſhew them any fauour, but to execute them preſently, as villains & traitors; railing vpon them, as if he had known ſome great fault by them. Baiazet thinking he could haue accuſed them of ſome great crime, becauſe of his earneſtneſſe, asked what reaſon he had ſo to exclaime againſt them. Reaſon, (quoth the jeaſter) becauſe the knaues be good for nothing; and they ſay that Tamerlane is with a great army comming againſt vs: if you wil but take vp an enſigne in your hand, and I go before you with a drum, I wil ſtrike vp ſuch a terrible march, and you make ſuch a dreadfull ſhew, that we ſhall need none of theſe bad fellows or their ſoldiers in the field to get the victory ouer our enemies. This conceit of the jeaſter ſtruck ſuch a melancholie imagination into Baiazet his head, that hee ſtood muſing a great while as it were in a deepe ſtudie: at laſt hauing well conſidered the drift of the jeſters ſpeech, and his furie now ſomewhat aſſuaged, granted them pardon, which they looked not for.

This Æthyopian jeaſter, Baiazet vpon a time ſent vnto the old Queene his mother, to bring her newes of the good ſucceſſe of his wars againſt the Chriſtians, for that ſhe had ſo deſired: who comming vnto her, of by her commanded to ſit down, ſhe began to demand of him, how the King her ſonne did, and of the ſucceſſe of his wars. Whereunto he anſwered, That hee did very wel, and had woon from the Chriſtians a great countrey, and greatly inriched his ſoldiers. But after a little more talke, the Queene mother deſirous to heare againe the good newes, (or elſe after the manner of ſome, which thinke nothing ſufficiently told, except it be told an hundred times) asked him againe, how the King her ſonne did, and how he ſped in his wars. Whereunto he anſwered euery word as before: but asking him the third time the verie ſame queſtion, how her ſon did? Do'ſt thou aske me ſo often (ſaid the Æthyopian) how hee doth? Bre Cachpe (ô whore, ſaid he) thou haſt brought forth a ſon like a diuell, who roaming vp and downe, doth nothing but burne and deſtroy the world where hee commeth. Whereat the Queen crying out, vp ſtart the Æthiopian, and betaking himſelfe to his heeles, was neuer more afterwards ſeene.

In the wars which Baiazet had againſt Sigiſmund, the Vayuod of Valachia had giuen aid vnto the Hungarian king; wherwith Baiazet being offended, determined now at length to be reuenged: and therefore intending to make war vpon the Valachian prince, left Temurtaſes his great lieutenant at Ancyra in Aſia, and ſo paſſed ouer Helleſpontus himſelfe againſt the Valachian. Vpon whoſe departure, Aladin his ſiſters ſonne the yong king of Caramania, with a great power came ſuddenly in the night to Ancyra, and tooke Temurtaſes priſoner: who then feared nothing leſſe, than in time of peace to be ſo ſurpriſed, and carried away in bonds into Caramania. But when he vnderſtood that Baiazet had ended his wars in Valachia, and was with victorie returned to Pruſa, he fearing his heauy indignarion for ſo great an outrage, preſently releaſed Temurtaſes out of priſon, apparelled him richly after the manner of that nation, craued pardon for the wrong he had done him, and ſet him at libertie to go whither he would, & withal ſent one of his noblemen with great gifts and Preſents to Baiazet, to make his excuſe in beſt manner he could: vnto which embaſſador Baiazet (yet in choler) would not giue audience, or ſuffer him to come in his ſight: but at the ſame time leuied a great armie to inuade Caramania. Which Aladin vnderſtanding, and now out of all hope to appeaſe this mightie enemie, leuied all the forces he could in his own kingdome, and withall entertained all the mercenarie ſoldiers he could get, intending to trie his fortune in the field, as a man of valour, rather than to be thruſt out of his kingdome like a coward: and ſo in readines, hearing of the comming of Baiazet, met him vpon the way, & at a place called Aczac gaue him battel: but being too weak, he was ouercome & put to flight; in which flight his horſe ſtumbling, & he falling to the ground, was there before he could recouer himſelf, taken by his enemies which had him in chaſe, and ſo brought bound to Baiazet: his two ſons Muhamet Beg & Alis Beg, being taken in that battell alſo, were ſent priſoners to Pruſa. Aladin himſelfe was by Baiazets command deliuered to his enemy Temurtaſes: who in reuenge of the wrong hee had before done him, preſently cauſed him to be hanged: which when Baiazet vnderſtood, he ſeemed verie ſorie that he had ſo put him to death, for that he was his owne ſiſters ſon. Baiazet following the courſe of his victorie, woon Iconium, Larenda, Nigde, with all the reſt of Aladin his kingdome. About this time alſo, Amaſia the great metropoliticall city of Capadocia, was by the prince thereof deliuered vnto Baiazet, being too weake himſelfe to defend the ſame againſt the force of Caſi-Burchanidin, Prince of the great and ſtrong citie of Sebaſtia, his enemie, now growne to be a man of great power in that part of Aſia, and had ſolicited the Sultan of Ægypt to aid him againſt Baiazet. Whereupon Baiazet returning from the conqueſt of Caramania, led his armie towards Sebaſtia, where the Citiſens had a little before depriued Caſi-Burchanidin of his gouernment, for his crueltie, and placed his ſonne in his ſtead: but in ſhort time no leſſe wearie of the ſon, than before of the father, they with like inconſtancie ſent word to Baiazet, That if he would come that way, they would yeeld vnto him the citie: vpon whoſe approch, Caſis (his ſon) for feare fled out of the citie, to Prince Naſradin his brother in law. After whoſe departure, the citiſens according to their promiſe, deliuered the citie vnto Baiazet at his comming, wherein he left Solyman his eldeſt ſonne gouernor. And ſo hauing in this notable expedition conquered the kingdome of Caramania, and taken the great cities of Amaſia and Sebaſtia, with moſt part of Capadocia, and all that part of Aſia which the Turks call Rumilia Aſiatica, hee returned to Pruſa and there wintred.

Amaſia yeelded vnto Baiazet.

Sebaſtia deliuered to Baiazet.

The next Spring, Baiazet hearing that his old enemy Cutrun Baiazet prince of Caſtamona & Pontus, was dead, came to Caſtamona with a great armie: which Iſſendiar (Cutrun Baiazets ſonne, and then Prince of that countrey) hearing, fled out of the citie of Synope, a little Citie vpon the coaſt of the Euxine: from whence he ſent an Embaſſador to Baiazet, humbly requeſting him, to ſuffer him to haue that little citie, as his ſeruant to liue in, (which he was ſure he would otherwiſe beſtow vpon ſome other of his ſeruants) and not to ſeeke the innocent bloud of the ſonne for the fathers offence. Which his requeſt Baiazet, mooued with pittie, eaſily granted: yet neuertheleſſe tooke from him Caſtamona, with the greateſt part of his dominion in Pontus, which he gaue to his ſonne Solyman. At the ſame time hee violently oppreſſed the prince Germean, and tooke from him the cities of Deſpotopolis and Hierapolis, with all the reſt of his dominion.

Baiazet inuadeth Iſſendiar Prince of Caſtamona.

The Prince of Menteſia long before driuen out of his countrie by Baiazet, (as is before declared) and hauing all this while made his abode at Caſtamona, doubting now of his owne ſafetie, after the death of his good friend Cutrun Baiazet, in the habit of an hermit fled to the great Tartarian Prince Tamerlane.

Baiazet returning to Pruſa, there built a magnificent Mahometane Temple; during which worke he with great ſuperſtition forbore drinking of wine, repoſing himſelfe with the companie of graue and learned men, and the adminiſtration of iuſtice: whereby hee greatly woon the hearts of his ſubiects, and had now ſo inlarged his kingdome, that all Kings and Princes bordring vpon him ſtood in great feare of him.

It fortuned about this time, that Achmetes King of Bagdat (or new Babylon) and Eiracum, with Ioſephus Niger King of Colchis, inforced with the violent incurſions of Tamerlane & his Tartars, for ſafegard of their liues were glad to flie into Syria: where they being diſcouered, were both caſt in priſon by the commandment of the Ægyptian Sultan, who then commanded ouer Syria: from whence they afterwards hardly eſcaping, fled to Baiazets court. Where after Achmetes had ſtayd two moneths, he by the aid of Baiazet recouered the poſſeſſion of Eiracum part of his own inheritance. Ioſephus the other Mahometane King hauing tarried in Baiazets court eight moneths, at length procured him to inuade the dominions of the Ægyptian Sultan: in which expedition he mightily preuailed, and hauing ſlaine the Ægyptian Sultans General, and diſcomfited his forces, tooke the citie of Malatie or Meletine in Armenia, with Diorige, Derende, and Bexene, taken from the Turcomans, and ſpoyled all the country thereabouts. From thence marching with his armie towards Erznitzane, the Prince thereof called Tachretin met him vpon the way, yeelding his citie and country into his power; which Baiazet preſently gaue to Ioſephus Niger: who after he had ſix days enioyed this new gouernment, finding the people vnwilling to be gouerned by him a ſtranger, ſurrendered the ſame againe into the hands of him that gaue it. Whereupon the Citiſens of Erznitzane humbly requeſted of Baiazet, That they might be againe gouerned by their old Prince Tachretin, now his vaſſall: Which thing he at their earneſt requeſt granted : but taking his wife and children as a G pledge of his loyalty, ſent them away to Pruſa, where they were all not long after made away.

The Mahometan princes of Aſia oppreſſed by Baiazet, diſguiſed flie vnto Tamerlane for ayd.

When Baiazet had now many yeres thus mightily preuailed againſt the Chriſtian Princes in Romania, Bulgaria, Boſna, Theſſalia, Valachia, & other places of Europe, as is before declared, and inflamed with inſatiable ambition, had in worſe manner oppreſſed the Mahometane Kings and Princes of Aſia (of whom ſome were by him ſlaine, ſome driuen into exile , ſome impriſoned , and otherſome brought into ſuch ſubiection , that they liued as it were but at his deuotion) and was now growne to that greatneſſe, that in the pride of his heart he ſtood in feare of no man, but was (as he thought) a terror vnto the world, hauing vnder his obeyſance great and large dominions in Europe, but farre greater in Aſia: it fortuned that diuers of theſe miſerable & diſcontented Mahometane Princes, by great fortune, as if it had bin by appoint- H ment, to meet together at the Court of the great Tartarian Prince Tamerlane , whether they were fled for reliefe and ſuccor. The Prince Germian Ogli, after long impriſonment in the ca-ſtle of Ipſala in Europe, brake priſon, and with Hiſſar-beg his great councellour and priſon fellow, conſorted themſelues with a companie of loytring companions, roaming from place to place, delighting the countrey people with their apiſh toyes : in which companie hee paſſed Helleſpontus, as a Beareward, and at length with much ado came to Tamerlane his court: whether the Prince of Menteſia was come before in the habit of an hermit (as is aforeſaid) with his head and beard ſhauen : Aidin Ogli paſſing thorow the countrey as a pedlar, with a packe at his backe, came thither alſo: the Prince Tachretin as a ſeruingman, came attending vpon the prince Iſſendiar ; who came alſo, but in ſome better faſhion than the reſt, as an Embaſſador from ſome I other prince. All theſe poore princes, with diuers others in like miſerie, in ſhort time arriued at Samarcand (great Tamerlane his court;) euery one particularly complaining of his own priuat griefe, and all together earneſtly requeſting that mighty prince, to take vpon him their defence, and to reuenge the wrong done vnto them by the Turkiſh tyrant Baiazet. Whoſe pit-tifull complaints much mooued the noble Tartarian ; but eſpecially the long and wrongfull impriſonment of Germian Ogli ; and the pittifull complaint and moane of Tachretin, who had of late loſt his wife and children by the crueltie of Baiazet. Yet in this matter of ſo great and important conſequence, Tamerlane made no great ſhew of his forwardneſſe, (although he was by nature in nothing more delighted, than in the relieuing of the diſtreſſed, and chaſtiſing of the proud) but coldly anſwered theſe Princes, That hee could not tell whither all were ſo as I they had reported of Baiazet, or not, but that hee well knew him to be a very zealous King in ſetting forth of the Mahometan religion ; and that he had therefore made great warres vpon the Chriſtians, in which godly cauſe (he ſaid) perhaps they had refuſed to aſſiſt him, or elſe had giuen him ſome other greater occaſion of offence, to him vnknown : For I can hardly beleeue (ſaid he) that ſo great and religious a prince as he, would without iuſt and ſufficient cauſe, offer ſuch violence as you complaine of, eſpecially vnto you his neighbour princes, and of the ſame religion with himſelfe: neuertheleſſe, whatſoeuer I intend concerning your requeſt (ſaid Tamerlane) I will ſend firſt an Embaſſadour vnto him, to vnderſtand more of him and his proceedings, before I reſolue vpon any thing : with which anſwer he willed them vntill then to hold themſelues contented. But as Tamerlane was about to haue diſpatched his Embaſſador to L Baiazet, he was aduertiſed, that Achmetes late King of new Babylon, and Ioſephus King of Col-chis, both by him driuen out of their Kingdomes, hauing broken out of priſon from the Sultan of Ægypt, were now come to Baiazet his court, to craue his aid and aſſiſtance: wherefore he deferred to ſend his Embaſſadour, ſuſpecting that Baiazet incited by theſe two exiled Kings, would firſt in their quarrell begin to make war vpon him. But not long after , vnderſtanding that they were both again departed from his court, as is before declared ; he then diſpatched his embaſſador to Baiazet, with many rich gifts and Preſents ; curteouſly requeſting him, the rather for his ſake, to deale kindly with theſe poore Mahometan princes, his friends ; as alſo with the Greeke Emperor Emanuel his allye, for whom he was now become an interceſſour vnto him. Some report alſo, that he beſides this, requeſted to haue the two aforeſaid Maho- M metan Kings of Bagdat and Colchis deliuered vnto him ; and withal ſeemed not a little to diſ-like of Baiazet his proceedings againſt the Turcomans his friends. But Baiazet being a prince of a great and haughtie ſpirit, and vnaccuſtomed to heare of any thing which fitted not his humor, highly offended with this embaſſage, in great ſcorne reiected the Preſents by Tamer- lane

A lane ſent to him, and ſpecially certain garments which Tamberlane after the manner of thoſe Eaſterne nations, had in kindnes amongſt other things ſent him: willing the embaſſador to bid his maſter meddle with his owne matters, and to preſcribe lawes vnto his owne ſubiects, and not vnto him, with whom he had nought to do; & to ſend his raggs for preſents vnto his inferiours, and not vnto Princes of greater power and ſtate than himſelfe. Adding thereunto many other words full of deſpight and diſdain, affording him no better ſtile than the plain name of Tamberlane: calling him the husband of a whore, if he met him not in the field; and wiſhing vnto himſelfe againe, to take vnto him his thrice diuorced wife, after ſhe had bin polluted by another man (as the greateſt diſhonor that might be) if he failed to meet him whereſoeuer he durſt to dare him battel. Which proud anſwere of the Turke, by the embaſſador reported B vnto Tamberlane, and aggrauated by Axalla (a Chriſtian of the race of the Genowaies, born at Capha, and then one of the greateſt counſellors about him, and the Greeke Emperours great friend) was ſo euill taken by him, that all other things ſet apart, he reſolued to go againſt the Turke, and to take in hand that war, as of all other the fitteſt for the increaſe of his honor and glorie. Beſides that, he thought it not in reaſon fit for the greatnes of the Tartarian empire, to ſuffer ſuch an vnquiet neighbor to grow great; as ſtill enchroching vpon other the weak Princes confining to him, and adding conqueſts vnto conqueſts; and yet neuer the more contented, might in the end proue dangerous vnto his owne eſtate and ſoueraigntie: a common care to ſuch as be themſelues great, & mounted vp vnto the higheſt degrees of worldly honour, to haue in iealouſie and diſtruſt the ſudden riſing of others neer or farther off; as perillous or diſgracefull C to themſelues, or their eſtate: whoſe growing greatnes they therefore ſeeke by all meanes to hinder; as did now the mightie Tamberlane the proceedings and increaſing of the great Othoman king, Baiazet: and the rather being continually prickt forward ſo to do, by the ſolicitation of the Greek Emperor Emanuel, the other oppreſſed Mahometan Princes, and by the great captain Axalla (as is aforeſaid) a Chriſtian: of whom for all that Tamberlane himſelf, a Mahometan, for the great fidelitie, valor and vertue he found in him, made no ſmal reckoning, but was contented euen in his greateſt and moſt waightie affaires to be by him aduiſed; diſliking of no man for his religion whatſoeuer, ſo as he did worſhip but one only God, creator of heauen & earth, and of al that therin is: being himſelfe of opinion, That God in eſſence one, & in himſelfe imutable, without change or diuerſity; yet for the manifeſting of his omnipotencie D & power, as he had created in the world ſundry kinds of people, much diffring both in nature, manners, & condition, and yet al framed to the image of himſelf: ſo was he alſo contented to be of them diuerſly ſerued, according to the diuerſity of their natures & manners: ſo that they worſhipt none other ſtrange gods, but him alone, the maker and creator of all things: which was the cauſe that he ſuffered the vſe of al religions within the countries ſubiect to his obedience, were they not meere Atheiſts, Idolaters, or worſhippers of ſtrange and vain gods.

Tamberlane his opinion concerning the diuerſity of religions

Neither was proud Baiazet as one ignorant of the power or purpoſe of Tamberlane, in the meane time idle, but ſtil proſecuted his good fortune for the inlarging of his empire, and increaſing of his ſtrength: wiſely deeming (as the truth was) whatſoeuer meſſages were ſent to him from Tamberlane, to be no other than meere threatnings & forewarnings of his more dangerous E purpoſes and deſignes againſt him and his ſtate: which he was ſo far from fearing, as that to prouoke him the more, hee ſpared no intemperate ſpeech, which might mooue him to wrath; wiſhing (as ſhould ſeeme) for nothing more, than to meet him in the field, there to try the fortune of a battell with him. So weake is our foreſight of our fortunes to come, and the reach of our vnderſtanding for the apprehenſion or declining of the fatal doom euen preſently hanging ouer our heads; as that we oftentimes through ignorance moſt deſirouſly wiſh for thoſe things which are vnto vs the chiefe occaſions of our vtter ruine and ouerthrow.

But here before we enter into farther diſcourſe of the mortal war betwixt theſe two ſo puiſſant Princes, it ſhall not be much from our purpoſe to ſtep a little out of the way, to ſee what this mighty Tamberlane (of whom ſo many Princes craued aid) was, who liuing, held the Eaſt F in ſuch awe, as that he was commonly called, The wrath of God, and Terror of the world, which he then filled with the glorie of his name. Moſt Hiſtoriographers report him to haue bin poorly borne, of baſe and obſcure parents: and ſo himſelfe alſo in his youth to haue liued as a poore ſhepheard or heardſman in the mountains; where conſorting himſelfe with other ſturdy companions of like qualitie and diſpoſition, ſuch as there liued by robbing of marchants & other

The baſe opinion ſome haue, concerning the birth & riſing of Tamberlane paſſengers, he became a maſterfull theefe amongſt them: vnto whom other ſuch leaud mates daily ſtill more and more reſorting, he in ſhort time grew (as they ſay) to that greatnes, that he is reported to haue been of ſuch power, as neuer man but he euer yet came vnto. A matter alſo moſt incredible: for albeit that the Roman empire, yea and this great empire of the Turks alſo, with ſome others, had their beginnings not much better or greater, the one vnder Romulus, and the other vnder Othoman; yet grew they not as on the ſudden, in their times to any great luſtre (neither was it poſſible for them of ſo ſmall beginnings ſo to do) but by many degrees, and that in long time; euery of the ſucceeding Princes, according to their fortunes, adding ſomething to their ſtate, before it could be made great: wheras he (by their report) contrary to the courſe of things both naturall & ciuill (which from their ſmall beginnings grow to no notable perfection or greatnes, but by degrees, and that in the long reuolution of time) taking his beginning of nothing, grew vpon the ſudden to be a burthen & terror vnto the world. Wherin our late hiſtoriographers ſeem too much to haue followed the report of the Turks, who by him brought low, and their kingdom almoſt in one battel ſubuerted, report nothing ſimply of him; but in what they may, detracting from his worthy praiſes, wrongfully charge him with many vntruths, not concerning his parentage only, but euen in the courſe of his whole life alſo making him (as they would haue the world to beleeue) firſt to haue bin a very abiect among men; & then for his inhumane crueltie a very monſter in nature, or (as it was long before, but more truly ſaid of another great one much like himſelf) a lump of earth tempered with bloud. Which incredible reports concerning ſo great a monarch, I liſt not to follow, as to ful of diſhonor; eſpecially wheras others of no leſſe credit than they, with far more modeſtie & greater probability report of him the greateſt honor that may be. He was (as they & the others alſo ſay) borne at Samarcand, the chiefe citie of the Zagataian Tartars, pleaſantly ſcituated vpon the riuer Iaxartes: his father was called Zain Cham, or as ſome others wil, Og, Prince of the Zagataian Tartars, and of the country of Sachetay (ſometime part of the famous kingdom of Parthia) third in deſcent from Zingis, the great and fortunate leader of the Tartars, before in the former part of this hiſtorie remembred. Which Og, as a Prince of a peaceable nature (accounting it no leſſe honor quietly to keep the countries left him by his father, than with much trouble and no leſſe danger to ſeeke how to inlarge the ſame) long liued in moſt happie reſt with his ſubiects no leſſe happy than himſelfe: not ſo much ſeeking after the hoording vp of gold and ſiluer (things of that nation not regarded) as contenting himſelf with the increaſe and profit of his flocks of ſheep, and heards of cattell; then, and yet alſo, the principal reuenues of the Tartar Kings and Princes: which happily gaue occaſion to ſome, ignorant of the manner and cuſtome of thoſe Northern nations and countries, to account them al for ſheepheards and heardſmen; and ſo alſo to haue reported of this mightie Prince, as of a ſheepheards ſonne, or heardſman himſelfe: vainly meaſuring his nobility by the homely manner of his people and ſubiects, & not by the honor of his houſe, & heroical vertues, ſuch as were hardly to be found greater in any Prince of that or other former ages. His peaceable father now well ſtricken in yeres and weary of the world, deliuered vp vnto him (not yet paſt fifteene yeres old) the gouernment of his kingdom, ioyning vnto him two of his moſt faithful counſellors, Odmar and Aly, to aſſiſt him in the gouernment of his ſtate (retiring himſelfe vnto a ſolitarie life, the more at quiet to ſerue God, and ſo to end his days in peace:) which two his truſty ſeruants and graue counſellors he dearely loued whilſt they liued, and much honored the remembrance of them being dead. The firſt proofe of his fortune & valour, was againſt the Muſcouit, for ſpoiling of a citie which had put it ſelfe vnder his protection; and for entering of his countrey; and for proclaiming of war againſt him: whom he in a great battell ouerthrew, hauing ſlaine fiue and twentie thouſand of the Muſcouits footmen, and between fifteen and ſixteen thouſand horſemen, with the loſſe of ſcarce eight thouſand horſmen & foure thouſand footmen of his owne. After which battel he beholding ſo many thouſands of men there dead vpon the ground, was ſo far from reioicing thereat, that turning himſelf to one of his familiars, he lamented the condition of ſuch as commanded ouer great armies, commending his fathers quiet courſe of life; accounting him happy in ſeeking for reſt, & the other moſt vnhappy, which by the deſtruction of their own kind, ſought to procure their owne glory; proteſting himſelfe euen from his heart to be grieued to ſee ſuch ſad tokens of his victorie. With this ouerthrow the Muſcouit diſcouraged, ſent embaſſadors to him for peace, which vpon ſuch honourable conditions as pleaſed Tamberlane honourably deſcended.

The cauſe why ſome haue reported him to haue beene a ſheepheard or heardſman.

A pleaſed him to ſet downe, was by him granted, and ſo the peace concluded. Now the great Cham of Tartaria(his fathers brother)being grown old,and out of hope of any moe children, moued with the fame of his nephew, after this victorie ſent him diuers preſents,and withall offering him his onely daughter in mariage,and with her to proclaime him heire apparant vnto his empire; as in right he was,being his brothers ſonne,and the daughters not at al ſucceeding in thoſe empires.Which ſo great an offer Tamberlane gladly accepted,and ſo the mariage was afterwards with great triumph at the old Emperors court ſolemnized;and he proclaimed heire apparant vnto that great empire. Thus was Tamberlane indeed made great,being euer after this mariage by the old Emperor his vncle, and now his father in law, ſo long as he liued, notably ſupported,and after his death ſucceeding him alſo in that ſo mighty an empire. Yet in B the meane time wanted not this worthy Prince the enuious competitors of theſe his ſo great honors: inſomuch,that whilſt by the aduice and perſuaſion of the old Emperor,he was taking in hand to make warre againſt the great King of China (who had as then gone far beyond his bounds)and ſo was now wel onwards on his way,he was by the conſpiracie of Calix(a man of greateſt power & authority in the great Cham his court)almoſt thruſt out of his new empire: Calix with a right puiſſant armie hauing alreadie ſeized vpon the great citie of Cambalu, and the citizens alſo generally fauouring thoſe his traiterous proceedings, as diſdaining to be gouerned by the Zagatian Tartar. For redreſſe wherof, Tamberlane was enforced with the greateſt part of his armie to return,& meeting with the rebel(who then had in his armie fourſcore thouſand horſe,and an hundred thouſand foot)in a great and mortall battell (wherein of the C one ſide and of the other were more than fiftie thouſand men ſlaine) ouerthrew him(though not without the great danger of his own perſon, as being there himſelfe beaten downe to the ground)tooke him priſoner,and afterwards beheaded him. Which ſo dangerous a rebellion, with the death of the traitour,and the chiefe of the conſpirators repreſſed, and his ſtate in the newneſſe therof by this victorie well confirmed,he proceeded in his intended war againſt the great King of China; brake down the ſtrong wall,which the Chinoies had made foure hundred leagues long betwixt the mountains, for the repreſſing of the incurſions of the Tartars, entred their countrey, and meeting with the King, leading after him three hundred and fifty thouſand men (whereof there were an hundred and fiftie thouſand horſemen,and the reſt on foot)in a great and dreadfull battell, with the ſlaughter of 60000 of his men,ouercame him, D and tooke him priſoner: whom for all that he (in the courſe of ſo great a victorie wiſely moderating his fortune) ſhortly after ſet again at liberty,yet ſo,as that hauing before taken from him the one halfe of his kingdom,and therin left Odmar his truſtie lieutenant,with a ſufficient power for the reſtraining of the proud king, if he ſhould again begin to raiſe any new ſtirres; and withal impoſed ſuch other conditions as pleaſed himſelf,with the yerely tribute of three hundred thouſand crowns,he well prouided for the aſſuring of thoſe his new conqueſts: and ſo in triumph returned with victorie vnto the old Emperor his father in law at Cambalu,not a little glad to ſee both him and his daughter,who had in al thoſe wars ſtill accompanied him.
But leauing him,now thus by birth great,by his fortune greater,but by his vertue greateſt of all, (as able now to draw after him almoſt the whole power of the Eaſt)let vs againe returne E thither from whence we haue for the better knowledge of him, thus with him digreſſed.

Tamerlane marrieth the daughter and heire of the great Cham of Tartarie.

The war againſt the Turkiſh Sultan Baiazet(as is aforeſaid)by Tamberlane reſolued vpon,he ſent Axalla the great captaine to his country of Sachetay(called of ſome Zagatay)to giue beginning to the aſſembling of his forces from al parts;to the end,that with the firſt of the ſpring he might ſet forward for the releefe of ſo many diſtreſſed princes,& the abating of the pride of ſo great and mighty a tyrant as was Baiazet.Now had Tamberlane procured from the great Tartarian Emperor,his vncle and father in law,an hundred thouſand footmen,and foureſcore thouſand horſemen,hoping to haue as many moe from Sachetay his owne countrey, beſides the lords that for his honors ſake would accompany him in thathis ſo honorable an expedition, from whom he made account alſo of fiftie thouſand men more which they would bring vnto him,& diuers other great ſupplies which he expected from other places alſo; wherwith he doubted not well to performe what he had ſo honourably determined to take in hand,for the abating of the Othoman pride:for which & other ſuch like,he was(as he would oftentimes ſay)by God himſelfe appointed:ſo taking his leaue of the old Emperor his father in law,and of the princeſſe his wife(then left behind him for the comfort of her aged father)he departed from Cambalu towards Samarcand, the place of his birth and ſeat of his empire; leauing behind him the forces brought from the great Emperor his vncle, to come after him to Ozara, where he had appointed the general meeting of his army. At which time amongſt other Princes that thither brought or ſent their ſupplies, the great Muſcouite being requeſted ſo to do, promiſed to ſend him fifteen thouſand horſe, with a certain ſum of mony, and leaue for his armie to paſſe thorow ſo much of his territories as ſhould be neceſſary: al which he afterwards performed vnto Tamberlane, being glad that he did ſet vpon others, rather than on himſelfe; and that ſo great a preparation ſhould fall vpon them, whoſe greatnes was as dreadfull & dangerous vnto him as to any other. All the earth almoſt at that time being aſtoniſhed at the ſudden greatnes of this Othoman king, and the happy ſucceſſe he had in all his wars: not the leaſt cauſe that moued Tamberlane to oppoſe himſelfe againſt him, deeming it much better to goe and ſet vpon him in his new conqueſts, than to ſtay vntil he therin ſetled, were come neerer to him, and ſo ſhould debate the quarrell within his owne empire, to his dammage. A good and ſound reſolution: firſt in that it tended to the deſtruction of the enemies country; & then, that if any thing ſhould fal out otherwiſe with him than wel, his country ſhould not therby receiue any ſuch aſtoniſhment as if the danger were neerer or within the bowels of the ſame. Now in the mean time that Tamberlane lay at Samarchand, Axalla the great captaine & Tamberlane his lieutenant generall, had aſſembled all the army at Ozara. Whereof Tamberlane vnderſtanding, ſent for him to Samarcand, to confer with him about the ſetting forward of his army. For although he were ſtill accompanied with great renowned Princes, yet were they no body in compariſon of Axalla, whoſe ſound counſel had won him ſuch credit with his Lord & maſter, as by his aduice he did al things, and without him nothing: which his ſo great authority and fauor with his Prince, wanted not the enuie of the court, but that his great vertues, and rare ſound courteſie (in ſo great fortune) together with ſo many worthy ſeruices as he had done, ſupported him againſt the malice of the ſame. He by the commandement of Tamberlane, leauing the charge of the army at Ozara, with the prince of Thanais, another of Tamberlains great captains, came himſelfe to Samarcand, & there at large diſcourſed with him, about the eſtate and order of his army. And ſhortly after, departing with Axalla and the reſt from Samarcand, for to goe to Ozara the place where all his army met: being come thither, entred into a great conſultation with his moſt expert captaines, about the taking of his iourney, & conducting of his army: as whether it were better to lead the ſame by the coaſts of the Muſcouit directly towards Capha, or elſe on the other ſide of the Caſpian ſea by the skirts of Perſia: where after long diſcourſe and ſundry opinions with their reaſons deliuered, it was reſolued (although the way were the longer) to paſſe by the Muſcouit, ſo to come to the Georgians, & to Trebizonda, and from thence to enter into the Othoman King his country. And ſo ſetting forward from Ozara, he came at length to Maranis, where he ſtaied three dayes looking for the forces which Prince Odmar ſhould ſend him from China, not long before by him conquered: wherof he there receiued news, & there cauſed his army to be paid, and a general muſter therof to be taken. He had alſo there newes of the aid the Muſcouit did ſend him: and cauſed an infinite quantity of victuals, and moſt part of his furniture to be conueied by the Caſpian ſea, being a great commodity & eaſe to his army, which marching by land, was of neceſſity to paſſe ſome twenty leagues thorow places deſtitute both of victuals & water. Tamberlane al the way coaſting along the ſea ſhore, paſſed the time in hunting, his army not comming neere him by ten leagues; which was ſo great, that it extended it ſelfe ful twenty leagues. Comming to the riuer of Edel, he ſtaid at Zarazich whilſt his army paſſed the riuer at Mechet, and two other bridges which he had cauſed to be made for that purpoſe. Now the Circaſſians, & Georgians, hearing of the approch of Tamberlane with his huge army, by their embaſſadors offred him al the help and aſſiſtance they could, in his iourney as he paſſed that way. Theſe Georgians were and yet are Chriſtians, a great and warlike people, of long time tributaries vnto the Greek Emperors: and afterwards ſomtimes tributaries, & ſometimes confederats vnto the Perſians: but alwaies enemies vnto the Turks, by whom of late (and in our remembrance) but eſpeciall by Amurath the third, they together with ſome part of the Perſian kingdome, haue bin grieuouſly oppreſſed, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtorie may appeare. Of theſe warlike people, glad of Tamberlane his comming for the repreſſing of the Turk, Axalla drew great numbers vnto the ſeruice of his Prince: who not a little eſteemed of them, being al tall men, very beautifull, of great ſtrength

and

A and courage, and withall moſt expert ſoldiers; as hauing oftentimes reſiſted the power of the Othoman Kings, by reaſon of the aduantage their countrey affordeth them, being very rough and hard to come into. By theſe kind people, Tamberlane was in euery place honorably entertained, and his great army with all neceſſaries plentifully relieued. In paſſing thorow which country and the reſt as he marched, he took ſuch order with his ſoldiers, that none of the people whereby he paſſed, were any thing by them iniuried; inſomuch that if a ſoldier had taken but an apple, or other thing of like value from any man, hee died therefore, ſo ſeuere were his commands. It is reported that one of his ſoldiers, hauing taken a little milke from a countrey woman, and ſhe thereof complaining, he cauſed the ſaid ſoldier to be preſently killed, and his ſtomacke to be ript; where the milke that he had of late drunk being found, he contented the B woman, and ſo ſent her away; who had otherwiſe vndoubtedly died for her falſe accuſation, had it not ſo appeared. Which his ſo great ſeueritie, and in other like caſes, was of many accounted for extream crueltie: yet was it indeed the wholſom preſeruation of his army, being ſo great, as that it was thought almoſt impoſſible to haue found ſufficient victuals for the reliefe thereof: whereof for all that, there was no want, either of any thing elſe neceſſarie for the vſe of man, his camp being ſtil as a moſt populous and wel gouerned citie, ſtored with al manner of things: wherunto both artificers and marchants, from far countries reſorted with their commodities & marchandiſe, as to ſome famous mart; and the country people, without feare from euery place brought in their country commodities, for which they receiued preſent mony, and ſo in ſafety again departed. So marching on, he at length came to Bachichich where he C ſtaid to refreſh his army eight daies, and there againe took a generall muſter thereof, wherein were found (as moſt write) foure hundred thouſand horſe, & ſix hundred thouſand foot; or as ſome others that were there preſent affirme, three hundred thouſand horſmen, and fiue hundred thouſand foot of al nations. Vnto whom he there gaue a generall pay, and as his manner was, made vnto them an oration, informing them of ſuch orders as he would haue kept, to the end they might the better obſerue the ſame: with much other militarie diſcipline, whereof he was very curious with his captains. At which time alſo, it was lawfull for euery common ſoldier to behold him with more boldnes than on other daies, foraſmuch as he did for that time, and ſuch like, lay aſide his imperial maieſtie, and ſhew himſelfe more familiar vnto them.

The number of Tamberlane his great armie.

Now could he hardly be perſuaded, that Baiazet hauing ſubdued the moſt part of Grecia, D diſtreſſed the Greeke Emperour, and ſo great means to recouer whatſoeuer he ſhould loſe in Aſia, would be ſo aduenturous as to come ouer the ſtraits out of Europe, to trie the fortune of a battell with him; but rather warily protract the time, to wearie him at length with wants, that in a ſtrange countrey drew ſuch a world of people after him. Wherein hee found himſelfe much deceiued: for hauing paſſed the Georgian country, and being come to Buyſabuich Axalla (whom he had not ſeen in eight dais before, becauſe he led the head of the armie) came vnto him with ſuch newes as hee knew would be right welcome vnto him: which was, that Baiazet had raiſed his ſiege of Conſtantinople (as indeed he had) for to come and defend his new conqueſts in Aſia: and that he was certainely reſolued, to come to a day of battell, not ſo much truſting vnto the multitude of his army, as to the valour and experience of his ſoldiers, E beeing all men of long well trained vp in the wars. At which vnexpected newes, Tamberlane greatly reioiced: yet without inſolencie or vaunting, but rather with the countenance of ſuch a one as iudged the euents of battels to be (as they are) alwaies doubtfull: ſaying ſometimes, that a ſmal number wel conducted, did oftentimes carrie away the victorie from the confuſed multitude. Three dayes he ſtaied at Buyſabuich, and cauſed his ſouldiers continually to march forward, which at Garga and Chiuſerig paſſed ouer the riuer Euphrates: which he did the rather to maintaine his armie vpon the ſpoile of the enemie, in attending his comming, than vpon himſelfe, or his allies. All the cities that yeelded vnto him by the way as he marched, hee fauorably receiued; the other that refuſed to ſubmit themſelues vnto his obedience, hee vſed with all extremitie: ſpecially the great and ſtrong citie of Sebaſtia, where certaine of the forerunners of his army were by the Turks there in garriſon cut off and ſlaine, & the gates of the city as it were in contempt of him, ſet wide open: wherwith Tamberlane offended, ſent out certain of his Tartarian horſmen, commanding them on pain of his diſpleaſure, ſo to beare themſelues againſt their enemies, as that he might at his comming either find the citie taken, or the gates thereof ſhut againſt him: for hee had his men at ſo great commaund, that no danger was vnto them more dreadfull than his diſpleaſure, neither did he puniſh any thing ſo ſeuerely as G cowardiſe:inſomuch,that if in his diſport of hunting the wild beaſt,any did for feare giue way to the Lyon or Beare, and ſlew him not, was ſure to die therefore himſelfe: and to turne his backe vpon the enemie, was no leſſe danger than to run vpon his owne death. Now the Turks in garriſon at Sebaſtia, ſeeing theſe Tartarian horſemen marching towards the citie, making little account of them, for that they were not in number many, iſſued out for to meet them; where they were ſo furiouſly charged by theſe few horſemen, that they were glad to retire, and for haſte to ſhut part of their owne men out of the citie, leaſt the enemie following them at their heeles, ſhould haue entred the gates together with them. Which Turkes ſo ſhut out, were by the Tartarians ſlaine at the gates of the citie. Shortly after came Tamberlane with all his armie,and ſate downe before the citie,where he lay ſtill ſeuen dayes, not making ſhew H of any violence at all; the defendants becauſe the citie was of great ſtrength, all that while thinking that hee had intended by long ſiege to diſtreſſe the ſame, and the more,becauſe of his long lying ſtill. But about the eight day, the walls and towers of the citie in many places vndermined, were ſuddenly ouerthrowne, leauing large breaches for the enemie to enter. Wherewith the Turkes in the citie diſmayed, foorthwith yeelded the citie to Tamberlan, in hope ſo to haue ſaued their liues: but hee (as the Turkes report) beeing entred the citie, commaunded a great number of deepe pits to be digged, and all the people of the citie, without reſpect of age,ſex, or condition,to be throwne into the ſame,and there buried quicke. Which done,the citie was by his commandement vtterly raſed alſo. After that,calling vnto him Malcozzius,the gouernour of the citie, whom he had for that purpoſe onely ſpared, he comman- I ded him to goe and tell his Maſter what was happened to his ſtrong Citie of Sebaſtia,and what hee had there himſelfe ſeene. Of which tragicall action, Malcozzius hauing made true relation vnto Baiazet,was by him demanded,whether of the two armies he thought bigger or ſtronger: for now Baiazet had aſſembled a mightie armie of three hundred thouſand men, or as ſome report of three hundred thouſand horſmen,and two hundred thouſand foot. Whereunto Malcozzius hauing before craued pardon, anſwered, That it could not be, but that Tamberlane might in reaſon haue the greater number, for that he was a commander of farre greater countries. Wherewith proud Baiazet offended, in great choller replied, Out of doubt, the ſight of the Tartarian hath made this coward ſo affraid, that he thinketh euery enemie to be two. K

Moſt of the Latine hiſtories report,that when Tamberlane had taken Sebaſtia,hee put all the men to the ſword, & bringing the women and children into the fields without the city,there ouer-ran them with his horſemen, excepting ſome few which were reſerued for priſoners. As alſo that Baiazet there loſt his eldeſt ſon Erthogrul (of ſome called Orthobules) whoſe death with the loſſe of the citie,ſo much grieued him(as it is reported)that marching with his great army againſt Tamberlane,& by the way hearing a country ſheepheard merily repoſing himſelf with his homely pipe, as he ſate vpon the ſide of a mountaine feeding his poore flocke; ſtanding ſtill a great while liſtening vnto him, to the great admiration of many, at laſt fetching a deep ſigh, brake foorth into theſe wordes: O happie ſheepheard, which haddeſt neither Orthobules nor Sebaſtia to looſe: bewraying therein his owne diſcontentment; and yet with- L all ſhewing, That worldly bliſſe conſiſteth not ſo much in poſſeſſing of much, ſubiect vnto danger, as inioying in a little, contentment deuoide of feare. Howbeit the Turkes themſelues reporting the taking of Sebaſtia, ſpeake not of Orthobules at all, but giue him loſt ſix yeares before,in the warres againſt Caſi Burchaniden, and lyeth buried by his father at Pruſa. In this citie of Sebaſtia was loſt twelue thouſand Turkes, men women, and children, as their Hiſtories report. The reſt of the cities all the way as Tamberlane marched, warned by the deſtruction of Sebaſtia, yeelded themſelues for feare of like danger: the citizens whereof he courteouſly vſed,ſpecially the Chriſtians,whom he ſet at libertie,in reſpect of Emanuel the Greeke Emperour, whome hee ſeemed wholly therein to gratifie. But hee had not gone farre into the Turkes dominion, but that hee was certainly aduertized,how that M Baiazet,with a great armie was comming againſt him, and now within thirtie leagues of him: which cauſed him after that time,to march with his armie more cloſely. Axalla leading the Vantgard ſent foorth Chianſon Prince of Ciarchan, with foure thouſand Parthian horſemen, to get knowledge of the Turkes armie, and where Baiazet lay, as alſo what countrey that

A was beyond Sennas; and if he could learne any thing thereof, to make relation of it vnto him. This Prince of Ciarcan was Tamerlanes neere kinſman, a man of great reputation, & next vnto Axalla, in whoſe abſence he had the commanding of the auantgard, his charge; who alſo ſent before him another Parthian captaine with 500 horſemen. So he had not ridden ten leagues but that he heard news of Baiazets comming, & hauing ſurpriſed Sennas, vnderſtood there the certain eſtate of the Turks army, which was then at Tataia, and ſo marching forward. Whereof Tamerlane certified, commanded him not to retire from that place, vntill he did ſee the arriual of the enemie, and thereof to giue him aduertiſement euery houre; being himſelfe reſolued to paſſe on no further, as come to a faire large plain, & a country of aduantage for the order of his battel: for he knew that his army was far greater than Baiazets, & therfore he made choice B of thoſe great plains. Yet for that his armie conſiſted of diuers nations, and withal conſidering that he was not to fight againſt the Chinois, a ſoft effeminat people, (as of late) but againſt the Turks a moſt warlike nation, & wel acquainted with all maner of fights & martial ſtratagems, he thought it good to be wel aduiſed how he proceeded againſt them. Wherefore he preſently ſent for Axalla, with him to view the ſaid place, and to haue his opinion, Whether it would be for his aduantage or not, there to ſtay: who not miſliking of the choice of the place, yet aduiſed him alſo to keepe Sennas ſo long as he poſſibly could: and ſo ſent word vnto them that were therein, vpon the approch of the enemie to ſet fire vpon the ſame, and ſo to withdraw themſelues from thence, to the end that the enemie ſhould not haue any deſire to incampe there, but come ſtil forward neere to thoſe plains where Tamerlane deſired to fight, eſpecially C for that he was ſtronger in horſe than Baiazet. Thus the Turks ſtill marching on, thought to haue ſurpriſed ſome of their enemies in Sennas; who as ſoon as they drew neere, retired al excepting ſome hundred left of purpoſe to fire the town: who hauing performed the ſame, retired of purpoſe in great diſorder. Now the Prince of Ciarcan had diuided his forces into two parts, & giuen commandment to the firſt, that as ſoon as they perceiued the enemies to purſue the hundred horſe that ſo diſorderly of purpoſe fled, they ſhould receiue them, and ſo retyre all together. He in the mean time with the reſt of his power ſtood cloſe in a valley, neere to a wood ſide, vnſeen at all. Where hauing ſuffred 2000 of the enemies horſe (the vantcurriers of the Turks army) to paſſe by him, he following them in the taile, charg'd them home, the other which before retired, now turning vpon them alſo: ſo that the Turks ſeeing themſelues thus D beſet, & hardly laid vnto both before & behind, as men diſcouraged fled: in which flight moſt of them were ſlain, and the reſt taken priſoners. This was the firſt incounter betwixt the Turks and the Parthians: all the priſoners there taken, were by the prince as a preſent ſent to Tamerlane, & among the reſt the Baſſa of Natolia who led theſe troups: of whom Tamerlane earneſtly demanded, what cauſed Baiazet ſo little to eſteeme of him, as to ſhew ſo great contempt of his armie, which he ſhould find ſtrong enough to abate his pride. Wherunto the Baſſa anſwered, That his lord was the Sun vpon earth, which could not endure any equall; and that he rather was aſtonied to ſee, how he from ſo far had enterpriſed ſo dangerous a journy, to hinder the fortune of his lord, in whoſe fauor the heauens (as he ſaid) did bend themſelues to further his greatnes, and vnto whom all the world ſubiected it ſelfe; and that he committed great fol- E lie in going about to reſiſt the ſame. Vnto which ſo proud a ſpeech Tamerlane replied, That he was ſent from heauen to puniſh his raſhneſſe, & to teach him, that the proud are hated of God, whoſe promiſe is to plucke down the mightie, and raiſe vp the lowly. As for thy ſelf (ſaid he) thou haſt alreadie felt (although I pitty thy miſhap) what the valour of my Parthian horſe is againſt thy Turkiſh: and thy maſter I haue already cauſed to raiſe his ſiege of Conſtantinople, and to looke to his own things here in Aſia. Furthermore, Tamerlane changing his ſpeech demanded, If his maſter did come reſolued to bid him battell: Aſſure your ſelf (ſaid he) there is nothing he more deſireth; and would to God I might acknowlege your greatneſſe, in giuing me leaue to aſſiſt my Lord at that battell. Good leaue haue thou, (ſaid Tamerlane) go thy ways and tell thy lord that thou haſt ſeen me, and that he ſhall in the battell find me on horſebacke, where he ſhall ſee a greene enſigne diſplayd. The Baſſa thanking him, ſwore, that next vnto his lord he vowed vnto him his ſeruice. And ſo returning, declared vnto Baiazet, how that he had ſeene Tamerlane, and truly reported vnto him all that he had willed him to ſay; not forgetting ouer all, to publiſh his courteſie and bountie: who beſides that he had franckely ſet him at libertie, had alſo giuen him a verie faire horſe well furniſhed, although hee well knew hee was to ſerue againſt himſelfe. Whereunto Baiazet anſwered no more, but that hee would ſhortly make triall of him,& that he well hoped before the march were ended,to make him acknowledge his own folly. The next day the two armies drew neere together,and incamped within a league the one of the other: where all the night long you might haue heard ſuch noyſe of horſes,as that it ſeemed the heauens were full of voyces,the aire did ſo reſound,& euery man thought the night long,to come to the triall of his valour,and the gaining of his deſires. The Scythians(a people no leſſe greedie than needie) talked of nothing but the ſpoyle; the proud Parthians,of their honor; & the poore Chriſtians,of their deliuerance,all to be gained by the next days victorie:euery man during the night time ſpeaking according to his owne humour. All which Tamerlane walking this night vp & down in his campe heard,and much reioiced to ſee the hope that his ſoldiers had alreadie in general conceiued of the victorie. Who after the ſecond watch returning vnto his pauilion,& there caſting himſelf vpon a carpet,had thought to haue ſlept a while: but his cares not ſuffring him ſo to do,he then,as his manner was,called for a booke,wherein was contained the liues of his fathers and anceſtors, and of other valiant worthies,the which he vſed ordinarily to read,as he then did:not as therwith vainly to deceiue the time,but to make vſe thereof,by the imitation of that which was by them worthily done, & declining of ſuch dangers as they by their raſhnes or ouerſight fel into. And afterwards hauing a little ſlumbred,he commanded Axalla to be ſent for,who forthwith came to him, with diuers other great lords & captaines the chiefe commanders of his army: with whom after he had a while conſulted of the order of the battell, he mounted on horſebacke himſelfe,& ſent euery one of them to their own charges,to put the ſame in readines. At which very inſtant he receiued news,that the enemy marched forward, and came to take his ground for the battell: whoſe order of march Tamerlane was deſirous to ſee,that ſo accordingly he might marſhal his own. And hauing cauſed 3000 horſemen to aduance forward, with charge to begin the skirmiſh, himſelfe followed after to lodge euery part of his forces in ſuch places as hee had foreſeen to be fitteſt for his aduantage. Now ſeeing the Ianizaries march in a ſquare battell in the midſt,and vpon the two fronts two great ſquadrons of horſemen, which ſeemed to be thirtie thouſand horſe; and another which aduanced and couered the battalion of the Ianizaries: he thought this their order to be very good,and hard to be broken;and thereupon turning himſelfe to Axalla, who was neere vnto him, ſaid, I had thought this day to haue fought on foot, but I ſee that it behooueth me now to fight on horſebacke,to giue courage vnto my ſoldiers, to open the great battalion of our enemies. And my will is,that my men come forward vnto me as ſoone as they may, for I will aduance forward with an hundred thouſand footmen, fiftie thouſand vpon each of my two wings,and in the middeſt of them fortie thouſand of my beſt horſeman. My pleaſure is,that after they haue tried the force of theſe men,that they come vnto my avauntgard,of whom I wil diſpoſe,& fifty thouſand horſe more in three bodies,whom thou ſhalt command: which I will aſſiſt with 80000 horſe,wherein ſhal be mine own perſon; hauing 100000 footmen behind me,who ſhal march in two ſquadrons:and for my arereward I appoint 40000 horſe,and fiftie thouſand footmen,who ſhall not march but to my aid. And I wil make choice of 10000 of my beſt horſe, whom I wil ſend into euery place where I ſhal thinke needfull within my Armie, for to impart my commands. Ouer the firſt fortie thouſand horſe the Prince Ciarcan commanded: ouer the formoſt footmen was the lord Synopes a Genouois,kinſman to Axalla,and his lieutenant ouer the footmen,a captaine of great eſtimation: the Prince Axalla his owne charge conſiſted of fiue ſquadrons of horſemen. Baiazet his armie being alſo both faire and great, came brauely ſtill on forwards towards their enemies, who ſtirred not one whit from the place they had taken for the battell: except certaine light horſemen, Scythians, Parthians, and Muſcouits, who ſent out as looſe men, hotly skirmiſhed betwixt the two armies. Now was Tamerlane by an eſpie aduertiſed, that Baiazet hauing before giuen order for the diſpoſing of his armie,was on foot in the midſt of thirtie thouſand Ianizaries,his principall men of war,and greateſt ſtrength,wherein he meant that day to fight,and in whom he had repoſed his greateſt hope. His battell of horſe was very faire, amounting to the number of a hundred and fortie thouſand horſe,all old ſoldiers. The Sultan of Ægipt hauing alſo ſent vnto his aid thirtie thouſand Mamalukes, all very good horſemen, with thirtie thouſand foot. So that his armie marching all in one front, in forme of an halfe-Moone (but not ſo well knit together as was Tamerlanes, whoſe ſquadrons directly followed one another)

ſeemed

A ſeemed almoſt as great as his: and ſo with infinite numbers of moſt horrible outcries ſtill aduanced forward; Tamerlane his ſouldiers all the while ſtanding faſt, with great ſilence.

There was not poſſible to be ſeen a more furious charge, than was by the Turks giuen vpon the prince of Ciarcan, who had commandment not to fight before the enemy came vnto him: neither could haue bin choſen a fairer plaine, and where the skilfull choice of the place was of leſſe aduantage for the one or the other; but that Tamerlane had the riuer on the left hand of his armie, ſeruing him to ſome ſmall aduantage. Now this young prince of Ciarcan with his 40000 horſe, was in this firſt encounter almoſt wholly ouerthrowne: yet hauing fought right valiantly, and entred euen into the midſt of the Ianizaries, (where the perſon of Baiazet was) putting them in diſorder, was himſelfe there ſlaine. About which time Axalla ſet vpon them

The Prince of Ciarcan ſlaine.

B with the avauntgard, but not with like danger: for hauing ouerthrowne one of the enemies wings, & cut it al to pieces, and his footmen comming to ioine with him, as they had bin commanded, he faced the battalion of the Ianizaries, who right valiantly behaued themſelues for the ſafetie of their Prince. This hard fight continued one hower, and yet you could not haue ſeene any ſcattered, but the one ſtill reſolutely fighting againſt the other. You might there haue ſeene the horſemen like mountaines ruſh together, and infinit numbers of men die, cry, lament, & threaten all at one inſtant. Tamerlane had patience all this while, to ſee the euent of this ſo mortall a fight: but perceiuing his men at length to giue ground, he ſent ten thouſand of his horſe to ioyne again with the ten thouſand appointed for the arereward, and commanded them to aſſiſt him at ſuch time as he ſhould haue need of them; and at the very ſame time

C charged himſelfe, and made them to giue him roome; cauſing the footmen to charge alſo, ouer whome the prince of Thanais commanded, who gaue a furious onſet vpon the battalion of the Ianizaries, wherein was yet the perſon of Baiazet, who had ſuſtained a great burden. Now Baiazet had in his armie a great number of mercenary Tartars, called Deſtenſes, with manie thouſands of other ſouldiers taken vp in the countries of the poore exiled Mahometane princes; in whoſe iuſt quarrel, & the Greeke emperors, Tamerlane had chiefly vndertaken that war: theſe Tartarians and other ſouldiers, ſeeing ſome their friends, and otherſome their naturall and louing princes in the armie of Tamerlane; ſtricken with the terror of diſloialtie, and abhorring the crueltie of the proud tyrant, in the heat of the battell reuolted from Baiazet to their owne princes; which their reuolt much weakened Baiazets forces. Who neuertheleſſe

D with his owne men of warre, eſpecially the Ianizaries, and the helpe of the Chriſtian ſoldiers brought to his aid from Seruia and other places of Europe, with great courage maintained the fight: but the multitude, & not true valor, preuailed; for, as much as might be done by valiant and couragious men, was by the Ianizaries & the reſt performed, both for the preſeruation of the perſon of their prince, and the gaining of the victorie. But in the end, the horſemen with whom Tamerlane himſelfe was, giuing a freſh charge, and his avantgard wholly knit again vnto him, re-inforcing the charge, he with much adoo obtained the victorie. Baiazet himſelfe wounded, and now mounted on horſebacke, thinking to haue eſcaped by flight, fell into the hands of Axalla: vnto whom he yeelded himſelfe, thinking it had bin Tamerlane: who for a ſpace knew him not, but took him for ſome other great commander of the Turks. Muſa (ſirna-

E med Zelebi, or, the Noble) one of Baiazet his ſons, with diuers others of Baiazet his great captaines, were there taken alſo: and amongſt the reſt, George the Deſpot of Seruia, who notwithſtanding this misfortune, had that day gained vnto himſelfe the reputation of a great and worthie captain; inſomuch that Tamerlane euen in the very heat of the battel maruelling to ſee him and the Seruians, with the other Chriſtians which he had brought to the aid of Baiazet, ſo valiantly to fight, ſaid vnto ſome of the captaines that were neere vnto him, See how couragiſly yonder Religious fight: ſuppoſing them by their ſtrange attire to haue beene ſome of the Turkes ſuperſtitious votaries. But being now taken, and afterwards brought to Tamerlane, he was by him courteouſly welcomed; but yet withall reproued, for that he had fought for Baiazet againſt him, who was come in fauor of the Chriſtian emperor, & the other poore oppreſſed Princes, ſuch as the Deſpot himſelfe was. Who thereunto boldly anſwered, That indeed it was not according to his dutie, but according to the proſperitie of Baiazet, vnto whome it ſeemed that all the world did bend: and that his own ſafetie had cauſed him, though againſt his wil, to take part with him. Whereupon Tamerlane held him excuſed, and ſo without more ado gaue him leaue at his owne pleaſure to depart.

Baiazet alſo himſelfe being afterwards brought vnto Tamerlane as a priſoner, and by him curteouſly entertained, neuer ſhewed any token of ſubmiſſion at all, but according to his proud nature, without reſpect of his preſent ſtate, preſumptuouſly anſwered him vnto whatſoeuer he demanded. Wherewith Tamerlane moued, told him, That it was now in his power to make him to loſe his life. Whereunto he anſwered no more, but, Doe it: for that, that loſſe ſhould be his greateſt happines. Tamerlane afterwards demanding of him, What made him ſo proud, as to enterpriſe to bring into his ſubiection ſo noble a Prince as was the Greeke Emperour? he anſwered, Euen the ſame thing that hath mooued thee to inuade me, namely the deſire of glorie and ſoueraigntie. But wherefore then (ſaid Tamerlane) do'ſt thou vſe ſo great crueltie towards them thou haſt ouercome, without reſpect of age or ſex? That did I (ſaid he) to giue the greater terror vnto my enemies. And what wouldſt thou haue done with me (ſaid Tamerlane) had it bin my fortune to haue fallen into thy hands, as thou art now in mine? I would (ſaid Baiazet) haue incloſed thee in a cage of yron, and ſo in triumph haue carried thee vp & down my kingdome. Euen ſo (ſaid Tamerlane) ſhalt thou be ſerued. And ſo cauſing him to be taken out of his preſence, turning vnto his followers, ſaid, Behold a proud and cruell man, he deſerueth to be chaſtiſed accordingly, and to be made an example vnto all the proud and cruell of the world, of the iuſt wrath of God againſt them. I acknowledge, that God hath this day deliuered into my hands a great enemie; to whom we muſt therefore giue thanks. Which he performed the ſame day: for the battell was woon at foure of the clocke, and there was yet fiue houres of day light. The next day Tamerlane commanded the dead to be buried; where among the reſt they found the bodie of the Prince of Ciarcan, dead in the middeſt of the Ianizaries, where he lay incloſed with their dead bodies, in token he died not vnreuenged: whoſe vntimely death Tamerlane for all that greatly lamented, for he was his kinſman, and like enough one day to haue done great ſeruice. Whoſe dead bodie Tamerlane cauſed to be imbalmed, and with two thouſand horſe (and diuers of the Turks priſoners chained and tied together) to be conueyed to Samercand, vntill his comming thither. All the other dead bodies were with all honour that might be, buried at Sennas.

This great bloudie battell fought in the yere of our Lord 1397, not farre from the Mount Stella, (where ſomtime the great King Mithrydates was by Pompey the Great in a great battell ouerthrown) was fought from ſeuen a clocke in the morning, vntill foure in the afternoon: victorie all that while, as it were with doubtfull wings, houering ouer both armies, as vncertain where to light; vntill at length the fortune of Tamerlane preuailed. Whoſe wiſedome, next vnto God, gaue that dayes victorie vnto his ſoldiers: for that the politicke tyring of the ſtrong forces of Baiazet, was the ſafegard of his own; whereas if he had gone vnto the battell in one front, aſſuredly the multitude finding ſuch ſtrong reſiſtance, had put it ſelfe into confuſion: whereas this ſucceſſiue manner of aiding of his men, made them all vnto him profitable. The number of them that were in this battel ſlaine, is of diuers diuerſly reported: the Turks themſelues reporting, That Baiazet there loſt the noble Muſtapha his ſon, with two hundred thouſand of his men, and Tamerlane not many fewer: and ſome other ſpeaking of a farre leſſe number, as that there ſhould be ſlaine of the Turks about threeſcore thouſand, and of Tamerlan his armie not paſt twentie thouſand. But leauing the certaintie of the number vnto the credit of the reporters, like enough it is, that the ſlaughter was exceeding great in ſo long a fight, betwixt two ſuch armies as neuer before (as I ſuppoſe) met in field together.

By this one days euent is plainly to be ſeen the vncertaintie of worldly things, & what ſmall aſſurance euen the greateſt haue in them. Behold, Baiazet the terrour of the world, and as hee thought, ſuperior to fortune, in an inſtant with his ſtate in one battel ouerthrown into the bottom of miſerie & deſpaire; and that at ſuch time as he thought leaſt, euen in the middeſt of his greateſt ſtrength. It was three days (as they report) before he could be pacified, but as a deſperat man ſtil ſeeking after death, & calling for it: neither did Tamerlane after he had once ſpoken with him, at all afterwards curteouſly vſe him, but as of a proud man cauſed ſmal account to be made of him: And to manifeſt that hee knew how to puniſh the haughtie, made him to be ſhackled in fetters and chaines of gold, and ſo to be ſhut vp in an iron cage made like a grate, in ſuch ſort as that he might on euery ſide be ſeen, and ſo carried him vp and down as he paſſed thorow Aſia, to be of his own people ſcorned & derided. And to his further diſgrace, vpon feſtiual dayes vſed him for a footſtoole to tread vpon, when he mounted to horſe; and at other Baiazet like a beaſt ſhut vp in an yron cage.

A times ſcornfully fed him like a dog, with crums fallen from his table. A rare example of the vncertaintie of wordly honour, that he vnto whoſe ambitious mind Aſia and Europe, two great parts of the world, were too little, ſhould be now carried vp and downe cooped vp in a little yron cage, like ſome perillous wild beaſt. All which Tamerlane did not ſo much for the hatred to the man, as to manifeſt the iuſt iudgement of God againſt the arrogant follie of the Proud. It is reported, That Tamerlane being requeſted by one of his Noblemen that might be bold to ſpeake vnto him, to remit ſome part of his ſeueritie againſt the perſon of ſo great a Prince; anſwered, That hee did not vſe that rigor againſt him as a King, but rather did puniſh him as a proud ambitious tyrant, polluted with the bloud of his owne brother.

Now this ſo great an ouerthrow brought ſuch a feare vpon all the Countries poſſeſſed by B Baiazet in Aſia, that Axalla ſent before by Tamerlane with 40000 horſe, and 100000 foot, without carriages, to proſecute the victorie, came without reſiſtance to Pruſa, whither all the remainder of Baiazet his armie was retyred, with the Baſſa Muſtapha: the countrey as he went ſtill yeelding vnto him. Yea, the great Baſſa with the reſt hearing of his comming, and thinking themſelues not now in any ſafetie in Aſia, fled ouer the ſtrait of Helleſpontus to Callipolis, and ſo to Hadrianople, carrying with them out of the battell, Solyman, Baiazet his eldeſt ſonne, whom they ſet vp in his fathers place: Mahomet his yonger brother preſently vpon the ouerthrow being fled to Amaſia; of whom, and the reſt of Baiazet his children, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter. Axalla comming to Pruſa, had the citie without reſiſtance yeelded vnto him, which he rifled; and there with other of Baiazet his wiues and concubines, tooke priſoner C the faire Deſpina, Baiazet his beſt beloued wife, to the doubling of his griefe.

Solyman ſet vp in his fathers ſtead.

Pruſa taken by Axalla.

Emanuel the Greeke Emperor now hearing of Tamerlane his comming to Pruſa, ſent his embaſſadors (the moſt honorable of his court) thither before to Axalla: by whom they were there ſtayd vntil the comming of Tamerlane; who receiued them with all the honor that might be, ſhewing vnto them all his magnificence, and the order of his campe, to their great admiration: For it reſembled a moſt populous and well gouerned citie, for the order that was therein, which brought vnto it plentie of all kind of victuals & other merchandiſe, as wel for pleaſure as for vſe. By theſe Embaſſadors the Greeke Emperor ſubmitted all his empire, together with his perſon, vnto Tamerlane the great conqueror, as his moſt faithfull ſubiect and vaſſall: which he was bound (as he ſaid) to do, for that he was by him deliuered from the moſt cruel tyrant of D the world: as alſo for that the long iourny he had paſſed, and the diſcommodities he had indured, with the loſſe of his people, and the danger of his perſon, could not be recompenced but by the offer of his own life and his ſubiects; which he did for euer dedicate vnto his ſeruice, with all the fidelitie and loyaltie that ſo great a benefit might deſerue: beſides that, his ſo manie vertues & rare accompliſhments, which made him famous thorow the world, did bind him ſo to do. And that therfore he would attend him in his chiefe citie, to deliuer it into his hands as his own, with all the empire of Greece. Now the Greeke Embaſſadors looked for no leſſe than to fall into bondage to Tamerlane; thinking that which they offered to be ſo great and delicate a morſell, as that it would not be refuſed, eſpecially of ſuch a conquering prince as was Tamerlane; and that the acceptance thereof in kindneſſe and friendſhip, was the beſt bargaine E they could make therein. But they receiued anſwer from this worthie Prince, farre beyond their expectation: for he with a mild countenance beholding them, anſwered them, That he was not come from ſo far a country, or vndertaken ſo much paines, for the inlargement of his dominions, alreadie large enough, (too baſe a thing for him to put himſelfe into ſo great danger and trauell for) but rather to winne honour, and thereby to make his name famous vnto all poſteritie for euer: And that therefore it ſhould well appeare vnto the world, that he was come to aid him, being requeſted as his friend & allie: & that his vpright meaning therin was the greateſt cauſe, that God from aboue had beheld his power, and thereby bruiſed the head of the greateſt and fierceſt enemie of mankind that was vnder heauen: and now to get him an F immortall name, would make free ſo great and flouriſhing a Citie as was Conſtantinople, gouerned by ſo noble and antient an Houſe as the Emperors: That vnto his courage he had always faith ioyned, ſuch as ſhould neuer ſuffer him to make ſo great a breach in his reputation, as that it ſhould be reported of him, That in the colour of a friend he came to inuade the Dominions of his allies: That he deſired no more, but that the ſeruice he had done for the Greek Emperor, might for euer be ingrauen in the memorie of his poſteritie, to the end they might for euer wiſh well vnto him and his ſucceſſours, by remembring the good he had done them; That long might the noble Emperour liue, happily to gouerne his eſtate: and that before his returne he would ſo well conſider for the eſtabliſhing of the ſame, as that he ſhould not lightly fall againe into the like jeopardie, alwayes aſſuring himſelfe of his good will and fauour towards him. Eaſie it is to iudge what ioy theſe Greeke Embaſſadors receiued, to heare this ſo kind an anſwer from the mouth of Tamerlane himſelfe: who rather than hee would ſeeme to breake his faith, refuſed an empire offered vnto him, with one of the moſt ſtately and magnificent cities of the world. Few princes (I ſuppoſe) would performe ſuch a part: but ſo there be likewiſe but few Tamerlanes in the world. Theſe Embaſſadors by the commandement of Tamerlane, were by Axalla royally feaſted, and all the honour done them that might be. One of them being ſent backe to carrie theſe vnexpected news vnto the Greeke Emperor, filled both him and all the citie of Conſtantinople with exceeding ioy and gladneſſe, which both he and his ſubiects in generall ſpared not with bonfires and all other ſignes of ioy and pleaſure to manifeſt. And the more to ſhew his thankfulneſſe, ſhortly after by the aduice of his graue Councellors, paſſed ouer the ſtrait into Aſia, to ſee Tamerlane at Pruſa, and in perſon himſelfe to giue him thanks: who hearing of his comming, and very glad thereof, preſently vpon the firſt days journy ſent the prince Axalla to meet him, and to certifie him of the ioy that he conceiued, to haue the good hap for to ſee him, as alſo to conduct him to Pruſa: where thoſe two great princes, with the greateſt magnificence that might be, met, and ſo ſpent one whole day together. The Greeke Emperor the next day taking his leaue, was by Tamerlane with much honor conducted out of the citie. Now had Tamerlane himſelfe conceiued a ſecret deſire to ſee this ſo famous a city as was Conſtantinople, from which he was not now farre, yet would he not goe thither as a conqueror, but as a priuat perſon: which by the meanes of Axalla was accompliſhed, and he thereinto by the Greeke Emperor priuatly receiued, and with all familiarity poſſible, entertained; the Emperor ſhewing vnto him all the rare and excellent things that were therein to be ſeen: and the other Greeke Princes deuiſing all the means they could to do him pleaſure, and them which did accompanie him; who were in a manner all apparelled after the Greeke faſhion. At which time the Greeke Emperour himſelfe was curious to ſhew vnto him all the faire gardens alongſt the ſea coaſt, a league or two from Conſtantinople, and ſo priuatly conducting him, ſpent fiue or ſix days with all the mirth that might be poſſible; Tamerlane by the way oftentimes ſaying, That he had neuer ſeen a fairer citie: and that it was indeed the city (conſidering the faire and rich ſcituation thereof) of right, worthie to command al the world. He wondred at the coſtly buildings of the temples, the faire ingrauen pillars, the high piramides, & the making of the faire gardens; and oftentimes afterwards ſaid, That he nothing repented him of his ſo long and dangerous a voyage, if it had bin onely but to haue preſerued from fire & ſword ſo noble a citie as that was. In the Greeke Emperor he commended greatly his mild nature and curteſie: who knowing him aboue al things to take pleaſure in faire ſeruiceable horſes, gaue vnto him thirtie of the faireſt, ſtrongeſt, and readieſt, that were poſſible to be gotten, all moſt richly furniſhed; and ſent likewiſe faire Preſents vnto all the Princes and great Commanders of the armie, and bountifully cauſed to be deliuered vnto them all things which he thought to be neceſſarie for the armie. So after many great kindneſſes in ſhort time paſſed, and a ſtrait bond of friendſhip made, and by ſolemne oath confirmed betwixt the two great Princes, Tamerlane with great contentment tooke his leaue of the Emperor, and returned againe to his armie at Pruſa. Wherewith he now at his pleaſure without reſiſtance waſted and ſpoyled al Baiazet his dominion in Aſia, no man daring to make head againſt him.

Tamerlane goeth to Conſtantinople.

Tamerlan much delighted with the pleaſures of Conſtantinople.

The yere being now wel ſpent, and Winter drawing on, Tamerlane diſperſed his armie into diuers of the prouinces of the leſſer Aſia, expecting ſtill when ſome of Baiazet his ſonnes or other friends ſhould make ſuit or meanes vnto him for his deliuerance, but none came: ſome fearing Tamerlane his heauie indignation, and others no leſſe dreading the fierce nature of Baiazet himſelfe, who if he had beene deliuered, was like enongh (as was thought) to haue taken ſharp reuenge vpon all them which forſooke him in the late battel; and therefore neuer made interceſſion for him. Whereupon Tamerlane one day paſſing by him, ſaid vnto him, I maruell that none of thy ſons or friends either come to ſee thee, or to intreat for thee, it muſt needs be that thou haſt euill deſerued of them, as thou haſt of others: yet how thinkeſt thou, if I ſhould ſet thee at libertie, would they againe receiue thee as their Lord and Soueraigne, or not? To whom

A whom Baiazet boldly anſwered; Were I at libertie, thou ſhouldeſt well ſee, how that I want neither courage nor means to reuenge all my wrongs and to make thoſe diſobedient and forgetfull, to know their duties better. Which his proud anſwere, made Tamerlane to keepe a ſtraighter hand ouer him.

In this great and bloudie war, wherein the Othoman empire had almoſt taken end, the Sultan of Ægypt had (as is aforeſaid) giuen aid vnto Baiazet: which Tamerlane tooke in ſo euill part, as that he reſolued to be therof reuenged: for as he was vnto his friends of al others moſt kind & courteous, ſo was he to his enemies no leſſe terrible and dreadful. Yet thinking it good before his departure out of the leſſer Aſia, to take ſome good order with theſe his new conqueſts: and finding nothing more honorable to reſolue vpon, he reſtored vnto the poore B Mahometan Princes (Tachretin, Iſfendiar, Germian, and the reſt before fled vnto him for refuge) al their antient inheritance, with ſomething more; as hee did alſo diuers cities and countries of Natolia vnto the Greeke Emperour, for the yearely tribute of foure hundred thouſand duckats of gold, and eight hundred thouſand franks of ſiluer, which the Emperour promiſed to pay vnto him yerely. And ſo hauing enriched his armie with the ſpoiles of the Othoman empire in Aſia, he turned his forces againſt the Ægyptian Sultan, and ſo paſſing thorow Caramania, entered into Syria, then part of the Sultans kingdome: where neere vnto Aleppo (beeing before yeelded vnto him) was fought betwixt them a great & mortal battel, the Sultan hauing in his army an hundred thouſand foot, and ſeuenty foure thouſand horſe: whereof there were thirty thouſand Mamelukes, accounted the beſt horſmen of the world. In which battel, Axalla the great captaine, with the avauntgard of Tamerlane his armie, was hardly diſtreſſed, and C Axalla himſelfe taken: but forthwith againe reſcued by Tamerlane: who had he not by his comming on with new forces, ſpeedily reſtored the battell, cunningly protracted by Axalla, that day was like enough to haue made an end of his good fortune. But the victory after a long and cruell fight (wherein were foureſcore thouſand men on both ſides ſlaine) inclining to Tamerlane, the Sultan fled, Tamerlane purſuing him by the ſpace of three leagues. After which victorie, Tamerlane diuiding his armie, ſent Axalla with fortie thouſand horſe and fiftie thouſand foot to purſue the Sultan alongſt the coaſt of Arabia: who oftentimes ſhewed himſelfe with ſome foure thouſand horſe to haue hindred Axalla, who hauing the ſmalleſt forces, followed him the neareſt. Tamerlane himſelfe in the mean time, with threeſcore thouſand horſe, and an D hundred thouſand foot, marching alongſt the ſea coaſt, had all the cities as he went yeelded vnto him; as Magata, Aman, otherwiſe called Apamea, Tortoſa, Barruto, and Nephthalin: onely the ſtrong citie of Damaſco refuſed to receiue him, whereinto the Sultan had put the Prince Zamadzen, with a ſtrong garriſon, who did what he might to haue defended the ſame: But all in vaine, for Tamerlane hauing by batterie ouerthrowne a great part of the wall, by aſſault won the citie, only the caſtle yet remaining, as being of a wonderfull ſtrength, and almoſt impregnable; whereinto ſuch a multitude had at the taking of the citie retired themſelues, as was not poſſible therein long to liue: who in ſhort time pinched with hunger, and many of them dead, the reſt vpon ſafegard of their liues offered to yeeld: whom for all that Tamerlane would not receiue to mercie, to make them feele what it was to hold out againſt him: ſo that E moſt of them dying of famine, the reſt yeelded without condition, and were for their obſtinacie almoſt al ſlaine. Which his ſeuerity towards them of Damaſco, cauſed, that thirty leagues off they brought the keyes of their cities vnto him, in token of their ſubmiſſion: whom he no way moleſted, more than in contributing vnto the charge of his army. From Damaſco, hee turned directly towards Ieruſalem, at which time they of the citie had driuen out the Sultans garriſon, as had almoſt all they of Iudea, ſubmitting themſelues vnto Tamerlane. At Chorazin the Sultan had left ſix thouſand men in garriſon for the defence of the place, who at the firſt ſeemed to ſtand vpon their guard; but afterwards diſmaied to ſee ſo great an army before it, and that Tamerlane hauing approched the wals, was ſet down to haue it, they ſubmitted themſelues and found mercie. In which citie Tamerlane left certaine of his men in garriſon, for the better repreſſing of the Mamelukes, who with often incurſions troubled his armie. So marching on, he himſelfe with certain horſemen for his guard, rode to Ieruſalem to viſit the ſepulchre ſo much reuerenced of all nations, and there to make his oblations: where hee was of the inhabitants ioyfully receiued, and hauing ſought out all the antiquities of that ancient citie, would be conducted vnto all the places thereabouts, where Ieſus Chriſt had preached, euen as the pilgrimes doe: and comming to the ſepulchre, gaue thereunto, and the deuout G there, many rich and precious gifts, to the great contentment of all men (to ſee him honour thoſe holy places) but of the Iewes only, who greatly blamed him for ſo doing: of whom of al others, Tamerlane made no reckoning, but called them the accurſed of God. There had he news that the Sultan had gathered al his forces, and being come into Ægipt, was there fortifiing of his cities, eſpecially the great cities of Alexandria and Caier. Tamerlane his armie in the mean time by his commandment came towards Ægipt to Damiata: which ſtrong city he thought not good to leaue behind him, although he was by ſome perſuaded ſo to do, for that it was thought impregnable, as well in reſpect of the caſtle, as of the ſtrong garriſon that the Sultan had put thereinto: but hee, whoſe fortune nothing could hinder, would needs goe thither: and ſo hauing commanded Axalla to ſet vpon it, followed himſelfe after with the reſt H of his armie. Now Axalla hauing ſummoned the citie, and declared vnto the inhabitants (who were moſt of them Chriſtians) the mildneſſe and courteſie of Tamerlane, as alſo who himſelfe was, and what religion he held; cauſing many of the Greeke captains to ſpeake vnto them, and to tell them of the miſerie they indured vnder the Moores and Mamalukes: ſo farre preuailed with them, that they all determined to aduenture their liues, to put the Mamalukes out of the citie, with all them that fauoured the Sultan. And ſo in the night taking vp armes, made themſelues maſters of one quarter of the citie, and deliuered one of the gates to Axalla: wherby he entering, put al the Mamalukes to the ſword, or took them priſoners, and ſo gained the citie. Whereof Tamerlane hearing, beeing as yet vpon his march, was in good hope of ſo proſperous a beginning, to find an happie end alſo of his deſignes in Ægypt. For I beſides the good fortune thereof, he knew that this hauen of Damiata might ſerue him with victuals out of all the parts of Greece, as the Emperor Emanuel had promiſed him, & wherein he nothing failed him. Into which port Tamerlane hauing made his entrie, left there in garriſon two thouſand of the Emperour Emanuel his ſouldiers, with a gouernour, of whom hee tooke an oath for their obedience. So hauing ſtayed a ſpace at Damiata, hee cauſed his vauntgard to march towards Alexandria: and hauing paſſed ouer the riuer, euen in an inſtant turned directly vnto Caier, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Sultan, who made prouiſion for the defence of Alexandria, as the neereſt vnto danger. But vnderſtanding of theſe newes, vſed ſuch diligence, that he entered into the citie with fortie thouſand horſe, and threeſcore thouſand foot, euen as Tamerlane his armie approached, purpoſing in perſon himſelfe to defend it. By K whoſe comming the great citie readie before to haue reuolted, was againe in his obedience confirmed, to the great hinderance of Tamerlane his affaires: for to remain long before it, was impoſſible, for want of victuals for ſo great an army in the enemies country. Yet notwithſtanding all this, did not Tamerlane forbeare to draw neere vnto it, and with all his army to encamp neere vnto the ſame, hauing cauſed a great trench to be made for to couer his horſemen, and thereby to lodge his armie more ſafely: during which time hee cauſed diuers onſets to be giuen, as well to trie what confidence the enemie had in himſelfe, as to ſee how the people of the citie, eſpecially the ſlaues (which in that populous citie are infinite) were affected towards him: who certainely informed him of the ſtate of the citie, and the armie; as glad to ſee the ſame by him ſhut vp, and the proud Mamalukes ſtill put to the worſt. But thus lying ſtill at L the ſiege, one day hee thought it good to ſhew his armie before the citie, to trie whether the enemie had a deſire to come to a day of battell or not: as alſo to view what forces he had, and ſo indeed to ſeek occaſion to fight: in hope alſo, that if the Sultan did come forth with al his armie into the field, ſome reuolt might happen within the citie, as well by the ſlaues (vnto whom liberty was by him promiſed) as by the citizens themſelues (diſcontented with the inſolencie of the Mamalukes entered of late into the citie with the Sultan) vnto whom he had made it knowne by certaine ſlaues (for that purpoſe fled as fugitiues out of his army into the citie) how that he was not come to hurt them, but only for the deſtruction of the Mamalukes, both his and their enemies. But betimes ſtanding ſo in battell array, no man came foorth, neither was there any tumult or ſtirre raiſed in the citie, as he had expected. For the Sultan M in ſo great a citie well prouided of all things, was reſolued to wearie him out with lying ſtill, and not to put all to the hazard of a battell. Which Tamerlane perceiuing, and ſet downe not to depart from thence, but victorious, reſolued likewiſe to force him euen in his greateſt ſtrength, in the heart of his greateſt citie; although it were not to be done, but with great aduen-

A aduenture: ſuch confidence he had in the ſtrength & multitude of his army. Now his purpoſe was, firſt to take one of the cities (for Caire is diuided into three) & therin incamping himſelf, by little & little to aduance forward as he might, ſtil fighting with the enemy. Vpon which reſolution, he commanded an aſſault to be giuen, and hauing brought his footmen to the place where he would haue them to giue the onſet (for the citie was not walled, but only fortified with ditches & trenches) he commanded the Prince of Thanais with fifty thouſand footmen, to begin the aſſault, euen in the face of the enemie; which he moſt valiantly performed, and there began a moſt terrible and cruel fight. Axalla in the mean time, deeming (as the truth was) that the Sultan had drawn his greateſt forces to the place where the Prince of Thanais ſought to enter, as vnto a place of greateſt danger; ſet a compaſſe about, & vpon another quarter of B the city, with ſmall reſiſtance paſſed the trenches; where hee preſently left thirtie thouſand men to fil vp the ditches, and to make way for the horſmen to enter: aduancing forward himſelfe, againſt twentie thouſand ſent by the Sultan to haue ſtopt his further paſſage: the Prince of Thanais being at that ſame time almoſt beaten back by the Mamelukes. But the way being made plain, by them that were for that purpoſe left by Axalla, and ten thouſand horſe entred, which charged vpon the backs of the Mamelukes, where the Sultan himſelfe was; and they ſeconded by ten thouſand moe ſent in by Tamerlane, following himſelf after, with al his power: the Sultan retired vnto a ſecond ſtrength, which he had made in the next city. The fight indured full the ſpace of ſeuen houres; wherein were ſlain of the Sultan his men aboue ſixteene thouſand; and of Tamerlanes betwixt ſeuen and eight thouſand. Who contented to haue diſ- C lodged the enemy, and gained a third part of the citie, cauſed a retrait to bee ſounded, in hope the next day to win all the reſt, as indeed he did. For the Prince of Thanais the next day forcing the enemies trenches in one place, and Axalla in another, the Sultan after a great fight finding himſelfe hardly preſſed by the obſtinat enemy, and too weake long to hold out, retired, and ſo forthwith abandoned the citie, & encamped himſelfe along the ſide of the riuer Nilus, with purpoſe to paſſe the ſame, and to flie to Alexandria his ſecond ſtrength & refuge. Which Tamerlane ſuſpecting, followed after him with his horſemen (who onely were in order) and ſome few foot, hardly drawn from the citie, which their fellowes were in ſpoiling; ſo as hee was glad to promiſe them eſpecially, to regard and reward their good ſeruice. Againſt whom the Sultan vpon a narrow cauſey, had oppoſed twelue or fifteen thouſand men, whom he cal- D led his ſlaues (to fauor his paſſage) but were indeed his beſt ſouldiers, and ſtood faſt, he place ſeruing greatly for their aduantage: who for all that at length forced by their enemies, ſtil increaſing vpon them, (though not without great loſſe) caſt themſelues into the great riuer, and made a moſt honorable retrait: euery man hauing his weapon in the one hand, and ſwimming with the other to the further bank. The Sultan flying with ſome eighteen thouſand horſe (for the reſt were ſundry waies fled or els drowned) is reported in his flight, to haue comforted his men, by telling of them, that they were not men that had vanquiſhed them, but gods, there appeared in them ſo great wiſedome, force, and valor: diuers of the Mamelukes taken in the late fight, being brought before Tamerlane, and by him courteouſly vſed, were of him demanded, if they could be content to ſerue him, now that their maſter was fled and gone? which they al vtterly refuſed: whom notwithſtanding, for their fidelitie, Tamerlane ſet at liberty to go again to the Sultan: as no leſſe deſirous to be admired of his enemies for his bounty and courteſie, than feared for his force and valor. The wonderfull wealth of this ſo great and famous a city became a prey vnto his ſoldiers; who for the ſpace of foure and twentie houres had the ſpoile thereof, euery man being then by open proclamation commaunded to repaire to his quarter. The citizens he ſet al at liberty, not ſuffering any of them to be taken priſoners: and ſo leauing ten thouſand good ſoldiers, with a great number of others (wherof he caried a great multitude in his army, planting euery where as he paſſed as it were new colonies) & carrying away with him ſuch of the inhabitants as he thought might hurt him; and taking order for all things neceſſary for the keeping of ſuch a city, hee cauſed his army to paſſe ouer the riuer for to follow the Sultan to Alexandria, to the end not to leaue his victorie vnperfect: Axalla haſting before with the avauntgard, for to hinder the Sultan for ioyning his forces againe together; and the reſt of his army conducted by the Prince of Thanais; he himſelfe with an infinite number of boats & ſoldiers to attend vpon him, going by water, taking great pleaſure to behold the faire riuer, & his ſwift courſe ſomtimes, and in an inſtant to become ſo calme as if it ſcarce moued.

The citizens of Alexandria hearing of his comming, and fearing what might betide them, beſought the Sultan to haue compaſſion of their eſtate, and to withdraw himſelfe into Lybia, whither Tamerlane for the barrenneſſe of the country could not with any great power follow him; reſolued for their parts to giue place vnto fortune, and to do as the time required, and no more to reſiſt ſo great a force, whereof they had alreadie made ſufficient triall: promiſing yet to remain in heart ſtil his, and vpon the firſt occaſion offered, to make the ſame to him appeare. Whereupon the Sultan ſeeing all things deſperat, determined for a time to retire, in hope, that time would bring ſome change: as alſo that Tamerlane his populous armie would not long remaine there. And ſo departing out of Alexandria with teares ſtanding in his eyes, oftentimes ſaid, That God was angrie with him and his people, and that he muſt of neceſſitie ſuffer the fatal ouerthrow of his eſtate, himſelfe hauing done as much as in him lay, according to his charge, and the expectation the world had of him: and yet that he hoped at length to returne againe, and deliuer his people from the bondage, whereunto they muſt now needes ſubmit themſelues. Tamerlane comming to Alexandria (before yeelded to Axalla) there ſtaied a great while, ſending Axalla to purſue the Sultan, exceedingly grieued that he could not get him into his hands; and therefore ſtill fearing ſome innouation to be by him raiſed, which cauſed him to deale the more hardly with them whom he ſuſpected to fauour him. Now the bruit of theſe victories hauing with Axalla paſſed beyond Alexandria into Lybia, had brought ſuch a feare, not onely vpon the people adioyning vnto theſe conqueſts, but alſo vpon all Affrica (they ſuppoſing that Tamerlane did follow) that two and twentie of the Moore kings ſent their embaſſadours vnto him, to offer vnto him their obedience: the Sultan as a man forſaken of fortune, ſtill flying before him. Of the neereſt of which Kings, Tamerlane tooke hoſtages: as for the other farther off, hee contented himſelfe with their faith giuen, and with the other outward ſignes of their good wils.

Tamerlane deſirous to return into his countrey.

Now after this long trauell and paines taken, was Tamerlane more deſirous than he had before vſed, to ſee the pleaſures of his owne natiue country: the rather thereunto moued by the requeſt of his wife, then longing for his returne; and the newes he heard of the ſicknes of the old Tartarian Emperor his father in law; beſides that, age it ſelfe began to bring vnto him a deſire of reſt: with whom alſo, the deſires of his ſouldiers well agreed, as men now wearie to haue run ſo many and diuers fortunes. The onely ſtay was, that he expected the comming of Calibes, an old and faithfull ſeruant of his, whom he for his good deſert had of his own accord appointed gouernor of al his new conqueſts in Ægypt and Syria: a great honour no doubt, but not too great for him that had ſo wel deſerued. So mindfull was he of the good deſerts of his faithful ſeruants, as that he needed not by others to be of them put in remembrance, were they neuer ſo farre off, as was now Calibes, who at this time was with the third part of his armie making way for him along the great riuer Euphrates, for the conqueſt of Meſopotamia, and Perſia: whoſe comming was now with great deuotion looked for of the whole army, deſirous to returne. Which their expectation he long delayed not, but beeing ſent for, came to Alexandria, whither the whole armie was now by the commandement of Tamerlane againe aſſembled. Vpon whoſe comming, Tamerlane departed from Alexandria, hauing there left the Prince Zamalzan (a man of great reputation) with ſix thouſand horſemen and ten thouſand foot, as gouernour of that place, and lieutenant generall vnder Calibes: whom Tamerlan (as I haue ſaid) had now appointed to commaund ouer all Ægypt and Syria, together with the countries newly conquered in Lybia and Barbarie: and now conducting him vnto the great citie of Caire, and there taking the beſt order he could for the preſeruation of his new conqueſt, left him with fortie thouſand horſe and fiftie thouſand foot. And ſo hauing ſufficiently inſtructed him how hee would haue thoſe kingdomes gouerned, diſmiſſed him, not like a maſter, but as a companion, ſeeming very ſorry to leaue him deſtitute of his preſence. So ſetting forward with his armie, conducted by the Prince of Thanais, Tamerlane himſelfe, with a few to guard him, by the way turned aſide vnto Ieruſalem: Where hee remained eleuen dayes, daylie viſiting the ſepulchre of Chriſt Ieſus (whom he called the God of the Chriſtians) and the ruins of Salomon his Temple: much wondering thereat, and at Ieruſalem, the ſeat of Dauids Kingdome, and of that great Salomon; but grieued that hee could not ſee them fully in their former beautie. He only deſpiſed the Iewes, which had committed ſo cruell a murder againſt him that came to ſaue them. And to ſhew his deuotion towards the holy city commanded it to be free from all ſubſidies and garriſons of men of war; and gaue great gifts vnto the Monaſteries, and honoured them ſo long as hee remained there. Departing from Ieruſalem, he came to Damaſco: which great citie, as well for that it was infected with the opinion of Iezides (accounted an arch heriticke among the Mahometans) as alſo euill affected to his proceedings, he cauſed to be raſed, and the bones of Iezides the falſe Prophet to be digged vp and burnt, and his graue before much honored, in deſpight to be filled with dung. So marching on, & blaſting the world before him as he went (for long it were and from our purpoſe, to recount all his victories) he paſſed ouer the riuer Euphrates, and hauing conquered Meſopotamia, with the great citie of Babylon, and all the kingdome of Perſia, laded with the ſpoile of the world, and eternized for euer, he returned at length to Samercand, the famous place of his birth, and glorious ſeat of his empire.

The miſerable death of Baiazet.

Now had Baiazet (but a little before one of the greateſt princes on earth, and now the ſcorn of fortune, and a byword to the world) with great impatiencie laine two yeres in moſt miſerable thraldom, for moſt part ſhut vp in an yron cage, as ſome dangerous wild beaſt: and hauing no better means to end his loathed life, did violently beat out his braines againſt the barres of the yron grate wherin he was incloſed, and ſo died about the yeare of our Lord 1399. Yet of his death are diuers other reports: ſome ſaying, that he died of an ague, proceeding of ſorrow and griefe: others, that he poyſoned himſelfe: and the Turks affirming, that he was ſet at libertie by Tamberlane, being by him beforehand poyſoned, whereof he dyed three daies after hee was inlarged (a report not like to be true:) but howſoeuer it was, his end appeareth to haue bin right miſerable. His dead bodie at the requeſt of his ſon Mahomet, was by Tamberlane ſent to Aſprapolis, from whence it was afterwards conueied to Pruſa, and there lyeth buried in a Chappell neere vnto the great Mahometan Temple without the citie Eaſtward: where alſo lieth his beloued wife Deſpina, with his eldeſt ſonne Erthogrul. And faſt by in a little Chappell lieth buried his brother Iacup, whom he in the beginning of his raigne murthered.

A compariſon betwixt Baiazet and Tamberlane.

Theſe two great and mighty Princes, Tamberlane and Baiazet, (both of them whilſt they liued, a burthen to the world) as they took their beginning from the Scyths or Tartars, ſo were they of like honorable progenitors deſcended: Baiazet being the fourth in deſcent from the warlike Othoman, the raiſer of his family; & Tamberlan in like degree from the great Zingis, the firſt and moſt fortunat leader of the Tartars (his countrymen) vnto the pleaſures of the Eaſt: both Princes of great power and like ſpirit; wiſe, hardy, painful, reſolute, and moſt skilfull in martial affaires; but ambitious aboue meaſure, the ground of al the former troubles by them raiſed, to the aſtoniſhment of the world. Howbeit, the great vertues and other the honourable qnalities of Baiazet, were in him by his cholerick and waiward nature much obſcured: which made him to exceed both in cruelty & pride: being alſo much more handfaſt than were his honorable predeceſſors. For which cauſes he was much feared and leſſe beloued of his ſoldiers and men of war in general, & of them at his moſt need forſaken: He vſed commonly to ſay, That his treaſures were his childrens meat, and not his ſoldiers pay: which by way of reproch was by a common ſoldier caſt in his teeth, when he raged to ſee himſelfe by them forſaken in the great battel againſt Tamerlane; telling him as he fled, that he ran not away, but went to ſeek his pay, wherewith to prouide his children bread. Whereas all the aforeſaid vertues in Tamberlane were graced with diuers other of like nature, no man being to his freinds more courteous or kinde, either vnto his enemies more dreadfull or terrible. The good ſeruice of his ſeruants he neuer forgot, either left the ſame long vnrewarded: being therof ſo mindful, as that he needed not by them or others in their behalf, to be put in remembrance therof, hauing always by him a catalogue both of their names and good deſerts, which he daily peruſed. Oftentimes ſaying that day to be loſt, wherein hee had not giuen them ſomething: and yet neuer beſtowing his preferments on ſuch as ambitiouſly ſought the ſame (as deeming them in ſo doing vnworthy thereof) but vpon ſuch as whoſe modeſty or deſert he thought worthy thoſe his great fauors; ſo tempering the ſeuerity of his commands with the greatnes of his bounty, as that it is hard to ſay, whither he was of his nobility & men of war, for the one more feared, or for the other beloued: both, the great ſtaies of princes ſtates; feare keeping the obſtinat in obedience; & loue, the dutiful in deuotion. But with Baiazet it was not ſo, who deeming all done for him but duty, & by nature chollerick & proud (after the maner of tyrants) deſired aboue al to be of his ſubiects feared, not much regarding how little he was of thē beloued; not the leſt cauſe

Baiazet in his poſteritie more fortunate than Tamberlane. cauſe of his great fall and miſerie, and that therein hee was of his owne ſo ſmally regarded: G wherein for all that he is to be accounted more fortunate than the other great conqueror his enemie, hauing euer ſince in the lineall deſcent of himſelfe, had one of the greateſt Monarchs of the world to ſucceed ſtil in his kingdome and empire: as he hath euen at this day, the great Sultan Mahomet, the third of that name, who now in great maieſty raigneth in Conſtantinople. Whereas the glorie of Tamberlane his empire, euen in his owne time growne to the height thereof, and labouring with the greatneſſe of it ſelfe, and by him diuided amongſt his ſonnes, ſhortly after his death decaied, rent in ſunder by ambition and ciuill diſcord; and not long after, together with his poſteritie, rooted out by Vſun-Caſſanes the Perſian King, to the worlds wonder, tooke end: nothing of the huge greatneſſe thereof now or ſince then remaining, more than the ſame thereof: as doth alſo the miſerie of the other ſo brought low. But H leauing this mirrour of miſhap (Baiazet) vnto his reſt, and Tamberlane for a while to triumph in Samarcand; let vs now proceed in the courſe of our hiſtorie, yet not forgetting by the way to remember ſuch Chriſtian Princes as then liued together with theſe two great Monarchs.

MAHOMETHES PRIMVS QVINTVS TVRCARVM REX FLORVIT ANNO 1405 1603

Phil. Lonicer. Hist. Turc. l. 1.

Vindicibus Mahomet patrium ſibi vendicat armis Imperium, & fractas feruidus auget opes.
Quod patri abſtulerat violentia Tamberlani, Imperio reddit Marte fauente ſuo.
Ille ſagittiferoſque Dacas, validoſque Triballos Contudit, & populos Iſter amœne tuos.
Turcica ſic rurſus ſublata potentia ſtragem Attulit imperio Romule magne tuo.

By force of armes ſtout Mahomet his fathers kingdome gaines, And doth the broken ſtate thereof repaire with reſtleſſe paines.
What ſo the force of Tamerlane had from his father tane, He by his fortune and his force reſtor'd the ſame again.
The Dacians he vanquiſhed, and Seruians in field, And forc'd the people neere to thee faire Iſter, for to yeeld.
So once againe the Turkiſh ſtate (by him rais'd vp on hie) Hath to thine empire, Romulus, brought great calamitie.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, THE FIRST OF THAT NAME, FIFTH KING OF THE TVRKES, AND RESTORER OF THEIR SORE SHAKEN KINGDOME.

Diuers opinions concerning the ſucceſſors of Baiazet.

HOw wonderfully the Turkiſh kingdome was by the violence of Tamerlane ſhaken, and the maieſtie thereof defaced, it well appeareth, in that the Hiſtories of that time, as well thoſe of the Greeks, as of the Turks, in nothing more differ, than in the ſucceſſors of Baiazet, their late vnfortunat King. Some writing, that he had two ſons, Orchanes (otherwiſe called Calepinus) and Mahomet: and that Calepinus in the ſecond yeare of his raigne was ſlaine, and his kingdome poſſeſſed by Mahomet his brother. Others reporting, that Baiazet had two ſons namely, Calepinus and Muſtapha: and that Calepinus ſucceeding his father in the Turkiſh kingdome, when he had raigned ſix yeres, died, leauing behind him two ſonnes Orchanes and Mahomet: and that Orchanes being young, was ſlaine by his vncle: whom Mahomet in reuenge of his brothers death, afterwards ſlew, and poſſeſſed the kingdome himſelfe. Others reckon vp ſeuen ſons of Baiazet; Ioſua, Muſulmanes, Moſes, Calepinus, Ioſua the yonger, Muſtapha and Halis; with an vncertaine ſucceſſion amongſt them alſo. This diuerſitie of opinions, full of no leſſe vncertaintie; as I mean not to follow in report of this Hiſtorie, ſo wil I not ſpend any time in refuting the ſame, (although much might be ſaid in the matter) but leaue theſe reports, together with the hiſtorie following, to ſuch credit as they ſhall hap to find with the conſiderat readers.

The Greeke Hiſtoriographers (beſt like to know the Turkiſh ſucceſſion, as wel by reaſon of their neereneſſe, as in that they were by them as their bad neighbors, ſo much troubled) make no mention at all either of Calepinus or of Orchanes: In like manner, Hiſtoria Muſulmana Turcorum, diligently gathred out of the Turks own hiſtories by Io. Leunclauius (a learned Phyſitian, and himſelfe a great traueller amongſt them, & therefore deſeruing the more credit) do not ſo much as name the ſucceſſion of Calepinus or Orchanes, after the captiuitie of Baiazet, but reiecteth them both as counterfets. But in my opinion (without preiudice to any, that vpon better reaſon may deeme otherwiſe) the great confuſion of the Turkiſh Kingdome, in ſhort time wrought by the mightie Tamerlane and his Tartars, with the ciuill diſcord and war afterwards ariſing among the ſons of BaiaZet, ſtriuing all as it were at once, for the reſtleſſe room of ſoueraintie, which ſuffereth no partners; and euery one of them, according to his hap or power, laying hand vpon ſome one part or other thereof, and bearing himſelfe therein for a time as a King, in countries ſo far diſtant; neuer leauing, vntill they had like the earth-borne bretheren, wrought one anothers deſtruction; might giue iuſt occaſion of ſuch diuerſitie of reports as is before ſpoken of, concerning the ſucceſſion of that time, in that troubled and rent kingdom: ſome reckoning one, ſome another; and ſome, ſuch as neuer were, to haue ſucceeded in the gouernment, and ſo vntruly augmenting the number of the Turkiſh Kings. Wherefore leauing Calepinus & Orchanes vnto them that firſt found them, with that little, which without any good ground and leſſe probabilitie is written of their ſuppoſed raigne; I (following the authoritie of the Turkiſh hiſtory) reckon this Mahomet one of the yongeſt ſonnes of Baiazet (of whom we are now to intreat) fifth king of the Turk: who after great and dangerous wars as well againſt his own brethren, as his forrein enemies, was at length ſolely inueſted in the Turkiſh Kingdome, about ten yeares after the captiuitie of his father Baiazet, as ſhall hereafter be declared.

The true poſteritie of Baiazet

Baiazet after the manner of the Turkiſh Kings, hauing layd vp the hope of his poſteritie in the common treaſure houſe of nature, rather than in the bodie of one lawfull wife, had by diuers wiues and concubins ſeuen ſonnes, Ethogrul, otherwiſe called Orthobules, Emer-Solyman, Muſtapha-Zelebi, (that is to ſay, the noble) Iſa-Zelebi, Muſa-Zelebi, Sultan Mahomet, and Caſan-Zelebi. Of whom Erthogrul the eldeſt was loſt in the wars againſt Caſi Burchaniden, as is before ſaid in the life of Baiazet. Muſtapha was ſlaine in the great battell againſt Tamerlane, and there buried in the bed of fame. Cuſan the yongeſt was a child in Baiazet his court, when his father was taken, and afterwards with his ſiſter Fatime deliuered as hoſtages, by their brother Solyman, vnto Emanuel the Emperor of Conſtantinople, where they both happily became Chriſtians, and ſo ſhortly after died.

Solyman was by Alis Baſſa Preſident of Baiazet his Councel, and other great captaines, conueyed out of the battell againſt Tamerlane, into Europe, and ſo by them at Hadrianople ſaluted Sultan. Mahomet fled out of the ſame battell to Amaſia in Capadocia, where he was in his fathers time gouernour. Iſa hearing of his fathers captiuitie, after the departing of Tamerlane with his Tartars, ſeiſed vpon Pruſa a citie of Bithynia, the antient ſeat of the Turkiſh Kings, with the country adioyning, and there raigned as King. Muſa-Zelebi was taken priſoner with Baiazet his father, and afterwards ſet at libertie by Tamerlane. But of their fortunes more ſhal be ſayd in this hiſtory following.

Mahomet gouernor of Amaſia.

Mahomet was but fifteene yeares old when his father Baiazet in the vnfortunate battell of mount Stella was taken priſoner, and was at the ſame time by his appointment Gouernour of Amaſia, with a great part of Capadocia adioyning: which places became ſo troubleſome after the great victory of Tamerlane, that the Turkes in that country were glad day and night for the ſafegard of themſelues, their wiues, and children, to keepe continuall watch and ward: in ſo much that many of them wearied with thoſe troubles, & deſpairing of better times, went into voluntary exile, becauſe they would not ſee ſo great miſeries: which thing much grieu'd yong Mahomet. Wherefore calling vnto him his moſt faithful councellors, to conſult what courſe to take in the midſt of ſo many dangers, it was by generall conſent thought beſt (for ſo much as they could not without apparent danger continue neere vnto Tamerlanes forces) to get themſelues further off into places of more ſtrength, & from thence to expect the departure of their enemies, and in the meane time to content themſelues with ſuch aduantages as occaſion and chance of war might miniſter; cutting them ſhort by policy, whom they were not able to meet in the plain field, and ſo by little & little to weaken or wearie their mightie ſtragling enemies. For albeit that Tamerlane himſelfe was not neere him, as then lying in Caria; yet did the Captains of his great and victorious army, at their pleaſure ſpoile and forrage the countries far and neere all ouer the leſſer Aſia. Vpon this reſolution he with all his forces departed from Amaſia, to Derby in Paphlagonia: where by the way he incountred with Cara Iabia a nigh kinſman to the prince Iſfendiar of Caſtamona, his enemie; whom he put to flight with great ſlaughter of his men. This was the beginning of Mahomets good fortune. From thence he went to Kereden, and there ſtaying certain dayes, ſent a ſpie into Tamerlanes campe, to ſee how all things went there: and afterwards entred again into councel with his captains, concerning his further proceedings.

Mahomet ſendeth Spies into Tamerlane his campe.

In which conſultation ſome were of opinion, That it was beſt for him to withdraw himſelfe into the mountains of the leſſer Aſia, as a place of good ſafetie, vntill the departure of Tamerlane, which was ſhortly hoped for: for that it was not to be thought, that Tamlaine would with his huge armie purſue him in that mountaine country, flying from hil to hil, and as it were from ſtrength to ſtrength. Others better aduiſed, thought thoſe mountains to be no places to truſt vnto, and therfore that it were more honorable, and as free from danger, for him to return again to Amaſia, and there to liue amongſt his ſubiects, protecting them in ſuch ſort as he might, & not to leaue them for a prey to euery ſtragling companie of the rude Tartarians: which councel he followed, as moſt reaſonable; & being readie to ſet forward, the ſpie before by him ſent into Tamerlanes campe, returned, certifying him that he had ſeen his father Baiazet in good health in the Tartars Campe, but could not by any means ſpeake with him, by reaſon of the ſtraight Guard ſet ouer him: and that all that part of Aſia was by Tamerlane poſſeſſed,

A poſſeſſed, who then with his army wintred in Caria and Lyſia: whereupon Mahomet returned backe againe into Amaſia; where he had not long ſtayed, but that newes was brought vnto him, That one of the Tartarian Princes called Cara Duletſchach (that is to ſay, the fortunate blacke King) was with an armie of twentie thouſand comming to ſpoyle his countrey, being giuen him by Tamerlane. With which newes hee was exceedingly troubled: wherefore with all ſpeed calling together his forces for the ſafegard of his country, he ſent before a ſpie to diſcouer the enemies doings. This diligent ſpie returning in all haſt, told Mahomet, That Cara Dulet lay at the towne of Ægiolus in Galatia, in great ſecuritie, hauing about him but a ſmall power; for that he fearing no danger, had at that time diſperſed his armie, to ſeeke after pillage abroad in the couutry. Mahomet taking hold of this opportunitie, marched thither with B great celeritie, and ſuddenly ſetting vpon Cara Dulet, ouercame him. In which conflict Cara Dulet himſelfe was ſhot thorow the head with an arrow and ſlaine, and his armie vtterly diſcomfited. Mahomet returning backe to Amaſia with victorie, refreſhed and rewarded his ſoldiers, yet no leſſe carefull for the ſafetie of his kingdome than before.

Cara Dulet ſlaine.

Shortly after, he was aduertiſed that Cubad Ogli with a great armie laid hard ſiege to the citie of Cæſaria in Capadocia, & was like in ſhort time to take it, if it were not ſpeedily relieued. By taking of which citie, that Tartar Prince was like to make a great entrance, to the hazarding of the whole country. Wherefore Mahomet hauing his army always in readineſſe, marched day and night with ſuch ſpeed to Cæſaria, as that he was vpon Cubad Ogli before he was aware of his comming, and there ſlew moſt of his ſoldiers, and put him with the reſt to flight. C ter that, he returned into Cubad Ogli his Countrey in Pontus, and grieuouſly ſpoyled and deſtroyed the ſame: at which time he alſo by force woon the ſtrong caſtle Peltæ in the confines of Phrygia.

Immediatly after that, Inall Ogli another of Tamerlanes Captaines (which at their pleaſure without let forraged all the countries of the leſſer Aſia, during the time that Tamerlane made his abode within the Turks dominions) vpon the ſudden entred into Capadocia with an army of twentie thouſand fighting men, killing the inhabitants, & ſpoyling the country before him: ſo that the people for feare left their dwellings, and fled into the woods and mountaines, to hide themſelues from his furie. Whereof Mahomet hearing, was therewith exceedingly grieued, and wrote vnto him as followeth:

Sultan Mahomet, vnto the Prince Inall Ogli.

Mahomet his Letters to Inall Ogli the Tartar Prince.

Whereas without any iuſt or lawfull cauſe, or any war proclaimed, you haue inuaded Our Kingdome, and ceaſe not cruelly to kill Our ſubiects, by God committed to Our protection; and to ſpoyle their wealth and labours, to the great diſturbance of the Mahometan commonweale; and make no end of your malice and crueltie: you do therein quite digreſſe from the manners and laws of the true Mahometans, or right beleeuers. For if thou wouldeſt not only be accounted, but indeed be a true Muſul-man, thou ſhouldeſt forthwith depart out of my kingdome with thine armie; thou ſhouldeſt not thus ſhed the innocent bloud, or without cauſe thus wrong my people: but foraſmuch as thou knoweſt not what beſeemeth thee, neither wilt liſten vnto good councell, but wilfully proceed in thy wicked purpoſe, falſly perſuading thy ſelfe, this my Kingdome to be deſtitute of a lawfull inheritor, and therefore doſt ſo great wrong and iniurie vnto the defenders of the true Mahometan religion; I would thou ſhouldeſt know, that I with my ſo often victorious armie will ſhortly by the power of God come againſt thee, and in plaine field according to thy deſerts chaſtiſe thee. Therefore whileſt thou yet maiſt, reclaime thy ſelfe, and proceed not too far in thine obſtinacie: too late repentance did neuer man yet good. Thus much We thought good to aduertiſe thee, that thou ſhouldeſt not be ignorant of Our purpoſe, but mighteſt ſo better conſider and diſpoſe both of thy ſelfe and thine affaires. In the yere after the departure of the great Prophet Mahomet 806.

Vnto which Letters Inall Ogli returned this anſwer in writing:

Prince Inall Ogli, to Mahomet.

Inall Ogli his anſwer to Mahomet.

Why doſt thou Mahomet with ſuch letters prouoke me? why doſt thou ſo vnciuilly taunt me, being thy ſelfe but a boy, and in truth a very child? It beſeemeth thee not to haue entred into theſe countries, or to lay hands thereon, wrongfully gracing thy ſelfe with the title of a Sultan. Neither is there any cauſe why thou ſhouldeſt complaine, that I ſhould lie in wait or ſeeke after thy life, thy kingdome, or any thing that thine is. I challenge vnto my ſelfe this kingdome, but none of thine: out of which it is reaſon for thee, as a wrongfull intruder of thy ſelfe, to depart; whom otherwiſe I will forthwith thruſt out, and ioyne the ſame vnto the reſt of my territories. Wherefore except thou without delay get thee packing, and ceaſe to oppoſe thy ſelfe againſt my deſignes; I denounce vnto thee all the calamities of war, and wiſh thee with ſpeed to prepare thy ſelfe to battell, for that I meane ſhortly to meet with thee. This yeare of our great Prophet 806.

Inall Ogli ouerthrown by Mahomet.

Shortly after, Mahomet according to his promiſe meeting with this Tartar Prince, by plaine force ouerthrew him, and had of him a notable victorie.

The like good hap he had alſo not long after, againſt Coſter Ogli and Kinpeck Ogli, two other Tartarian captaines, at the caſtle of Chara-chizar and the Plaine of Artuck-Oua. And hearing that one Meſites a Turke, had fortified himſelfe in the ruins of Sebaſtia, and from thence ſpoiled the country round about, he ſent Baiazet one of his Baſſa's againſt him; who in ſhort time tooke him, and brought him bound vnto him: by whom he was adiudged to die. But ſeeing in the man an inuincible courage, and contempt of death at ſuch time as he ſhould haue been executed, mooued therewith, hee gaue him his pardon; for which he euer after continued vnto him faithfull, and did him great ſeruice.

Mahomet hauing many times thus vanquiſhed the ſtragling Tartarian Princes, which had ſought the ſpoyle of his countrey, became thereby famous amongſt the great commanders of Tamerlane his armie; in ſo much that the bruit of his name came at length to Tamerlanes eare, yet lying in the leſſer Aſia: who as he thought it not worth his greatneſſe and labor, himſelf in perſon to goe againſt ſo great an enemie; ſo hee thought it not good or conuenient quite to neglect him, but by ſome other meanes (if he could) to ouertake him. For which purpoſe he began to ſpeake many times very honourably of him, highly commending his great valor and forwardneſſe in ſo tender yeres. And calling for Baiazet, told him what great commendation he had heard of his ſonne Mahomet, and that he was therefore very deſirous to ſee him: where if he found that true which was reported of his great vertues, hee would beſtow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage, with many other great preferments: and therfore willed Baiazet to write vnto him, Not to doubt to come vnto him, to the great good both of himſelfe and his father. Which thing BaiaZet at the firſt doubting the worſt, requeſted Tamerlane not to beleeue that of his ſon, being yet very yong, and not worthie of ſo great a fauor. Neuertheleſſe partly perſuaded by Tamerlane his proteſtations, & importuned by him that might now command him; he with an euill will wrot to his ſon Mahomet to ſuch effect as Tamerlane required. With which letters, and others of like purport from himſelf, with many rich Preſents, Tamerlane ſent Hozza Mahomet (one of his ſecret councellors) embaſſador to Mahomet, of whom he was right honorably receiued, and likewiſe entertained. But hauing read the aforeſaid letters, and thereby vnderſtood the cauſe of his comming, he entred into councel with the great Baſſa's about him, whether he were beſt to go to Tamerlane or not. Where his Councellors were al cleere of one opinion, that it was not good for him to aduenture his perſon to the danger of ſuch a journey, or the mercie of ſo mightie an enemie, of whoſe faith he had no aſſurance. And if ſo be (ſaid they) he therewith offended, will by force ſeeke to haue you, we at his comming will take the refuge of the woods and mountains, and there ſhroud our ſelues vntil he be departed again: for that he with his huge armie cannot here long ſtay in this bare country, for want of neceſſaries. Neuertheleſſe Mahomet hoping that his journy might be both for the good of his father, and his owne aduancement; contrarie to the mind of all his councellors reſolued to go: and ſo hauing prepared all things needfull for the honor & ſafety of his journy, ſet forward. But as he was vpon the way in the marches of Pontus, Cara Iahia whom he had before ouerthrowne, vnderſtanding of his comming that way, thinking now to be reuenged, and hauing got vnto him ſome of the Prince Iſfendiars forces, ſet vpon him by the way: but with as euill ſucceſſe as before, moſt of his men being there by Mahomet ſlain, & himſelf glad ſhamefully to flie. So trauelling on further, he vnderſtood that Alis Beg, a great Lord in thoſe countries, went about to intercept him alſo: which cauſed him in ſuch haſt to goe on, that he was vpon Alis before he was aware of his comming, or well prouided for him: ſo that for feare he was glad to betake himſelf to flight. Mahomet cōſidering the danger he had eſcaped in that journey,

iourney, and that the neerer he came to Tamerlane, the more like he was to fall into greater, although happily without Tamerlane his knowledge: by the aduice of his graue and faithfull counſellours, reſolued to goe no further. Wherefore calling vnto him Tamerlanes embaſſador, he thus ſpake vnto him:

Mahomet his ſpeech to Tamerlanes embaſſadour.

You ſee the dangers and iniuries I indure in this my iourny, and my mind forbodeth greater to enſue: for which cauſes I may not goe any further, but here returne. Commend me therefore I pray you vnto the moſt mightie Tamerlane, with my father, and tel them what dangers haue happened vnto me vpon the way: which conſidered, I hope they will haue me excuſed. For which purpoſe I will alſo ſend in your companie an embaſſadour of mine owne.

Mahomet at that time had with him a graue, wiſe, and learned man, called Sophis Baiazet, ſometime his ſchoolemaſter: whom he ſent embaſſadour to Tamerlane and his father, to haue him vnto them both excuſed: and ſo departed, he homewards, leauing the way he came (for feare of further danger) and they towards Tamerlane, who honourably receiued Mahomets embaſſadour and letters. But taking pleaſure in the man ſent vnto him, gaue him honourable entertainment, but would neuer after ſuffer him to returne againe vnto his maſter.

It was not long after, but that old Baiazet died of impatiencie (as is aforeſaid:) whoſe dead bodie Tamerlane left at Apropolis with the Prince Germean, to bee deliuered vnto his ſonne Mahomet; with Muſa his elder brother (who all this while had beene kept priſoner with Tamerlane) if Mahomet ſhould require them. And ſo the mightie Prince Tamerlane, after he had long time waſted Phrygia, Caria, Lydia, with the moſt part of the leſſer Aſia; and conquered all Syria, Iudea, Ægypt, and Perſia, with many other great countries and prouinces; returned at laſt into his owne kingdome, vnto the great citie of Samercand, which he wonderfully inlarged, and beautified with the ſpoiles of a great part of the world, before by him waſted: where he afterwards in great peace and glorie raigned, no leſſe honoured than feared of all the Princes of the Eaſt. To the terrour of whom, and for the aſſuring of his eſtate, hee kept alwaies a ſtanding armie of fortie thouſand horſe, and threeſcore thouſand foot readie at all aſſaies: beſide other his great garriſons which he kept in Syria, Ægypt, China, and Cambalu; as alſo againſt the Muſcouite, and Turks; beeing commonly in euery place threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, though not ſtill in field, but as occaſion required. Vntill that at length hearing of the riſing againe of the Turkiſh kingdome, vnder the Othoman Princes, the ſons of Baiazet, with whom the oppreſſed Mamelukes of Ægypt, and the Greeke Emperour (as doubtfull of his eſtate) had now alſo for feare of him combined themſelues; he by the perſuaſion of Axalla (then Generall of his imperiall armie) made great preparation for a ſecond expedition to be made for the vtter rooting out of the Othoman familie, & the conqueſt of the Greeke empire. But hauing now all things in readineſſe, and alſo giuen a good beginning vnto theſe his intended conqueſts, (one of the Turkes great Baſſaes beeing by Axalla his lieutenant in a great battell ouerthrowne, and thirtie thouſand of the Turks ſlaine) he in the middeſt of theſe his great hopes, as alſo of his greateſt power, died of an ague the 27 day of Ianuary, in the yere of our Lord 1402. A little before whoſe death, appeared a great and terrible blaſing ſtar, portending as it were to the world the death of ſo great a Prince. He was a man of the middle ſtature, ſomewhat narrow in the ſhoulders, otherwiſe wel limmed, and of a great ſtrength. In his eies ſate ſuch a rare maieſtie, as a man could hardly indure to behold them without cloſing of his owne: and many in talking with him, and often beholding of him became dumbe; which cauſed him oftentimes with a comely modeſtie to abſtaine from looking too earneſtly vpon ſuch as ſpake vnto him, or diſcourſed with him. All the reſt of his viſage was amiable & wel proportioned: he had but little haire on his chinne; and ware the haire of his head long and curled, contrary to the manner of the Tartars, who ſhaue their heads, hauing the ſame alwaies couered: whereas he contrariwiſe was for the moſt part bare headed, commanding his ſon alſo to be ſo by his tutors brought vp: his haire was of a dark colour, ſomwhat drawing toward a violet, right beautifull to behold: which his mother comming of the race of Sampſon (as hee gaue it out) willed him to nouriſh, in token of his deſcent: the cauſe that made him to be the more reſpected of his men of war; moſt part of them beleeuing that in thoſe haires was ſome rare vertue, or rather ſome fatal deſtiny: an old practiſe of many great commanders of former ages, to fil the heads of their ſoldiers with ſome ſtrange opinion conceiued of them, to be the more of them honored; as if in them had bin ſome one thing or other more than in other men.

The great power Tamerlane continually kept

Ille nouus Xerxes, orientis victor, & ingens Quacunque permearet, horror gentium: Compleuit totos Scythico qui milite campos, Hoc ſe ferebat ore trux Tamerlanes.
Cuius in aduentum tutæ altis mœnibus vrbes, Ipſumque terre contremiſcebat ſolum: Ipſi adeo montes, ipſa per deuia valles, Vim Barbarorum non ferebant agminum.
Quare ab Caucaſeis Aſiam conuallibus omnem, Ad vſque Nili flumina armis ſubdidit: Eufratem, & Tigrim, & rapidū tranauit Orontem, Vi, vaſtitate, cæde, cuncta proterens.
Vtque olim fœda cum tempeſtate coorta Erumpit atra nube fulmen igneum: Obuia quæque cadens perrumpit, & alta ſonanti Templa atque ſolidas ſtrage turres diſiicit: Subſidit vaſto tellus labefacta fragore, Humiliſque mentes ſternit humanas pauor:

Haud ſecus ille viam ferro molitus, & igni, Euertit arces, opida aquauit ſolo.
Regem Aſia horribili captum impete Baiazetem Caueaque clauſum ferrea circumtulit.
Hac agitantem illum, & ſpirantem immania iuſſa.
Qua cunctus vndique orbis expaueſceret; Exiguo cæca domitum molimine febris Fatalis vno ſoluit hora triduo.
Deque tot inſanis opibus, de tot modo regnis,

In Engliſh thus:

Of Tamerlane a Xerxes new, which did the Eaſt ſubdue,
And in all places where he came, the nations ouerthrew;
That fild the fields with Scythian troupes, brought from thoſe climats cold, This was the feature and the ſhape which thou do'ſt here behold.
At whoſe approach, the ſtrongeſt townes could ſmall reſiſtance make,
The earth it ſelfe vnder his feet ſeeming for feare to quake.
The mountaines high, mating the skie, and vncouth vallies low, Vnable were the force to beare, where he did come or goe.
All Aſia from mount Caucaſus, vnto the bankes of Nile, With valiant hand he vanquiſhed and made his force to feele.
Euphrates, Tygris, and the ſwift Orantes gaue him way, With force, waſte, and deſtruction great, on what he liſt to prey.
And as in tempeſts great oft times, when all things goe to wracke, The fierie lightning flaſhing forth, out of the clouds ſo blacke, Doth breake downe what it lights vpon, and with a dreadfull fall Or'ethrowes the Temples, with their Towers, and ſtately buildings all:
So that the earth diſmaid therewith, doth lower downe deſcend, And feareful wights wrapt vp in woe, are brought to their wits end:
In like ſort he with fire and ſword ſeeking all to confound, The ſtrongeſt caſtles, towers, and townes, laid equall with the ground.
And like an whirlewind taking vp great Baiazet away, Coupt vp in cage, ſo carried him, for his diſport and play.
But whileſt he rageth thus about, and plotteth in his head Such hard commands and heauie doomes, as all the world ſhould dread:
A little feauer in three fits, oppreſſed him with woe, And cloaſing vp his vitall ſprites, did lay his head full low.
So that for all the world of wealth and kingdomes he poſſeſt, The ſmall remainder of himſelfe in ſimple graue doth reſt.

His great empire by himſelf diuided betwixt his ſons, was by their diſcord, and the ambition of ſome of their diſloyal ſubiects, in ſhort time after brought to great confuſion, & his poſteritie vtterly rooted out by Vſun-Caſſanes, the Armenian Prince, as in the proceſſe of this hiſtory may appeare. But to return again to our purpoſe; Mahomet deliuered of his greateſt feare, by the departure of Tamerlane out of thoſe countries, determined to goe to Pruſa in Bythinia, where his brother Iſa as then raigned: but vnderſtanding that Iſa had before taken the ſtraits whereby he ſhould paſſe the mount Horminius, he tooke another way about, and came to Palæo-Caſtron, where the valiant captaine Eine-beg Sub-baſſa then remained: who with all honour and gladneſſe receiued him, and there for certaine dayes refreſhed both him and his army. Afterwards greater forces ſtill repairing vnto him, he marched thence to Vlabad, called in antient time Lopadium. Of whoſe comming Iſa before vnderſtanding, and hauing aſſembled his armie, marched thither alſo, & encamped on the other ſide of the towne towards Pruſa, readie to giue him battell. But Mahomet ſeeing his brother ſo forward, conſulted with his captaines what were beſt to be done: where Eine Sub-baſſa a man of great experience, and of late one of Baiazet his great counſellors and captaines, told him, That it was not for their honours being brethren, to pollute their hands one in the others bloud; but to aſſaie if the quarrell might by ſome other good meanes be compoſed, and they made friends. For which purpoſe, Mahomet preſently ſent letters vnto his brother Iſa, concerning the partition of their fathers kingdome in Aſia betwixt them: offering vnto him the prouinces of Aidinia, Saruchania Germeania, Charaſia, Charamania, with other countries to them belonging: ſo that hee might haue Pruſa with all the other prouinces about the ſame. Which letters, when Iſa had read, and ſaw that Mahomet offered him but titles for kingdomes, and ſuch countries as were rather ſometimes tributaries vnto their father Baiazet, than any part of his kingdom, and now of late by Tamerlane againe reſtored vnto their antient libertie and gouernors, ſharing out the beſt and ſtrongeſt part thereof vnto himſelfe, he brake forth into choller and ſaid:

The anſwere of Iſa to Mahomet his offers.

What, doth not my fathers kingdome of right belong vnto me being the elder brother? Mahomet is yet but a youth, and ſcarce crept out of the ſhell: by what right then can he claime my fathers kingdom as his inheritance? If he can by the ſword win it, let him take it, and ſo hold it.

Mahomet hauing receiued his anſwere, prepared himſelfe to the field, where his brother as ready as himſelfe, ſtood expecting his comming: and hauing ſet his army in order of battell, gaue the firſt charge: which was the beginning of a moſt cruel and bloudy fight, wherein, as it commonly falleth out in doubtfull battels, many were on both ſides ſlain. At laſt the fortune of Mahomet preuailing, Iſa his armie began to retire: which he ſeeing, left nothing vndone for the encouraging of his fainting ſoldiers, which belonged to a politicke Generall, or valiant ſoldier to do; but preſſing into the thickeſt of his enemies, there with his owne hand ſlew the antient and valiant captaine Eine Sub-baſſa, who had many times beene Generall of the footmen in old Baiazet his wars. But what preuaileth courage againſt euil fortune? Iſa muſt either flie or die. And therefore hauing done what he could in ſo deſperat a caſe, being himſelfe on euery ſide forſaken, in the end was glad himſelf to flie to the ſea ſide: where finding a ſhip readie bound for Conſtantinople, he paſſed ouer thither in ſafety, and there yeelded himſelfe vnto the protection of the Greeke Emperour Emanuel. In this chaſe Mahomet his ſouldiers tooke the valiant captaine Temurtaſes priſoner, another of Baiazet his great commanders, & brought him to Mahomet: who in reuenge of the death of Eine, commanded his head preſently to bee ſmitten off, and his bodie to bee hanged vpon a tree by the high way ſide. Of this victorie, Mahomet certified his brother Solyman at Hadrianople, and in token thereof ſent him Temurtaſes his head. This battell was much ſpoken of, both for that it was fought betwixt two brethren; and alſo for the death of the two famous and old captaines Eine and Temurtaſes, who both together as louing friends, had fortunately fought many great battels vnder Baiazet his enſignes; and now as it were by deſtinie, and againſt their wils, without any priuate grudge, were both drawne into contrarie factions and ſlaine: both whileſt they liued wiſhing a good peace betwixt the ambitious brethren. But as the Turks vſe to ſay, What is by God written in a mans fore head before his birth, cannot in his life be auoided.

After this victorie, Mahomet thinking himſelfe now in ſure poſſeſſion of all his fathers dominions in Aſia, led his army to Pruſa, where he was of the citizens ioyfully receiued as their Sultan: and for his great bountie, of all men highly commended and honoured. From thence he went to Nice, and ſo to Neapolis, and there in both places was likewiſe receiued. Thither reſorted vnto him all the garriſons of Caraſina, Saruchania, and Aidinia, with other the inhabitants of thoſe countries, with all loyaltie ſubmitting themſelues vnto him, with ſuch honor and reuerence as belonged to their King.

The bodie of Baiazet honourably buried at Pruſa.

All things thus ſorting according to his deſire in Aſia, he ſent to the Prince Germean for the bodie of his father Baiazet, and for his brother Muſa, which were there left by Tamerlane, as is before declared. This bodie was by the ſame Prince at the requeſt of Mahomet, with great ſolemnity ſent to Pruſa, and there ſumptuouſly buried, with all the Turkiſh obſequies and ceremonies: the Turkiſh Alcoran or book of their Law, being read ſeuen daies vpon his tomb. All which time great cheere was kept for all commers, and much giuen to the poore (vpon the Turkiſh deuotion) for Baiazet his ſoule: but aboue all others, exceeding bounty was extended to the poſterity of their Prophet Mahomet, which are knowne from others amongſt the Mahometans, by the colour of their apparell, which is all green, and not lawfull to be worn of any but of them: ſo that they were by the bountie of Mahomet, at that time greatly enriched. Hee alſo endowed the abbey which his father had there lately built, with great lands and poſſeſſions for the maintenance thereof. All which things done, and the ſolemnitie paſt, he went in progreſſe to all parts of his kingdome, and was in euery place ioyfully receiued; and ſo afterward returned ro Amaſia; and there in great pleaſure ſpent that ſummer. Where we will for a while leaue him, to ſee what Solyman his eldeſt brother in the meane time doth at Hadrianople: whoſe liuely countenance is by the skilfull workmans hand thus expreſſed.

Good counſell.

Iſa with a great armie ſent by his brother Solyman into Aſia againſt Mahomet.

Solyman the eldeſt ſonne of Baiazet (who kept his court at Hadrianople, there peaceably raigning all this while ouer the countries which his father Baiazet ſometime poſſeſſed in Europe) hearing what his brother Mahomet had done, and how violently againſt all right hee had driuen Iſa out of Pruſa, and made him glad to flie to Conſtantinople: was with this his outragious dealing much offended, and thereupon calling vnto him his Baſſaes and faithfull counſellors, declared vnto them the vnnaturall proceedings of Mahomet againſt his brother Iſa. Wherein (ſaid he) hee doth mee alſo great wrong in taking vpon him the ſoueraigntie ouer thoſe great dominions and countries in Aſia, which of right belong to mee his elder brother, and not to him the youngeſt of ſix. In reuenge of which iniurie and wrong, I intend in mine owne right, to paſſe ouer into Aſia with a ſtrong armie, and by force of armes to recouer mine inheritance there, if I may not otherwiſe come by it. Vnto which ſpeech one of his graue counſellors replied, That in his opinion it was not the beſt courſe for himſelfe to goe in perſon into thoſe warres. For although (ſaid hee) your brother Mahomet be but young, and therefore by your greatneſſe leſſe accounted of, yet is his fortune great, and his experience aboue his yeares. None haue yet had to doe with him, but they haue had enough of him: yea it is worth the noting, how politickly he hath borne himſelfe for his owne ſafetie, and the ſafegard of the countries which he gouerned all the while that the great and mightie Tamerlane with his innumerable forces couered the face of the countries faſt by him: moſt part whereof, Mahomet hath now ſince his departure, againe recouered. Wherefore it were beſt for you to ſend for your angrie brother Iſa, to Conſtantinople, and to make him Generall of the armie you intend to ſend into Aſia againſt Mahomet. In which warres, it is not vnlike, but that one of your brethren will be loſt, wherby you ſhall haue one competitor of your kingdome the leſſe. So ſhall you afterwards with leſſe trouble ſubdue him that is left, or at leaſtwiſe pleaſe him with ſome part of that which they haue ſo mightily ſtriuen for. This counſell was of Solyman and all the reſt well liked of, and approued. So was Iſa preſently ſent for vnto Conſtantinople, and a great armie leuied. Who beeing come to Hadrianople, was by Solyman courteouſly welcommed, and made Generall of his armie: and therewith ſhipped ouer the ſtrait of Helleſpontus into Aſia. Where at his firſt comming, hee poſſeſſed the whole countrey of Caraſia or Lydia: and paſſing further, in all places where hee came, was receiued of the people with great reuerence, they all promiſing him their obedience, if it were his fortune to preuaile againſt his yonger brother Mahomet: wherwith he held himſelf wel contented. So comming to the city of Beg-Bazer, otherwiſe called Deſpotopolis, he there wintered with his armie. In which time, he with many kind and louing letters ſtil directed to Mahomet as his yonger brother, ſeemed to be glad that he was ſo wel obeied & liked of by his ſubiects: and that preſuming of his loue and fauour, he was as his louing brother, and not as an enemie come into Aſia, to intreat with him of ſuch matters as much concerned the good of them both. Whereunto Mahomet with like diſſimulation anſwered, That he was right glad of his comming; for which he needed not (as he) ſayd to make any excuſe, for that he was entered into a kingdome, in part his owne, and the reſt open before him: in token whereof he commanded a rich garment to be caſt vpon the meſſenger as a fauour, ſending alſo diuers rich preſents vnto his brother, with great prouiſion of victuals, and other neceſſaries for his ſouldiers.

Pruſa burnt by Iſa.

But Winter paſt, and the Spring come, Iſa marched with his army to Pruſa, & there ſhewed vnto the citizens the louing letters he had at ſundrie times before receiued from Mahomet: and telling them that he was in good hope that they ſhould in ſhort time right well agree; requeſted to haue the caſtle deliuered vnto him, ſometime their ſoueraigne: whereinto the better ſort of the citizens had retired themſelues, & made faſt the gates againſt him: but when he ſaw that he could by no faire words or policie gaine the poſſeſſion of the caſtle, enraged with that repulſe, he ſet fire vpon that goodly citie, and burnt it downe to the ground. Mahomet not ignorant how his brother Iſa roamed vp and downe his kingdome, vſing all kindnes to ſuch as yeelded vnto him; and exerciſing no leſſe crueltie vpon ſuch as refuſed his obedience: and how that he had raſed the royal citie of Pruſa: hauing gathered a ſtrong army, marched in ten dayes from Amaſia to Pruſa, and by the way meeting with his brother Iſa, in a great battell ouerthrew him with all his forces. Iſa himſelfe accompanied with no more but ten perſons, fled vnto Caſtamona, Prince Iſfendiar his citie: who hearing of his arriuall there, entertained him with al the honor he could, in recompence of the great friendſhip he had before found at his hands, at what time he was an humble ſuter in his father Baiazet his court.

Mahomet comming to Pruſa, grieued exceedingly to ſee that faire city ſo deſtroyed: yet to comfort the poore citiſens, he gaue exceeding ſummes of money to be beſtowed amongſt them, and tooke order for the new building of the citie, and there continued certain days himſelfe to ſee the worke begun.

Iſa in the mean time hauing incited the Prince Iſfendiar in his quarrel to inuade his brother Mahomet, and going thither himſelfe in perſon, was by him now the third time ouerthrowne and put to flight. Neuertheleſſe he with ſome ſmall forces twice afterwards entred into Mahomets dominion, but finding few or none willing to follow his euil fortune, was glad at laſt to flie to the prince of Smyrna, by whom he was both honorably entertained, and comforted.

This prince of Smyrna mooued with Iſa his pittifull complaints in ſo manifeſt a wrong, did not only promiſe him what helpe he could of himſelfe, but alſo by his embaſſadors ſolicited the Princes of Aidinia, Saruchania, and Menteſia, to giue him aid in ſo iuſt a quarrell, for the reliefe of Iſa, againſt his vſurping brother. Theſe Princes pittying the caſe of the diſtreſſed Prince, and moued with the requeſt of the Prince of Smyrna, and fearing alſo the ambitious ſpirit of Mahomet; amongſt them ſent ſuch aid, that being all aſſembled together, Iſa had now twentie thouſand men in armes. Mahomet vnderſtanding of this great preparation made againſt him, and hauing raiſed a ſtrong armie, thought it not beſt to expect his brothers comming into his countrie (where perhaps many might ioyne themſelues vnto him, being ſo ſtrong in field) but entred the Prince of Smyrna his countrey, with ſuch ſpeed, that he was vpon him and the reſt of his enemies before he was looked for; where after a great and bloudie fight he obtained of them a notable victorie. Iſa hauing loſt the battel, and therewith his hope alſo, fled into Caramania, and there in ſuch obſcuritie ended his dayes, that no man can tell where nor how he died. This was the end of this noble Prince, always of greater courage than fortune. The Prince of Smyrna the chiefe author of this war, humbling himſelfe to Mahomet, obtained his fauor. The other confederat Princes which gaue aid to Iſa, were ſhortly after by Mahomet for moſt part ſpoiled of their dominions. Which done, he returned with victorie to the building of Pruſa, hoping now to liue at more quiet.

Iſa flieth into Caramania, and the there dieth in obſcuritie.

But whileſt Mahomet after this victorie dreading no danger, was in the midſt of his pleaſures at Pruſa, he was certainly aduertiſed, That his brother Solyman had raiſed a great armie in Europe, to inuade him in Aſia. Vpon which aduertiſement he furniſhed the caſtle of Pruſa with a ſtrong garriſon, and all things needfull for the induring of a long ſiege, and placed Iacup-Beg the ſonne of Firoſes, captaine therein; and afterwards departed himſelfe, becauſe that city (lately before burnt by Iſa) was not as yet to be defended, much leſſe to be accounted of as a place to retyre vnto if need ſhould ſo require. From Pruſa he came to Ancyra, & from thence directed commiſſions for the taking vp of ſoldiers in all parts of his kingdom. At which time he wrot letters alſo to Doioran a Tartar Prince (whom he had many times greatly pleaſured) for aid: who preſently came vnto him with certaine troups of braue horſe, promiſing him his faithfull ſeruice.

Not long after, hearing that his brother Solyman was with a puiſſant armie now come ouer Helleſpontus, he conſulted with his beſt leaders, what courſe firſt to take; being himſelf of opinion, without delay to meet his brother in the field, deeming it great ſhame, not to offer him preſent battel. But he was by his more expert captains aduiſed, to conſider that he was to fight againſt his eldeſt brother, of whoſe good or bad fortune he had as yet no experience: and that many ſecretly fauored his quarrel and claime, as the eldeſt ſonne and right heire of his father Baiazet: and therefore it were better for him to retyre further off into the ſtrength of his kingdome, and ſo temporizing, to await all good opportunities that might chance, as it doth in nothing more than in martiall affaires; rather than to commit all to the hazard of one battell, wherein if fortune failed him, all were then vtterly loſt. Vpon which reſolution he retyred from Ancyra towards Amaſia. At which time Doioran the falſe Tartarian, marching out at the other ſide of the Citie, fell to robbing and ſpoyling of Mahomets ſubiects as an enemie, burning the countrey villages as they went: which thing when Mahomet vnderſtood, he with his horſemen purſued him, and ouertaking him before he was looked for, ſlew moſt part of his men, and recouered all the ſpoyle which he had before taken; all which Mahomet gaue to his ſoldiers: Doioran himſelfe hardly eſcaping by flight. And ſo Mahomet hauing reuenged himſelfe vpon his diſſembling friend, held on his way towards Amaſia.

The caſtle of Pruſa beſieged by Solyman.

Solyman being come into Aſia, led his armie towards Pruſa ; where the citiſens vnderſtanding of his comming, went out of the citie to meet him, and hauing done vnto him ſuch honor and reuerence as belonged to their Sultan, brought him peaceably into the citie. But Iacup-Beg ſtood vpon his guard, and would by no means deliuer vnto him the caſtle, which was before by Mahamet committed to his charge: for which cauſe Solyman laid hard ſiege vnto it, and gaue thereunto diuers ſharpe aſſaults, whereby the defendants were greatly weakned, manie of them being ſlain, &the reſt for the moſt part wounded. Wherupon Iacup by letters ſent by one Eine Hozze, certified Mahomet how things ſtood, and that the caſtle could not long be holden againſt the furious aſſaults of Solyman, except it were with ſpeed relieued; vpon which news he in all haſt made towards Pruſa, returning the ſame meſſenger before him, with letters to the captain of the caſtle, if happily hee could find means to deliuer the ſame : wherein hee highly commended him for his fathfull ſeruice, and promiſed him ſpeedie reliefe. This meſſenger with his letters chanced by Solyman his ſoldiers to be intercepted, and brought to Alis Baſſa, Solyman his chiefe Councellour, a man of a ſharpe conceit, who of nothing could make ſomething, but hauing any thing to worke vpon could do wonders : he hauing ſtraitly examined the meſſenger, and peruſed the letters, ſuppreſſed the ſame, and preſently writ others in the name of Mahomet, commending the captaine for that he had already done in his ſeruice; but yet foraſmuch as he could not poſſibly in time relieue him, he willed him therefore to deliuer vp the caſtle, and to prouide for the ſafeguard of himſelfe and his garriſon, by ſuch conditions as he could beſt obtaine. Theſe counterfeit letters Alis Baſſa found means to be as cunningly deliuered vnto the captaine, as they were craftily indited : who hauing read the ſame, and now out of all hope of reliefe, expecting alſo euery houre to be aſſaulted by the furious enemie ; vpon reaſonable conditions yeelded the caſtle to Solyman. The news whereof being brought vnto Mahomet, now come within one days march of Pruſa, exceedingly grieued him: but ſeeing no remedie, he returned backe againe to Amaſia ; whither Solyman (now poſſeſſed of the city and caſtle of Pruſa, and hauing thereby got a great name in Aſia) ſhortly after came with his armie, and hardly beſieged his brother in Amaſia : but ſeeing no hope to win the Citie, he retyred backe againe to Pruſa, and there after his woonted manner ſpent his time in riot and exceſſe, whereunto he was exceedingly giuen. Iacup-Beg for yeelding of the caſtle, was afterward by Mahomet ſtraitly impriſoned, and in danger to haue been put to death, had not the great Baſſa's become earneſt interceſſors for him.

Mahomet lying at Amaſia, was by his ſecret eſpials aduertiſed , That his brother Solyman hauing diſperſed his armie, lay in great ſecuritie at Pruſa, guarded but with a ſmall power, paſſing his time in all voluptuous pleaſure, his common exerciſe. Whereupon he in all haſt marched with his armie thitherwards, to haue ſurpriſed him before hee ſhould be able to call together his diſperſed forces. But when he was come to the riuer Sangarius, he was diſcouered by Solyman Subbaſſa a great captain, whom Sultan Solyman had ſent for the taking vp of men in that ſide of the country. Who returning in all haſt, gaue Solyman knowledge of his brothers comming: with which ſudden newes he was ſo diſmaied, being now of ſmall ſtrength, that for the auoiding of the imminent danger, he would preſently haue fled into Europe, had not Alis Baſſa otherwiſe perſuaded him; telling him, That if he ſhould ſo cowardly flie away, it would not only blemiſh and defame his honour, but diſcourage his friends alſo in Aſia, & incourage his enemies to purſue him perhaps vnto the gates of Hadrianople : and that therefore it were better with ſuch forces as he had to take the ſtraights of Neapolis, and ſo to ſtay his brothers further paſſage into that countrey, vntill ſuch time as he might aſſemble the reſt of his armie. According to which good councell, hee firſt tooke the beforenamed ſtraights and paſſages, whereby Mahomet was of neceſſitie to paſſe, and there ſtrongly fortified himſelfe. Mahomet comming thither, with great force entered thoſe ſtraights, but was ſtill valiantly by Solyman repulſed. The like attempt he many times valiantly gaue, for that hee knew himſelfe to be at that time too ſtrong for his brother : but Solyman hauing the aduantage of the place, with little danger or loſſe fruſtrated thoſe his brothers braue attempts, although he were then a great deale the weaker. Alis Baſſa, whoſe wilie head, fraught with long experience, could (with nothing) effect great matters , in the meane time was not idle, but (making Solyman before acquainted with his doings) ſent a ſecret meſſenger (one of his owne truſtie ſeruants) to Mahomet with letters ; certifying him, That moſt of his nobilitie and great captaines had ſecretly conſpired to betray him into the hands of his elder brother Solyman, as the vndoubted heire of his father Baiazet; & ſo with the price of his head, to make their own peace & attonement with him: and that for the performance thereof they had bound themſelues firſt vnto Solyman, and afterwards one to another, by ſolemne oath. Which treaſon he diſcouered vnto him, with great proteſtation of his loue and good will, as he that had a long time eaten bread and ſalt (as the Turks vſe to ſay) in his fathers court, and therefore could not but wiſh well vnto him, being one of his lord and maſters ſonnes. Theſe letters ſomething troubled Mahomet, breeding in his head many a jealous conceit: for all that, hee ceaſed not for ſix or ſeuen dayes ſpace, to giue many a hot ſkirmiſh for the gaining of thoſe ſtrait paſſages, but all in vaine. In which time it chanced, one of his ſeruants neere about his perſon, to flie vnto the enemie; which cauſed him the more to ſuſpect all that to be true, whereof Alis Baſſa had forewarned him. Which conſidered, and that by lying there he preuailed nothing, but loſt and wearied his men, (for it was all that while exceeding foule weather) and withall doubting to be betrayed, returned as he came, to Amaſia. And Solyman glad alſo of his departure, retired to Pruſa, giuing order into all parts of his kingdome, for the aſſembling of a great armie: but vnderſtanding that the king of Caramania had made a league with his brother Mahomet, and that they were agreed to ioyne their forces againſt him, for the driuing of him out of Aſia, hee forthwith drew all his forces to Ancyra, as a place of more ſafetie.

Whileſt Solyman thus lay at Ancyra, it fortuned that Muſa (which had all this while remained with his brother Mahomet, ſince he was ſet at libertie by Tamerlane, though not altogether well pleaſed with his owne eſtate) one day by way of talke, thus ſpake vnto his brother; You ſee (ſaid he) how our elder brother Solyman ceaſeth not to vex and moleſt vs dayly, and is not vnlike in the end to preuaile againſt vs, to our vtter deſtruction: Now if it might pleaſe you to giue me leaue, I would go to Iſfendiar Prince of Caſtamona and Pontus, our brothers enemie, and of him procure ſhipping to paſſe ouer the Euxine ſea, into Europe; where I doubt not to find opportunitie to make ſome great innouation in that kingdome, now in my brothers abſence: by reaſon whereof Solyman ſhall of neceſſity be driuen to leaue Aſia, to be againe by you ſolely poſſeſſed: or elſe be brought in danger there to loſe his kingdome in Europe. Which if it ſhall be my good hap to gaine out of his hands by your ſupportation, I promiſe you faithfully to hold the ſame of you as of my Lord and Soueraigne. This greatly pleaſed Mahomet, and thereupon not long after they concluded betwixt themſelues, one to ſtand faſt vnto another, and the one to helpe the other in what they could, during life; confirming the ſame with great ſolemnitie of their Turkiſh faith giuen and taken. Whereupon Mahomet furniſhed his brother Muſa with great ſummes of money and other needfull things for the taking in hand of ſo great an enterpriſe.

Muſa thus furniſhed, taking his leaue of his brother, ſet forwards towards the Prince Iſfendiar: who hearing of his comming, met him on the way, and entertained him as a great prince. But after that Muſa had made him acquainted with his purpoſe for paſſing into Europe, and had obtained grant of his helpe therein, he tooke his leaue of him for a time, and went to viſit the King of Caramania; who alſo moſt honorably entertained him, and the rather in deſpight of Solyman. But whileſt Muſa was thus paſſing the time in Caramania, it fortuned that Mark (of ſome called Merxes) Prince of Valachia, hauing his countrey much ſpoyled by Solyman his garriſons; and hearing that Muſa one of Baiazet his ſonnes was with the Prince Iſfendiar, he writ vnto him, promiſing to beſtow his daughter & heire in mariage vpon Muſa, if he would come ouer into Europe, and reuenge the wrong done vnto him by Solyman. Whereof Muſa aduertiſed by the Prince Iſfendiar, gladly returned out of Caramania, and was by him tranſported ouer the Euxine or blacke ſea, into Europe: where the Prince of Valachia glad of his comming, receiued him with great honor, and according to his promiſe gaue him his daughter in marriage.

Muſa marrieth the Prince of Valachia his daughter.

The fame of Muſa his comming into Europe, and of his marriage, was in ſhort time bruted thorow all Solyman his Kingdome in Europe, and wrought ſuch effect in the minds of the mutable vulgar people (always deſirous of noueltie) that they all as it were with one conſent ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, as vnto their Lord and Soueraign: in ſo much that comming to the royal citie of Hadrianople, in the abſence of his brother Solyman he was there receiued as their King.

Muſa in the abſence of Solyman receiued at Hadrianople as King.

Solyman now lying at Ancira in Aſia, vnderſtanding of theſe proceedings of Muſa in Europe, and that he was poſſeſſed of a great part of his kingdome there, was therewith exceedingly troubled. Wherefore leauing his deputie in Ancyra, hee with all his army came to the ſtrait of Boſphorus, and there of Emanuel the Greeke Emperor obtained paſſage, promiſing for the ſame to reſtore vnto him certaine places before taken from him in Aſia: for Muſa had ſo prouided, that he could haue no helpe of the Turkiſh ſhipping, which was by his commandment all before brought ouer vnto Europe ſide. Muſa hearing of Solyman his arriuall in Europe, made towards him with a great power: but after that both their armies were come the one within view of the other, and now readie to ioyne battell, many of Muſa his captains forſooke him, and fled to Solyman the elder brother, and their vndoubted king: which Muſa beholding, was glad to flie, and to take the ſafegard of the woods and mountaines for his refuge. After which victorie, Solyman returning to Hadrianople, tooke againe poſſeſſion of his Kingdome, and there without meaſure gaue himſelfe to riot and exceſſe, according to his woonted manner.

After the departure of Solyman out of Aſia Iacup-Beg (but lately before againe receiued into Mahomet his fauour, and now left as Solyman his deputie) deliuered Ancyra, with the caſtle of Pruſa, and all the reſt that Solyman had gained in Aſia, to Mahomet; who ſhortly after led his armie thorow the countries of Caraſia, Aydinia, Sarucania, Tekenſis, and Germeania, reducing them once againe vnto his obeyſance: and afterwards returned to Pruſa, where hee now the ſecond time tooke poſſeſſion of his fathers kingdome in Aſia.

Muſa goeth againſt Solyman.

Muſa ſtil aided by the Valachian Prince his father in law, gaue many great attempts againſt his brother Solyman, but was ſtill put to the worſe. At length hauing gathered ſome good ſtrength, and diligently attending the leaſt ſmile of better fortune, drew neere vnto the place where Solyman lay; who at that time was (as his manner was) banqueting with great pleaſure in his campe, and ful of wine. Inſomuch that when news was brought vnto him, that his brother Muſa was at hand with a great power, he in his drunkennes cauſed the meſſenger that brought the news to be beaten: and when he had with greater earneſtnes than was to his liking, affirmed that his report to be true, he commanded him to be ſlain for troubling his mirth. But Shortly after, Muſa was come ſo neere, that the vantcourrours of his armie did skirmiſh with ſome of Solyman his ſoldiers: when as Chaſis Eurenoſes one of his fathers old captaines, preſſing in, told him that Muſa was at hand, and had skirmiſhed with part of his armie. Whereof Solyman (now far in wine) had no regard, but ſaid, Good Tutor do not trouble me no more; my brother Muſa dares not come ſo nigh me; if I do but hold vp my cap, he is gone. With which anſwer the old Captaine going out diſcontented, ſent in Chaſan, Aga of the Ianizaries: who boldly comming vnto him, told him plainly of the imminent danger, and ſharply reprooued him for his intemperance and ſecuritie. With whoſe free ſpeech Solyman moued, in great rage commanded his beard to be cut off, then no ſmall diſgrace amongſt the Turkes. Chaſan preſently comming forth thus diſgraced, ſaid to them that ſtood waiting without, This is the honor wherewith Sultan Solyman in his exceſſe rewards his moſt faithfull ſeruants. Wherefore be it known to you all, I will from henceforth (and not without cauſe) ſerue Muſa, a Prince of greater temperance and diſcretion: who ſo will follow me, come and welcome. So mounting to horſe, and accompanied with a number of his Ianizaries (of whom he was greatly beloued) went ouer to Muſa; as did many other great captaines alſo with their companies, mooued by his example ſo to doe. But when Solyman vnderſtood that Chaſan with moſt part of the Ianizaries, and many other worthie captaines, with the greateſt ſtrength of his armie, were reuolted to Muſa, then faſt by, and readie to ſet vpon him; it then repented him too late of his diſſolute folly: and finding no other remedie now to eſcape, hid himſelfe vntil it was darke night; then taking horſe, accompanied only with Caratze-Beg and Cara Muchil, two of his noblemen, and one country Turke whom they had retained for their guide, thought to haue fled to Conſtantinople. This malicious clown hauing of purpoſe led them by vnknowne wayes all that night too and fro, as it were in a maze, (oftentimes miſnaming vnto them the places they paſſed by, as if they had been in the right way) brought them in the morning to a village not far from the place from whence they departed the euening before: and there riding a little before them of purpoſe, gaue warning to a ſturdie peaſant or two of his acquaintance, that Solyman was comming after; willing them to make ſtay of him. Theſe rude country churles, with ſome others of like breed, running out with bats and ſtaues, and ſuch other homely tooles as firſt came to hand, ſlew Caratze and Cara Muchill, which would not yeeld vnto them, but ſtood vpon their guard, and tooke Solyman aliue: where, as it commonly falleth out in the vulgar peoples furie, ſome cried out to kill him, and ſo to end the warres; ſome likewiſe to burne him; and ſome to hang him; and ſome few to ſaue him: euery one as his rude affection lead him. In the heat of this countrey vprore came Muſa; who glad to his brother Solyman ſo hardly beſet, cauſed him preſently to be there ſtrangled, when he had raigned in Hadrianople ſix yeares and ten moneths.

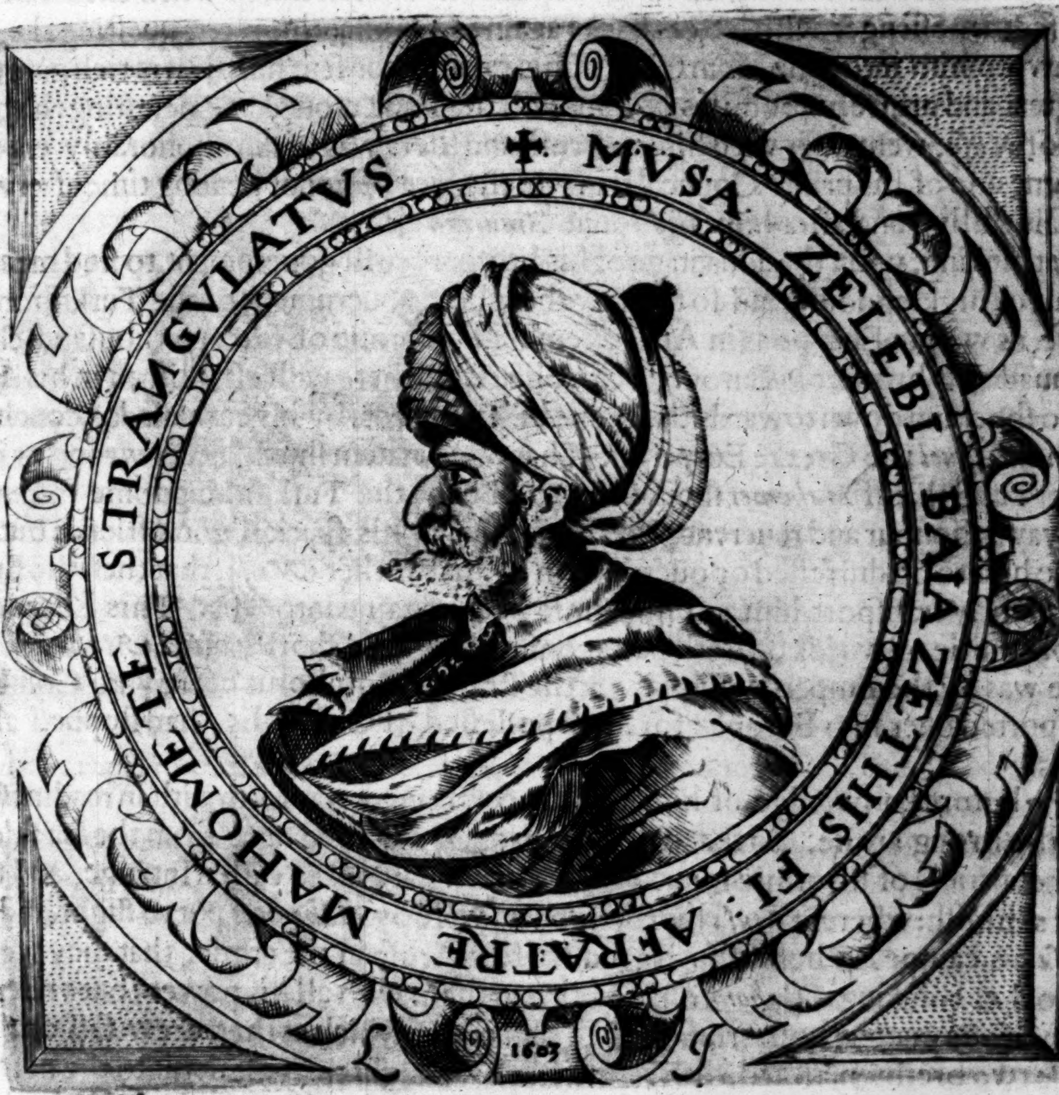
Solyman ſtrangled by his brother Muſa.
This Solyman is that ſame whō ſome call Celebinus, and other ſome, Calepinus, and reckon him for the fift king of the Turks.

This was the miſerable end of Solyman, the eldeſt ſonne that Baiazet left aliue. A man much giuen to exceſſe, otherwiſe indued with many great vertues, being both of great valor, and exceeding bountifull. In his time liued the learned Doctor Achmetes, which wrot the hiſtorie of Alexander the Great in Turkiſh Verſe, and publiſhed it in the name of Solyman himſelfe: for which he was by him bounteouſly rewarded. The dead bodie of Solyman himſelfe, was by the commandement of Muſa conueyed to Pruſa, and there lieth buried faſt by the bodie of his grandfather Amurath. So now of theſe Cadmeian brethren remained none but Mahomet and Muſa, the one raigning in Aſia, and the other in Europe, diuers parts of the world, and well bounded with the ſureſt bounds of nature: yet not ſufficient to content or containe their ambitious minds, vntill that the yonger had moſt vnnaturally deuoured the elder: whoſe liuely counterfeit, as it is by the ſkilfull workeman expreſſed, you may here behold:



MVSA ZELEBI BAIAZETHIS FI: A FRATRE MAHOMETE STRANGVLATVS 1603

Quid properas inſane tuum peſſundare fratrem?
  Nam ſceleris tanti, præmia digna feres.
Quicquid enim fratri maleféceris, hoc tibi frater Mox referet, nimis hac in tua fata ruis?

Rich. Knolles.

What haſteſt thou, mad foole, thy brother to confound?
  The guerdon of ſuch villanie ſhall to thy ſelfe redound.
For looke what miſchiefe thou haſt wrought, ſhall turne to thee againe: Why do'ſt thou therefore, fooliſh man, ſo haſten on thy paine?

Muſa preſently after the death of his brother Solyman tooke vpon him the Turkiſh Kingdome in Europe: who in the beginning of his raigne diſplaced moſt of them which had borne great offices before in the time of his brother Solyman, and had now of late reuolted to him; fearing to be by them betrayed or forſaken, as his brother was; and in their roomes placed other his owne creatures. And not ſo content, proceeded further, vpon ſmall cauſes moſt vnkindly to impriſon and put to death many of them who had of him well deſerued. Which cruell dealing ſo alienated the minds of his Nobility, that many of them kept themſelues out of the way, doubtfully expecting the euent of ſuch his tyrannicall gouernment: Chaſis Eurenoſes that old and renowned captaine, to eſcape his hands, was glad to feigne himſelfe blind, ſo to abſent himſelfe from court. At this time he alſo by his Embaſſadors demanded of diuers Christian Princes his neighbours, ſuch tribute as they had in times paſt either payed or promiſed to pay vnto his father Baiazet: and in that quarrell inuaded many of them, namely the Princes of Seruia and Bulgaria. Amongſt other he ſent Ibrahim Baſſa (a learned man of great experience, and ſometimes one of his fathers graue councellors) vnto Emanuel Palæologus the Emperor of Conſtantinople, to demand the like tribute of him. Who ſo ſoone as he was come to Conſtantinople, from thence by letters aduertiſed Mahomet of the vndiſcreet gouernment of his brother Muſa in his new gotten kingdome; and what vntimely ſtirres he began to make before he was therein well ſetled, loſing the loue both of his ſubiects and neighbor Princes: with much other matter concerning his miſgouernment. Which things when Mahomet vnderſtood, he ſent a meſſenger with letters backe again to Conſtantinople, requeſting the Baſſa to come ouer vnto him into Aſia, & in token of his great fauor ſent him diuers rich garments, with many great and princely promiſes: wherewith the Baſſa moued, and deteſting the cruell gouernment of Muſa, went ouer vnto him to Pruſa, and there was of him honorably entertained, and ſworne one of his priuie Councell: in which place of honor he long time afterwards ſerued him faithfully; and after him, his ſonne Amurath alſo.

Mahomet thinking, vpon the aduantage of his brothers euill gouernment, to find means to thruſt him out of his kingdome, and ſo to draw the whole gouernment of the Turkiſh empire vnto himſelfe, as well in Europe as in Aſia; aſſembled an armie of fifteene thouſand choice ſoldiers to inuade his brother in Europe, before hee were there well eſtabliſhed in his Kingdome. And ſo ſhocking down towards the ſtraits of Boſphorus, by his embaſſador concluded a league with Emanuel the Greeke Emperor, That one of them ſhould neuer wrong or damnifie the other: and that if Mahomet ſhould hap to obtaine the Turkiſh kingdome in Europe, he ſhould alwayes honour and reuerence the Emperour as his ſpeciall good friend: but if it ſhould chance him to be diſtreſſed or ouerthrown by his brother Muſa, that then the Emperor ſhould preſently tranſport him and his armie backe againe into Aſia. This League was with great ſolemnitie of words on both parts confirmed. And ſhortly after, Mahomet with all his Armie was by the Emperors ſhipping at the ſtrait of Boſphorus neere vnto Conſtantinople, tranſported ouer into Europe: for Muſa poſſeſſed of Callipolis, had ſtopped all the other paſſages.

The battell betwixt the two bretheren, Mahomet & Muſa

Muſa hauing before knowledge of his brothers comming, was forthwith in readineſſe to meet him with a ſtrong armie. So that Mahomet had not marched farre from the ſea ſide, but that the vauntcourriers of his armie met with his brothers, at a place called Intzuge, and there began a light skirmiſh: wherein Muſa his forerunners were by Mahomets put to flight, and chaſed vnto Muſa his campe. Whereof ſuch a ſudden feare aroſe in the armie, that they were almoſt readie to flie, thinking Mahomet had bin vpon them with all his power: but vnderſtanding the truth of the matter, both armies reſted that night, which as then drew faſt on. The next day theſe two brethren, armed with equall hope, brought their armies into the field, and gaue the ſignal of the battel, whereupon began a mortall and bloudie fight: in the furie whereof Michael Ogli Baſſa of Romania, and certaine other of Muſa's great captaines, vpon ſecret diſcontentment reuolted to Mahomet: wherewith many of Muſa his ſoldiers diſcouraged, fled. Which Mahomet his ſoldiers ſeeing, purſued the chaſe with ſuch earneſtneſſe and furie, that few were left with himſelfe: yet with ſuch as were left, in hope of good hap, he ſet vpon his brother: who although he was halfe diſcomfited with the flight of the greater part of his armie, whom the enemies had yet in chace, yet ſtood he faſt himſelfe with 7000 Ianizaries, his beſt ſoldiers; ſo taking the vnexpected good hap, preſented vnto him by his brothers forwardneſſe, neſſe, valiantly receiued his charge. But Mahomet finding there a greater ſtrength than he had before ſuppoſed, and himſelfe too weak to withſtand the furie of the Ianizaries, becauſe moſt of his men alſo were following the chaſe, was now for ſafegard of his life glad to flie himſelf to Conſtantinople: whither he came accompanied ſcarcely with two hundred men; and was from thence, according to the agreement before made betwixt him and the Emperor, ſpeedily ſhipped ouer into Aſia. Muſa hauing thus put his brother to flight, with great ſlaughter of his men, preſently tooke his tents with all that was therein, and there encamped himſelfe. They of Mahomets armie, which followed the chace of ſuch as had fled in the beginning of the battell, not knowing what had happened to Mahomet, returning to the campe, doubting no perill, and finding it at their returne poſſeſſed by their enemies, ſtood as men amazed, and vtterly diſcouraged: at which time Muſa would not ſuffer his ſouldiers to put them to the ſword, as they would faine haue done, but commanded them to bee diſpoiled of their armes and ſuch other things as they had, and ſo with life ſuffered them to depart.

After this ouerthrow, whileſt Mahomet lay ſtill at Pruſa, the Prince of Smyrna forcibly entered into Aidinia, purpoſing to paſſe thorow into Sarucania: which thing Mahomet hearing, gathered a great armie, and entering into the Princes countrey, made ſuch ſpoile as hee went, and ſo diſtreſſed the Prince himſelfe, that he was glad to ſubmit himſelfe vnto him; and from thenceforth to hold his dominion of him, as of his Lord and Soueraigne, and ſo returned vnto Amaſia.

Mahomet could not well diſgeſt the loſſe he had ſo lately receiued in Europ, and therefore leuied an armie of choice ſouldiers out of all parts of his kingdome, once againe to trie his fortune againſt his elder brother Muſa. For the better ſucceſſe wherein, he by his letters craued aid of the Prince Dulgader Ogli, written to this effect:

Sultan Mahomet vnto the Prince Dulgader Ogli, his father in law.

My purpoſe is to lead mine armie into Romania in Europe, and there againe to trie my quarrell with my brother Muſa. My hope is, that you will not with your aid be wanting vnto me your ſonne in law, in my ſo great affaires, neither for want of good will to hinder this my purpoſe. Fare you well. In the yeare of our great Prophet Mahomet 814. From Amaſia.

Mahomet his letters vnto the Prince Dulgader Ogli his father in law.

Whereunto the Prince returned this kind anſwere:

Prince Dulgader Ogli vnto the great Sultan Mahomet.

I doubt not moſt mightie Monarch, but that whitherſoeuer your deſires ſhall draw you for the vndertaking of any great exploit, he that ruleth aboue in heauen, wil be alwaies your aid, proſper your attempts, miniſter vnto you fit occaſions, and bring all your actions vnto moſt happie end, with moſt aſſured victorie. Wherefore ſeeing (God ſo diſpoſing our affaires) I cannot my ſelfe in perſon come vnto you with my power, and giue you my truſtie helpe in this your intended warre: yet will I in no caſe faile with all ſpeed to ſend my ſonne your ſeruant, to aid you with our forces, in this warre. Fare you well. This ſame yeare of our Prophet 814.

The anſwere of prince Dulgader Ogli to Mahomet.

And ſo ſhortly after, the Prince ſent vnto him his ſon, according to his promiſe, with a companie of braue ſouldiers, excellently furniſhed: for the welcomming of whom, Mahomet his brother in law made a great and royall feaſt: and there in his mirth gaue vnto the yong Prince the rich apparrel he wore himſelfe, with the horſe he rode vpon, and all the rich plate of gold and ſiluer wherin they were ſerued at that feaſt, a matter of great value. And to euery one of his noblemen he gaue a rich garment, made for that purpoſe, with ſome other gift, as a fauor: and afterwards gaue them al to vnderſtand, That he intended forthwith to paſſe ouer into Europe, & there to recouer all his fathers kingdom, or els there to end his daies: as for the ſpoile and prey (ſaid he) it ſhall be theirs that can win it: one horſe, one ſword, one horſemans mace ſhal content my ſelfe. So hauing furniſhed his army with all things needful for ſo great an enterpriſe, he ſet forward & came to the ſtrait of Boſphorus; & from thence gaue knowledge of his comming to the Emperour of Conſtantinople: who glad thereof (for the diſpleaſure hee bare to Muſa) tranſported him and all his armie ouer that ſtrait into Europe, and there in one of his countrey palaces royally feaſted him. At which time Mahomet requeſted the Emperour to ioyne with him in that war againſt their common enemie: but he excuſed himſelfe by reaſon of his great age; yet neuertheleſſe, aſſiſted him with certaine companies of valiant Chriſtians, whoſe ſeruice afterward ſtood the Turke in great ſtead.

So Mahomet taking his leaue of the Emperor, marched with his armie to the riuer Wyzen in Thracia, where by the way he receiued letters from the antient captaine Chaſis Eurenoſes, aduiſing him to be very circumſpect in his marching, and not to make too much haſt to ioyn battell with his brother: counſelling him alſo (if he could by any means) to allure Iegides Baſſa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, to forſake his brother, and to follow his enſignes; for that in thoſe men conſiſted Muſa his greateſt ſtrength: and promiſed in good time to come vnto him himſelfe alſo, if he were not too haſtie. This meſſenger that brought this newes, Mahomet bountifully rewarded, and ſo ſent him away. Shortly after, as hee was marching towards Hadrianople, part of the enemies armie began to ſhew it ſelfe vnder the leading of Cara Calile, and was preſently charged by Michael Ogli, and put to flight. So holding on his way to Hadrianople, he laid ſiege to the citie: where the citizens ſent out to him certaine of their graueſt and moſt ſubſtantiall burgeſſes, to certifie him, That by reaſon of the garriſon there left by Muſa, they could not as then deliuer the citie vnto him; but if it ſhould pleaſe him to go & try his fortune in the field againſt his brother, who ſhould be the commander thereof, he ſhould find them readie to follow his good fortune, and to yeeld themſelues, the citie, and all therein, to his pleaſure, if it were his good hap to carrie away the victorie. With which anſwere Mahomet contenting himſelfe, raiſed his ſiege, and took the way towards Zagora. In that place Muſa is reported to haue come ſecretly diſguiſed into Mahomet his campe, and to haue taken full view thereof; but perceiuing himſelfe too weake to encounter his brother, withdrew his army into the ſafegard of the great woods & ſtrong places: & ſo from thence retired with his army towards Philippopolis, and ſo marched along the riuer Meritze, called in antient time, Hebrus: where Iegides Baſſa, with Hamza Beg, and Iſmir Ogli (three of Muſa his great captains) ſet vpon the rereward of Mahomets armie, and were by Michael Ogli repulſed. Mahomet holding on his way, came to Sophia: whereas he went, Muſa diuers times from the mountaines made ſhew of his armie, but durſt not come downe into the plaine to giue him battell. Mahomet hauing refreſhed his army at Sophia, marched to Sarkiue, where he receiued letters from Iegides Baſſa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, all ſecretly perſuaded by old Eurenoſes to reuolt vnto him: the tenor whereof in briefe was this:

Hadrianople beſieged by Mahomet.

Iegides Baſſa, Barac Beg, and Sinan Beg, vnto the great Sultan Mahomet.

We are three young men (moſt mightie Monarch) and haue with vs three thouſand choice ſouldiers, men of incomparable valour, ſuch as the world hath ſcarce the like: draw your forces neere vnto with as much ſpeed as you can, and you ſhall find vs readie to come ouer vnto you. Fare you well.

Muſa his chiefe captains reuolt to Mahomet.

Whereupon he marched all the next night after, vntill hee came to the riuer Moraua, and there encamped: where the three aforenamed captaines, according to their promiſe ioyned themſelues vnto him with all their ſoldiers. Thither came alſo old Eurenoſes, of all others the moſt famous captain amongſt the Turks, and now no longer blind, bringing with him a great company of moſt expert ſoldiers. Marke the Deſpot of Seruia (for the diſpleaſure he bare vnto Muſa) ſent him aid thither alſo. By which ſupplies, Mahomets armie was greatly increaſed: who after hee had courteouſly welcommed all theſe new come captaines, he began againe to march farther vntil he came to Coſſoua, the vnfortunat plain; where Hamza Beg the Prince of Smyrna his ſonne, hauing forſaken Muſa, came vnto him with fiue hundred horſe, certifying him, that al the nobility had forſaken his father: ſo, as he marcht from place to place, his forces ſtill increaſed, by the reuolt of his brothers. Muſa ſeeing his ſoldiers thus daily fall from him, inſomuch that he had almoſt none now left, but the ſouldiers of the court (which were indeed his beſt men of war, and alwaies vnto him faithfull, becauſe he had bin euer vnto them exceeding ding bountifull) thought it beſt to attempt ſomething, before he were left himſelfe alone. Wherefore hauing yet with him ſeuen thouſand of thoſe expert ſouldiers, he drew neerer vnto his brother, ſeeking to haue taken him at ſome aduantage. But Mahomet hauing knowledge of his purpoſe, & contented to be aduiſed by his old expert captaines, had euer a vigilant eye vnto him. Yet at laſt, whether it were vpon good hope, or elſe prickt forward with deſpaire, Muſa vpon the ſudden, valiantly ſet vpon his brothers army: but his ſouldiers oppreſſed with multitude, rather than ouercome with true valour, after a hard and bloudie fight were put to the worſt: which he ſeeing, deſperatly brake into the midſt of his enemies, ſeeking there for death among the thickeſt of them. But being knowne by Baiazet Baſſa, Mahomet his lieutenant general, deſirous to take him aliue, he was beſet on euery ſide: where ſeeing himſelfe in more danger to be taken than ſlaine, hee with great courage brake from amongſt the midſt of them, and fled. In which flight his horſe falling into a deepe muddie ditch (or as ſome others ſay, hoxed by Sarutzes his owne ſeruant, and himſelfe wounded) ouerthrew him, and there before he could againe recouer himſelfe was taken by Baiazet Baſſa (the great lieutenant) Michael Ogli and Barac Beg, which had hardly purſued him out of the battell; and ſo with his hands bound, by them brought through the middeſt of the armie. Which pitifull ſight, greeued not a little the hearts of many; to ſee him but euen now ſo great a King, and one of the ſonnes of great Baiazet, by the ſtrange change of fortune, bound like a captiue ſlaue led forth to execution: yet were moſt part glad thereof, hoping this long ciuill wars would now in him take end. Shortly after came vnto him a nobleman called Balta Ogli, ſent (as they thought) from Mahomet himſelfe: who after he had in few words bitterly reprooued him, for the crueltie by him before ſhewed vnto his brother Solyman, in like caſe, cauſed him preſently to be ſtrangled with a bowſtring. His dead bodie was by and by after preſented to his brother Mahomet: who ſeeing it, ſhed a few Crocadils teares ouer it. He raigned three yeres and ſeuen moneths and was afterwards conueyed to Pruſa, and there lieth buried by the bodie of his brother Solyman, in the ſame Chappell with his grandfather Amurath.

Muſa taken.

Muſa ſtrangled

Mahomet after the death of Muſa, now free from all competitors, tooke vpon him the ſole gouernment of the Turkiſh kingdome, as well in Europe as in Aſia. And here the Turkiſh Hiſtories begin the raign of this Mahomet fifth King of the Turks: accounting the troubleſome time from the captiuitie of Baiazet, vnto the death of Muſa, as a time of vacancy or Anarchie, wherein the Turkiſh kingdom was not at any time wholly poſſeſſed by any one of Baiazet his ſons; Iſa poſſeſſing one part, whereof he was by Mahomet diſpoſſeſſed: who afterwards vſurped all that part of the Turkiſh kingdom in Aſia, being the right of his elder brother Solyman: who at that time raigning in Europe, was depoſed and ſtrangled by his brother Muſa; who was in like manner ſerued by his yongeſt brother Mahomet, the onely ſon of Baiazet then left, as is before declared. Which diuers mutations, and interrupted ſucceſſions, was the cauſe that the Hiſtoriographers do ſo greatly diſſent vpon the ſucceſſor of Baiazet: ſome reckoning one, ſome another; and ſome more, ſome fewer; and ſome, ſuch as neuer were. But foraſmuch as Mahomet held all or moſt part of the Turkiſh kingdome in Aſia, during his troubleſome time, and in the end poſſeſſed the other part thereof in Europe alſo, I reckon him for the fifth King of the Turks, and ſucceſſor to his father Baiazet: including alſo in this hiſtory of his life, all that inteſtine and ſerpentine-like Tragedie, wherein he himſelfe was the principall actor.

1415

Pruſa burnt by the Caramanian King.

Whileſt Mahomet was (as is aforeſaid) thus buſied in his wars in Europe, againſt his brother Muſa, the King of Caramania taking the aduantage of his troubles there, with a great army inuaded his kingdom ioyning vpon him in Aſia, burning and ſpoiling al before him as he went: Eiuaſes Baſſa, Mahomet his lieutenant, then lying at Pruſa, not able to withſtand him; and fearing his comming thither, becauſe it was the ſeat of the Othoman Kings in Aſia, cauſed the citizens to bring the greateſt part of their wealth into the caſtle: whereinto hee alſo receiued ſo many of the citizens as hee conueniently could, willing the reſt to ſhift for themſelues as they might, in ſuch caſe of extremitie. Shortly after, the King of Caramania (according to his expectation) came to Pruſa, and without reſiſtance tooke the citie, not as yet fully fortified; which he without delay cauſed the ſecond time to be burnt downe to the ground: and afterwards laid ſiege to the caſtle, giuing many great aſſaults therto by the ſpace of thirty days, but was alwaies valiantly repulſed by Eiuaſes the Baſſa, who ceaſed not continually to encourage his ſoldiers, ſtill putting them in comfort, that Mahomet hauing now ouercome his enemies in Europe, would in few dayes vndoubtedly come to their reliefe. It chanced at the ſame time, G that the dead bodie of Muſa, ſent to Pruſa to bee buried, was honourably conueyed vpon the way, with much people following it. The Caramanian King hearing of the comming of ſuch a multitude, & fearing it to haue bin Mahomet with his power, raiſed his ſiege, and with ſpeed departed: whereat the Turks long time after jeaſted, ſaying, If the Caramanian King run away for feare of the dead bodie of the Othoman King, what would he doe if he had come againſt him aliue? But the truth was, he feared Mahomet and his power.

Orchanes the ſonne of Solyman (yet a boy) hauing liued at Conſtantinople euer ſince the death of his father, about this time departed thence, becauſe of the league but lately made betweene the Emperour and his vncle Mahomet, purpoſing to haue gone into Valachia: but by the way as he was trauelling, the Turkiſh voluntarie ſouldiers vnderſtanding that he was the H ſon of their late King Solyman, reſorted vnto him in great numbers, offering in his quarrell to ſpend their liues. Of which inſurrection Mahomet hearing, marched thither in all haſte, with a great power to ſuppreſſe the ſame: of whoſe comming the ſouldiers with Orchanes vnderſtanding, deſperſed themſelues & fled. As for Orchanes himſelfe, he was by his vnlawful tutor Zaganos betrayed vnto his vncle Mahomet: who preſently cauſed his eyes to be put out, and ſo ſent him to Pruſa; allowing him great reuenewes to liue vpon, and euer after vſed him with great honour. The ſiſter of this Orchanes hee gaue in marriage to one of his noblemen, with a great dowrie. This is that Orchanes, whom ſome Hiſtoriographers reckon vp among the Turkiſh Kings, as one of the ſucceſſors of Baiazet; and that he was betrayed to his vncle Moſes: erring as I ſuppoſe, both in ſucceſſion and the name, miſtaking Moſes for Mahomet.

Mahomet inuadeth the Caramanian King.

Now Mahomet calling to remembrance the iniury which the Caramanian king had done to him in his abſence, returning to Pruſa, aſſembled a great armie to reuenge himſelfe of that wrong. At which time, he ſent to the Prince Isfendiar for aid, who ſent him his ſon Caſſumes. Hee commanded alſo the Prince Germean Ogli, to make prouiſion for the victualling of his campe, as he ſhould paſſe by his countrey: which was accordingly done. And ſo prouided of all things neceſſarie, he with his army entred into the Caramanian countrey: where he tooke the cities Aſpropolis, Deſpotopolis, Hierapolis, and beſieged Iconium; but by reaſon of the immoderat raine which at that time fel, he was glad to make peace with the Caramanian king, called alſo Mahomet. And ſo raſing his ſiege: departed towards Pontus; where he had not long ſtaied, but that news was brought vnto him, That the Caramanian king renouncing his league, was againe vp in armes. Wherefore returning into Caramania, and ſo to Iconium, hee there ouerthrew the King in battell, and tooke both him and his ſonne Muſtapha priſoners: who redeemed themſelues by deliuering many of their ſtrong cities and caſtles into his hands: and afterward concluded a peace, they receiuing from him an enſigne (as the Turkiſh manner is) in token they were now become his vaſſals.

Valachia tributarie to the Turke.

The Caramanian war thus happily ended, he went ouer into Europe, and paſſing ouer Danubius, foraged the country of Valachia, Tranſalpina, making there great ſpoile: for redreſſe whereof, the Valachian Prince by his Embaſſadours ſent him ſuch tribute as hee demanded, and his ſonne alſo to ſerue him in his court. About which time hapned a great earthquake in Pruſa, and other places of Aſia, whereby many houſes and townes were ouerthrowne; after which, enſued great troubles in moſt parts of Aſia: howbeit Mahomet going thither, by his preſence kept all his dominions in peace and quietneſſe.

Isfendiar prince of Caſtamona and part of Pontus, reſeruing vnto himſelfe Caſtamona, with a little part more of his dominion, gaue the reſt vnto Mahomet, vpon condition, that he ſhould reſtore no part thereof againe vnto his ſonne Caſſumes; who hauing long time ſerued in Mahomet his court and warres, could not be perſuaded to returne againe vnto his father; and therefore was by him thus diſinherited. Which great gift, Mahomet thankefully accepted, and in lieu thereof aſſigned vnto Caſſumes other great and large poſſeſſions within his owne kingdome.

Mahomet, after the death of his brother Muſa, had ſent Scheiches Beiredin (his brothers Cadeleſcher) to Nice in Aſia, as vnto a place of exile, allowing him neuertheleſſe a great penſion wheron to liue. This Bedredin had in his houſe one Burgluzes, Muſtapha his ſteward: theſe two conſulted together, how to raiſe ſome tumult or rebellion to trouble the peaceable gouernement of Mahomet. For which purpoſe, Burgluzes (according to the plot by them laid) tooke his way

A way into Aydinia (ſometime called Caria) and there pretending great zeale of reformed religion, with a wonderfull grauitie began to broach diuers new and ſtrange opinions, far differing from the Turkiſh antient ſuperſtition, yet very plauſible and wel fitting the humor of the vulgar people. By which means he was in ſhort time reputed for a famous learned deuout man and had many followers, drawing after him much people, fit to begin ſome great innouation. Bedredin glad of his mans ſucceſſe, fled from Nice into the Prince Isfendiar his countrey, from whence he tooke ſhipping ouer the Euxine into Valachia, and there withdrawing himſelfe into a great forreſt, as if he had beene ſome deuout and religious man, allured vnto him a great number of outlaws and theeues which there liued. Whom when he had ſufficiently inſtructed and framed to his purpoſe, he ſent them in the habit of religious men into the country of Zagora, and other places in the frontires of Mahomet his dominions, neere vnto him, as his B diſciples: who with great boldnes and confideney, publiſhed Bedredin his doctrine and authority; and how that he was by God appointed to be the King of Iuſtice, and commander of all the world: whoſe doctrine and maner of gouernment was (as they ſaid) alreadie receiued (as they gaue it out) in Aſia, being ſet forth but by one of his ſcholers, Burgluzes; whoſe fame was now diſperſed throughout all the Turks dominion: and that therefore if any were deſirous of preferment, they ſhould repaire to Bedredin, who would in ſhort time ſhew himſelfe to the world, and promote his followers according to their deſerts. Many of the country people deluded with this phantaſie and practiſe of theſe ſeditious ſeed-men, reſorted to Bedredin in hope of preferment, and with them ſome of good calling alſo. At laſt, out of the forreſt commeth this C great Prophet with banner diſplaied, attended vpon with a great multitude of the ſeditious vulgar people, which daily reſorted vnto him more and more. Mahomet for the repreſſing of theſe dangerous tumults, ſent his ſon Amurath, and Baiazet the great Baſſa, with two thouſand men to apprehend Burgluzes in Aydinia: but when they came thither, they found him guarded with three thouſand men well appointed, readie to aduenture their liues in defence of their fooliſh Prophet. Neuertheleſſe, Amurath & Baiazet not diſmaied with the multitude of thoſe vplandiſh people, ſet vpon them: where was fought a right bloudy battell, for the number, & many ſlaine on both ſides; yet at laſt the rebels fled: in which flight Burgluſes himſelfe was ſlain, and hewen al to peeces. After which victorie Baiazet from thence haſted to Magneſia, and there executed Torlac Kemal, another ſeditious Turkiſh Monke, which with two thouſand, by him ſeduced, did much harm in the country thereabout. D At the ſame time alſo, Mahomet ſent another power againſt Bedredin: but moſt of his followers ſeeing in him no ſuch matter, as was by his diſciples and himſelfe promiſed, and as they hoped for, were alreadie fallen from him, ſo that of that great multitude which before followed him, few or none were left with him, wherby he was eaſily apprehended by them that Mahomet had ſent againſt him: and ſo being brought to Mahomet to Serras, was there in the market place before a tauerne doore, faire hanged, without any further harme.

Mahomet in the ſhort time of his raigne finiſhed the great Mahometan Temple at Hadrianople, before begun by his brethren Solyman and Muſa. Where hee alſo built a Princely Pallace, the ſeat of the Turkiſh Kings in Europe, vntil the taking of Conſtantinople. He alſo built E another Temple, with a moſt ſumptuous Abbey, and a publick ſchoole thereto adioyning; endowing the ſame with great reuenewes, ſuch as had by him and thoſe his brethren of late bin taken from the Chriſtians. He gaue alſo great ſummes of mony, yerely to be paid at Medina and Mecha, for the releefe of poore Pilgrims trauelling from far to the ſepulchre of their great Prophet Mahomet, at Medina, or his Temple at Mecha.

Shortly after Mahomet fel ſick at Hadrianople, and perceiuing himſelfe in danger of death, by his laſt will appointed his eldeſt ſonne Amurath to ſucceed him in his kingdome, and ſent Eluan-beg (a man in great fauor with him) in poſt to Amaſia, to will him with all ſpeed to repaire to the court at Hadrianople. But feeling death to approch, and that he could not poſſibly liue vntill the comming of his ſonne, hee ſtraightly charged his Baſſaes with all ſecrecie to conceale his death, vntill his comming, for feare leſt any trouble ſhould riſe vpon the bruit thereof, before his comming thither: and ſo hauing ſet all things in order, he departed out of this world vnto his Prophet Mahomet, about the yere of our ſauior Chriſt 1422, when he had raigned ſeuenteen yeares: accounting in his raigne that rroubleſome ten yeares next after the captiuitie of Baiazet, in which time the Turks kingdome was by his ambitious ſonnes rent in ſunder(as is aforeſaid)vntil it was at length again by this Mahomet reſtored to the former integrity,about 7 years before his death,which the Turks account for the whol time of his raign; & the other troubleſome 10 yeres as a vacancy or anarchy of their kingdome,as is aforeſaid.

The death of Mahomet cunningly conceald from the Ianizaries,by the three great Baſſaes.

Mahomet being dead,the three great Baſſaes, Eiuaſes,Baiazet,and Ibrahim(to rid themſelues of the feare they had of the Ianizaries,& other ſoldiers of the court)called a Diuano or counſel for the wars, as if the King had bin aliue : wherein it was pretended,That Mahomet had determined to make war vpon the prince of Smirna:and that for that ſeruice,it was his pleaſure, That the Ianizaries ſhould forthwith paſſe ouer into Aſia, to the caſtle of Baga. Whereupon preſſe mony was preſently giuen them, & they ſent ouer with letters directed to the viceroy of Anatolia,for the aſſembling of an armie for Baga. In the meane time, the great Baſſaes of the court ſat daily in counſell, placing and diſplacing,promoting and diſgracing whom they thought good, as if the king had ſo commanded:the kings phyſicians alſo,to countenance the matter,were commanded continually to go to and fro with their potions & receits,after their wonted manner,as if they had had the king ſtill in cure: and letters were ſent in poſt to Eluan Beg,for ſpeedy diſpatch of the buſines for which he was ſent into Aſia. Yet for al this cunning diſſimulation,the pentioners and other ſouldiers of the court,wont to be neere vnto the kings perſon, and ſome of them alwayes of the priuie chamber, began to ſuſpect the matter : and comming to the Baſſaes,ſaid they maruelled that the king in ſo long time did neuer ſhew himſelfe, as he had alwaies before done. Wherunto the Baſſaes anſwered,That he had bin dangerouſly ſick,& was as yet but a little recouered,& that therfore the phyſitians would not ſuffer him to looke abroad,or take the aire,for feare of caſting him down againe. Then will we our ſelues,ſaid the pentioners,go and ſee his Maieſtie;and with that were readie to force in vpon the Baſſaes. Eiuaſes ſeeing their importunitie, deſired them to hold themſelues contented,and not as then to trouble the king,for that he had that day,as he ſaid,taken phyſick ; but tomorrow (ſaid he) we will requeſt his Maieſtie,if he ſo pleaſe to ſhew himſelfe, that you may ſee him:wherwith they for that time held themſelues content. Now among the kings phyſitians there was one Geordiron,a Perſian,a man of a quick ſpirit & ſubtill deuice,which found means to deceiue the pentioners:he deuiſed,that the dead body of the king being apparelled in royall large robes,ſhould be brought betwixt two,as if he had bin led into an high open gallery; and being there ſet,to haue a boy ſo neatly placed behind him vnder his large robes,as that he vnperceiued,might moue the kings hand vp to his head,as if he ſhould ſtrok his face or beard, as his manner was. The next day the dead king being accordingly brought forth by the Baſſaes in his rich robes, & wrapped with clothes about his head, as if it had bin for feare of the aire,or of taking cold, & ſo placed in an high open gallerie, as was before deuiſed, ſuddenly the phyſitian came running in,fuming and raging as if he had bin halfe mad,ready to teare his cloths for anger;& in great choller caſtnig his cap againſt the ground,asked the Baſſaes if they meant to kill the king,by bringing him into the open aire? We(ſaid he)haue with great pains, in long time,a little recouered him, and will you thus fooliſhly caſt him downe againe? Pardon vs good doctor(ſaid Eiuaſes)for theſe gentlemen(pointing to the pentioners) were ſo importunat to ſee his maieſtie,that to ſatisfie their deſires,he was content to be led forth of his chamber;wherof we hope ſhall enſue no harme. The pentioners ſeeing the king many times mouing his hand to his face,and as it were ſtroking his beard,held themſelues wel contented, ſuppoſing him to haue bin aliue,although but weake,and therefore not willing to ſpeake vnto them. The phyſitians taking him vp amongſt them,carried him into his lodging again,which was but faſt by, making as if they had carried a extreame ſicke man. Thus was his death cunningly concealed one and fortie daies, vntill the comming of Amurath his ſonne.

This Mahomet was both wiſe and valiant, and withall exceeding bountifull, but ambitious aboue meaſure : and may of right be accounted the reſtorer of the Turks kingdom;for he recouered againe all thoſe countries in Aſia,which Tamerlane had taken away and giuen vnto other Mahometan princes,after the ouerthrow of BaiaZet. And when as the kingdome of the Turks was rent in pieces and almoſt brought to nought by ciuile wars, and the ambition of himſelf and his brethren;he at length got poſſeſſion of the whole, & ſo left it to his ſon Amurath an entire kingdome, in the former greatneſſe, although not ſo much by him augmented. His bodie lieth buried in a faire tombe made of artificiall ſtone, very beautifull to behold,in a chappell at the Eaſt ſide of Pruſa,where we leaue him at his reſt.

ANNO 1422 ✠ AMVRATHES SECVNDVS SEXTVS TVRCARVM REX FLORVIT

Phil. Lonicer. Hiſt. Turc. li. 1.

Europam luctu & funeſtis cladibus implens, Sævus Amurathes totus in arma ruit.
Major at Huniades virtute & fortibus auſis, Cogit eum trepida vertere terga fuga.
Conſilia Eugenij bellum furialia ſuadent, Sacrorum antiſtes Martia ad arma ruit: (Arma viri tractent, curet ſua templa ſacerdos) Europæ exitium res tulit iſta graue.

Fierce Amurath doth Europe fill with bloud and wofull cries:
And wholly giv'n to martiall deeds, doth whole in armes ariſe.
But yet Huniades (than he, of greater ſtrength and might) Enforced him right fearefully to turne his backe in flight.
Eugenius his infernall ſpels ſtirres vp a fatall jarre:
Who hauing charge of ſacred Rites, runnes headlong into warre.
(Leaue martiall deeds to martiall men, and let the Prieſt go pray) Such diueliſh councell, worſe receiu'd, wrought Europes great decay.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, SIXT KING OF THE TVRKS, AND THE GREAT ESTABLISHER OF THEIR KINGDOME.

Murat is the ſame that wee call Deſiderius.

AFter that the death of Mahomet had beene politiquely concealed one and fortie days, by the three great Baſſa's Baiazet, Eiuaſes, and Ibrahim, Amurath, or Murat (as the Turks call him) his eldeſt ſonne, at that time comming to Pruſa, was by them placed in his fathers ſeat, and the death of Mahomet at the ſame time publiſhed: whereupon great troubles began on euery ſide to ariſe.

Muſtapha the ſuppoſed ſon of Baiazet raiſeth rebelliō againſt Amurath.

The Princes of Smyrna and Menteſia roſe vp in armes: and at Theſſaſalonica, an obſcure fellow crept as it were out of a chimneys corner, tooke vpon him the name and perſon of Muſtapha the ſonne of Baiazet, which was ſlaine many yeres before, in the great battell againſt Tamerlane at mount Stella, as is before declared in the life of the vnfortunate Sultan Baiazet. This counterfeit Muſtapha animated by the Grecian Princes, and going from Theſſalonica to Vardarium, ſet ſo good a countenance vpon the matter, with ſuch a grace and majeſtie, that not onely the countrey people (apt to beleeue any thing) but men of greater place and calling alſo, as Tzunites Beg the Prince of Smyrna his ſonne, with the ſons of old Eurenoſes Baſſa, perſuaded that he was the very ſonne of the great Baiazet, repaired vnto him, as vnto their naturall Prince and Soueraigne. From Vardarium he went to Serræ, and from thence to Hadrianople, (Amurath being as then at Pruſa) where he was receiued as if it had been that noble Prince Muſtapha, whom he feigned himſelfe to be: ſo that in ſhort time he was honored as a King in all parts of the Turkiſh Kingdome in Europe.

Amurath to repreſſe this ſo great and dangerous a rebellion, ſent Baiazet Baſſa a man of great authoritie in his court, with a ſtrong armie into Europe. This great Baſſa paſſing ouer Helleſpontus, found all the countrey reuolted vnto their new found King Muſtapha: but marching towards Hadrianople, with purpoſe to haue giuen him battell, hee was firſt forſaken of the Europeian ſouldiers which he brought out of Aſia, and afterwards of all the reſt alſo: and being left poſt alone, with his brother Hamze Beg, was for ſafegatd of his life glad to yeeld himſelfe to Muſtapha; of whom he was graciouſly entertained, and vpon promiſe of his loyaltie, ſworne one of his priuie Councell.

Muſtapha thus now poſſeſſed of the Turkiſh kingdome in Europe, and entertaining great thoughts, the better to maintain his credit, leuied a great armie to make war vpon Amurath in Aſia. And as he was vpon his way, at a place which the Turks call Saſlidere, or the place of willowes, his other councellors repining at the great honour he gaue to Baiazet Baſſa, aduiſed him to beware that he truſted him not too far, of whoſe ſmal faith he had ſufficient trial alreadie, & was like enough when occaſion ſhould ſerue, to reuolt from him to Amurath, & to draw after him ſome great part of his armie, to the great peril both of himſelfe & all them his faithfull ſeruants & followers. Vpon which jealous conceit, this great Baſſa Baiazet was there forthwith as a traitor apprehended, and without further triall executed: at which time his brother Hamze was with much ado ſpared. This done, Muſtapha proceeded on his journey, and paſſed ouer with his army at Callipolis into Aſia. Amurath vnderſtanding of the proceedings of Muſtapha in Europe, and of his preparation made for his inuaſion of Aſia, created three new Baſſa's, Omer, Vruge, and Alis, all three the ſonnes of Temurtaſes; theſe he ioined with his old Baſſa's Ibrahim and Eiuaſes. All theſe fiue he vſed as councellors for the wars; by whoſe aduice he ſent for Mahomet Beg, ſyrnamed Michael Ogli, who in the time that Muſa raigned was Viceroy in Europe, and therefore a man well knowne to moſt principall men in Muſtapha his armie, but had been kept priſoner in the caſtle of Amaſia, from the time that Muſa was depoſed and put to death by his brother Mahomet, vntil now that he was after eight yeares impriſonment, for this ſpeciall purpoſe inlarged and receiued into fauour.

About the ſame time that Muſtapha ſet footing in Aſia, Amurath hauing gathered his army, ſet forward from Pruſa to meet him; yet with ſuch diſtruſt in his forces, which were thought to be much inferior to the European ſoldiers that followed Muſtapha, that he was glad vpon a ſuperſtitious opinion or zeale, to proſtrat himſelfe at the feet of an Emir (one of the falſe prophet Mahomets poſteritie) to receiue at his hypocritical hands a graceles bleſſing for his better ſpeed: by whom he was made to beleeue, that after two repulſes, he had with much ado at the third time obtained grant of the great Prophet Mahomet, that he ſhould preuaile in that war: and thereupon had his ſword girt vnto him with the Emir his holy hands, with many other vaine and ſuperſtitious ceremonies. Yet for all theſe charmes, he marched on with his armie in feare enough, vntill he came to the riuer of Vlibad (otherwiſe called Rindacus:) where hauing intelligence of the approch of Muſtapha, hee for feare cauſed the bridge ouer the riuer there to be broken downe, and incamped himſelfe on that ſide the riuer. Not long after came Muſtapha, and finding the bridge broken, incamped at the foot thereof on the other ſide: ſo that nothing parted the two armies, but the bredth of the riuer onely. Whileſt they lay thus neere incamped together, that the ſoldiers might on both ſides take the full view one of another, and alſo talke together; Mahomet Beg, ſyrnamed Michael Ogli, but lately deliuered out of his long impriſonment (as is aforeſaid) came to the riuer ſide, and with a loud voyce called by name vpon the great captaines and old ſoldiers that were in Muſtapha his armie; asking by name for many of his old friends and acquaintance: many of them being there preſent, reioycing to ſee that honorable man (whom they ſuppoſed to haue been dead in priſon many yeres before) came gladly to the ſide of the riuer, to heare what he could ſay.

Then with a loud voyce he began to perſuade them, that the man whom they followed was not the honourable Muſtapha, but ſome baſe high minded fellow ſet vp by the Grecians, abuſing the obſcuritie of his birth, as the vaile vnder the couert wherof he went craftily about to intrude himſelfe into the honorable diſcent of Baiazet; and ſo masking in the counterfeit titles of ſtolne honor, had miſ-led them from their dutie to their natural King and Soueraign, to follow him a meere deceiuer. And further aſſured them, that Muſtapha, Baiazet his ſon, was dead and buried in the bed of fame 22 yeres before; honorably ending his days in defence of his country, in the great battel of mount Stella againſt Tamerlane: wherefore they ſhould doe well to forſake that ſuppoſed Muſtapha, and again to yeeld their dutifull obedience vnto their vndoubted Soueraigne Amurath. Theſe words deliuered vnto them by Mahomet, whom they generally both reuerenced and truſted, wrought ſuch effect in their minds, that ſome preſently aduentured to ſwim ouer the riuer, and ioyned themſelues vnto him; and many others that ſtayed ſtill, began now to doubt leſt they had worſhipped a wrong Saint. At the ſame time alſo, Eiuaſes Baſſa, to terrifie Muſtapha, ſent vnto him letters as in great ſecret, aduertiſing him, that Amurath had the next night purpoſed with his armie to paſſe ouer the riuer aboue the broken bridge; at which time the chiefe captaines of his armie being (as he ſaid) corrupted, had promiſed to deliuer Muſtapha into his hands, and with his head to pay the ranſom of them all. This he coloured with ſuch faire gloſſes, that Muſtapha partly beleeued the ſame. So when the dead time of the night was come, Eiuaſes with certain troups of horſemen paſſed ouer the riuer, at the verie ſame place he had in his letters named; and that with ſuch a noyſe and tumult, as Amurath with his whole armie had beene comming. Muſtapha ſeeing things begin thus to worke according as Eiuaſes Baſſa had before written; and with this, doubting alſo to be preſently betrayd, and carrying about him a guiltie conſcience (the mother of feare & diſtruſt) Muſtapha flieth tooke horſe, (ſlenderly accompanied but with ten perſons of his whole armie) and fled in haſt, no man purſuing them, vntill he came to the riuer of Boga, and there with a great ſumme of money obtained paſſage, by corrupting the captaine that dwelt in the caſtle vpon the paſſage of the riuer: and the third day after paſſing ouer the ſtrait of Helleſpontus, landed at Callipolis. The flight of Muſtapha once knowne in his armie, they all yeelded themſelues vnto Eiuaſes Baſſa: who taking poſſeſſion of Muſtapha his tent, cauſed the broken bridge to be repaired; whereby Amurath paſſing with his armie, ioyned himſelfe with Eiuaſes. The other Baſſa Ibrahim, councelled Amurath to put to ſword all thoſe rebels that had followed Muſtapha: but by the mediation of Eiuaſes (to whom they had yeelded themſelues) they were generally pardoned.

Amurath departing from Vlibad or Lopadium, came to Boga, and there hanged vp the captaine that had giuen Muſtapha paſſage. From thence he held on his way to Lampſacum, intending to purſue Muſtapha into Europe: but being come to the ſea ſide he could find no paſſage, for that Muſtapha had cauſed all the ſhipping on that ſide, to be brought ouer into Europe. Yet at laſt Amurath by good fortune chanced vpon a great Genoway ſhip, which he hired for foure thouſand duckats to tranſport his Armie, and ſo with much adoo at length landed in Europe. Muſtapha ſeeing that Amurath was now come ouer, fled to Hadrianople, where he found ſuch cold entertainment, that fearing to be betrayed, he was glad to ſpeed himſelfe thence, thinking all the world too little to hide himſelfe in; and ſo came to an obſcure place in the countrey of the Turks, called Kiſul-Agatze-Genitze: where the ſoldiers ſent to purſue him, ouertook him, and brought him bound to Amurath, then being at Hadrianople: by whoſe commandement he was ſhamefully hanged from the battlements of one of the higheſt towers of the citie, and there left to the worlds wonder.

Muſtapha hanged.

This Muſtapha is of ſome writers reported to haue been in deed the ſon of the great Sultan Baiazet, and that he was kept in priſon all that long time, and thus at length ſet vp by the Greeks to trouble the ſtate of the Turkiſh kingdome: but the Turkiſh Hiſtories report as before, calling him Duſme or counterfeit Muſtapha. And it is verie likely, that if hee had been one of the ſons of Baiazet, he would haue found ſome means to haue made ſome great ſtirre long before that, as all the reſt of the vnquiet brood of Baiazet did, which neuer reſted vntil they had, like the earth-borne bretheen, one deſtroyed the other: beſides that, their bloudie natures conſidered, it is very like, that Mahomet his younger brother, who raigned in Hadrianople almoſt eight yeres, and was in league all that time with the Emperour of Conſtantinople, would for his more ſafetie haue got him into his owne power, if hee had been in priſon with the Emperour; or elſe haue diſpatched him, if he had been in priſon with himſelfe. All which I am the rather perſuaded to thinke, for that Orchanes a child, the ſonne of Solyman, could find no ſafe place of abode at Conſtantinople in the raigne of Mahomet, but flying, was apprehended, and his eyes put out, as is before declared in the life of Mahomet: much leſſe is it like, that Muſtapha, being a warlike prince, and his elder brother, could haue been ſo long preſerued and kept in priſon from his furie.

It fortuned in theſe late broyles (as oftentimes it doth with others in like caſe) diuers of the rebels Aſapi, or common ſoldiers (whom he for his greater countenance had apparelled & armed like Ianizaries) to fall into the hands of the true Ianizaries, Amurath his faithfull guard; whoſe liues indeed they ſpared, but vſing them with all the deſpight and indignities poſſible. Amongſt the reſt, one of the Ianizaries being an hungred, brought two of theſe Aſapi his priſoners vnto a cookes ſhop, offering to ſell them vnto him for a little victuall: which the cooke refuſed to giue him, as hauing no vſe for ſuch vnneceſſarie ſeruants. Wherewith the proud Ianizary inraged, ſwore many a great oath, preſently to cut off their heads, and to giue them him for nought, if he would not for a thing of nought redeeme them. And like enough hee was to haue ſo done, had not the cooke, moued with pittie, offered him for them both a ſheepes head: which the Ianizarie tooke for them, ſwearing that the cooke had giuen for them more than indeed they were worth. Which diſgrace ſo long ſince done vnto theſe Aſapi, is yet oftentimes by way of reproch in great contempt, by the maſterfull and inſolent Ianizaries, obiected vnto the whole bodie of the Aſapi, the greateſt part of the Turks huge armies, of whom for all that the proud Ianizaries make ſmall reckoning, accounting them ſcarcely for men, and in their rage oftentimes telling them, That two of them are not worth a ſodden ſheeps head.

Two Aſapi ſold by a Ianizarie for a Sheepes head.

Amurath hauing at length with much adoo thus pacified the dangerous rebellion raiſed by the counterfeit Muſtapha both in Europe and Aſia, was yet not a little grieued, to thinke Conſtantinople in vaine beſieged by Amurath.

how the ſame had, to the great hazard of his eſtate, bin firſt plotted by the Greekes, and afterwards countenanced by the Greeke Emperor, of whom he thought now to be reuenged. And therefore ſending before him Michael Ogli, his lieutenant generall in Europe, with his Europeian ſoldiers to inuade the country about Conſtantinople, followed himſelfe after with the Ianizaries and his Aſian forces: and incamping before the Citie, filled all that necke of land which lieth before it, from ſea to ſea. And ſo incamped, began right furiouſly to batter the wals, in hope ſo to haue made a breach, & by the ſame to haue entred the city: but finding the wals of greater ſtrength than he had before ſuppoſed, & the defendants ſtill repairing whatſoeuer the furie of his artillery had beaten down or ſhaken, he ceaſed his batterie, & comming on with all his forces, deſperatly attempted by aſſault to haue gained the citie: wherin his fortune was not anſwerable to his deſire; for approching the city, with arrowes as ſhoures falling vpon the defendants, and ſcaling ladders in the mean time clapt vp to the walls, & the Ianizaries with other of his beſt ſoldiers valiantly mounting the ſame, they were by the defendants notably repulſed & beaten down, loſing ſome their hands, ſome their arms, ſome their heads, but moſt their liues, no ſhot falling in vain from the wals. Which Amurath beholding, & grieued to ſee (though vnwilling) commanded a retrait to be ſounded, and the aſſault giuen ouer: and ſhortly after ſeeing no hope to preuaile, in great rage raiſed his ſieged & departed. Vnto whom for all that the Greek Emperor not long after ſent his Embaſſadors to intreat with him for peace; whereof he would by no means heare, but proudly threatned to be ere long of all his wrongs reuenged: which cauſed the Greek emperor to deuiſe what he might for the troubling of his eſtate, ſo to keepe him otherwiſe buſied: as he did ſhortly after with the Caramanian king, by countenancing another Muſtapha (ſyrnamed Cutzug or the Little) Amuraths yonger brother, againſt him, to the raiſing of new ſtirres, and Amurath his no ſmall trouble.

Mahomet the late King had fiue ſons and ſeuen daughters, whereof Amurath was the eldeſt, and ſucceeded in his fathers kingdom; Muſtapha the ſecond, ſirnamed the Little; Achmetes the third, who died before his father: the other two, Ioſephus and Machmutes, both died of the plague, being but children, after the death of their father. Three of their ſiſters were married to the three ſonnes of the King of Caramania, Ibrahim, Aladin, & Iſa: other two were beſtowed vpon the ſonnes of the Prince Iſfendiar, Ibrahim and Caſimes: the ſixt was giuen in mariage to Cozza-Beg Viceroy of Anatolia: and the ſeuenth, to the ſonne of Ibrahim Baſſa, who died at Mecha, whither ſhe went vpon ſuperſtitious deuotion on pilgrimage.

At ſuch time as Amurath was buſied in his warres in Europe, againſt Muſtapha the ſuppoſed ſon of Baiazet; the yonger ſon of Mahomet (called alſo Muſtapha) being but thirteen yeres old, and Amurath his brother indeed was ſet vp to raiſe new troubles, by the King of Caramania and other Princes, as well Mahometans, as the Chriſtian Princes of Grecia; who thought it good policie, by that means to impeach the greatneſſe of Amurath. This yong prince Muſtapha ſtrengthned with the forces of his friends, entred into his brothers dominions in Aſia, and beſieged Nice, which was at length yeelded vnto him. Amurath aduertiſed of this new rebellion, by great gifts and large promiſes corrupted Ilias Beg, the young Princes tutor, to betray the Prince into his hands. Whereupon Amurath with great celeritie ſet forward with his Armie from Hadrianople, & in nine days came to Nice, where he entred the citie with ſmal reſiſtance, as was to him before promiſed, where Muſtapha was by his falſ tutor to him preſented: who becauſe he would not ſpill one drop of the ſacred Othoman bloud, (as the Turkes call it) commanded the executioner preſently to ſtrangle him with a bow ſtring; which was done accordingly, and his bodie afterwards buried by his father at Pruſa.

Muſtapha betrayed & ſtrangled.

Amurath hauing ſuppreſſed theſe two rebellions, and now out of all feare of any competitor, thought his fiue councellors too many by three, and therefore remoued the three Baſſa's, Omure, VrutZi, and Alis (the ſons of Temurtaſes) into honorable places, retaining of his Councell, only the two old Baſſa's, Ibrahim and Eiuaſes. But ſhortly after, Eiuaſes was ſecretly accuſed to Amurath, that he ſought by his fauorits the ſoldiers of the court, to aſpire vnto the kingdome himſelfe, and to depoſe the King; and that intending ſome ſuch matter, he did vſually weare a priuie coat. This ſuſpicious report troubled the jealous tyrant: wherefore on a time as he rid accompanied with Eiuaſes, he caſt his arme about him, as if it had been in kindneſſe: but finding him ſecretly armed, would needs know the cauſe thereof: whereunto Eiuaſes anſwered, That it was for feare of ſome enemies he had in the court: but this excuſe could by no means ſerue his turne: wherefore he was forthwith apprehended by the commandement of Amurath, and both his eyes burnt out with a hot ſteele glaſſe.

Eiuaſes Baſſa his eyes put out.

Whilſt Amurath was thus buſied in ſubduing rebellions at home, Muhamethes the Caramanian King beſieged Attalia, a great citie in Pamphilia, by the ſpace of ſix moneths, which was valiantly defended by Hamza-beg, Amurath his lieutenant there: at which ſiege the vnfortunate King himſelfe, as he was taking view of the citie, was ſlaine with a great ſhot out of the citie: whereupon Ibrahim, which ſucceeded him in the kingdome, brake vp the ſiege, and returned home to burie his father. At this time alſo, Dracula Prince of Velachia, paſſing ouer Danubius, did the Turkes much harme about Siliſtra, but was afterwards enforced to ſubmit himſelfe to Amurath, and become his tributarie.

The king of Caramania ſlaine.

About this time alſo Tzunites, the Prince of Smyrna, which had before aided the rebell Muſtapha, did by al means he could vex and moleſt Iaxis-beg, (Amurath his lieutenant in Aidinia) and hauing by chance taken his brother priſoner, put him to death. This prince of Smirna was deſcended of the antient Princes of Aidinia, and therefore pretended an intereſt in that ſeigniorie: which his claime the people of the country ſecretly fauoured, ſo far as they durſt for feare of the Turks. Amurath hearing of the harmes that this Prince of Smyrna did, commanded Hamze-beg, viceroy of Anatolia, with all his power to make war vpon him. The viceroy without delay aſſembled a great armie, and inuaded the Princes countrey: and the Prince being well prouided for his comming, meeting him vpon the way, gaue him battell; wherein Haſan the Princes ſon, leading a great part of his fathers army, had put one part of the Turks army to flight: and purſuing them with too much furie, left his father at the ſame time ſo hardly beſet by the viceroy, that he was glad to flie to his caſtle of Hipſily faſt by. Haſan returning from the chace of the enemie, not knowing what had happened to his father, was by the Turks in his returne ouercome and taken priſoner. After which victorie the viceroy preſently laid ſiege to the caſtle wherein the prince was. This ſiege continued a great while: at length the prince brought to extremity, was content to yeeld himſelfe vnto the viceroy, vpon condition he ſhould vſe no violence againſt the perſon of himſelf or his ſon, but to ſend them priſoners vnto Amurath: which thing the viceroy by ſolemne oath promiſed, whereupon the Prince came out of the caſtle, and yeelded himſelfe priſoner to the viceroy. Iaxis-beg, whoſe brother the Prince had before put to death, attended the going of Hamze the viceroy to his tent, where finding Haſan the princes ſon ſitting vpon the ground, as the manner of the Turks is, took him by the choller with great fury, & drawing him along to the feet of the prince his father, there moſt cruelly ſtrucke off his head: and in the ſame rage laying his bloudie hands vpon the aged prince, ſtrucke off his head alſo, to the great diſhonor of the viceroy, who had before giuen his faith for their ſafety. The heads of the Prince and his ſon were ſet vpon two launces, within the ſight of the caſtle; which the defendants ſeeing, and now diſparing of all reſcue, yeelded themſelues with the caſtle. This infortunate Tzunites was the laſt Prince of Smyrna, after whoſe death all his territorie was vnited to the Othoman kingdome. After all theſe troubles, Amurath with great triumph married the daughter of the Prince Iſfendiar.

Amurath hauing laid vp in the depth of his thoughts the remembrance of that the Grecian Princes had done, in giuing aid to the rebels aforeſaid, thought it now high time to take reuenge of that wrong: and for that purpoſe gathered a great army, wherewith he ranged at his pleaſure thorow Macedonia, vntill he came to Theſſalonica, ſurpriſing by the way diuers cities and caſtles, at that time belonging to the Conſtantinopolitan empire. This famous citie of Theſſalonica, now called Salonichi, for beautie and wealth ſometime not inferiour to any of the greateſt and moſt renowned cities of Grecia, is ſituate vpon the borders of Macedonia, cloſe vnto a bay of the Archipelago or the ſea Ægeum: which bay was in antient time called Thermaicus-Sinus, and now the bay of Salonichi. To the Chriſtian congregation there dwelling, S. Paul wrote two Epiſtles, in the latter whereof, he forewarneth them of a great defection to come before the latter day. Before this Chriſtian citie, then in the protection of the Venetians, Amurath encamped his great armie of misbeleeuing Turks; and laid hard ſiege to it with moſt terrible batterie: at which time he by ſecret means corrupted certaine of the wicked citizens, to haue betraid the citie by a ſecret mine, and to haue let him in, which treaſon was by the Venetian gouernours perceiued, and the plotters thereof for ſafegard of their liues glad to leape ouer the wals, and to flie into the Turks campe.

Theſſalonica beſieged.

Amurath hauing greatly battered the wals of the citie, the more to encourage his ſoldiers, G promiſed to giue them all the ſpoile therof, if they could by force win it. The greedy deſire of this rich prey, wherin euery common ſoldier promiſed vnto himſelfe whatſoeuer his fooliſh fancie or vnbrideled affection could deſire, ſo inflamed the minds of theſe barbarous ſoldiers, and eſpecially of the Ianizaries, that giuing a moſt terrible aſſault to the city, they by force entred the ſame, and wan it. The Venetian ſoldiers fled to their gallies, lying at ancor in the hauen, & ſo got to ſea: but the infinit miſeries which the poore Chriſtian citizens endured in the furie of that barbarous nation, no tongue is able to expreſſe, or pen deſcribe: death was leſſe pain than the ignominious outrages and vnſpeakable villanies which many good Chriſtians there ſuffered, heartily wiſhing to die, and could not; and yet the furious enemies ſword deuoured all the people, without reſpect of age or ſex, except ſuch as for ſtrength of body, or H comlines of perſon, were reſerued for painfull labor or beaſtly luſt; which poore ſoules were afterwards diſperſed into moſt miſerable ſeruitude and ſlauerie, thorow all parts of the Turkiſh kingdom. The infinit riches of that famous city, became a ſpoile vnto the barbarous ſoldiers; the goodly houſes were left deſolate, void of inhabitants. Thus the beautifull citie of Theſſalonica, ſomtime one of the moſt glorious ornaments of Græcia, the late pleaſant dwelling place of many rich Chriſtians, was by the tyrant giuen for an habitation to ſuch baſe Turkes, as at their pleaſure repaired thither to ſeat themſelues, and ſo is by them at this day poſſeſſed. This calamitie happened to Theſſalonica in the yeare of our Lord 1432.

Theſſalonica taken by Amurath.

Theſſalonica beeing thus taken, Amurath rerurned to Hadrianople himſelfe, and at the ſame time ſent Caratze with the greateſt part of his armie into Ætolia. Charles prince of that countrey dying a little before the comming of Amurath to Theſſalonica, and hauing no lawfull iſſue, had diuided the countrey of Acharnania amongſt his three baſe ſons, Memnon, Turnus, and Hercules, leauing all the reſt of his dominion to his brothers ſonne, called alſo Charles. But ſhortly after, ſuch diſcord fell among theſe bretheren, that Amurath ſending his Turks to aid one of them againſt the other, as he was by them requeſted, in fine brought all that countrey of Ætolia into ſubiection to himſelfe, leauing nothing for the fooliſh brethren to ſtriue for, more than the bare titles of imaginatiue honour. The other Grecian princes of Athens, Phocis, Boetia, and al the reſt of Græcia, vnto the ſtrait of Corinth, terrified by their neighbours harmes, were glad to ſubmit themſelues to the barbarian yoke, and to become tributaries vnto the Turkiſh tyrant; vnder which ſlauerie they of long time moſt miſerably liued, I if intollerable ſlauery ioyned with infidelitie may be accounted a life. Thus the Grecians loſt their libertie, which their anceſtors had many times before, to their immortall praiſe, worthily defended againſt the greateſt Monarchs of the world, and are now ſo degenerate, by the meanes of the Turkiſh oppreſſion, that in all Græcia is hardly to be found any ſmall remembrance of the antient glorie thereof: inſomuch that whereas they were wont to account all other nations barbarous in compariſon of themſelues, they are now become no leſſe barbarous, than thoſe rude nations whom they before ſcornd. Which miſery with a thouſand more, they may iuſtly impute to their owne ambition and diſcord.

At this time, among the diſtreſſed Princes of Macedonia and Græcia, one Iohn Caſtriot raigned in Epirus: who ſeeing how mightily the Turke preuailed againſt the princes his neighbors, and conſidering that he was not able by any means to withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemie; to obtaine peace, he was glad to deliuer into Amurath his poſſeſſion, his foure ſons, Staniſius, Reposius, Conſtantine, and George, for hoſtages: whom Amurath faithfully promiſed, well and honorably to intreat. But aſſoone as he had got them within his reach, he falſified his faith, and cauſed them to be circumciſed after the Turkiſh maner, and to be inſtructed in the Turkiſh ſuperſtition, to the great griefe of their Chriſtian parents: and afterwards, when he vnderſtood of the death of Iohn Caſtriot their father, he poiſoned all the three elder brethren: and by Sebaly (one of his great captains) ſeiſed vpon Croia, his chiefe citie, and all the reſt of his territories, as if they had by good right deuolued vnto him. But George the yongeſt, whom the Turks named Scander-beg, or lord Alexander, for his excellent feature, and pregnant wit, he alwaies entirely loued, and as ſome thought, more paſſionatly than he ſhould haue loued a boy. Him he cauſed to be diligently inſtructed in all kind of actiuitie and feats of war, wherein he excelled al other his equals in Amurath his court; & riſing by many degrees of honor, came at laſt (being yet but very young) to be a great Sanzack or gouernor of a prouince, and was many times appointed by Amurath to be General of his armies; in which ſeruice he ſo behaued himſelfe, that he got the loue of all that knew him, and increaſed his credit with Amurath: vntil at laſt he found opportunitie by great policie and courage, to deliuer both himſelfe and his natiue countrey from the horrible ſlauerie of the Turkiſh tyrannie, as ſhall be afterwards declared.

Shortly after that Amurath had thus danted the Princes of Grecia, he turned his forces into Seruia: but the Prince of Seruia vnable to withſtand ſo mightie an enemie, to procure his fauour, ſent embaſſadors, offering to pay him a yerely tribute, and to do further what he ſhould reaſonably demand. Amurath beſide the yerely tribute, required to haue Marie (this Princes faire daughter) in marriage; and that he ſhould not ſuffer the Hungarians to paſſe through his countrey to inuade him; and further, not at any time to denie paſſage vnto the Turkiſh armie, when he ſhould ſend forth the ſame for the inuaſion of the kingdome of Boſna. All which vnreaſonable conditions the Prince was glad to agree vnto, and ſent his faire daughter by Saratze, who was afterwards married to Amurath.

Plague among the Turkes.

About this time, Ioſephus and Machmutes, Amurath his brethren, and Orchanes the ſonne of Solyman, who had his eyes put out by his vncle Mahomet, with many other men of great account among the Turks, died of the plague at Pruſa.

Whileſt Amurath was thus buſied in his wars in Europe, the king of Caramania his brother in law, inuaded his dominions in Aſia: for ſo it was agreed betweene the Chriſtian Princes of Europe, and the Mahometan princes of Aſia, to whom the greatnes of the Othoman kingdome was now become dreadful, That whenſoeuer he inuaded the Chriſtians in Europe, the Mahometan princes ſhould inuade his countries in Aſia; and that whenſoeuer he ſhould turn his forces into Aſia, the Chriſtian princes ſhould ſpoile his countries in Europ. Againſt this Caramanian king, Amurath tranſported his army into Aſia; & as he went, ſeiſed vpon the countries of Sarucania, Menteſia, and other prouinces, which were before but tributaries vnto him, driuing out the poore princes before him; & ſo entred into Caramania, and inforced the King ſo far, that he was glad to agree to ſuch conditions of peace as it pleaſed him to propound vnto him, & to ſend his ſon to wait at his court. And at the ſame time picking a quarrel with Iſfendiar prince of Caſtamona, cauſed him to become his tributarie, & to ſend his ſon to his court alſo. By which means the name of Amurath became terrible to all the Mahometan princes.

Hungarie ſpoiled by Amurath

When Amurath had thus quieted all his troubles in Aſia, he returned to Hadrianople: and vnderſtanding that the Hungarians paſſing ouer Danubius, had in his abſence made diuers incurſions into his dominions, he was therewith greatly offended; and in reuenge thereof firſt ſent Alis Baſſa the ſon of Eurenoſes, with an armie to inuade Hungaria; which he performed accordingly by the ſpace of a moneth, and returned from thence with rich bootie. Not long after, he himſelfe in perſon made another road into Hungary, commanding the prince of Seruia his father in law, to giue his armie free paſſage through his country; and charging Dracula prince of Valachia to aid him with his forces in that expedition: which his commandement both the Chriſtian princes (more for feare, than of good will) diligently performed. So Amurath hauing inriched his ſouldiers with the ſpoile taken in Hungarie, returned home and wintred at his court at Hadrianople.

The ſecret confederation betweene the Hungarians and the Mahometan King of Caramania, was not vnſuſpected of Amurath, which hee was the rather induced to beleeue, for that whenſoeuer he inuaded the one, he was preſently ſet vpon by the other, either in Europe or in Aſia: of which plot hee doubted not but that George prince of Seruia (his father in law) was chiefe author, although in ſhew he was therein the leaſt actor. Wherfore Amurath intending to ſpill the play, ſent for the prince his father in law to come to the court at Hadrianople: but he doubting ſome Tnrkiſh tragedie, pretended great occaſions that he could not come; and fearing that which afterwards fel out, fortified and manned all his ſtrong cities and caſtles by all means he could poſſibly, eſpecially his chiefe citie Semendre (otherwiſe called Spenderouia) and left therein his ſon Gregorie (or as ſome call him, George) as gouernor; for his other ſon Stephan was long before in Amurath his court, with the Queene his ſiſter. The prince of Seruia himſelfe went into Hungarie to procure from thence ſome aid, hauing there alſo himſelfe certaine territories, which he had in exchange of Sigiſmundus (late Emperor and King of Hungarie) for the citie of Belgrade. It was not long after, but Amurath forgetting both the affinitie and league hee had with the Prince his father in law, entered with a great armie into Amurath contrary to his faith inuadeth Seruia and ſubdueth it.

Seruia, deſtroying all before him, and hardly beſieged Semendre: where, after long ſiege the young gouernour (the Princes ſon) doubting to fall into his enemies hands by ſudden aſſault, yeelded himſelfe, with the citie: which thing ſo diſcouraged the reſt of the Seruians, that in ſhort time, Sophia, Nouomont, with all the reſt of the cities of Seruia, were yeelded into the power of Amurath. After which conqueſt hee returned to Hadrianople, and hearing that the Prince of Seruia with the Hungarians, were making head againſt him, and that the two young Seruian Princes, Gregorie and Stephen, his wiues brethren, had intelligence with their father, he commanded them both to be caſt in priſon ar Dydimoticum, & their eyes cruelly to be burnt out with a braſen baſon made red hot, a common vnmercifull practiſe among the Turks.

About this time, Albertus duke of Auſtria, hauing before maried Elizabeth the only daughter of Sigiſmund the Emperour, and ſucceeding his father in law both in the empire and kingdome of Hungarie (vnto which type of higheſt honour nothing more furthered him than the remembrance of Sigiſmund) in the ſecond yeare of his raigne, before hee was well ſetled in thoſe new atchieued honors, died of the flix, as he was making great preparation againſt Amurath the Turkiſh King: who hauing lately driuen George Prince of Seruia and Raſcia out of his dominions, had now extended the Turkiſh kingdom euen vnto the borders of Hungarie. This Albertus dying, left his wife great with childe. The Hungarians, in whoſe minds the remembrance of Sigiſmuna was yet freſh, could haue bin contented to haue liued vnder the gouernment of the Queene his daughter, the widow of Albertus (then great with child;) but that the Turkiſh King was now grown ſo great, & come ſo nigh, that it was thought more than needfull by Iohn Huniades, and other of the Hungarian nobilitie, for the defence of that kingdome, not wholly to reſt vpon the deuotion of the people toward the Queene, and the expectation of her iſſue, whereby they ſhould be nothing ſtrengthned: but to make choice of ſome great Prince, by whoſe power they might the better defend themſelues and the kingdome againſt their dangerous enemies. Whereupon with conſent of the Queene, it was reſolued vpon, to make choice of Vladiſlaus, the yong King of Polonia, then a Prince of great power, but of farre greater fame and expectation: and by Embaſſadours to offer vnto him the marriage of the Queene, and with her, the kingdome alſo. This embaſſage being ſent vnto Vladiſlaus, the matter was to and fro debated in the Polonian Court, whether it were to be accepted of or not? Some began to ſpeake of the inequalitie of the match, conſidering that the King was but in the prime of his youth, and the Queen well ſtept into yeares; vrging farther, that nothing was offered in that match but wars; and that the Hungarians therein ſought for nothing more, than by the Polonian forces to defend themſelues againſt the Turkes. Others of the contrarie opinion, ſaid, that the vniting of thoſe two mightie kingdomes would be to the great good of them both, and to the great honour of the king, whoſe very name would thereby become terrible vnto the Turkes: and that it were greater pollicie, by the forces of both the Kingdomes, to keepe the Turkiſh king from entring into Hungarie, than to leaue that kingdome to him land for a prey, & afterward be inforſt to fight with the ſame enemie in the heart of Polonia: and as for inequalitie of yeres betwixt the King and the Queene, it was not ſo great matter, that in regard therof ſo honorable & commodious alliance ſhould be reiected; for as much as Princes do more regard the vertues of their choice, with the increaſe of their honor & wealth of their kingdoms than the ſummer fruit of youth & beauty, which of it ſelf in ſhort time doth rot & periſh, although it be neuer ſo carefully kept and preſerued: and that for as much as there can be but one king in a kingdom, ſuch choice was to be preferred of Kings as had not therin the greateſt hope of many children. After long deliberation, Vladiſlaus gaue anſwer to the embaſſadors, That he would accept of the offers by them made: wherupon ſome of them returned to make relation to the Queene, and ſome of them ſtaied behind to haſten the king forward. But whilſt theſe things were a doing, the Queen in the mean time was deliuered of a faire ſonne, whom ſhe cauſed to be baptized & named Ladiſlaus. After the birth of this child, the Queen moued with a motherly affection, began to repent her ſelfe, that ſhe had giuen her conſent for the calling in of the Polonian king, to the preiudice of her ſon. And being animated by ſome of the Hungarian nobilitie (who preſuming of the good grace they were in with the Queen, hoped to grow great themſelues, if they might firſt draw the gouernment of that kingdom to the Queen & her yong ſon) determined now by all means to exclude the Polonian King: but the greater part of the nobilitie better conſidering what was moſt expedient for the preſent eſtate,and that they could neither with honour or ſafetie flie from that which was before(for the common good) by the Embaſſadors concluded, continued firme in their former reſolution for the bringing in of Vladiſlaus: ſo that by this meanes, ſome taking part with the Queene and her young ſonne,and others ſtanding faſt for Vladiſlaus,the kingdome of Hungarie was diuided into two factions,and as it were rent in pieces, & ſo grew to ciuil wars. The Queene with ſuch as fauored her claime, the more to gaine the minds of the common people, (which are many times no leſſe carried away with ſhews than matter) cauſed her ſon Ladiſlaus (being then but three moneths old) ſolemnly to be crowned King at Alba-Regalis, the vſuall place for the coronation of the Hungarian Kings. But after that the Polonian King had entred into Hungarie with a goodly armie, and ioyned his forces with his friends, moſt part of them which before followed the Queene and her ſonne,reuolted vnto Vladiſlaus. So that when ſhe had done what ſhe could, ſhee was glad at laſt to commit the tuition of her ſon, together with the crowne of Hungarie, vnto Fredericke the third,then Emperour: neuer ceaſing for all that, to the vttermoſt of her power, to trouble the gouernment of Vladiſlaus, continually ſtirring vp great warres againſt him both at home and abroad,vntill that at the laſt by her death her quarrell tooke end,together with her life.

In the midſt of theſe ciuill wars, Amurath thought a faire opportunitie preſented vnto him, to make an entrance vnto the conqueſt of Hungarie,which kingdome he had in his ambitious mind alreadie deuoured. And therefore gathering a great armie, he marched along the riuer Danubius,vntil he came to the ſtrong citie of Belgrade,called in antient time Taurunum,and of ſome Alba Græca,but now commonly Grecis Weiſenburg. This citie is inuironed on the Eaſt ſide with the famous riuer Danubius, and on the South with the great riuer of Saus or Sawe,which there falleth into Danubius;and on the other two ſides is defended with ſtrong walls, with deep and large ditches; and was then accounted the gate or entrance into Hungarie. Vnto this citie Amurath at his firſt comming gaue two terrible aſſaults, and was in good hope ſo to haue woon the ſame,but yet was both times valiantly repulſed,with great ſlaughter of his men. Wherefore finding it to be a matter of more difficultie than was by him at the firſt ſuppoſed,he began to raiſe mounts againſt the Citie, and high towers of wood to annoy the defendants,and furiouſly battered the walls. At this time alſo he cauſed great numbers of gallies and ſmall pinnaces to be brought into both the riuers of Danubius and Sawe,to aſſault the citie on thoſe parts where was leaſt feared,and by that meanes alſo to keepe them of the citie from all ſuccors to be ſent that way out of Hungarie. Yet for all he could do or deuiſe, the citie was ſtill valiantly defended by the Chriſtian ſoldiers, which vnder the leading and conduct of Ioannes Vranus a Florentine,gouernor thereof,with often ſallies and continual ſhot ſlew great numbers of the Turks. At the time of this ſiege,Vladiſlaus King of Polonia,& lately elect King of Hungarie,was ſore troubled by the Queene & her faction in Hungarie:which thing the Turkiſh King knew right wel,and therupon continued his ſiege, although famin began greatly to increaſe in his campe; hoping in nothing more, than that the defendants deſpairing of helpe from the King,would in ſhort time yeeld vp the citie. Vladiſlaus being ſo intangled with ciuill wars,as is aforeſaid,that he could not poſſibly prepare ſuch force as might reſcue the beſieged citie: yet foraſmuch as the Turkiſh king had not long before by his Embaſſador required to ioyn with him in league & amitie,he thought good now to aſſay if he could raiſe the ſiege,by ſending vnto him the like embaſſage. Wherupon he ſent Dobrogoſius, Oſtrogenus,and Lucas Gorſenſis,three of the Polonian nobilitie,embaſſadors vnto Amurath; declaring vnto him, That for ſo much as he had offered by his embaſſadors,to ioyne with him in league before he came out of Polonia,the remembrance thereof had taken ſuch deep impreſſion in his mind,that he would not take vp armes againſt him,although it were in his own iuſt defence,before he had offered him reaſonable conditions of peace: wherefore if hee would deſiſt from inuading of Hungarie(whereof Vladiſlaus was now by God his permiſſion,& conſent of the people,choſen King) and ſo raiſe his ſiege, that then they ſhould afterwards eaſily agree vpon the deſired peace: in concluding whereof, he ſhould not find Vladiſlaus inferior to himſelfe in any manner of princely courteſie: but if hee had rather proceed in armes, and to make proofe of his ſtrength,he would then do the beſt that he could,to make him know that he was of ſufficient power,in ſo iuſt a quarrel to withſtand his greateſt forces,& to reuenge the wrongs to him done. When Amurath had receiued this embaſſage, he appointed the Embaſ-ſadours to withdraw themſelues for a while to Synderouia (a citie of Seruia, not farre off, vntill he might better conſider of their demands; pretending, that he did it for their ſafetie: but as appeared afterward, ſecretly reſoluing with himſelfe, preſently to do his vttermoſt deuoire, for the gaining of the city, & vpon the ſucceſſe therof to ſhape them anſwer accordingly. Wherfore ſo ſoon as the embaſſadors were departed to Synderouia, he firſt by his meſſengers aſſaied the minds of the citizens and ſoldiers with magnifical promiſes of large liberties, and infinit rewards and preferments, if they would yeeld vp the citie: and many arrowes with letters made faſt vnto them, full of like promiſes, were at the ſame time ſhot into the citie. But when he ſaw no hope to preuaile by that means, he called together the captains and commanders of his armie, and there in the preſence of them all, ſpake vnto them as followeth:

The notable ſpeech of Amurath to encourage his ſouldiers to the aſſault of Belgrade.

Although I know it is in mine owne power, to grant, or not to grant, the peace whereof our enemies haue made a motion: yet it is my pleaſure (worthie ſouldiers) to know your minds alſo. For ſo much as wee haue that warre in hand, wherein with worldly felicitie, (whereof amongſt you I hold the chiefe place) is alſo endangered in our religion, and puritie of life; the defence and care whereof equally belongeth vnto vs all: for although we differ much one from another in the manner of our vocation, and liuing here, yet after death we all hope for one and the ſelfe ſame felicitie. And therefore I would haue you to vnderſtand all that I ſhall ſay, as proceeding not of any regard of mine owne priuate, but vpon the conſideration of the common good of you all. For as concerning mine owne eſtate, I poſſeſſe ſo large countries in Aſia, ſuch great dominions in Europe, that either part thereof (in good time bee it ſayd) might ſeeme a ſufficient kingdome: ſo that perhaps it might better ſtand with my eſtate, to take more care, for keeping of that I haue, than to trauell for the gaining of more: but you are to conſider with your ſelues, whether you haue euery man ſufficient to ſuffice himſelfe or not, and how long you thinke your ſelues aſſured of the ſame; and moreouer, that together with theſe worldly things, wee ſhall be driuen at length to forſake our profeſſion and religion, if wee ſhall now lay downe armes. For our enemies require, that wee ſhould firſt ceaſe from warre, and then afterwards they thinke it meete to talke of peace. I will not ſpeake of the indignitie, that men beſieged, and in euill plight, ſhould propound conditions of peace to them that beſiege them, and are well furniſhed of all things; that feeble and cowardly men ſhould promiſe peace vnto couragious and expert ſouldiers: I omit what labour and paines we haue taken in laying our ſiege, in raiſing of mounts, in making of ſhipping; all which, our enemies command vs to forſake, as if they had vs alreadie bound or couped vp in hold, as wee haue them. All Bulgaria, and the greater part of Raſcia is now by vs conquered, and moſt part of Seruia is at our command: all which places are by vs either to bee kept, or elſe all the reſt of that wee poſſeſſe in Europe, is with them to bee quite loſt and forſaken. Whoſoeuer ſhall haue in their power this Citie which wee beſiege (and that our enemies know right well) ſhall haue not onely as it were a fortreſſe and bulwarke of defence for his owne, but alſo a Caſtle and entrance for the ſubduing of others. The Kingdome of Hungarie is now diuided in it ſelfe, and full of domiſticall ſedition: neither is it ſo much ſtrengthened by the vniting of the kingdome of Polonia, as it is by ciuill diſſention weakened. And in this motion of peace nothing is ſought for, but to gaine time for the pacifying of their priuate quarrels, that they may afterward with their double forces ſet vpon vs. For if wee ſhall breake vp our ſiege before wee haue woon the citie, they will eaſily finde delayes ſo long to protract the concluſion of peace, vntill that either Vladiſlaus his good fortune, or elſe the Hungarians beeing of themſelues better aduiſed, ſhall make an end of their ciuill warres What manner & conditions of peace wil they then require of vs, when they are at vnitie amongſt themſelues, and in armes againſt vs; ſeeing that now beeing in danger with mutuall diſcord, and almoſt by vs vanquiſhed, they thinke it reaſonable (as if they had woon the field) that wee ſhould firſt raiſe our ſiege, and then intreat of peace? Their proud demaunds for the reſtitution of Bulgaria and Raſcia, with other countries and cities woon by our trauell and danger, alreadie ſound in mine eares: which if wee ſhall refuſe to grant, not onely the Hungarians being then at vnitie among themſelues, but alſo the Polonians, ioyned vnto them, will bring theſe warres home to our doores, which wee now at great aduantage make vpon them, troubled with diſcord and ciuill broiles. And if for deſire of peace we could bee content to yeeld vnto ſuch ſhamefull and miſerable conditions, and reſtore vnto them all they ſhould or in reaſon could deſire: doe you thinke the Prince of Seruia would reſt contented with his owne, whoſe haughtie minde (I am ſure) beeing inflate with the combining of two ſuch mightie kingdomes, thinketh not onely of the recouerie of that hee hath loſt, but euen now gapeth at all that is ours in Europe. He will not thinke himſelfe ſatisfied, before hee ( ing brought the Hungarian and Polonian Forces againſt vs) ſhal ſee the ſame hauocke and ſpoile made in our kingdome with fire and ſword, which he hath before ſeene made by vs in his owne. Where if his fortune ſhould anſwer his deſignes (which God forbid, but yet it may chance) beſide all the miſerable and intolerable outrages, which are to be feared of an angrie Conquerour, it is accounted with them for a godly and religious worke, to vſe all cruell and vnſpeakeable villanies againſt our nation, except we wil forſake the faith and religion deliuered vnto vs by our anceſtours, and follow their new and incredible ceremonies. Neither doe they thinke they can more eaſily and effectually procure the fauor of God with any kind of ſacrifice or ſeruice, than by ouerthrowing and prophaning our Temples, by ſcoffing at our moſt ſacred and ſecret Rites and ceremonies, by ſcorning our Religion and Prieſts: and that you may know all the furie wherewith they rage againſt vs and our Religion, they account all them for holie Saints which die in fight againſt vs. There is no cauſe (valiant ſouldiers) that vpon the vaine hope of peace, we ſhould expect whileſt the enemie doth gather and vnite his forces and armes againſt vs, eſpecially ſuch an enemie as propoundeth not ſpoyle and worldly honours, but immortalitie it ſelfe, as a reward of his victorie. We haue alreadie taken much more labour than we haue to take, we haue filled the ditches with reſtleſſe labour, we haue caſt vp bulwarkes equall with the walls, and part of the walls we haue beaten euen with the ground, ſo that you ſee the towne halfe opened: and that towne, by gaining whereof, all that ours is, may be made ſafe and quiet; and that which our enemie poſſeſſeth, ſubiect to our ſpoyle and prey. If you will but a little enforce your ſelues, as men mindful of our good fortune and forwardneſſe, you ſhall find our temples, our ſacrifices, our religion, all worldly and heauenly felicitie to be then aſſured vnto vs, when as you ſhall to morrow ouerthrow the verie foundation of the enemies wal. Then (couragious ſouldiers) we may crie, Victorie, not for the preſent, but for euer. If this war ſhould bring vnto vs nothing elſe but an aſſured ſecuritie of our eſtate, it were ſufficient reward; for which we ought cherefully to aduenture our ſelues to all dangers, and to challenge in combat euen death it ſelfe. But as this victorie doth defend all our things as with a deepe trench, or ſure wall, ſo doth it lay open and expoſe all our enemies dominions vnto danger and ſpoyle. Hitherto we haue ſtriuen with nature her ſelfe in the rough and abrupt mountaines of Bulgaria and Raſcia, where we were to ſtriue with hunger, thirſt, labour, and deſperation: all them we haue ouercome, allured with no other reward, but that at length we might attaine vnto the wealth of fruitfull Hungarie, from whence we muſt fetch the guerdon of our victorie, and the ground of our glorie. We are come to the gates, which being layd open, we are not to paſſe ouer inacceſſible rockes, or vncoth deſarts, but we ſhall goe thorow moſt pleaſant places, decked both by Nature her ſelfe, and the induſtrie of man; where the temperateneſſe of the aire, and liuely Springs, with the fruitfulneſſe of the ſoile, doth euery where yeeld plentie of all manner of food both for man and beaſt, not only to ſerue for natures neceſſitie, but euen to glut our wanton deſires. What thing ſoeuer curious endeauor hardly bringeth forth in other places, that the fertilitie of the ſoile yeeldeth plentifully of it ſelfe: ſo that it is to be thought, that nature adorned Hungary with a certain extraordinarie care, when as ſhe would ſet forth a patterne of good husbandrie for other countries to imitate. Neither hath ſhe in any place bin more bountifull in beſtowing her rich gifts: for gold, which other men moſt painfully dig vp, and that in few places, the Hungarians gather at their eaſe, as if it were a growing plant. It is in your power (worthie ſoldiers) whether you will to morrow open a way to all theſe good things for your ſelues for euer, or elſe leaue the way open for your enemies vnto all that you hold. I would that you would remember when you go vnto the breach, that all the ſtore of happie fortune is laid open vnto you for a prey, without any other defence, without any other garriſon, without any other keeper; and that behind you are your wiues, children, your houſes, your temples, and religion, together with the rewards of all your former victories: ouer whom, except you win this citie, the furie and inſolencie of the victorious enemie will muſt cruelly and ſhamefully inſult. I, according as I ſhall ſee you fight at the breach to morrow, ſhall eaſily perceiue how you are ſet downe to command as Conquerors, or elſe as ſlaues to be commanded; and alſo what ta anſwer to the moſt inſolent demands of the proud Embaſſadors. In the meane time make much of your ſelues, and together with your armor haue all things in readineſſe, that to morrow with the dawning of the day we may aſſault the breach.

The Turkiſh captains for that time joyfully departed, as if they had been alreadie aſſured of the victorie, & of all thoſe good things which Amurath had ſo liuely ſet before their eys. The next morning verie early, Amurath commanded the aſſault to be giuen to a great breach which he had made in the wall with continuall batterie: the ſoldiers with great courage aſſailed the breach, eſpecially the Ianizaries, who vnder the leading of Haly Baſſa valiantly woon

the ſame, and were entring the citie with aſſured hope of victorie. The Chriſtians ſeeing all in danger to be loſt, running to the breach from all parts of the citie, ſo forcibly charged the proud Ianizaries on euery ſide, that they were glad to retyre with more haſt than they before entred: in which retrait many of them were ſlaine, and the reſt flying out at the breach, were either ſlain, or burnt to death in the town ditch with wild fire; whereof the defendants had caſt great ſtore vpon the Turks at the breach, which hauing taken hold vpon the fagots, hurdles, and other light matter, wherewith the Turks had vpon the ſudden made their way ouer the town ditch, did ſo terribly burne, that the Ianizaries which had entred the breach, being again repulſed, were in that fierie lake conſumed, or elſe with ſmoke ſtrangled. In this aſſault Amurath is reported to haue loſt 8000 of his beſt men, beſide 7000 others ouerwhelmed or ſtrangled in the mines, by the countermines of the Chriſtians. The other part of the Turks, which at the ſame time aſſaulted the citie by water, out of their gallies and ſmall ſhips, had as euill or rather worſe ſucceſſe: many of them were ſunke with great ſhot, & ſome burnt by the fire caſt from the walls, and ſo fired one another; and diuers of them in that ſudden feare, for auoyding of that preſent danger, ran a ground vpon the ſhelfs in the riuer, and ſo ſplit. Amurath wonderfully diſcouraged with the ſlaughter of his men, and ſhamefully beaten from the aſſault, returned to his campe with his Turks, much like men which had lately eſcaped from ſome great ſhipwracke. And thus partly by famin, and partly by the defendants force, hauing loſt the greateſt part of his army, he determined now after ſeuen months ſiege to return home. Yet becauſe he would not encourage his enemies by ſhewing his feare, he ſent for the Embaſſadors into the campe, and with ſterne countenance anſwered them in this ſort:

Amurath his anſwer to the Embaſſadors.

We will (ſaid he) then talke of peace, when Vladiſlaus ſhall deliuer vnto vs all that part of Raſcia which he yet holdeth, and alſo this citie of Belgrade as a pledge of the league. And for this time I will raiſe my ſiege, to giue Vladiſlaus time to aduiſe himſelfe: yet I would wiſh him rather to accept of my friendſhip vpon theſe conditions, than by denying that little which is demanded, to hazard the ſtate of both his kingdomes. I aske but that which is myne owne by Law of Armes, before Vladiſlaus was called into Hungarie: and the Hungarians cannot transferre vnto him that right which they had not themſelues. Wherefore if he will proceed rather to ſtriue for that which is other mens, than quietly to poſſeſſe his owne, I will in good time repaire hither againe, with my God the beholder and reuenger of wrong.

With this anſwer he diſmiſſed the Embaſſadors, and forthwith roſe with his armie, forerepenting his comming thither: yet becauſe he would take ſomething in his way, he left his nephew Iſa-Beg with certaine troupes of horſemen at Scopia in Seruia, who ſo troubled the King of Boſna, that he was glad to require peace of Amurath, and to promiſe vnto him a yeerely tribute of fiue and twentie thouſand ducats.

Vladiſlaus newly elected King of Hungarie, ſeeing that part of his kingdome which is called Tranſyluania or Pannodacia, to be much ſuibect to the incurſion of the Turks; (who hauing got into their poſſeſſion all the countrey of Moldauia, and grown inſolent by continuall victories, ceaſed not to inuade and ſpoyle the countrey of Tranſyluania) for remedie of that dayly miſchief, created Iohn Huniades Vayuod, or his Vice-gerent in Traſyluania. This Huniades (as ſome write) was Earle of Biſtrice, borne in Valachia: others ſay, that he was borne but of meane parents, and called Huniades of the village wherein he was borne, and grew to be great by his vertue and proweſſe. Whatſoeuer his parents were, he himſelfe was a politque, valiant, fortunate, and famous captaine, his victories ſo great, as the like was neuer before by any Chriſtian Prince obtained againſt the Turks: ſo that his name became vnto them ſo dreadfull, that they vſed the ſame to feare their crying children withall. This worthie captain, according to the truſt repoſed in him, began to keepe the Turks ſhort, by cutting them off, whereſoeuer they preſumed to enter into his countrey; and alſo by ſhutting vp the paſſages whereby they were woont to forrage the countrey of Tranſyluania: and when he had put his own charge into good ſafetie, he entred into Moldauia, and neuer reſted vntill he had woon it quite out of the Turks hands. And not contented with this, paſſed many times ouer Danubius into the Turks dominions, making hauocke of the Turks, and carrying away with him great bootie, with many captiues.

Now

A Now were two great and worthie captains met together, in places nigh one to another; Huniades in Tranſyluania and the next part of Hungarie, and Iſa in Raſcia & the vpper part of Seruia; the one lying at Temeſwar, and the other at Sinderouia; both men of great ſpirit, and deſirous of honour. Of theſe two, Iſa in great fauour with Amurath, and by him highly preferred, to increaſe his credit with the Sultan his vncle, and to inlarge the bounds of the Turkiſh kingdome committed to his charge, continually forraged the country about Belgrade, to the intent that hauing wearied the inhabitants with the harmes he dayly did them, & brought the citie into great wants, he might ſo at length gaine the ſame, for the moſt part abandoned then of citizens, which Amurath could not by force obtaine, and ſo to open a way into Hungarie. Thus was the country by him ſpoyled, the villages rifled and burnt, and great numbers both of men and cattell dayly carried away: yea ſomtimes not contented to haue ſpoiled the B open country, he aſſailed the verie ſuburbs of the citie, and was thence hardly repulſed: and finding Huniades the only man that hindred his further proceedings, to requite him, and prouoke him the more, brake ſomtimes into his country, laying in euery corner as he went, ſtrong ambuſhes, ſo to haue circumuented that warie captain, if it had bin poſſible. But he grieued to ſee the countrey thus ſpoyled, and purpoſing thereof to be reuenged, ſecretly raiſed a ſtrong power both of horſe and foot, & with his companion Nicholas Vilach a right valiant captaine, paſſing ouer Danubius, came and incamped betwixt Belgrade and Sinderouia, being about 20 miles diſtant. Of whoſe comming Iſa-Beg vnderſtanding, forthwith ſet forward with a great armie againſt him, leſt he ſhould by longer delay ſeeme to ſtand in doubt of his enemy, whom he had by many iniuries ſo often prouoked. So marching on with his armie ranged in C order of battell, he found Huniades as readie for battell as himſelfe; who in both wings had placed his light horſemen, and behinde them his men at armes, with certaine companies of croſſebows on horſebacke: in the midſt ſtood his armed men, with his archers, and other ſoldiers more lightly armed, readie at all aſſayes, all ſtrongly garded with men at armes: after whom in the rereward followed alſo a ſtrong ſquadron of valiant footmen. The ſignal of battell being giuen, there began a great and cruell fight, as amongſt men deſirous either to ouercome, or there honourably to end their days. At the firſt incounter, the wings of Huniades his battell were by the Turks inforced to retire; but comming to the men at armes, their furie was there ſtayd, & a cruel battel fought, wherein many fel on both ſides, but of the Turks mo, who truſting to their agilitie and nimblenes of bodie, were not able long to endure the ſhocke D and ſtrength of the men at armes, but were there by heapes ouerthrowne, and moſt miſerably ſlain. Which Iſa-Beg beholding, and perceiuing the Hungarians couragiouſly to fight, as men almoſt in poſſeſſion of an aſſured victorie, to ſaue himſelfe, turned his backe and fled to Sinderouia. The reſt beholding the flight of their Generall, betook themſelues to flight alſo: after whom the Hungarians fiercely followed, eſpecially Huniades himſelfe, who by his example to animate the reſt, left not the chaſe vntil he was come almoſt to the ſuburbs of Sinderouia: few of the Turks eſcaped, the reſt being either taken or ſlain. Huniades after ſo great a victory, with a rich prey and a multitude of priſoners returned to Belgrade; hauing now ſufficiently reuenged himſelfe of the wrongs he had before receiued. After which time Iſa the Turke was more quiet, as hauing ſufficient proofe of his valor. The fame of this victorie increaſed not a little the fame of Huniades, the report whereof comming to Buda, filled the citie with joy and gladnes; but moſt of all King Vladiſlaus, who thereupon cauſed publique prayers, with thankſgiuing to be made in euery Church; and by his letters gratulatorie, with many rich Preſents incouraged Huniades to the proſecution of the religious warre; wherein was propounded vnto him not only the increaſe of his wealth (a baſe regard in the honorable) but the immortalitie of his name, and hope of eternall bliſſe. 1440.

Not long after this victorie, Huniades obtained a far greater in Tranſyluania. For Amurath much grieued with the loſſe he had firſt by himſelfe, and after by his lieutenant Iſa, receiued at Belgrade, and in the countrie therabout; leſt he ſhould ſeem to yeeld vnto the Hungarians, E repaired his broken forces with new ſupplies, with purpoſe againe to renew his wars in Valachia. And ſo hauing put all things in a readines, ſent one of his Baſſa's called Meſites (his Viceroy in Aſia, a man of great wiſdome, experience, and valor) with a puiſſant armie vpon the ſudden by the way of Valachia Tranſalpina, to inuade Tranſyluania. This worthie captain according to his charge departing out of Seruia, and paſſing from Danubius, ſuddenly entred into Tranſiluania inuaded and ſpoiled by Meſites Baſſa.

Huniades flieth

Huniades and the Biſhop of Alba Iula entrapped by the Turks.

Huniades his country, burning and ſpoyling whatſoeuer came in his way, and killing al that he light vpon, man, woman, & child, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition, filling al the countrey as he went with tumult and terror. Whereof Huniades (but lately come into the country) vnderſtanding, and hauing as then no ſufficient forces to oppoſe againſt the furie of ſo puiſſant an enemie, either means to raiſe any in ſo great a confuſion and feare; was wonderfully grieued thereat, and perplexed in mind, as not well knowing which way to turne himſelfe. At length he tooke his flight into Alba Iula, vnto his old friend George Lepe Biſhop of that citie, a man of great vertue and grauitie: but whileſt he there ſtayeth with his friend, about the raiſing of a tumultuarie armie, the enemie was now come neere vnto him; who hauing ouerrun the greateſt part of the country, had ſcraped together ſuch a bootie, and taken ſuch a multitude of priſoners, that ſurcharged as it were with the ſpoyle, he was glad to march ſoftlier; yet ſtill burning the country before him. Which Huniades and the good Biſhop beholding out of the city, ſo much grieued thereat, that albeit that they both well knew themſelues, with an handful of men taken vp in haſt hand ouer head, too weake to encounter with their enemies; yet thought it better, with ſuch power as they had to go out, and ſo in defence of their country honorably to die, than longer to behold the moſt miſerable deſtruction of the ſame. But whileſt they vpon this reſolution (carried forth with too hot a deſire of reuenge) march vnaduiſedly forward, without any ſcouts or eſpials ſent out before them, they fell before they were aware into ſuch ambuſhes both of horſe & foot, as the crafty enemie had in the ſecret woods & vallies whereby they were to paſſe, laid of purpoſe to intercept them: which now with great force and horrible outcries breaking out vpon them on euery ſide, diſmaied them with a great feare. Huniades and the Biſhop ſeeing themſelues ſo intrapped and beſet with the multitude of their enemies, as that they muſt needs periſh if they ſhould longer ſtay, fled incontinently backe again, after whom followed all the reſt of their armie, and at their heeles the eager Turks, who ſpared none of the flying Chriſtians they could ouertake, but put them all to the ſword: neuertheleſſe moſt part of them eſcaped backe again to Alba Iula. The Biſhop thinking to haue ſaued himſelfe by the ſwiftnes of his horſe, comming to a riuer, in taking the ſame was ouerthrown, and there by the enemie ſlain. With whoſe death the Baſſa incouraged, as alſo with the preſent victorie, began now more at libertie to range abroad, and at his pleaſure with fire & ſword to waſt that part of the country which yet remained vnſpoiled: leauing in the meane time (as a man out of feare) the rich prey he had taken, together with his baggage & carriages, to be carried all together, as a notable teſtimonie of his victorie, vnto his great lord & maſter. Huniades in the mean time with wonderfull celeritie running about the borders of his country, and out of euery town & village taking ſuch ſoldiers as he could, perſuaded alſo the Sicilians (or people commonly called Siculi) in defence of their wiues and children to take vp arms: who also in reſpect of the preſent neceſſitie, cheerfully did whatſoeuer he commanded. With this tumultuarie armie he followed the Baſſa (who then in great pride was returning, laded with the ſpoile of the whole country) with purpoſe to ſet vpon him as time or place ſhould giue him occaſion. In the mean time Meſites being told, that Huniades with a great power was comming after him, and now euen at hand, is reported to haue made no reckoning thereof, but to haue proudly anſwered vnto him that brought the news, Let him come, and with the ſpoyle of himſelfe inrich our victorie. There was preſent when he thus ſaid, one Iohn one of Huniades his eſpials; who diſcouered vnto him many of the Turks deſignes concerning the joyning of battel with him; but eſpecially, that the Baſſa had commanded thorow his armie, That aboue all things, they ſhould in the beginning of the battell aſſaile the perſon of Huniades himſelfe, for that he being once ſlain, the reſt would eaſily be put to flight, as all depending on his direction: & that for the performance thereof, he had appointed certain companies of his beſt ſoldiers, giuing them certain tokens wherby they might know both him and his horſe. There was then in the armie one Simon Kemene, a right valiant and couragious gentleman, not much vnlike to Huniades, with whom he changed both his horſe and armor, appointing vnto him a ſtrong troupe of his choice horſemen to attend vpon him: neither was this counterfeit Huniades vnwilling to expoſe himſelfe vnto the danger, accounting it honour enough, if by his death he might ſaue the life of his friend, and preſerue ſo worthie a defender of the commonweale. Huniades following faſt after the Baſſa marching before him, ſought by light skirmiſhes, ſomtimes on the one ſide, ſometimes on the other, and ſometimes in the rereward, to ſtay him, and at ſome aduantage, uantage,if any ſuch were giuen,to fight with him before he ſhould get out of the country.At length finding ſuch an opportunitie as he thought good to lay hold vpon, he with all his forces,as if it had been a violent tempeſt, came vpon the Turks ſo ſuddenly, as that they had not time to put themſelues in order of battell,but were glad confuſedly to fight as they might,& without order:in which diſordred fight many fel on both ſides,but far more of the Turks.But whileſt both armies with like obſtinacy incounter together,certain troups of the moſt valiant Turks deſcrying Simon the counterfeit Huniades,& by the ſignes before deliuered vnto them, both of his horſe and armor,ſuppoſing him to haue bin Huniades indeed ; with al their power made towards him, to haue ſlain him, according as they had in charge : where meeting with right valiant men, of no leſſe courage than themſelues, there was fought a moſt terrible and bloudie battell,in ſuch ſort, as if in that verie place ſhould haue been tried the whole fortune of the day. But the Turks ſtill bending their forces more and more thither, for the killing of him of whom they ſtood in more dread than of all the reſt ; at length by plaine ſorce made a way vnto him,& hauing ſlain them that were about him, though not without their own great loſſe,furiouſly aſſailing him,ſlew him,vainly ſuppoſing it to haue bin the very Generall himſelf: who had he there periſhed (as like enough it was he ſhould,had he not bin before warned of the Baſſa's purpoſe)no doubt but that the whole country had bin with him,or ſhortly after quite loſt. But Huniades in the mean time riding to and fro in the armie, encouraged his ſoldiers not to forſake the victorie they were now as it were in poſſeſſion of,nor leaue vnreuenged ſo many ſlaughters and harms ſo lately committed by their enemies,but to remember as they were fighting,that they carried in their hands their wiues and children, and were in that one battell to reuenge the wrong by them done both to God and man.Somtime he with new ſupplies encouraged ſuch as were ouercharged , and euen now readie to flie ; otherſome he with cheerfull words ſtayd,that had alreadie turned their backs;performing in euery place all the parts both of a worthie commander and valiant ſoldier, as the neceſſitie of the time and place required. In the heat of this battel (fortune yet fauoring neither part, but both fighting with all their power) the Tranſiluanian priſoners that in great number were kept in the camp,wiſhing rather to die,than to be carried away into captiuitie, and thinking it now or neuer,time for them to attempt their deliuerance;with one conſent brake aſunder their bonds,and with ſuch weapons as firſt came to hand, ſet vpon their keepers,of whō they ſlew a great number,& ſo deſperatly iſſuing out into the battell,incouraged their countrimen,& diſcouraged their enemies. Yet was the battell hardly fought,though not altogether with like courage,or for like cauſe: for why,the Tranſyluanians fought for their country,their wiues, their children, their liues, their libertie,their religion,and alters : but the Turks,for the rich prey they had before taken,& that they were by victorie in hope of. But at length the Turks by the breaking out of the priſoners (who laid about them like deſperat men) out of hope of the victorie, began by little and little to retyre;and the other on the contrarie part by this vnexpected aid encouraged,and quickly finding the enemies fainting,fought more fiercely than before.Meſites ſeeing his armie thus in euery part wauering,was therewith exceedingly troubled : but preſently after, beholding ſome of his men retyring as if they had fled, and other ſome flying outright, and no meanes to ſtay them, for ſafegard of his life turned his horſe and fled alſo : after whom the Hungarians followed with moſt terrible execution,as men deſirous of the bloud of them that had done them ſo great harme. In this chaſe Meſites himſelf with his ſon were both ſlain: the repoort of whoſe death in the purſuit, added ſwiftnes vnto the Hungarians, to the encreaſing of the ſlaughter of the Turks,whom for the deſire of reuenge they ceaſed not for certain days to purſue,vnto the top of the Alps. In this battel were ſlaine of the Turks 20000,and of the Hungarians about 3000.Huniades with this victorie recouered all the prey the Turks had taken of the ſpoile of the country,together with their tents and baggage:vnto whom at his return into the campe,a wonderfull number of the poore captiues came, and falling at his feet, and kiſſing them, gaue God thanks for their deliuerance by him ; ſome called him the father, ſome the defender of his country ; the ſoldiers,their inuincible Generall ; the captiues , their deliuerer ; the women,their protector ; the yong men and children, their moſt louing father. In all which joyfull acclamations,no honorable additions was heard, which in the iudgement of all men,worthily agreed not with his deſerts.He again with tears ſtanding in his eys,courteouſly embraced them , rejoycing at the publique good ; and himſelfe giuing moſt heartie

A great battell betwixt Meſites and Huniades.

Great reioycing for the victorie.

thanks vnto God, commanded the like to be done in all churches of that Prouince. Somtime he commended the ſoldiers valor, and in generall, the peoples loyalty. The nobilitie & worthie captains he extolled by name, according as their deſerts had bin in that notable battell, not detracting any thing from any mans worthie prayſes: part of the ſpoyle of the Turkes he appointed vnto deuout vſes, and the other part he diuided amongſt the ſoldiers: and willing as it were with the firſt fruits thereof to gratifie King Vladiſlaus and the Deſpot of Seruia, then preſent with him, he ſent a great waggon, with 10 horſes which could ſcarce draw, laded with the Turks enſignes and the chief of their heads, where the heads of the Baſſa and his ſon ſtood formoſt, and aboue them was placed an old Turke, ſomtime wel known vnto the Deſpot: who in this order preſented vnto them, is ſayd to haue thus deliuered his meſſage, as followeth:

The ſpeech of an old Turk, in deliuering the Preſent vnto the King.

Huniades your Maieſties moſt humble ſeruant, and the moſt honourable Deſpots ſonne, ſendeth vnto you this part of the ſpoyle gained by this late victorie, leſt he ſhould ſeeme to defraud you of the honour of the battell, happily fought vnder your good fortune. Theſe heads of the Aſian Nobilitie he ſendeth you for a Preſent, that you ſhould not want the aſſured teſtimonie of ſo notable a victorie: theſe are two princes heads, the one of Meſites Baſſa the Generall, and the other of his ſon; the reſt are the heads of the other great commanders and Sanzacks. All theſe witneſſe the greatneſſe of the late ſlaughter, and exhort you to greater atchieuements. What your royal Maieſtie for the natural inſtinct of pietie and religion ingrafted into you, may hope for; and what an occaſion of immortalitie and glorie is offred vnto you, Huniades wiſheth you hereby to conſider: and humbly requeſteth, that generall ſupplications may be commanded, and a great armie prouided, foraſmuch as all men ſuppoſe, that the Turke will gage his whole forces, and leaue nothing vnattempted, in reuenge of ſo great a ſlaughter of his people.

Hauing ended his ſpeech, he ſhewed vnto them the griſely mortified heads: which the nobilitie and others there preſent, earneſtly beheld, and wondred at, eſpecially the King & the Deſpot; who by letters further vnderſtanding the whole proceeding of the war, and fortune of the battel, highly commended the diſcreet valour of Huniades, together with the glorious victorie, worthie (as they ſaid) of a Roman triumph: for which, Vladiſlaus commanded publike ſupplications to be made in all churches thorow Hungarie, and by honorable meſſengers ſent of purpoſe to Huniades, gaue him great thanks, according to his deſerts, with many rich Preſents alſo, commending his faithfull and worthie ſeruice: and requeſting him, with like courage and care, to proſecute the war, ſo happily begun; promiſing him, That he ſhould neither want men nor mony, or any thing elſe needfull thereunto. Vpon this victorie, the countries of Moldauia and Valachia, before tributaries vnto the Turks, now reuolted again vnto the Hungarians, to the great griefe of Amurath: and the fame of Huniades was in ſhort time diſperſed thorow all Europe, and a generall hope conceiued of him, as of one moſt like to be one of the greateſt champions of the Chriſtian commonweale, as in his time vndoubtedly he was.

The report of this late ouerthrow, with the death of the Baſſa Meſites, and the loſſe of his Armie, being brought to Hadrianople, much troubled the Turkiſh Tyrant; but moſt of all, the reuolt of the two Countreys, Moldauia and Valachia. So that full of wrathfull indignation, and deſire of reuenge, he commaunded a great armie to be raiſed againſt the next Spring, with intent to haue gone therewith himſelfe: but afterward vpon better aduice changing his purpoſe, he committed the leading thereof vnto one Schech Abedin Baſſa (corruptly called Sciabedin Baſſa) an Eunuch, and yet neuertheleſſe a right valiant and expert captaine, and his Viceroy in Europe; with charge firſt to enter into Valachia, and there hauing done what harme he could with fire and ſword, to doe the like in Moldauia: and after that, with all his power to breake into Tranſyluania, there to reuenge vnto the full, the loſſes before receiued, and with the ſlaughter of the Hungarians to ſacrifice vnto the ghoſts of their dead friends and companions. The Baſſa according to his charge, departing out of Macedonia, and marching thorow Myſia, and ſo paſſing ouer Danubius, with an armie of foureſcore thouſand fighting men, whereof foure thouſand were of the beſt Ianizaries, entred into Valachia, filling the country with feare and tumult; the Valachians now altogether in deſpaire to be able to defend themſelues againſt the furie of the Turkes, and ſore repenting them of their reuolt from them, vnto the Hungarians. Whom for all that, Huniades comforted with cheereful words, willing them betime to retyre themſelues vnto the ſafeſt places of the Countrey, and not to expoſe themſelues with their too weake forces againſt the furie of the Barbarians; promiſing miſing in goodtime to come himſelfe to their reliefe, not doubting by the power of Ieſus Chriſt, to dare them battel in the plain field, and to haue of them a glorious victory, although they were in number far moe than they were reported to be. The Baſſa diuiding his armie into two parts, forraged the countrey far and neere, burning the countrey townes and villages before them, ſpoiling whatſoeuer came in their way, and killing whoſoeuer they light vpon, men, women, or children, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition. But the Valachians for the moſt part had retired themſelues, ſome into the mountains, ſome into the ſtrong townes, and ſome into places further off; ſo that few fell into the enemies hands, but ſuch as were not able to flie, or not regarding the danger, had negligently ſtaid the enemies comming, and ſo periſhed. Valachia thus ſpoiled, the Turks paſſing ouer the mountaines, deſcended into Tranſyluania, as Amurath had commanded, with purpoſe there to haue don the like or greater harm, if poſſible it had been to haue ſo done: but there was Huniades with 15000 choſen ſouldiers readie to encounter them. A ſmall power indeed, in compariſon of the multitude the Baſſa led: but al men of great experience & reſolution, in valor counteruailing the great number of their enemies, men reſolued rather to die than to flie. Of whoſe approch the Baſſa (vnto whom the name & fortune of the man was dreadful) by his eſpials vnderſtanding, ſtaied his intended furie, and as one well aware with whom he had to doe, without farther proceeding, encamped himſelfe with his armie, to ſee what power and courage the enemie had. But certainly informed by his ſcouts, for that purpoſe ſent out, That he was not in number a quarter ſo many as the Turks, but lay ſtrongly encamped with his waggons & carriages, as in a ſure fort, in ſuch order, as that he could not without great danger be aſſailed, & yet might at his pleaſure come forth, and ſo if need were retire again, as into a ſtrong hold: he wondered at his courage and ſkilfull manner of encamping; yet preſuming of his own multitude and ſtrength, he doubted not to march forward, and to offer him battel. Being come within halfe a mile the one of the other, although they were on neither ſide vnwilling to fight, yet hoping both for a great victorie, they thought it not beſt to attempt any thing raſhly, but betooke themſelues both vnto the higheſt of their wits, as willing in ſo great a conflict, as wel to ſhew the vtmoſt of their policie and skil, as of their courage & valor. The Turk thought it beſt not to ioyn battel with his enemies in one front, for feare of confounding ſo great a multitude, but to diuide his army into certain battalions, & ſo to fight by degrees and in good order, whereby to make al his men profitable: or if he could not do ſo, then with his multitude to encloſe the Chriſtians round, & ſo to ouerwhelme them. On the other ſide, Huniades charged his ſoldiers, aboue all things to keep their order, and in no caſe to ſuffer themſelues to be diuided by their enemies. The next day, being come vnto a place which they call Vaſcape, both the armies by the breake of day began to diſlodge; at which time the Baſſa ſpent a good ſpace in the martialling of his great army, as did alſo Huniades, ſeeking by prouident foreſight and policie to match the multitude of his enemies. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order, calling vnto him the chiefe captaines and commanders of his armie, with cheerefull countenance encouraged them as followeth:

The moſt Chriſtian ſpeech of Huniades to encourage his ſoldiers againſt the Turks.

No courage (beleeue me) worthie companions, and fellowes in arms, could haue induced me to encoun r ſo great a multitude, did not neceſsity it ſelfe enforce me, your approued valour perſuade me, and the ſured hope I haue in Chriſt Ieſus aboue all things confirme me: hauing made choice of vs to fight this s ſacred battell, and by our right hands to reuenge the diſhonour of his holy name. In which his eſpe ll choice wee are to conſider how much hee hath beloued vs: and for the ſame to praiſe his infinite odneſſe and mercie. Three ſuch commodities hath God thereby euen this day propounded vnto vs, if will be the ſame men we haue beene in times paſt, as that the leaſt thereof were ſufficient to encou ge men of worth, for the ſame to lay downe their liues, held they them neuer ſo deare. Firſt, you are fight for the health and welfare of your children, wiues, and countrey, ioyned with your whole eſtate: en, for eternall glorie and renowne in this world: and laſt of all, for immortalitie and a crowne that ll neuer be taken from you, in the world to come. How many miſeries and calamities we haue in for r times, and of late receiued from the Turks, would to God you had rather heard thereof by report, n ſeene the ſame with your eyes, and indured them in your ſelues. You had long ſince beene bereft our beloued wiues and children, whome moſt miſerable ſeruitude had ouerwhelmed; you had had ither houſe nor Church, wherein to dwell or to ſerue God, had not the diuine power of God, and your re proweſſe beene at hand for preſent reſcue: your countrey, your goods, your honour, your liberty, you could not haue kept, had not your valour, confirmed by an aſſured confidence in the higheſt, preſerued all theſe things vnto your ſelues: The horrible furie of the Turke had now brought all theſe things into the power of it ſelfe, had they not beene by your armes defended, and hee by ſo many bloudie ouerthrowes repreſſed. He could not before be ſtayed; the Grecians, the Macedonians (both ſometimes the greateſt commanders) the old Thracians, the ſtrong Bulgarians, the valiant Epirots, & Dalmatians, could not abide their force: The Athenians, the Thebans, the Lacedemonians, authors & maſters of the antient diſciplin of warre, willingly gaue place vnto theſe. Vnto vs, is the praiſe and great glorie of this victorie by God aſsigned, who oftentimes with a ſmall power, yea and that ſometime againſt all hope, haue with a notable ſlaughter ouerthrowne them, vanquiſhed them, and put them to flight. Neither is there any men in the world whom they more feare and ſtand in dread of, than you, whom though in number but few, they haue by their daily ſlaughter and loſſes, learned no leſſe to feare, than if you were many. And now to trie the vttermoſt of their power, they are come with their innumerable legions: but are not for that of you any thing the more to bee feared than before; ſeeing that wee all beare armes vnder the conduct of the moſt mightie God; and are by daily victorie, long experience, and approoued valour taught, what wee are to dare: beſides that the greateſt part of their armie is of common ſoldiers, ſlaues, or rude countrey peſants, or men by force by them compelled; more than the Ianizaries, are no good ſoldiers among them, the reſt as men enforced, ſerue them for feare, and againſt their wils, and they by their cowardiſe brought into that bondage and ſlauerie. What Greekes, Macedonians, or Sclauonians ſoeuer are ſent to their aid, for aſmuch as they are not yet reuolted from the Chriſtian faith, deeme them not to ſtand for them, but for vs: they long for vs the reuengers of their wrongs, and for you as victorious conquerors: in this warre they haue giuen vnto the Turks their names, but vnto vs their hearts and power; and pray heartily for our victorie: wherefore you ought ſo much the more valiantly and couragiouſly to fight, by how much greater you ſee the victory, the honor, the prey before your eyes. We are not to fight for other mens houſes and altars, but for our owne; ſo our preſent neceſsity requireth, in ſuch ſort, that if we our ſelues deliuer not our ſelues, and beare our ſelues vpon our wonted hope and valour, we ſhall this day be enforced to endure the greateſt miſerie that men may poſsibly. Firſt, the loſſe of our goods and ſubſtance, the captiuity of our children, the deflouring of our daughters, the rauiſhing of our wiues, the ſlaughter of our parents, the burning of our houſes and churches; and that which worſe is than all this, the ſcorne of our Sauiour Chriſt Ieſus, and his Saints; whoſe images you ſhall ſee in deſpight broken, or dragged in the durt, or moulten and conuerted into other prophane vſes; all Religion tredden downe, and God himſelfe (if it were poſsible) with violence and deſpaire driuen out of our hearts, if we ſtand not manfully vnto it as becommeth worthie champions. God is able with his little finger, if he ſo will, forthwith, to deſtroy all the Turks in the world; but ſeeing he hath committed vnto our right hands the defence of his name, he firſt maketh proofe of our courage and valour, that finding the ſame faithfull and readie, he may ſtrengthen and defend it with his owne right hand. He neuer yet forſooke any faithfull or deuout man, neither will our Sauiour Chriſt be wanting vnto you, if you be not wanting to your ſelues: in the power of his name which is aboue al names, he ſhal tread down his rebellions enemies, and exalt the righteous that put their truſt in him. Moreouer, the cauſes that they and we combat for, are diuers, and our hopes much ſtronger. They fight for their Prophet, a moſt prophane man, author of all impietie, for ſpoile and prey, for the deſtruction of nations & cuontries, for other mens kingdoms, for the inlarging of their dominions, and territories, for worldly praiſe and glorie: But wee contrariwiſe beare armes for the Sauior of the world, for our faith and religion, for the Chriſtian common wealth, for our natiue countrey, for our wiues and children, for our fortune and ſtate; than which nothing can be more excellent, more commendable, or honorable. What reward is laid vp for them in heauen which haue worthily protected or deliuered their countrey, or laid downe their liues in defence of their faith and religion? Neither, hauing often proued, are we ignorant, that God wil neuer forſake them that honor, feare, and ſerue him. Wherby (fellow ſoldiers) you may plainly perceiue, how far your hopes are beyond theirs. Beleeue our Sauior, promiſing vnto you an eternal reward: and ſhew your fidelitie and valor vnto God and your countrey together. Wherefore, ſeeing without the power of God we can do nothing, before the ſignal of battel be giuen, I beſeech you colonels, captains, and lieutenants, by your effectuall & Chriſtian exhortations in your regiments & companies, to encourage your ſoldiers, valiantly to fight the Lords battel; & for the preſent, euery man by taking a little earth in his mouth, to prepare himſelf according to the neceſsitie of the time, as it were to the receiuing of the Lords Supper: ſo hauing cleanſed your ſoules, embrace you one another, plight your mutual faith with your right hand & a kiſſe; & make a perpetual couenant among your ſelues, none of you to forſake one another in this holy battel, but for your religion & country valiantly to fight it out, euen to

A the laſt man. And a little refreſhing your ſelues with a ſhort repaſt as you ſtand, vpon the ſignall giuen, thrice calling aloud vpon the mightie name of Chriſt Ieſus, fight with the like valour and courage ſo neere as you can, that he in the agonie of death fought for your redemption and libertie: which that you wil willingly do, I requeſt and charge you this for our Sauiors ſake, for the loue of our country, & for the faith you owe both to God and man. I alſo pray and beſeech you, ſo to fight, as men reſolued either to gaine a moſt glorious victorie, (whereof I doubt not) or elſe if it ſhould otherwiſe chance, this day to purchaſe vnto your ſelues a bleſſed life in the kingdome of heauen: not to ſup in hel with the Turkes, but with the bleſſed wights in heauen: for Chriſt Ieſus our Sauiour will be alwaies preſent with vs, who (beleeue me, and ſo hope) wil this day not only deliuer vs out of the hands of the Turks, but to our immortal glory lode vs with the rich ſpoiles of our enemies, and ſo in ſafetie bring al home again with much ioy & triumph.

B The Baſſa on the other ſide likewiſe encouraged his ſoldiers, putting them in remembrance of their former victories, exhorting them not to degenerat from their worthie anceſtors and themſelues, by whoſe great valor the glory and empire of the Turks had bin ſo mightily increaſed, and vnto whom their great prophet Mahomet, the interpreter of the gods, had foretold the empire of the whole world to be by al the gods allotted, & had by diuine inſpiration prophecied, that antient and ſtately nation in time to become the terror of the world, the ſcourge of the wicked, and commander of all nations. He farther declared vnto them, what an increaſe of kingdomes they had got in that ſhort time, ſince which they firſt paſſed ouer into Europe: and filled them with the hope of a great ſpoile; promiſing vnto them that ſhould in the battell valiantly behaue themſelues, not onely the ſpoile and prey, but whole villages, C towns, and cities, and other great preferments, according as they ſhould deſerue. As for the victorie, conſidering the weake power of their enemies, and the great number of themſelues, he aſſured them thereof, if they would but a while valiantly fight it out like men. In concluſion, he told them, that hauing ouercome Huniades (whom only, as he confeſſed, he had found to be the moſt valiant and skilfull captaine of the Chriſtians) nothing ſhould afterward be able to ſtand in their way, or to hinder their further conqueſts: and that if this day they ſhould vtterly ouerthrow him, they ſhould gain the moſt honorable victorie that was euer yet got in Europe. Wherefore he willed them aboue all things, in the battell to ſeeke after him, promiſing vnto him that ſhould kill him, a great reward, with moſt honourable preferments. Hauing thus D ſufficiently, as he thought, encouraged his Turks, he ſet forward with his armie in order of battell. His horſmen and footmen he diuided into two great wings, betwixt which marched the Ianizaries in a ſquare battell, all men of approued valour: after whom followed the rereward: vnto the wings he had alſo ioyned certaine looſe companies of light horſemen to begin the battell, and to flie about the enemies, and ſo as occaſion ſhould ſerue, either to charge or retire. Huniades likewiſe had placed in both wings two ſquare battalions of men at armes, and with them certaine horſemen with croſſe bowes: before theſe wings he had alſo placed certaine troupes of light horſemen, to encounter the enemies: in the midſt ſtood two ſquare battels of men at armes: and betwixt them a ſtrong ſquadron of armed men, guarded behind with a conuenient number of pikemen and archers: both the wings hee had compaſſed E about with a multitude of carts and waggons, and they alſo well manned. So marching forward, and both armies being come within a quarter of a mile together, the ſignall of battell was on both ſides giuen, and the battell begun. Huniades ſeeing the multitude of his enemies, caſt his firſt battel into the forme of a wedge, the more eaſily to diuide them: and they on the other ſide in form of a paire of ſheeres, were readie to receiue him: where on both ſides they encountred together with ſuch furie and outcrie, as neuer was thing more terrible to be heard or ſeen. The Turks truſting vnto the multitude of their nimble light horſemen, firſt with their light ſtaues, and afterward with their crooked Scimaters fiercely aſſailed the Chriſtians light horſemen, in which firſt incounter many fell on both ſides. But the wedge battel of the Chriſtians could not of the Turks be broken, as conſiſting all of valiant expert ſouldiers, and they alſo ſtrongly armed; who, doe the Turks what they could, with a great ſlaughter cut their ar-
F mie in ſunder, but not without a great fight, and ſome loſſe alſo vnto themſelues. In the wings alſo the light horſemen for a while fought couragiouſly and with like hope: but the Turkes with that kind of fight better acquainted than the Chriſtians, & better appointed for that purpoſe, and exceeding in number alſo, put the Chriſtian light horſemen to the worſt, and enforced

ced them to retire to the men at armes. Here began the fortune of the Turkes to ſtay, where both parts deſperatly aſſailing the one the other, was made a moſt terrible fight, wherein moſt part of the Turks light horſemen were ſlain: for why, they were not able to abide the force of the men at arms, although in compariſon of them, but few; but were with their lances and arming ſwords ouerthrowne and ſlain, no otherwiſe than if they had bin naked men: ſo that in both wings the Turks began now to faint. But the battell in both the wings yet wauering, and the victory doubtful, in the maine battaile was fought a moſt cruell fight: the Ianizaries with a ſtrong power of men at arms, & certain troups of light horſmen, compaſſed about the men at armes that ſtood (as wee ſaid) in the maine battel of the Chriſtians, were the old Ianizaries with their crooked Scimitaries, with great courage cut in ſunder the legs of the horſes of the men at arms; of whom many fel down, & lying along vpon the ground, were made ſhorter by the head: as likewiſe on the other ſide, the Ianizaries whileſt they ſeek the deſtruction of the men at arms, were themſelues ouerborn & troden vnder foot. Wherupon ſuch a ſlaughter was made, that the bloud ran like riuers, whileſt they deſperatly fight with furious rage both on the one ſide & the other. In this cruel fight moſt part of the Ianizaries were ſlain, and many of the Chriſtian men at arms alſo. The Baſſa now perceiuing the Hungarians to haue the better, both in the wings and in the main battell, & yet in hope that with long fight they would faint (although he ſaw great ſlaughter of his men in euery place) came on with the rereward, & a number of other freſh ſoldiers which he had left for the guarding of his baggage, al yet ſound men, in good hope ſo to ouerwhelme the wearied Hungarians. It was now foure houres that this cruell fight had endured, when as the Baſſa beganne it afreſh: neither was this by him don without reaſon; for why, he was afraid leſt if his men ſhould turn their backs and flie, the whole armie ſhould follow after: and therefore to make vſe of all the men he had, he brought on his rereward, in hope that his enemies, now ſpent with long fight, would not longer endure a freſh charge. And the more to encourage his men, he commanded them to compaſſe in the Hungarians round, and to diſpatch their wearied enemies, vainly boaſting, That it would be the laſt battel that euer the Hungarians would fight. On the other ſide, Hunaides perceiuing the enemies purpoſe, ſuffered his men to be in part enuironed, and by and by cauſed the waggoners with the armed carts & waggons to thruſt in behind them, and ſo to compaſſe them in, diuided in part from the reſt, & afterward with freſh ſupplies renewed the battel with the enemy. The fight was great, and in euery place right terrible: and albeit that the ſlaughter of the Turkes was in many places great, yet by reaſon of their multitude they felt it not much, but fought yet ſtill moſt deſperatly: vntil that they in the right wing ſeeing themſelues compaſſed in behind with the waggons, & ſo from them charged with ſhot, darts, & other ſuch miſſiue weapons; ſtanding in doubt which way to turn themſelues, & beſet with danger on euery ſide, began to faint, and fearing the danger behind them, ſhrunke from the fight. On the other ſide, the Hungarians, now in good hope of victorie, with great & cheerful outcries, as men inſpired with freſh ſpirits, more furiouſly aſſailed their fainting enemies afront, than before; encouraging them alſo that aſſailed them behind in the waggons, to approch them neerer: with which double danger the turks hardly beſet, fought diſorderly, & doubting to be all incloſed round, firſt retired, & preſently after betooke themſelues to plain flight. But they which were already ſhut in betwixt the waggons & them that fought before them, periſhed euery mothers ſon. They which fought in the left wing alſo, diſcouraged with the flight of their fellows, fled likewiſe: after whom the Hungarians fiercely followed. The Baſſa himſelfe ſeeing both the wings of his battel put to flight, & his own battel ſore broken alſo, ſtruken with deſpaire fled, with certain companies of the Ianizaries, which he had ſtil kept about him againſt all euents, for the ſafegard of his perſon: after whom followed alſo ſo many other of the Turks as could; the reſt diſperſedly flying thorow the woods, foreſts, & mountains, either there periſhed with hunger, or falling into the hands of the Valachians, were by them ſlaine. Of ſo great an armie as the Baſſa brought into Tranſiluania, ſcarce the one halfe returned again ouer Danubius. It is reported by ſome that were in that battell, that if Hunaides hauing them in chace, had purſued them to Danubius, ſcarcely one of them had eſcaped ouer the riuer. But he contented with ſo great a victory, & to haue driuen his enemies out of the field, purſued them not far: but entring into their camp, with the ſpoile therof greatly inricht both himſelf & his ſoldiers. Beſide the great multitude of the Turks here ſlain, 5000 more were taken priſoners, & 100 of their enſignes.

The Turks flie.

ſignes. Long it were to rehearſe and reckon vp the rich ſpoile there taken, the guilt armor, and goodly furniture, both of men and horſes, beſide the rich pauilions and tents there ſtanding. In briefe, the wealth there found, was ſo great, as that there was no man in Huniades armie, which was not thereby for euer inriched. Huniades for this ſo great a victory, & for his country, deliuered from ſo great a feare, cauſed general praiers with thankſgiuing, for the ſpace of three dayes, to be made in all churches of thoſe three prouinces, vnto whom that danger was threatned; and at Vaſcape, where the battel was fought, hanged vp certaine of the Turkes enſignes, as trophies of the victorie there gotten. This was the famous battle of Vaſcape, wherein Huniades got the greateſt victory that euer any Chriſtian Prince before that time obtained againſt the Turkiſh Kings. The fields thereabouts lay couered with the dead bodies of the ſlain Turks, whoſe carrion carkaſſes ſo infected the aire, that many of the better ſort of the inhabitants of the country were glad for a ſeaſon to leaue their dwellings, & to get them further off, for feare of infection. Afterwards he in great triumph came to Buda, & there preſented to King Vladiſlaus the enemies enſignes, with ſuch a part of the ſpoile, as might both wel declare the greatneſſe of the victorie, and beſeeme the greatneſſe of ſo great a Prince; which the king thankefully receiued, highly commending his great valour, the fame whereof had in ſhort time filled euery corner of Europe.

Amurath, a little before this great ouerthrow of his army in Tranſyluania, aſſuring himſelf of the victory, had ſent a proud embaſſage to King Vladiſlaus into Hungarie, offring him peace vpon condition, That he ſhould deliuer vnto him the ſtrong city of Belgrade, or elſe yeeld to pay him a yerely tribute: to which, vpon the firſt report of the victorie, anſwer was giuen by the king, anſwerable to the proud demand, That according to the iſſue of matters in Tranſiluania, he would ſhortly in perſon himſelfe come & giue him farther anſwer. With which ſhort anſwer, the proud embaſſadours were diſmiſſed and gone, a little before the comming of Huniades to Buda.

How much this late ouerthrow grieued the great king Amurath, Vladiſlaus was not ignorant; either of his power and deſire of reuenge, as ſufficiently warned thereof by the worthie Huniades: for the withſtanding wherof, he thought it good not to be vnprouided. Wherfore calling together the ſtates of his kingdome, and with them Iulian the Cardinall of S. Angel, the Popes Legat; at ſuch time as they were all aſſembled, he propounded vnto them the greatneſſe of the danger threatned by the angrie Turke, leauing vnto their graue conſideration, to determine how the ſame were by ſtrong hand and plaine force, or otherwiſe to be auerted. In which moſt honorably aſſemblie, Iulian the Cardinall, of purpoſe ſent thither by Pope Vrban to ſtir vp the Hungarians againſt the Turks, being requeſted by the King to deliuer his opinion firſt, ſpake vnto them as followeth:

The effectuall ſpeech of Iulian the Popes Legat in the parlament to perſuade the war.

Since the time that the Turkiſh peſtilence began to rage in Europe, no newes was euer more welcome vnto the great Biſhop, vnto the Apoſtolicall Senate, and other Princes of Italie (moſt mightie King, and you other moſt worthie Princes) than when it was told them, That Vladiſlaus, King of Polonia, was by you alſo choſen King of Hungarie. For a fitter gouernour of the Hungarian ſtate, and leader of their power, could not the Hungarians any where haue found: As he in whome Iuſtice, religion, wiſedome, valour, and martiall skill, doth ſo abound, that he ſeemeth rather for the good of this kingdome by God ſent from heauen, than here in earth choſen by men. By this happie & fortunat choice, the minds alſo of all the Italians, which before lay heauie and diſcouraged, were lightned and reuiued: and therefore that this choice might be vnto the Chriſtian common-weale both glorious and fortunate, they made their ſolemne vowes and praiers. At ſuch time as the moſt holy Senate vnderſtood of the ciuill diſcord of this kingdome, and the danger of the Turks faſt by, it ſent mee hither to deale with you for the appeaſing of thoſe troubles, and repreſſing of that miſchiefe (as you haue oftentimes heard mee ſay.) The kingdome is by your force and valour, by my mediation, and the death of the Queene, wel pacified: but yet the other remaineth full of honour, full of profit, full of ſafetie, glorie, and immortalitie, beſt fitting Vladiſlaus conduct and fortune, and the valour of the Hungarians. The Turkiſh tyrannie and their proud command (worthie Princes) is to bee repreſſed: yea their ſeruile yoke, hanging euen now ouer our necks, is to be ſhaken off, and to be driuen away. What you are to dare to doe, the valour and fortune of Huniades, foretelleth you: the fortune ſaid I of Huniades, nay the fortune of the Chriſtian common-weale, and preſent mercie of our bleſſed Sauiour, which ſuffereth his people to be vp and downe toſſed, but not quite drowned. If ſo great an armie of the enemies was vanquiſhed and put to flight by the power of one of thy captaines, and that but ſmall: what is to be hoped of thee (moſt mightie King) if thou ſhalt lead forth thine armies thy ſelfe in perſon, vnder thine owne conduct, and the protection of Christ Ieſus? The eyes of all Chriſtian Princes are caſt vpon thee, vpon the Hungarian and Polonian forces; vpon thee haue they repoſed all their hopes, they all expect that thou ſhoulaſt be the reuenger of the Barbarian crueltie, the defender of the faith, and protector of Europe: and that is it, for which the Pope doth with his letters daily ſolicite and importune you. And albeit, that the common cauſe and quarrell of the Chriſtian religion require it, yet doth the neceſſitie of Hungarie and Polonia no leſſe enforce it: of which, the one is moſt miſerably and daily vexed with the Turks forces and furie out of Seruia and Dalmatia; and the other out of Moldania and Valachia. Now if any there be, whom neither the zeale of religion, the neceſſitie of the cauſe, the hope of immortall fame and glorie, can moue, let their owne ſafetie, the preſent ſeruitude of their wiues and children, the ſafegard of their wealth and ſubſtance, the lawful reuenge of the wrongs don them, ſtir them vp to take in hand this ſacred expedition. So fit an opportunitie is now giuen vnto you, that at one and the ſelfeſame time you may ſet your bodies in perpetuall ſafetie and happineſſe; your ſoules in quietneſſe and reſt, and vnto both giue eternall glory and happineſſe. You lacke not (worthy captaines) money, the ſinewes of the warre, which ſhall be brought vnto you from all parts of the Chriſtian common-wealth, not luſtie and couragious ſouldiers; not policie, not fortune, not the propitious heauenly powers, which haue made choice of you for the defence of the true faith and religion: you want nothing (worthie Princes) but Will. It is an expedition neceſſarie, religious, profitable, and honourable: wherein are propounded moſt ample rewards both in this life, and in the life to come. Wherefore (moſt mightie Prince, and your right worthy Princes all) I pray and beſeech you by the faith of Chriſt Ieſus, by the loue of your children, by the health of your kingdome, and deliuerance from your preſent deſtruction, with valiant courage & one conſent to take this ſacred war in hand, and ſo thereby to enroll your names in the eternall booke of Fame. And ſith that you are to goe, not ſo much to a worldly as a ſpirituall warre; againſt the enemies of Chriſt and his truth, take vp your armes with ſuch zeale, courage, and cheerfulneſſe, as the expectation and hope of men, as your valor, the preſent danger, and the mercies of God towards you ſeeme of right to require.

The pitifull complaint of the Deſpot, of the crueltie of the Turks, perſuading the Hungarians to take the war againſt them in hand.

The Legate hauing made an end, forthwith enſued the miſerable ſupplication and teares of the Deſpot; perſuading them, of the neceſſitie of that expedition to be taken in hand, declaring vnto them the crueltie of the Turks, their torments and ſtrange tortures, his ſonnes depriued of their ſight, and ſpoiled of their genitoires, many halfe mangled, and moe cut in ſunder with ſawes; ſome flaine quicke, and others buried aliue, with many other ſtrange kindes of death, ſuch as would abhorre any Chriſtian eares to heare. And warning the Hungarians, by his example to beware how much they had need to looke to themſelues, told them, That they were but by the riuer Savus diuided from the Turks; which in ſummer was oftentimes to be waded ouer, and in Winter hard frozen, & ſo to be paſſed: that the country beyond Danubius lay all open vpon them; and that hee, ſometime the rich King of Seruia, was now driuen into exile by the power of the Turke, depriued of his kingdom, of his children, ſhamefully diſgraced, ſpoiled of his wealth and fortune, glad to flie from place to place, and yet not able to finde any ſafe place to reſt in. Firſt he fled (as hee ſaid) to Raguſium, where by and by he was ſought after, and endangered by the Turks: then into Hungarie, which was alſo forthwith by them on euery ſide infeſted: and whereof the Barbarian King now asked tribute, to haue ſome colour for the inuaſion thereof: which dreadfull enemy was not farre off from it, but ſtill houered euen ouer it: as well witneſſed Valachia and Tranſyluania, two of the greateſt and richeſt prouinces of the Hungarian kingdome: which had not the valour of Hunides, the fortune of the common-weale, and aboue all, the mercy of God, deliuered out of the hands of this filthie Nation, the ſtate of Hungarie had now beene vtterly forlorne. The euents of warre (hee ſaid) were diuers, fortune vncertaine, and that God would not euery day bee tempted. Wherefore with many teares abundantly running downe his aged face, he beſought King Vladiſlaus and the reſt, not to let ſlip this faire occaſion, neither by cowardiſe or negligence to breake off the courſe of their good fortune and victorie: but to make choice rather to become reuengers of other mens harmes, than of their owne, and to ſatisfie the good opinion the world had conceiued of them. He was (as he ſaid) a ſufficient example to al men. Beſides that, he offered a great ſumme of money himſelfe towards the defraying of the charges of the war, aſſuring them alſo of great ſupplies both of men and mony from diuers other

A Chriſtian Princes. Which opinion of the Legat and Deſpots being generally liked & approued, a decree was made by a whole court of Parlament there aſſembled, That the king ſhould himſelfe in perſon, with al ſpeed poſſible entertain that honorable war. So that though it were now vpon the approch of winter, yet were men taken vp in euery place, and embaſſadors ſent vnto the Emperour and the other neighbour Princes, to pray of them aid againſt the common enemie. Who for the moſt part excuſed themſelues by their own particular affaires, but ſent no aid at all. Neuertheleſſe many deuout Chriſtians both out of France and Germanie, for the zeale they bare vnto Chriſt and the Chriſtian religion, forſaking wife and children, and whatſoeuer they had elſe, came and worthily ſerued vpon their owne charge. The Spring being come, and ſupplications made in all places, for the proſperous ſucceſſe of this religious war, King Vladiſlaus the firſt of May ſet forward from Buda; where paſſing the riuer Danubius, and B marching faire and ſoftly, & comming to the riuer Tibiſcus, he there ſtayed three days for the comming of his armie. Departing thence, and marching on alongſt the ſide of Danubius, vntil he came within the ſight of Bulgaria, he there at a place called Cobis, ouer againſt Sinderouia, paſſed ouer Danubius with his army, which was now grown very great: and ſo marched directly to Sophia, ſcituate about ſix dayes march from Danubius, in the frontiers of Bulgaria, ſo called of a moſt ſumptuous and magnificent temple there built by Iuſtinian the great emperor. Which citie being then old and ruinous, & but badly fortified, was eaſily taken; and afterward for that it was not well to be holden, was by the Kings commandement burnt, as were all the other country towns and villages thereabouts, to the terror of the reſt. Marching thence, he came vnto the riuer Moraua, and there incamped: where the plain country eaſily riſeth & falC leth in manner of the ſea, when it is moued with a little wind. Here 500 horſemen being ſent ouer the riuer, not ſo much to ſeeke after prey, as to view the countrey, which way the armie might moſt ſafely and eaſily paſſe, hapned vpon the Turks ſcouts, of whom they tooke foure: and vnderſtanding by them, that 2000 of the Turks were comming at hand, knowing themſelues too weake to encounter them, they retyred backe again with all ſpeed they could, vnto the riuer; where many of them for feare leapt headlong from the high and broken banks, and ſo periſhed in the deepe; the reſt terrified with the misfortune of their fellowes, ſtood ſtill, doubtfully expecting what ſhould become of themſelues. Beyond the riuer was another hil, vpon the top whereof the King with a great number of horſemen were hunting: whome the Turks a far off deſcrying, and doubtful to fall into ſome ambuſh, of purpoſe layd for them beD twixt them & the riuer, without comming on further, retyred. Which they that before fearefully ſtayd on the further ſide of the riuer, perceiuing, and now encouraged by the comming of the King downe to the riuer, followed a while after, ſo to increaſe their feare; and ſo hauing well feared one another, retired on both ſides worſe affraid than hurt. The next day the King paſſed ouer the riuer, ſending out his ſcouts to ſee if all were cleere before him: by whom he was aduertiſed, that the Turks were at hand, hauing placed certain ambuſhes faſt by, expecting but a fit time to ſet vpon him. Whereupon entring into councell with his beſt and moſt expert captains, what were beſt to be done, it was reſolued vpon, That Huniades the next ght with 10000 choice horſemen, ſhould vpon the ſudden ſet vpon the enemie, then fea- g nothing leſſe. Who conducted by the eſpials, was in the firſt watch of the night brought rie neere vnto them. The Moone by chance, as fauouring his great attempt, did then ſhine t, ſo that he might wil diſcerne how the enemie lay incamped, & which way for to charge m for his beſt aduantage; which was by the ſame way they were moſt like to flie, if they uld be put to the worſt: vnto which place he led his men, and there with a moſt hideous crie entred the campe, as then for the moſt part buried in ſleepe and ſecuritie: when as Turks awaked with the ſudden noyſe, as it were out of a dead ſleepe, and diſmayed with horror of the crie, began to betake them ſome to their weapons, ſome to their heeles. Of hom ſuch as fled, lighting vpon the enemies troups ſtanding in their way, ranne as faſt backe ain: the other ſcarce yet well awake, and ouercome with feare, & now ſcarcely themſelues, d much adoo to make themſelues readie to fight. Huniades in the mean time riding vp and wne amongſt his men, cheered them vp, ſtill crying out and calling vpon them, couragiou- to aſſaile their ſleepie, naked, and fearefull enemies, and not to let ſlip ſo faire an occaſion, d ſo notable a victorie now alreadie in their hands. At the firſt encounter the Turkes raer made a ſtirre, than fought; but after that they heard that Huniades was there, as men diſmaied with his name, they turned their backs and fled, finding, which way ſoeuer they tooke, their fellows halfe dead or wounded: yea, ſuch a confuſion was raiſed amongſt them with the greatneſſe of the ſudden feare, that thruſting together, with an inconſiderate deſire of flight, they trod one another vnder foot, & thruſt themſelues one vpon anothers weapons: the greateſt part of them driuen headlong into the thickets and other ſtraits, & not able in time to get out thence, were there by the victorious enemie, fiercely purſuing of them, ſlain. Al that night the fearefull Turks were with great ſlaughter held in chace: but as ſoon as it was day, the reſt that remained of them, ran alſo the ſame fortune with their fellowes. A far greater ſlaughter was there made, than a man would thinke that ſo few men could haue made, when as but with 10000 horſe, 30000 Turks were in one night ſlain, and 4000 taken, with a number of their enſignes. Of Huniades his men were not many loſt, for the greatneſſe of the ſlaughter: moſt report not aboue 500, for few of them found any enemie to reſiſt them. There was taken all the ſpoile of a moſt rich campe, the enemie hauing carried with them nothing out of it. Huniades hauing in ſo ſhort time gained ſo notable a victorie, and inriched his army, returned to the king in great triumph: neither was that day more joyfull vnto theſe victorious ſouldiers, than vnto the reſt of the armie, who moſt joyfully expected their returne. The King and the Deſpot hearing of the approch of Huniades from the ſlaughter of the Turks, with the great applauſe and joyful acclamation of the other legions, went to meet him three miles: and at ſuch time as at their firſt meeting Huniades was about to haue lighted to haue done him honour, he would in no caſe ſuffer him ſo to do, but taking him by the right hand, joyed with him for the victory, thanking God in the hearing of the whole armie, that he of his mercie had giuen him ſuch a Captaine, as, without enuie, in all mens iudgments was worthie to rule the Roman empire. In briefe, he ſhewed how much his country, his kingdome, yea the Chriſtian commonweale, was bound and indebted vnto him, gaue him his due praiſes, exhorting all others to imitate his glorie: the like honour did alſo all the reſt of the nobilitie vnto him. As for the common ſoldiers, they could not be ſatisfied with beholding of him, but imbracing one another, as if they would haue died one in anothers arms, welcommed their victorious friends. So with joy joyning their forces together, & ſending the rich ſpoile of the enemy, with the priſoners chained together in long ranks before them; the King and Huniades in great triumph returned into the campe, where they cauſed generall prayers, with thankſgiuing vnto almighty God for ſo great a victorie, to be made thorowout the armie.

The meeting of Vladiſlaus and Huniades after the victorie.

The Legat Iulian, Generall of the voluntarie Chriſtians, which for deuotion ſake ſerued of their own charge, after ſo great a victorie moſt earneſtly perſuaded the King and the reſt of the great commanders of the armie, to proſecute their good fortune, and in God his ſo great fauor not to loiter, but daily to march forward, and to take in the reſt of Bulgaria. Now had Huniades by his eſpials learned, that from Sophia it was but three days journey to Philippopolis, a great citie of Thracia; and the like diſtance from thence to Hadrianople, the chiefe ſeat of the Turkiſh tyrant; and as much more to Conſtantinople. The onely difficultie was, how to paſſe the great and rough mountain Hemus; which running a maruellous way in length, euen vnto the Euxine ſea, and mating almoſt the skie, diuideth the countries of Bulgaria and Seruia, from Macedonia and Thrace: and for the great height and roughneſſe therof, is not to be paſſed ouer but in two places; the one made by the great Emperor Traian & the Romans, where as yet is to be ſeen a mightie ſtrong gate built of great ſquare ſtone, whereby the paſſage that way was opened or ſhut at the pleaſure of them that had the keeping thereof: the other neere vnto a little riuer, which the Bulgarians now call Saltiza. By either of theſe ways, if he ſhould find them open, Huniades, vnto whom the King had committed both the leading and the conduct of the armie, purpoſed to enter. Wherefore marching forward, they tooke al ſuch towns of Bulgaria as ſtood in their way; ſome by force, ſome by compoſition: wherein was no ſmall helpe, the conformitie of the Chriſtian religion, the horrible crueltie of the Turks, the great affinitie of language, the moſt effectuall means to win the loue of ſtrangers: for the Polonians and the Bulgarians both diſcended of the Sclauonians, and vſing the ſame language, the Polonian horſemen came to no town, but it preſently yeelded. But being come vnto the mountain Hemus, to haue entred into Thracia, the Winter weather being now verie cold; they learned by their eſpials, that the aforeſaid paſſages were both faſt ſhut vp with great ſtones, timber, and ſuch other like matter, ſo ſtrongly, as that they were verie hardly to be forced. Wherfore Huniades niades leauing the ſtraiter way made by the hand of man (which beſide the former fortification at the great gate, the Turks had in many places, with abundance of water poured downe the ſteep hil in the night, and hard frozen with the coldneſſe of the weather, made ſo ſlippery, as that it was not poſſible either for man or beaſt there to ſtand, or to get vp that way) vpon Chriſtmas euen came to the other, by which the riuer Saltiza runnes, the which he found likewiſe ſhut. Here they met with many inconueniences: firſt, the difficultie of the paſſage, which old Amurath had (not without great reaſon) ſhut vp, & there placed ſtrong garriſons, ſo at eaſe, and without danger of battel (ſo often by his Baſſa's vnfortunatly proued) to defend his kingdome in Macedonia and Thracia, from the inuaſion of the Hungarians, who now of all nations he moſt dreaded. Beſide that, in the armie was ſuch want of all things, as that the ſoldiers were readie to forſake their enſignes, and to riſe vp in a general mutinie: for the country neere vnto the mountain Hemus, riſing high, with broken rocks, and inacceſſible places, was altogether barren; and victuals failing in the camp, they were glad to liue with a little wheat & fleſh boiled together, and that ſo ſparingly, as that the ſouldiers began now generally to grow weake and faint. Beſides that, the Winter was exceeding cold, and the froſt ſo great, that many times they could not go out of their tents to ſeeke for forrage or water. So that the armie enforced with hunger and cold, and the difficultie of the paſſage, began to retire, and had vndoubtedly bin diſſolued, had it not bin for the often and earneſt perſuaſions of Huniades: for he daily told them, that the greateſt difficulties were paſt, that that which remained, was with their wonted valour and courage to be indured, whereunto nothing was high or difficult: that they ſhould forthwith come into the borders of Thracia, where they ſhould find plentie of all things: that they were now come ſo far, that if they would go back again, they ſhould in thoſe waſt countries through which they were to paſſe, find greater difficulties & dangers, than in going forward: that theſe ſtraits once opened, remained no more trauell, but cheerefully to fal to the ſpoile of a moſt rich and pleaſant country. They were not (as he ſaid) to ſtay in the midſt of their fortunes, for that it was not always permanent, and for that the contempt of Gods fauors cauſed them to be oftentimes taken from vs: al that was yet done (he ſaid) was nothing, if they proceeded not further: for that whatſoeuer they had already woon, was eaſily by the enemy to be recouered, except that thoſe which yet remained (for that moſt part of them, as he ſaid, were ſlain, with their houſes burnt ouer their heads) were driuen out of Thracia and Macedonia, and ſo quite out of Europe. So whileſt the ſoldiers heard Huniades ſpeake, euery man was wel incouraged; but when they remembred the miſeries wherwith they were inuironed, they curſed all the raſh attempts of ambitious princes. In the mean time news was brought by the ſcouts, that the Turks were comming after them: but then began they to rejoyce, as deeming it much more honor, manfully to die in battell, than to ſtarue with hunger and cold. Againſt theſe Turks was Huniades ſent with certain troups of horſemen: who incountring with them, eaſily inforced them with loſſe to retire. Eight times he incountred them (as the ſoldiers there preſent reported) & as often put them to flight. In retiring back from the impregnable mountain, the king with the greateſt part of the armie went before; after whom followed Huniades and the Deſpot, a good days march: when the Turks that kept the paſſage vpon the mountain, vnderſtanding of their return, followed them down the hill, in good hope to be of them well reuenged, before they ſhould get out of Bulgaria. Carambey the Baſſa of Romania, & brother to Caly-Baſſa (a man of all others in greateſt fauor with Amurath, and his brother in law, as hauing married his ſiſter) was General of this army, & by him appointed for the keeping of theſe ſtraits; with expreſſe charge, vpon no occaſion whatſoeuer, although it made ſhew of neuer ſo aſſured a victorie, to fight with the enemie: for he thought it victorie enough, without any loſſe to haue kept his enemies out of Thracia. Which the old Kings command, Carambey for all that neglected, in good hope by a notable victory eaſily to anſwer the contempt of that he was commanded. The Chriſtian armie deſcending down the broken mountains, was come to great mountain, which the Bulgarians call Cunobiza, and part of the mountain Hemus: at whoſe heeles followed Carambey, with his Turks, ſtill houering ouer their heads, to take them ſome aduantage: whom the Chriſtians beholding, could not by their captains be ſtayd, but that they would many times by companies flie forth vpon them, and deſperately fight with them in places of great aduantage, ſaying, That they had rather die in fight like men, than to ſtarue with hunger and cold. Here Carambey, being himſelfe a man of great courage, and deſirous of honor, and by the raſhneſſe of his enemies allured to fight; and withall, beſide the aduantage of the ground, perceiuing himſelfe to exceed his enemies both in ſtrength & number of men, could not be ſtayd, but would needs giue battell, with ſuch a deſire, as if he had bin already aſſured of the victorie. Huniades and the Deſpot had before perceiued, that the Turks, prouoked with the brauing of their men, would aſſuredly fall vpon them, and were therefore much troubled with the abſence of the King, who (as is before ſaid) was gone a days march before they ſaw they could neither ſhun battel, neither if they could haue ſo done, would their deſperat ſouldiers be ſtayed, for the deſire they had to fight. Yet ſeeing Carambey comming down vpon them, they put themſelues (though vnwillingly) in beſt order they could to receiue him, perſuading their ſoldiers not raſhly in furie to run vpon their enemies, as deſperate men prodigall of their liues, but to keepe their rankes, and orderly to fight, and ſo like valiant men to carrie away the victorie, or to leaue vnto their enemies a bloudy remembrance thereof. Now had Carambey ſent his horſmen down the hil, and the battel was begun, where both the armies met together with great furie, and a cruel fight was made both at the foot of the hil, and amongſt the hils and vallies alſo: in which hard incounter many were ſlain, as well on the one ſide as the other. The Polonian men at arms (whom the king but a little before had left with Huniades againſt all euents) with the Hungarian light horſemen (of whom the Deſpot had the leading) fought ſo that day, as if they had fought for nothing more, but how honourably to die; & the Turks for a ſpace ſtood hard to it, ſo that many were there ſlain: yet at length finding themſelues hardly layd to, as by deſperat men, reſolued to ſel their liues deere, they began to faint & to giue ground: when as Carambey comming in behind them with new ſupplies, rated the cowardly, ſtayd them that were flying, and ſomtime with rough ſpeeches, ſometime with faire perſuaſion, incouraged the wauering, and reſtored the battell, before almoſt quite loſt. Neither did Huniades and the Deſpot leſſe beſtir them, but as ſoon as they perceiued the enemie a little to faint, by and by cried out, Victorie; with cheerful ſpeech incouraging their men, ſtil calling vpon them, To keepe their ranks ſtrong, and to vrge their preſent good fortune, aſſuring themſelues, that they fought againſt thoſe infidels vnder the fauor & protection of the Almighty: and forthwith ſent certain companies of footmen, who climbing vp the hil among the buſhes, with their halfe pikes & boare-ſpears panched the Turks horſes as they paſſed by them. Theſe looſe companies did the Turks horſemen much harm, and here began their battel to decline; they which were comming down, for feare of the danger retyring back again vnto them that were left aboue for the keeping of the ſtraits: and the bolder ſort of them, which were come down into the vallies, compaſſed about with the men at armes, hardly recouered the riſing of the hill. Carambey in the mean time crying out behind them, one while called back them that fled, another while relieued them that fainted, and to the vttermoſt of his power reſtoring the battell, performed all the parts both of a valiant ſouldier & worthy captaine, couragiouſly fighting himſelfe in the thickeſt of his enemies, and by his own valor ſtaied for a time the loſt battel. At length performing his laſt indeauor, deceiued by the ſnow, he fel into a bog, where ſticking faſt with his horſe, and not able to helpe himſelfe, he was taken priſoner by a common ſoldier. The reſt that eſcaped out of this bloudie battel, retired themſelues vnto them that were left aboue vpon the mountain, for the defence of the paſſage. After whom the Chriſtians followed, through the vntract and rough places, vntill that hindered of their further purſuit by the approch of the night, and the abruptneſſe of the way, they were glad to ſound a retrait, and ſo retyred vnto the campe. Many other great men were taken beſide Carambey, but many moe ſlaine in the battell, and moſt of all in the flight; few eſcaped, but ſuch as fled backe againe vp into the mountaines. In the retrait, Huniades ſeeing ſo gallant a man as was Carambey (though to him altogether vnknown) vnworthily bound, and led priſoner by a common ſoldier, asked the ſouldier, if he would ſell his priſoner? who ſayd, he would; and asked for him ten duckats, (a poore price for ſo great a man:) vnto whom Huniades commanded to be giuen foure hundred, and ſo ſent him vnto his tent, comforting of him vp with cheerefull words, and willing that he ſhould be well vſed. The Deſpot the ſame night comming to Huniades his tent, to confer with him about the remainder of the war, and ſeeing ſo braue a man ſtanding among the reſt by the fire ſide, began to talke with him in the Turkiſh language, whereof he had ſome knowledge, by reaſon of the neereneſſe of the Nation, and ſuch matters as he had ſometime to do with them; and hauing ſome geſſe by his talke, what he was,and pittying his eſtate,asked Huniades,how he would ranſome him? who ſaid,that he coſt him foure hundred duckats,but that he valued him at forty thouſand; which the Deſpot offered to pay him. Thus by the ſtrange change of fortune, was Carambey, of late ſo great a commander,and ſo neere allied vnto the great Turke,valued & prized twice in one day by his enemies,as a mirror of the vncertaintie of worldly bliſſe and felicitie. The Polonians report ſomewhat otherwiſe of this battell; as that Vladiſlaus ſhould himſelfe therein be preſent,and the chiefe that therein commanded: howbeit the Hungarian writers,whoſe credit herein we follow,report it as before,not to haue been fought vnder the good fortune of the King then abſent,but vnder the leading of Huniades and the Deſpot.

Scanderbeg reuolteth from the Turks.

Out of this bettell (or as ſome others report,a little before, out of the battell of Moraua) fled the great captaine George Caſtriot, otherwiſe of the Turks called Scanderbeg, now ſeeking to deliuer both himſelfe,and his natiue country of Epirus,out of the thraldome of the Turks, as preſently after he did: whoſe vnwoonted flight not a little terrified the reſt of the Turkes armie,and much furthered the Chriſtians victorie,whoſe proceedings he alwayes ſecretly fauored; hauing (as it was thought) ſecret intelligence with the great captaine Huniades, who not without inſtructions from him (as ſome ſay) gaue that great ouerthrow vnto the Turks at Morau. But of him and his worthie acts done for the deliuerance and defence of his countrey, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

Shortly after this great ouerthrow and diſcomfiture of the Turks, the two great captains, Huniades & the Deſpot,together with the King,conſulted for the remouing of the Turks gariſons,left aboue for the keeping of the ſtrait paſſages of the mountain, & the proſecution of the war. Which Vladiſlaus(conſidering the difficultie of the matter,and his ſoldiers neceſſitie) thought it not good further to proſecute,but forthwith to return. But Huniades & the Deſpot, the one thirſting after honour,and the other in no leſſe hope,by the good ſucceſſe of this war, to recouer again his loſt kingdome,ſaid, That the Turks were in any caſe to be remoued, the paſſage opened,& the ſparks that yet remained,for feare of raiſing a greater fire,extinguiſhed: oppoſing againſt the difficultie by the king alledged, the inuincible courage of his ſouldiers, whereunto(they ſaid)nothing was impoſſible or difficult. To which opinion the king alſo(leſt he ſhould ſeem to diſtruſt the valor of his captains or ſoldiers) eaſily yeelded, & ſo commanded on Gods name to ſet forward. The firſt that mounted the hil was the kings battel,which by the roughneſſe and abruptneſſe of the mountain hindered, oftentimes ſtayd. But Huniades ſtill carried with an earneſt deſire to proſecute the victorie, and leauing nothing vnattempted, in ſearching about found a crooked turning way,whereby he with his men,more eaſily & readily got vp to the top of the mountain,euen with their enemies, vndeſcried or moleſted, by reaſon of the broken couert of the place: from whence they were in good hope eaſily to haue come vnto their enemies. But being come vp to the place they deſired,they found ſuch a deep and wide gaping of the rocke betwixt them and the enemie,as was neither to be paſſed, or filled vp: yet being come verie neere,they attempted by croſſebow ſhot,& great ſtones caſt out of ſlings, and other ſuch engins, to haue remooued the Turkes from their places: who were therewith,and with their vnexpected approch,at the firſt ſo greatly both annoyed and diſcomfited,that they were almoſt at the point to haue forſaken the paſſage, had not Alis Beg (but the night before choſen for their General inſtead of Carambey) incouraged them and taught them how by ſhrouding themſelues vnder the broken rocks,& parapets with tumultuary labor caſt vp,to ſaue themſelues from the ſhot of their enemies. In the mean time alſo Huniades,by another more high & ſteep way,whereby the enemie was alſo to be approched,had ſent vp other companies of ſoldiers,who fighting at too much diſaduantage, were by the Turks eaſily rejected. So at length,ſeeing the vain attempt giuen by himſelfe vpon the top of the hil; and the deſperat danger of the others in climebing the inacceſſible mountain, where one might keep down an hundred,deſpairing to inforce the enemy,he by the Kings command cauſed a retrait to be ſounded,and ſo againe retired down the mountain, to the great rejoycing of the Turks. The next day the winter cold raging,and wants in the armie ſtill more and more increaſing,the King with the reſt of the great commanders entred into conſultation for the haſtning of their returne out of that rough and barren countrey, into places of greater plentie, before the armie were brought into any greater extremitie. Whereunto Huniades (giuing place vnto neceſſitie, which always ſuffreth not to be regarded that is ſeemly)now eaſily yeelded: only the Deſpot

ſpake againſt it, blaming them, that hauing taken the Generall, and put their enemies to flight, and victorie now as it were in their hands, they would not proſecute the ſmall remainder of the war, but cowardly turn their backs vnto their vanquiſhed enemies: promiſing that he himſelfe would find mony enough for the prouiding of all things needful for the reliefe of the armie. So ſaid the Popes Legat alſo. But foraſmuch as the wants in the army were great, and the ſoldiers preſently pinched with hunger and cold, they could with no hope of any profit, were it neuer ſo great, be perſuaded to ſtay; openly crying out, that it was not their captaines and lieutenants, which wanted nothing, but them the poore ſoldiers that ſtarued for hunger: as for the Deſpot, that he in hope of recouering his kingdome, perſuaded things impoſſible, and no way to be performed; neither to be any thing mooued with the death of their men or cattel. Need (they ſaid) could not be vanquiſhed: but that when Winter was paſt, they would willingly returne again vnto the ſacred war. In the mean time, Winter raging, and hunger commanding, let vs giue ouer (ſaid they) and depart into more fruitfull places, there to refreſh our bodies, ſpent with labor, cold, and hunger. For which reaſons, the King ſending before his baggage, retyred again by the ſame way he came. Which the Turks from aboue beholding, and ſtrengthned with new ſupplies, followed after them, as after men that had fled: oftentimes aſſailing them in the rereward, and ſetting vpon them ſometimes on the one ſide, ſometimes on the other, with often ſkirmiſhes both did and receiued much harme. Whoſe manner of fight was, to retire when they were themſelues charged, and preſently by great troupes to charge again their enemies, their backs once turned to them; & ſo troubled the army, that it was conſtrained oftentimes to ſtay; beſides that, loded with the rich ſpoile of the enemie, and much baggage, it could not of it ſelfe make any great haſt. Now was it by the way come into a great thicke wood, full of deep bogs and water-courſes, hard to be paſſed thorow: where the reſt of the army going before, in the rereward, at the entrance of the wood were left certaine ſtrong companies of men at arms, as a wall againſt the purſuing enemie: whom the Turks with their readie light horſemen fiercely charged; where betwixt them, in the wood was fought a great fight, and a great tumult raiſed: vnto the noiſe wherof, they which marched before haſtily returning, in ſkirmiſhing, many of them fell into thoſe deepe bogs and queachie places, out of which they could hardly rid themſelues againe. Beſides that, there were many crooked and troubleſome turnings and windings, with ſudden deſcents, ſo ſteepe, as that in going down the ſame, their horſes came tumbling heeles ouer head, and there lay ouerthrown together with their riders: in ſuch ſort, as that to auoyd theſe difficulties, they were oftentimes inforced to fight on foot. In which troubleſome ſkirmiſh about foureſcore of the men at arms were loſt; but of the Turks, beſide them which were ſlain, were taken an hundred and ſeuenty, al whom Huniades cauſed to be preſently ſlaine. In this wood the Chriſtians were more troubled with the difficulties of the place, than the enemies aſſaults. Wherefore wants dayly more and more increaſing in the army, which by reaſon of the multitude of their carriages, abundance of their baggage, and often aſſaults of the Turks, was able to make no way; the King for feare his Armie ſhould in ſo long & ſlow a march thorow thoſe troubleſome & barren countries, be conſumed with hunger and other wants, cauſed all the carriages & baggage to be brought into the midſt of the army, and of it, all ſuch things as ſerued rather for burthen than vſe, to be there burnt; and the arms as wel of ſuch ſoldiers as he had there loſt, as of the enemy, to be buried in the ground; and all the weake beaſts that ſerued for burthen, to be killed. So the armie well diſcharged of ſuch vnprofitable burdens, marched much more ſpeedily, neither was ſo much ſubiect vnto the aſſaults of the Turks, as before. And ſo at length by long journies, Vladiſlaus with his army arriued at Belgrade, where he was of his ſubiects honorably receiued. And hauing there ſtayd certain days, & well refreſhed his armie, departing thence, & paſſing the riuer Sauus, came to the royal city Buda, where he was of al his ſubjects joyfully receiued alſo: the Legat and Huniades going on his right hand, and the Deſpot on the left: after whom followed other colonels, captains, and lieutenants, with their companies; who at the firſt meeting with the citiſens, more than a mile out of the citie, in token of their mutual joy, gaue together ſuch joyfull acclamations & outcries, as that the heauens ſeemed to reſound, and the earth to ſhake with the noyſe thereof. Before the King, at his comming vnto the Citie, went a long companie of the notable Turks Captiues; and next before him, Carambey, bound in chaines; vpon whom all mens eyes were fixed. With them were alſo carried the enemies enſignes, and ſuch Vladiſlaus honourably receiued at Buda.

A ſpoiles as had bin ſaued. Behind the King came Huniades in a triumphant robe, in the midſt betwixt the Legate on the right hand, and the Deſpot on the left, as he that next vnto the King had beſt deſerued the honor of the triumph. Next vnto them followed the deuout Chriſtians, that for the zeale of religion had moſt honorably of their owne charges voluntarie ſerued in thoſe wars: and on both ſides of them the ciuill magiſtrates and beſt of the citizens: behind them came the reſt of the legions, and about them both vpon the right hand and the left, the promiſcuous common people, doubling and redoubling the praiſes of the king, and Huniades. Before all theſe went the prelats and prieſts in ſolemne proceſſion, ſinging hymnes and pſalmes of thankſgiuing vnto almightie God. Vladiſlaus comming to the gate of the citie, acknowledging God to haue bin the author of ſo great a victorie, alighting from his horſe, on B foot went firſt vnto the cathedral church of our Lady; & there giuing moſt heartie thanks vnto almightie God, hanged vp the enemies enſignes, & part of the ſpoile, in perpetual remembrance of ſo notable a victory: which he afterward cauſed to bee moſt liuely depainted in a faire table of moſt curious worke, & there in the ſame church to be hanged vp; as were alſo the arms of al the notable Chriſtians that ſerued in that moſt famous expedition, which there long time after remained. Which ſolemnities ended, he went to his pallace in his caſtle, and there hauing giuen to euery man, but eſpecially to Huniades, his due commendation, gaue them leaue to depart. Thus the Hungarians, with whom alſo the Polonians in moſt part agree, report of this notable expedition of their king Vladiſlaus: howbeit the Turks (notable diſſemblers of their own loſſes) confeſſing the great ouerthrow, call the Baſſa ſo ouerthrowne, not by C the name of Carambey, but of Caſſanes; and the noble priſoner that was taken, by the name of Mechmet Beg, Sanzacke of Ancyra, Amurath his ſon in law, and brother to Cali-Baſſa, Amurath his great councellour, of ſome called Carambey after the name of his father.

Out of this late ſlaughter of the Turks, where Carambey was taken, ſcaped that valiant prince and famous warriour George Caſtriot (of the Turkes called Scanderbeg) as is before declared: whoſe noble minde had long time deſired to breake out of the golden fetters of the Turkiſh thraldom, & to be reuenged of the intollerable iniurie by Amurath don to his country, his parents, his brethren, & himſelf. Although he had always moſt warily diſſembled the ſame, for feare of the old tirant: being oftentimes ſolicited and animated therunto by ſecret letters and meſſengers from his friends in Epirus, knowing right wel that the leaſt fortune therof had bin vnto him preſent death. But finding no fit means for the accompliſhment thereof, wiſely diſ- D ſembled the ſame, with al the ſhews of loue and loyaltie to Amurath that might be: vntill that now in this great ouerthrow of the Turks army, vnder the leading of Carambey, and in ſo great a confuſion, he tooke occaſion to put in practiſe what he had long before in his deepe conceit plotted, for the deliuery both of himſelf & his country from the Turkiſh bondage and ſlauery. At which time Scanderbeg (for ſo from henceforth we cal him) hauing a little before imparted the matter vnto ſome of his truſtie friends and countrymen, no leſſe deſirous of libertie than himſelfe, but eſpecially vnto his nephew Ameſa, the ſon of his brother Repoſius, a yong man of great courage (in great confuſion of the Turkiſh armie, when euery man was glad to ſhift for himſelfe) had euer in his flight a vigilant eye vpon the Baſſaes principal ſecretarie; whom ac- E companied with a few Turks, he with his nephew Ameſa, & other of his faithful friends cloſely followed, as he fled from the ſlaughter: but when he had got the ſecretary with his few followers in place moſt conuenient for his purpoſe, he ſet vpon the Turks and ſlew them euerie one: and carrying the ſecretary away with him faſt bound, when he had brought him whither he thought good, with great threats compelled him (ſore againſt his will) to write counterfeit leters, as from the Baſſa his maſter, vnto the gouernor of Croia, commanding him in Amuraths name, Forthwith to deliuer vnto Scanderbeg, the new choſen Gouernor, the charge of the city with the garriſon there: cunningly enterlacing many other things in the ſame letters, wherby the matter might ſeem more probable. Which letters ſo extorted, he preſently ſlew the ſecretary, & as many more of the Turks as came in his way, of purpoſe that his doings might be F the longer kept from the knowledge of Amurath, who not hearing what was become of him, might reaſonably coniecture that he was ſlain by the Hungarians among the reſt of the Turks.

Scanderbeg wiſely diſſembleth his deſire for the deliuery of himſelfe and his country

Whileſt the fame of this great ouerthrow is going to Hadrianople, and there filleth the Turks court with ſorrow and heauineſſe, in the mean time Scanderbeg hauing with him three thouſand Epirot ſouldiers which followed him out of the battell, as men deſirous rather to ſight for the libertie of themſelues and of their country, than in the quarrell of the Turk, was G with incredible celeritie come into the vpper countrey of Dibra, in the borders of Epirus, about ſeuentie miles from Croia: into which country he was moſt ioyfully receiued, where he ſtaied but one day, and choſe a few of thoſe three hundred which he brought with him, to wait vpon him when hee went to Croia, as if they had bin his domeſticall ſeruants: the reſt, with other three hundred luſty ſoldiers, which were then come vnto him out of Dibra, he appointed to be led by ſecret by-waies thorow the woods and mountaines by perfect guides, vntill they came ſo nigh Croia as was poſſible for them to come, vnperceiued; and there to ſtay vntil he might find opportunity to conuey them into the city to oppreſſe the Turkiſh garriſon.

So he with a ſmal company of his followers, as if they had bin his priuat retinew, tooke the way towards Croia. But when he began to draw neere to the citie, he ſent Ameſa before H with two Seruitors attending vpon him, as if he had bin his Secretarie, to certifie the Gouernor of his comming. This yong gentleman, as he was of a moſt ſharpe wit, and well ſpoken, ſo had hee framed his countenance and attire, that he ſeemed to be a naturall Turke: who aſſoon as he was come into the citie, he went vnto the Gouernor, whom after he had ſaluted according to the Turkiſh manner, he deliuered his meſſage as from Scanderbeg his maſter, with ſo good grace, & words ſo wel placed, that al he ſaid was verily beleeued for truth. But when Scanrerbeg himſelfe came, and had deliuered the great commanders letters, the Gouernour made no further queſtion of the matter, but preſently deliuered vnto him the gouernment of the citie, and the next day departed out of Croia with all his houſhould towards Hadrianople.
Scanderbeg hauing by this policie got the gouernment of the chiefe citie of Epirus; the I night following found means in the dead time of the night, to receiue into the city the ſoldiers of Dibra, who were by this time come, according as he had before appointed: moſt part of them he placed in moſt conuenient places of the city, and for the ſpeedy ſuppreſſion of the Turkiſh garriſon, he with the reſt, firſt ſet vpon the Turks which kept the watch vpon the wal, and ſlew them; and afterwards breaking into their priuat houſes, ſlew many of them in their beds: the Chriſtian citizens alſo taking vp arms at the ſame time, helped to increaſe the ſlaughter of the Turkes, ſo that in the ſpace of a few houres, there was none of the Turkiſh garriſon left aliue, except ſome few, which were content to forſake their Mahometan ſuperſtition, and to become Chriſtians. Many of the Turks might ſo haue ſaued their liues, and would not, chuſing rather to die, and (as it is reported) alſo to kill themſelues, than to forſake their damnable K ſuperſtition: ſo ſmall is the regard of life vnto reſolute minds, in what quarrell ſoeuer.

The citie of Croia being thus happily by Scanderbeg recouered, wherin appeared both the greateſt difficulty, & hope of his good or bad ſucceſſe in ſo great an attempt, he preſently ſent Ameſa backe againe into Dibra, and other ſpeedie meſſengers likewiſe into all the parts of Epirus, to diſperſe the news, and to ſtir vp the people to take vp arms for the recouerie of their loſt libertie: but flying Fame, the ſpeedie poſt, had preuented the meſſengers by him ſent, and alreadie filled euery corner of Epirus with report of Scanderbeg his comming, and of all that was done at Croia. And the oppreſſed Epirots which had long wiſhed to ſee that happie day, were now vp in arms in euery place, wanting nothing but leaders, whoſe comming although they greatly deſired, yet they ſtaied not therupon, but running together by heaps (as the manner L of the common people is in all great tumults) they ſet vpon the Turkes garriſons which lay abroad in the countrey, and ſlew moſt part of them: whereby it came to paſſe, that no Turke could ſtirre in the country, but that he was ſnatched vp and ſlaine, ſo that in few dayes there was not a Turke to be found in Epirus, but ſuch as lay in garriſons in ſtrong townes. In this furie of the people, the gouernor of Croia, with all his retinue, was by the countrey people by the way as he went ſet vpon and ſlaine, and all his goods taken as a prey.

When Scanderbeg had thus recouered Croia, and ſcoured the countrey, yet to remooue the garriſons, which Amurath had put in euery ſtrong citie; was thought to be a matter of great importance, and more difficultie. For which purpoſe he commanded thoſe whom he had appointed for captaines, ſpeedily to repaire vnto Croia with all the power they could make. At M which time alſo, diuers noble men his nigh kinſmen, reſorted to him with their followers: ſo that within a few dayes, he had together at Croia twelue thouſand ſouldiers well appointed.
With this armie hee marched from Croia to Petrella, a ſtrong Citie 25 miles diſtant from Croia, and encamped before it. This citie is ſtrongly ſcituate vpon the top of a ſteepe rockie mountaine,

Scanderbeg commeth with his armie to Petrella.

A mountaine, as all the reſt of the cities of Epirus be, and was by the Turks well furniſhed with men, munition, and other things needfull; yet Scanderbeg was in good hope that the Turkiſh garriſon there, terrified with the fortune of the garriſon of Croia, and the ſlaughter of the Turkes in the countery round about, would be glad to hearken vnto reaſonable conditions.
Which to make prooſe of, aſſoone as he was encamped, he ſent one of thoſe ſouldiers which had followed him out of Hungarie (a faithful and wiſe fellow) vnto Petrella, to offer vnto the ſoldiers, That if they would yeeld vp the citie, it ſhould be at their choice, either to continue in ſeruice with Scanderbeg, with whom they ſhould find moſt bountifull entertainment, or elſe to depart in ſafety with bagge and baggage at their pleaſure, with an honorable reward to be diuided among them. The ſubtil meſſenger comming thither, and framing his tale according B to the preſent occaſion, and neceſſitie of the time, firſt declared vnto them, how that Amurath of late vanquiſhed by the Hungarians in a great battel, & looking euery day to be ſet vpon by diuers other Chriſtian princes, was ſo buſied that he had no leiſure to looke into Epirus, or to ſend them any reliefe; after that, he in the name of Scanderbeg offered them the conditions before rehearſed, ſetting the ſame forth with many great words; willing them oftentimes by the way, to conſider the dreadfull miſerie that but the other day befell to the garriſon at Croia, and other their fellows abroad in the country, whoſe dead bodies as then lay in euery corner of Epirus for a prey to the hungrie dogs and gredie wolues: which thing was eaſily beleeued of them of the garriſon, for that diuers of the Turks lately fled out of the country into the citie, had themſelues ſeene the ſame to be true. The Gouernor hauing a little conſidered of the matter, was content to giue vp the city, vpon condition that he with the ſoldiers might in ſafetie C depart with ſuch things as they had; not couenanting vpon any further reward, becauſe it ſhould not be ſaid that he had ſould the city. Which when Scanderbeg had faithfully promiſed to perform, the Turkiſh Gouernor comming forth with all his garriſon, yeelded vp the city: and Scanderbeg mindfull of his promiſe, gaue vnto them both meat and mony, and ſent them with a ſufficient conuoy of horſemen in ſafetie out of Epirus.

Petrella yeelded vnto Scanderbeg.

When Scanderbeg had thus gained Petrella, he placed therein a conuenient garriſon, and ſet all things in order as he thought good; but ſuffered none to enter into the city, more than the appointed garriſon, although it was then very cold and froſtie weather. This done, he preſently raiſed his campe, & following his good fortune, marched towards Petra-Alba in ſuch haſt, as if the citie had beene running away from him; well knowing, that though Time be euermore D precious, yet neuer more than in martiall affairs, wherein the leaſt moment is oftentimes of ſuch power as to effect or fruſtrat mens greateſt deſignes. Petra-Alba is a citie in the countrey of Æmathia, diſtant from Petrella three miles, ſtrongly ſcituat vpon the top of a mountaine, neere vnto the riuer Æmathus. Scanderbeg had ſcarcely well encamped himſelfe before this citie, but that the Gouernour thereof, terrified with the fortune of Croia, and Petrella, offered to deliuer vp the citie, on the ſame conditions that were granted at Petrella: which beeing agreed vpon, the citie was forthwith deliuered, and the conditions by Scanderbeg faithfully performed.

Petra-Alba yeelded.

Petra-Alba being thus taken, and all things ſet in order, Scanderbeg carried with the courſe E of his victorie, without delay came to Stelluſa, which is alſo a ſtrong citie of Æmathia, fiftie miles diſtant from Croia, pleaſantly (as it were of purpoſe) built vpon the top of an high hill, ſtanding in the midſt of a pleaſant & fruitfull vallie, with great plaines round about it. There Scanderbeg encamped a little before the going downe of the Sun, and reſted that night. In the morning he ſent a meſſenger to the citie, with like conditions as were accepted at Petrella and Petra-Alba: which moſt part of the garriſon ſouldiers of the Turkes would gladly haue accepted, but that Deſdrot the Gouernor of the citie, with ſome few others earneſtly withſtood the reſt; whereupon a great contention aroſe amongſt the garriſon ſouldiers. But the greater part deſirous to yeeld vp the citie, when they could by no means perſuade the Gouernor and thoſe few which took his part, to yeeld to their deſires, they violently ſet vpon him, & deliuered him with the reſt to Scanderbeg, faſt bound, and ſo yeelded vp the city. For which fact, fearing F to returne to Amurath, ſome of them remained with Scanderbeg, and afterwards became Chriſtians: the reſt were either honeſtly prouided for, or elſe wel rewarded & ſuffered to depart whether they would. All the other weaker places of Epirus wherein any of the Turkiſh garriſons lay, hearing that the ſtrongeſt cities were already deliuered vnto Scanderbeg, in ſhort time yeelded themſelues vpon like conditions: onely Sfetigrade (otherwiſe called the holy citie) remained in the poſſeſſion of the Turks: which citie is placed in the vpper countrey of Dibra, in the frontiers of Epirus, vpon the top of an high and ſteepe hill, as if it were an Eagles neſt. Vnto this citie came Scanderbeg with all his armie: and hauing placed his tents, he began firſt to aſſay if he could gaine it by compoſition, as he had done the reſt: and the rather to moue them by the examples of others, he cauſed his embaſſadors to declare vnto them al that had happened at Croia, Petrella, Petra-Alba, and Stelluſa, ſpecially how he had vſed the garriſon of Stelluſa, which yeelded vnto him, with all bountie and courteſie; and how that on the contrary part hee had the gouernour in bands, with all his wilfull partakers, whome they ſhould preſently ſee executed before their faces, if they forthwith deliuered not the citie. This meſſage troubled the minds of al the garriſon, but eſpecially of the gouernor, ſeeing before his eyes in the wofull example of another man, what might by and by happen vnto himſelfe. Wherefore fearing to deliuer his own opinion and to giue anſwer vnto the embaſſador, for offending the inconſtant multitude and vnknown minds of the people, he firſt entertained the embaſſadors honourably, and afterwards turning himſelfe vnto the citizens and ſoldiers, ſaid vnto them, Worthie men and moſt faithfull ſouldiers, what is your pleaſure, or what ſhall we anſwer to theſe our enemies demands? Then one of the ſouldiers that ſtood by (a rough bold ſpirited fellow) vnwilling for his owne part to giue vp the citie, and deeming the gouernor to be of the ſame mind, in that hee had tearmed them worthie and faithfull, and Scanderbeg by the name of an enemy, drawing out his ſword, & with his right hand ſhaking it on high, anſwered:

A notable ſpeech of a common ſouldier to the reſt of his fellowes for the holding out of the citie againſt Scanderbeg.

Moſt valiant gouernor, this ſame and the like, ſhal make anſwer for vs. Nothing was to leſſe purpoſe, than with premeditated words to ſeeke to terrifie valiant minds, firſt with the diuers fortune of Croia, and then of Stelluſa: for as the faces and countenances of men are diuers, ſo alſo are their mindes and diſpoſitions. Euery man wiſely directeth his owne actions, according to his own proper humor, & by the ſame plaies the foole or bedlam. We preſcribe no lawes to them of Petrella, nor to them of Stelluſa, neither let them preſcribe any vnto vs. Let neuer ſo baſe examples of cowardly ſlaues euer enter into the thoughts of couragious men: braue mindes diſdaine to imitate other men in their honeſt actions, much leſſe in their cowardiſe. And why? for euery man liueth after his own faſhion. Wherfore let Scanderbeg proceed, let him kil the gouernor of Stelluſa before our faces, let him ſacrifice our fellow ſoldiers, do you therfore think that we ſhal die in their bodies? ſhal our liuing ſpirits be there extinguiſhed? ſhall our bloud there be ſpilt? But ô happie bodies, O ghoſts of me euer to be reuerenced, which in worthy defence of your libertie & faith haue indifferently contemned gold, ſiluer, death, and torture, and whatſoeuer elſe miſerable worldlings hold deare or diſmall! Wherefore carry thou back again vnto thy maſter this anſwer from a common ſoldier, If he ſeek to impoſe theſe conditions vpon vs, let him once more bare that arm of his, which men of courage feare not ſo much as he thinketh. He may peraduenture inforce vs to theſe conditions of his, if God forſake vs: but aſſuredly perſuade vs vnto them, ſhall he neuer. And yet for al that, your maſter Scanderbeg is not the man wee haue long ſince heard him reported to bee, of an honorable mind, eaſie to forgiue, & ſuch a one as wil indifferently iudg betwixt the enemy & himſelf: for why then doth he hold in bonds the gouernor of Stelluſa, for that he freely, iuſtly, and honorably ſtood in defence of his King, his faith and liberty? Why doth he threaten him with death, wheras he hath not deſerned the ſame, although he hath reſolutely offered himſelfe thereunto. for defence of his libertie?

All they which were preſent, liſtened with great attention to the ſouldiers ſpeech, neither was hee interrupted by any, vntill he had ſaid what he would. Then the ſouldiers thronging about him, and beating their ſwords and targets together, withall gaue a great ſhout, in token that they all approued his ſpeech for anſwere. So the gouernour encouraged with the cheerfulneſſe of his ſouldiers, returned the embaſſadour without other anſwere than that of the common ſouldiers, and preſently appointed euery man to his charge, and with great carefulneſſe ordered all things for the better defence of the citie. But when Scanderbeg had heard the anſwer that was ſent him from the citie, deliuered by the mouth of a common ſouldier, hee ſmiled thereat, and ſaid, Hee is vndoubtedly a valiant ſouldier, if his deeds be anſwerable to his ſpeeches: but if my force faile me not, I will alſo make him happie amongſt the happie ghoſts of them of Stelluſa: and by and by commanded the gouernour of Stelluſa, with the other captiues, to bee brought before him, and there cauſed ſome of them which were content voluntarily to Scanderbeg his ſhort anſwer to the ſouldiers ſpeech.

forſake

A forſake their Mahometan ſuperſtition, to be preſently baptized, to the great griefe of the other Turks. Dſedrot the gouernor with the reſt, to the terror of the defendants, were in their ſight put to death: wherupon the garriſon ſouldiers with great indignation gaue a great ſhout from the wall, and bitterly railed vpon the Chriſtians.

Deſdrot gouernor of Stelluſa, executed.

Scanderbeg conſidering the ſtrength of the citie, with the time of the yeare, vnfit for ſoldiers to keep the field, for Winter was now grown on, left Moſes Golemus, a moſt valiant captain, with a garriſon of three thouſand ſouldiers, to keepe in the Turks garriſon at Sfetigrade, and to defend the borders of Epirus, vntill hee might at more conuenient time himſelfe returne again to the ſiege: and ſo with the reſt of his armie repaired to Croia, when hee had in the ſpace of little more than one month, to his immortall praiſe, recouered his kingdome, and dri- B uen the Turks out of euery corner of Epirus; excepting only Sfetigrade: which citie alſo not long after was by compoſition deliuered vnto him. During all this time, from his firſt comming into Epirus, he neuer ſlept aboue two houres in a night, but with reſtleſſe labor proſecuted his affairs. He euer fought againſt the Turks with his arme bare, and that with ſuch fierceneſſe, that the bloud did oftentimes burſt out of his lips. It is written, that hee with his owne hand ſlew three thouſand Turkes in the time of his warres againſt them. But of his great and worthie victories obtained againſt the two mighty Turkiſh kings, Amurath, and Mahomet his ſonne, more ſhall be ſaid hereafter in due time and place.

After that Scanderbeg had thus by great force & policie wrung his inheritance out of Amuraths hands, and ſcoured the Turks out of euery corner of Epirus, he proceeded further, and C ouerran part of Macedonia, making ſundrie incurſions into the heart of that countrey, being then in the Turks poſſeſſion, whereby he ſo enriched his ſouldiers, that they deſired of him no better pay. Which was ſo vſuall a thing with this reſtleſſe prince, as that it began to grow into a prouerbe in moſt princes courts, That the ſpoile of Amurath his dominions, was Scanderbegs reuenewes. Complaint hereof came daily to Amuraths court, which the craftie aged ſire (being then troubled with the Hungarian warres) ſeemed at the firſt to make no great account of, but as of that he could eaſily and at his pleaſure remedy; although he was therwith inwardly grieued at the heart. But when the certain report of one miſchiefe as it were in the necke of another, continually ſounded in his eares, and that he ſaw no end to be expected of theſe miſeries, he ſent Alis Baſſa, one of his greateſt men of war, with an army of fortie thouſand ſelect D ſouldiers, at once to ſubdue the countrey of Epirus, and to bring it again vnder his obeiſance. The ſetting forth of this great army, vnder the conduct of ſo famous a captain, repleniſhed the minds of the Turkes with ſuch an aſſured hope of victorie, that a man would haue thought Scanderbeg had bin already taken, & now brought to execution: yea the common ſoldiers before their ſetting forth, were oftentimes at vain contention for the diuiſion of the ſpoile they were neuer like to haue: So readie are men to promiſe wonders to themſelues, whileſt they confer but with their own deſires. And on the other ſide, Fame, the forerunner of great attempts, had filled all the ſmall country of Epirus, with great terror & feare of Alis Baſſaes comming. The countrymen with their families fled into the ſtrong cities, & the citizens within their walls fell to fortifying the ſame, and kept continual watch and ward, as if the enemy had euen then lien faſt E by them: the aged men & women commended themſelues and al theirs firſt to God by praiers and then to the courage of the luſtie ſoldiers with tears, as in caſe of extreme peril & danger. Only Scanderbeg was nothing moued either with the terrible report of the Baſſaes comming, or the vain feare of his ſubiects; but alwaies kept the ſame cheerfulnes both of countenance & ſpeech, as hee was wont, being well acquainted with the tumult of the Turkiſh wars, and hauing (as was ſuppoſed) certain intelligence before from his ſecret friends in the Turks court, of all Amuraths deſignes. So that hauing ſet all things in order for the ſafety of his country, he began to leauie an army at Croia; at which time moſt part of his ſubiects of Epirus, which were able to beare armes, repaired vnto him: the confederat Chriſtian princes alſo, his neigh- F bors, and for moſt part his kinſmen, ſent to him great ſupplies: beſide other deuout and warlike minded Chriſtians, which voluntarily reſorted vnto him from far, in great numbers. Out of which multitude of people he choſe only 8000 horſemen & ſeuen thouſand foot, when as he might haue raiſed a far greater armie: and placing ſome few in garriſons in the frontier cities where hee thought moſt conuenient, al the reſt hee ſent home again to their dwellings. At which his confidencie, his friends, yea and his enemies alſo much maruelled, that when he might might haue had ſo many, he would take the field with ſo few: with which ſmal army of fifteen thouſand, he marched from Croia, fourſcore miles to Dybra: where hearing by his eſpials, of the approch of his enemies, after he had with cheerfull ſpeech encouraged his ſoldiers, he encamped with his army in the lower country of Dybra, neere vnto a wood ſide, right in the way where the Baſſa muſt needs paſſe. In which wood, he placed Gnee Muſachee, and Ameſa in ambuſh with three thouſand men: commanding them to ſtand cloſe, vntill they ſaw hee had throughly ioyned battell with the Baſſa, and then with al their force to breake forth vpon his rereward. The Baſſa marching forward, came and encamped neere vnto Scanderbeg, a little before the going downe of the Sun, and there reſted that night, making great ſhew of mirth and ioy, with great fires in euery corner of the campe, as the Turkiſh manner of encamping is. Wheras in Scanderbegs campe, all things were ſilent, and no ſhew of any fire at all; for ſo Scanderbeg had commanded: which made the Turks the more careleſſe, deeming therby the Chriſtians as good as already diſcouraged. The next morning Scanderbeg ranged his army in order of battell, placing Tanuſius in the left wing, with fifteen hundred horſmen, and as many foot; and Moſes in the right with like number: and leading the main battell himſelfe, the rereward was committed to Vranacontes a man renowned in thoſe dayes, both for his grauitie in counſel & for his valour in armes, fit to command or be commanded; but afterwards, amongſt the reſt moſt famous, for the worthie defending of Croia againſt Amurath, being then there himſelfe in perſon. Alis Baſſa contemning the ſmal number of Scanderbegs armie, ſeeing nothing therein to be feared more than the good order thereof, gaue the firſt charge with a ſmall troupe of horſemen: who at the firſt incounter retired, as if they had fled, of purpoſe that the Chriſtians haſtily purſuing their vntimely hope, might diſorder their battel, & ſo giue occaſion to their owne ouerthrow. But by the commandement of Scanderbeg (who eaſily perceiued the Baſſaes meaning) their dangerous forwardnes was warily waied, & all with ſafety kept in good order. So both armies comming on, the wings began the battel afreſh, and Scanderbeg with great courage bringing on his maine battell in the face of the Baſſa, valiantly charged him. But by that time that the battels were throughly ioyned, Muſachee and Ameſa ſuddenly iſſued out of the wood, & fiercely ſet vpon the rereward of the Turks army, where they made great ſlaughter, and forced many of the Turks for feare to fly. Thus was the Baſſaes great army driuen to fight both before and behind, being hardly beſet and laid vnto with a ſmall number. The Baſſa had placed his beſt ſouldiers neereſt vnto himſelfe in the main battell, as his moſt aſſured ſtrength and laſt refuge: theſe valiant men ſtood faſt, and renewed the battell, before almoſt loſt. And here Scanderbegs fortune was euen at a ſtand: vntill that the well aduiſed and valiant captaine Vranacontes hauing receiued the wearied ſoldiers into the rereward, and ſetting al things there in ſafety, accompanied with certain troups of freſh ſoldiers which he brought out of the rereward, brake through the Baſſaes army with ſuch ſlaughter of the Turks, that he made way for Scanderbeg and all the reſt of his armie. The Turkes diſcomfited with the inuincible courage of theſe old ſoldiers, & the ſlaughter of their fellows, which lay by heaps wallowing in their own blood, betooke themſelues to flight; whom the Chriſtians fiercely purſued, and ſlew of them two and twenty thouſand: at which time were alſo two thouſand others taken priſoners, with foure and twentie of the Turks enſignes: wheras of the Chriſtians were ſlain not paſt an hundreth & twenty. The enemies tents with all their carriages, were at the ſame time taken alſo. After this great victory, when Scanderbeg had made all his ſeuen thouſand footmen, horſmen, by giuing vnto them the horſes of the ſlain Turks, he brake into the enemies country, & entred farre into Macedonia, where he filled the deſires of his ſouldiers with the wealth and ſpoile thereof, ſparing nothing that fire and ſword could deuoure: and ſo with victorie returned to Croia, where he was of his ſubiects ioyfully receiued. Alis Baſſa with the remainder of his diſcomfited armie, returned to Hadrianople, and there by Amurath was hardly charged of cowardiſe & want of diſcretion, for that he had loſt ſo puiſſant an army to ſo weake an enemy. Whereof when he had cleared himſelfe by the modeſt rehearſal of his former victories, and the teſtimonie of all the other captaines preſent with him in that battel, he was pardoned, and ſo againe receiued into fauour, and that great ouerthrow imputed to the chance of warre.

A great ſlaughter of the Turks Amurath in deſpaire.

Amurath hauing receiued two ſo great ouerthrows, firſt from Huniades and the Hungarians, and now from Scanderbeg, and ſeeing himſelfe elſwhere beſet with ſo many miſchiefs, as that hee could not tell which way to turne himſelfe; tormented with deſpaire, and deſire of reuenge,

A uenge, whereof he ſaw ſmall poſſibilitie, fell into ſuch a melancholie paſſion, that ouercome with the darke conceits thereof, he was about to haue become the bloudie executioner of himſelf, had not Caly Baſſa by his graue aduice comforted vp his dying ſpirits: by whoſe perſuaſion (contrary to his haughtie nature) he yeelded by his Embaſſadors ſent for the ſame purpoſe, to deſire peace of Vladiſlaus King of Hungarie; vſing the exiled Deſpot of Seruia (his father in law) then preſent with the King, as a mean therein. Who at the firſt gaue ſmall credit vnto the Embaſſadors, or vnto ſuch things as they told him, vntil that at length better perſuaded of the true meaning of the Turke, he ſo wrought the matter both with the King and the reſt of the nobilitie, and eſpecially with Huniades, that there was an honorable peace concluded. The capitulations whereof were, firſt, That Amurath withdrawing all his forces & garB riſons, ſhould clearely depart out of Seruia, and reſtore the ſame vnto the poſſeſſion of George the Deſpot, the right lord and owner thereof; deliuering alſo freely vnto him his two ſonnes, Stephen and George, who bereft of their ſight, he had long time kept in ſtrait priſon. Alſo, That from thenceforth he ſhould make no claime vnto the kingdome of Moldauia, nor to that part of Bulgaria which he had in the laſt wars loſt. And finally, That he ſhould not inuade or moleſt the Hungarians, or any part of their kingdome, during the whole time of that peace: and to pay 40000 duckats for the ranſome of Carambey. Vnto which hard conditions, when the Turkiſh tyrant had full ſore againſt his will condiſcended, a peace for ten yeres was forthwith on both parts concluded, and the ſame by ſolemne oath confirmed: King Vladiſlaus taking his oath vpon the holy Euangeliſts, and Amurath (by his Embaſſadors) vpon their Turkiſh AlcoC ran. This was the moſt honorable peace that euer Chriſtian Prince had before that time made with any of the Turkiſh Kings, and moſt profitable alſo, had it beene with like ſincertie kept, as it was with ſolemnitie confirmed.

Amurath by the perſuaſiō of Calī Baſſa, ſeeketh for peace of king Vladiſlaus

The capitulations of the ten yeres peace concluded betwixt Vladiſlaus and Amurath.

Amurath with this peace deliuered of his greateſt feare, conuerted all his forces againſt the Caramanian king, in reuenge of the iniuries by him done whileſt he was occupied in the Hungarian wars. This King of Caramania knowing himſelfe vnable to withſtand ſo great an enemie, durſt neither meet him in the field, nor truſt himſelfe to the ſtrength of any his cities or ſtrong caſtles, but fled into the mountaines, there fortifying himſelfe more ſure than in any other his ſtrong holds. Amurath entring into Caramania, made great ſpoyle in the countrey as he went, and tooke great booties. At laſt comming to Iconium, he layd hard ſiege to the ſame. D The poore King ſeeing his kingdome thus ſpoyled, and his chiefe citie in danger to be loſt, ſent embaſſadors, and with them his wife alſo, which was Amuraths ſiſter, to intreat for peace; offering to pay vnto him yerely the double tribute which he before payd, and for the performance thereof to giue his ſonne in hoſtage. Vpon which conditions Amurath granted him peace, and ſo returned. In this warre, Aladin, Amuraths eldeſt ſonne, died, to the great griefe of his aged father, being ſlaine with a fall from his horſe as he was hunting.

Amurath inuadeth Caramania

Old Amurath thorowly wearied with continuall warres and other troubles incident vnto reſtleſſe roomes, reſolued now to retire himſelfe to a more priuat and quiet kind of life: and therefore ſent for his ſon Mahomet, being then but fifteene yeres old, to whom he voluntarily E reſigned his kingdome, appointing Caly Baſſa his tutour, with one Choſroë a learned Doctor of their law, to be his truſtie councellors and chiefe directors. And ſo taking with him Hamze-Beg one of his noblemen in whom he tooke greateſt pleaſure, departed to Magneſia, and there as a man wearie of the world, gaue himſelfe to a ſolitarie and monaſticall kind of life, in the companie of certaine religious Turkiſh Monks, as they accounted of them.

Many great Kings and Princes, as well Mahometans as Chriſtians, glad before of the Hungarian victorie, were now no leſſe ſorrie to heare of the late concluded peace betwixt King Vladiſlaus & the old Sultan Amurath: as being of opinion, that the proſecution of this war ſo happily begun, would haue bin the vtter ruin & deſtruction of the Turkiſh kingdom. Wherefore they ſought by all poſſible meanes to induce the young King Vladiſlaus to breake the F league he had ſo lately and ſo ſolemnly made with the Turke: eſpecially Iohn Palæologus the Emperor of Conſtantinople, did by letters importune the King to remember the confederation he had made with the other Chriſtian princes, for the maintenance of the wars againſt the common enemie of Chriſtianitie: which Princes were now preſt, and readie (as he ſaid) to aſſiſt him with their promiſed aid: adding moreouer, That whereas Amurath had diuers times ſought to ioyne with him in amitie and friendſhip, he had vtterly reiected that offer of peace, preferring the vniuerſall profit(like to inſue to al Chriſtendome by that religious war)before his own proper ſecuritie and profit, being for his part in readineſſe to joine his forces with the Kings,if he would preſently enter into armes : which he could neuer doe in better time than now,whileſt Amurath,terrified with his late ouerthrow,and ſtil beſet with doubtful war, had drawn his greateſt forces out of Europe into Aſia,in ſuch diſordred haſt, as that it ſhould ſeem he rather fled for feare of his enemies in Europe , than marched to incounter his enemies in Aſia,and now being wearie of all,had betaken himſelfe to a priuat kind of life.To conclude, he requeſted the King,not to leaue him and the other Chriſtian Princes of ſmall power, as a prey to the Turk,who would aſſuredly with all hoſtilitie inuade them,ſo ſoon as he thought himſelfe ſafe from the danger of the Hungarians.At the ſame time alſo, and vpon the departure of the Turks Embaſſadors,for the performance of ſuch things as they had promiſed, letters came from Francis the Cardinall of Florence, Generall of the Chriſtian fleet, declaring how that Amurath hauing left almoſt none in Europe, was with all the power he could make, gon ouer into Aſia againſt the Caramanian King,leauing a moſt faire occaſion for the Chriſtians,eaſily to recouer whatſoeuer they had before loſt in Europe:& that he was in good time come with his fleet vnto the ſtraits of Helleſpontus,according to promiſe,and there lay ready to imbar the Turks paſſage backe again out of Aſia.Both theſe letters being read in the councell,ſo much moued the King,with all the reſt of the Nobilitie of Hungary there preſent,as that they were neuer more ſorrie or aſhamed for any thing they had done in their liues , than for the league ſo lately with Amurath concluded: for why, they ſaw that all the plot they had laid for their immortal glory,was now by this haſty peace that they had made with the Turk, without the good liking and knowledge of their confederats,brought to nought;& that they had thereby moſt ſhamefully deceiued the generall expectation that the Chriſtian commonweale had conceiued of them;& that they,of long time called the protectors of the Chriſtian faith,the defenders of true religion,the reuengers of Chriſts name, & deliuerers of the faithfull nations ; ſhould now be accounted the breakers of the Chriſtian league,men forgetfull of their confederation both with the Latines and the Greeks,contemners of immortality,& louers of their own profit onely.In this doubtfulnes of minds whileſt they ſtood yet thus wauering,Iulian the Cardinal & Legat,always an enemie to the peace, and by reaſon of his place,a man in greateſt authoritie next to the King,tooke occaſion to diſſuade the ſame as followeth:

The cunning Speech wherewith Iulian the Cardinall perſuadeth K.Vladiſlaus to break the League hee had before made with Amurath.

If any of you,right Worthie (ſaid he) ſhall haply maruell that I ſhould ſpeake of breaking the league, and violating our faith, let him firſt vnderſtand, That I at this preſent am to perſuade you to nothing elſe but the faithfull obſeruing both of the one and the other : led with like repentance with you ; repentance,I ſay , not ſorrow , when as I , as from a watch-tower foreſeeing all theſe things which were decreed againſt my will,to ſort alſo contrary to your expectation, am now for the dutie of my legation,and the zeale vnto the Chriſtian religion , inforced with you to doubt : and ſo much the rather, for that at this preſent the queſtion is of the loſſe and hazard of all our honors and credit in common : which except we by common conſent , and woonted valour, endeauour to amend, ô how much is it to be feared,leſt for ſhame neither may you go out of Hungarie, or I returne to Rome, where all things are with moſt deepe judgement cenſured. Conſider, I pray you , into what miſeries this haſtie reſolution hath caſt vs. We haue entred into league with the Turke, an Infidel,to violate our faith with the Chriſtians,and to breake the holy league before made with the great Biſhop and the other Chriſtian Princes our confederats. And that for what, for what profit I ſay? Forſooth, that ſo we might againe recouer Seruia, long before deſtroyed. Verily a ſmall and wofull profit, which may againe in ſhort time be cut off,and depriueth vs of others far greater, and of much longer continuance. For,what can be more fond and inconſiderat,than in our conſultations to haue regard to our priuat profit only,and not to the publicke,without reſpect of religion,honeſtie,or conſcience? It is not demanded of you at this preſent, (right Honourable) what you owe vnto the periured Turke ; but you are by me Iulian, the great Biſhops and the confederat Chriſtian Princes Legat,and Agent,before the tribunall ſeat of your owne conſciences, accuſed of breach of faith, breach of league,and breach of promiſe ; and thereof euen by your owne iudgement, rather than by the iudgment of God,or other men, I wil condemne you. Anſwer me, you noble Worthies : After you had happily ſix months made wars againſt the Turks in Bulgaria and the borders of Thracia ; and after that triumphantly returing into Hungarie receiued you not honorable embaſſages from almoſt all Italy,& from the great Emperor, with common rejoycing for your ſo glorious a victorie,and exhortations to continue

A the warre? We receiued them. Did not you in my preſence, and I the authour thereof, willingly make a moſt holy league with the Italians and Greeks; That the one ſhould with their aid and power meet you out of Thracia, and the other with a great fleet ſhould come into the Helleſpontus? We made it. If you made it, why breaking this, made you another with the Turks? or by what right can you keepe the ſame, being made? Wherefore if the laſt yeare you made a league with the great Biſhop, (God his Vicar here on earth) if you be men, if you be in your wits, if you be Chriſtians, this ſecond league is to be broken, leſt you ſhould violate the firſt, and that a moſt Chriſtian league: which except you do, I feare leſt that as Iudas betrayed Chriſt, ſo you may ſeeme to betray his Vicar; or that God, whom hitherto you haue alwayes found preſent, propitious, and fauourable, you ſhall hereafter find him angrie, and an enemie to your proceedings. And now I pray you tell me, What will you anſwer vnto the Conſtantinopolitan emperor; B who according to your appointment, hath now with the firſt taken the field, and in ſo great an opportunitie expecteth but your comming? What will you anſwer the great Biſhop? What the Venetians and Genowaies, who haue their great fleet readie, as was appointed? What the Burgundians, who for their zeale vnto the Chriſtian faith and Religion, haue long ſince paſſed the Ocean, and ſo by many dangers of the ſea now flote in the Helleſpont? Deuiſe (I pray you) if you can, ſome excuſe and colour, that we may not ſeeme altogether vnlike our ſelues: if out of your hidden skill you can coyne any thing, ſhew it. You promiſed with the firſt of the Spring, that you would be in the field: and now your ſoldiers both the Spring and Summer, play; ſo great and ſo wholeſome occaſion paſſing away, thorow your woful ſloth and negligence. O the great blindneſſe of mens minds! O groſſe cowardiſe! O deteſtable League, made to the deſtruction of the Commonweale! Some man happ ly will blame me, and aske, why I ſuffered it with the reſt? I was preſent, I muſt confeſſe; but as much as in me was I intreated it might not be. I diſliked C it; and (as many of you here preſent can teſtifie) I vtterly condemned it. I was ouercome by the wiſedome and authoritie of Huniades, and the compaſſion of the Deſpot, leſt (vnhappie man) he ſhould by my interceſſion ſeeme longer to want his Kingdome: and leſt any man ſhould call me a contemner or impugner of your good; I, full of ſorrow, and vnwillingly, gaue way: not ignorant, the health of the Chriſtian Commonweale to be therein weakened, the hope of your immortall glorie extinguiſhed, and vs all (by your leaue may I ſay it) accounted breakers both of diuine and humane Leagues, forſworne men, and traitors vnto all good Chriſtians. Wherefore except before the report of our perfidiouſneſſe be further bruted, we deliuer our ſelues from this infamie, nothing can be greater, or more miſerable, than our ſhame or villanie. If we will ſo doe, we may not ſo eaſily, as juſtly and religiouſly doe it: Hauing made reſtitution of Seruia and the captiues, what remaineth elſe for you to doe, (Noble Worthies) but D to repaire your Armie, to prepare what ſo is needfull for warre, and to keepe your firſt League with the Chriſtian Princes? And to ſay, That King Vladiſlaus, after his league made with the Greek and Latine Princes, could not without the conſent of theſe his Confederates and Allies (vnder whoſe good fortune that Common warre was vndertaken) conclude any thing, eſpecially with the enemies of the Chriſtian Religion? And that therefore, if any thing were agreed vpon betwixt him and the Turke, it was fruſtrate, and the firſt league to be ſtood vpon. Who is ſo partiall an eſteemer of mens actions, that would not eaſily judge, That in caſe faith were giuen to both, it were rather to be kept with a Chriſtian, than with a Turke; with a Beleeuer, than with an Infidel? Againſt a perfideous enemie it is lawfull (as they ſay) for a man to vſe all cunning, force, and deceit, deluding craft with craft, and fraud with fraud.
E By craft the Turke firſt paſſed ouer into Europe, by little and little he crept into that kingdome, he neuer kept faith with any, he grew to this height rather by cunning than by ſtrength: and are you become ſo blind, as to thinke it better to keepe your promiſe with the Turke, deuoyd of all faith and humanitie, rather than with the faithfull Chriſtians, and eſpecially the moſt holy Biſhop. All great things are done by deuice and policie: the Romanes our anceſtors vprightly and religiouſly alwayes kept their leagues with their confederates, but deluded the deceitfull with their cunning. Cæſar was of opinion, that for ſoueraigntie the Law was ſometimes to be broken. And Philip (the father and maſter of him that conquered Aſia) oftentimes vſed cunning and deceit for the deſire of rule: yet were not theſe men called traitors.
It is ſometime lawfull for the commonweale ſake, neither to ſtand to our leagues, neither to keepe our faith with them that be themſelues faithleſſe. Lawfull it is to breake vnlawfull oathes, and eſpecially ſuch as are thought to be againſt right, reaſon, and equitie. Was it lawfull for Diomedes, vowing F for to ſacrifice vnto the gods whomſoeuer he firſt met at his returne into his countrey, to kill his ſonne by that his vow and oath? Verily it was a great impietie. Wherefore a juſt and lawfull oath is in the judgement of all men to be religiouſly kept, but ſuch an oath as tendeth not onely vnto priuate, but publique deſtruction, that ought to be vaine and fruſtrate. Wherefore before our faithleſſe dealing be further ther ſpread abroad, I beſeech you, worthie men, and thee eſpecially, moſt glorious King, not in any point to G violate your faith, for the good of the Chriſtian commonweale, giuen vnto the moſt holy Father and the other Chriſtian Princes. The league you haue made with the Greeks and the Latines, faithfully and religiouſly keepe; the expedition by common conſent taken in hand, by the example of your confederates, proſecute; the foundation of immortall glorie by you layd, build vp. Deliuer the Chriſtian Prouinces, oppreſſed with the Turkiſh ſeruitude; ſatisfie the hope conceiued of you, and deceiue not the expectation the world hath now conceiued of you, than which, nothing can be more diſhonorable: make no conſcience of the league you haue made with the Infidell, but thinke it a great impietie and wickedneſſe, to violate the holy league made with the great Biſhop and the other Chriſtian Princes: thinking, that if you ſhould do otherwiſe, God (which he of his mercie forbid) would become of that your falſified faith a moſt ſeuere and ſharpe reuenger: and that you can do nothing more acceptable vnto our Sauior Chriſt, or more glorious H to your ſelues, than to deliuer the oppreſſed Chriſtian countries from the cruell ſlauerie & bondage of the Turke. Suffer not this ſo fit an occaſion to ſlip away, than which, a fitter can neuer be giuen. Europe is vnfurniſhed of the Turkes, buſied in the Caramanian warre; their returne is imbarred by the Chriſtians fleet, now in the ſea of Helleſpontus; you need but to go ſee, and as it were to take a view of Thracia, Macedonia, Grecia, and Epirus, there is no enemie there left to oppoſe himſelfe againſt you. Wherefore for God his cauſe, I requeſt you aboue al things to continue the Chriſtian league, and with your happie and victorious forces, to march forward into Macedonia and Thracia, as is before by you with the other Chriſtian Princes your confederates agreed.

Iulian the Cardinall abſolueth king Vladiſlaus & the reſt, from their oth before giuen to Amurath.

In concluſion, hauing much ſpoken of the authoritie and power of the great Biſhop, he in I his name diſannulled the league whatſoeuer, by the King made with the Turke; and abſolued him, with the reſt whom it might concerne, from the oath they had giuen, and the promiſe they had made. Which ſo well contented both the King and the reſt, that there was now no more queſtion of the oath, or of the lawfulneſſe of the war, but a decree made for the continuation of the league with the other Chriſtian Princes their confederats, and for the proſecution of the wars againſt the Turks, as was with them before agreed: whom, they could now ſay, they were not to forſake, and to leaue them as a prey vnto the Turke their greedy enemy; now for nothing more in danger, than for that, at their requeſt they had taken vp arms in their quarrell. Vnto which vnfortunat Decree, both the Deſpot and Huniades (the chiefe authors of the late peace betwixt the King and Amurath) eaſily conſented: the Deſpot, induced with K the great hope he had conceiued of the good ſucceſſe of the war; and Huniades, with the deſire of the kingdom of Bulgaria, promiſed vnto him by Vladiſlaus, and by faire Charter alſo (as ſome ſaid) aſſured vnto him.

Of this the Kings reſolution for the breach of the peace with the Turks, notice was with all ſpeed giuen vnto the Conſtantinopolitan Emperour, and Francis the Florentine Cardinall, then lying with a fleet of ſeuentie gallies at the ſtraits of Helleſpontus: for feare leſt they hearing of the former concluded peace, ſhould alter alſo, or elſe quite deſiſt from their former purpoſes. In the mean time, whileſt theſe things were yet in plotting, the Turke ignorant hereof, according to his promiſe had withdrawne all his garriſons out of Seruia, and other places before agreed vpon in the late concluded peace, reſtoring the ſame vnto the Deſpot & others L the lawfull owners, although it was not done at the verie prefixed day at which it ſhould haue been done. In which time alſo he ſet at libertie great numbers of captiues, and amongſt the reſt, the two blind ſons of the Prince of Seruia; faithfully performing whatſoeuer he had before vpon his religion promiſed in the league with the Chriſtians before concluded, ſo deſirous he was of peace with the Hungarians. Howbeit Vladiſlaus, by the councel of Huniades, detained to his own vſe certain of the ſtrong Holds in Seruia: for which cauſe, George the Deſpot euer afterwards bore a ſecret grudge againſt Huniades.

Now as King Vladiſlaus (hauing by the perſuaſion of Iulian the Cardinall, renounced the league betwixt him & Amurath) was preparing his forces, the fame of the Epirot Prince Scanderbeg was alſo (by the recouerie of his fathers kingdome of Epirus out of the Turks hands, M and by the late ouerthrow of Alis Baſſa) grown great, euery one ſpeaking of him honour and praiſe. Wherewith Vladiſlaus moued, & reaſonably perſuaded what a furtherance it would be vnto his haughty deſignes (aiming at no leſſe than the vtter ouerthrow of the Turks kingdome in Europe) if he might vnto his owne great preparations joyne alſo the ſtrength of that ſo fortunate

A tunate a Prince, by the conſent of his Nobilitie, with all ſpeed diſpatched away his Embaſſadors with letters vnto him, certifying him of his honorable purpoſe for the rooting out of the Turks; and in that common cauſe praying his aid againſt ſuch a dangerous and dreadful enemie. The purport whereof here followeth:

Vladiſlaus King of Hungarie and Polonia, vnto the noble Scanderbeg Prince of Epirus, greeting.

The Letters of king Vladiſlaus to Scanderbeg.

It may be that ſome good hap hath deferred this our late congratulation vntill this preſent, to the intent we might at this time, together with you, rejoyce in the double ſucceſſe of your proſperitie: firſt, for B the happie recouerie of your eſtate; and then, for that the ſame hath by your wiſedome and valor, of late been ſo notably defended. Wherefore in this we rejoyce, not only in your behalfe, but in the behalfe of all good Chriſtians, that it hath pleaſed God of his goodneſſe, by your valour to haue giuen ſo great an increaſe and comfort vnto the Chriſtian commonweale: for as much as amongſt others our great euils, the loſſe of the Albanian people hath not bin to be accounted the leaſt, at ſuch time as Iohn Caſtriot, a worthie Prince, your father, oppreſſed by Amurath, and by the vngrateful Deſtinies taken out of this world, had neither the means to leaue vnto you his kingdome and ſcepter, (as vnto his ſonne, then liuing in his enemies power) either was able yet otherwiſe to prouide for his affaires. And would to God this your father, moſt happie in ſuch a ſonne, might haue till now liued: whoſe felicitie had in that ſurmounted all others, if he might haue ſeene you before his death. For as you ſeeme vnto me aboue all other Princes in the world (without offence be it ſaid) moſt accompliſhed with all the good graces and perfections both of C bodie and mind; ſo are you indowed alſo with a certaine diuine and wonderfull fortune: vnder the good conduct whereof, not onely the whole kingdome of Epirus may thinke it ſelfe in ſecuritie, but all the reſt of the other nations alſo, lately by the deteſtable fraud and violence of the Othoman Kings diſmembred from the realme of Macedon, may alſo recouer the former beautie of their antient lawes and liberties. For (to ſay nothing of thoſe things which euen from your childhood hauing continually made you enuied, haue heretofore purchaſed vnto you an immortall fame and glorie euen amongſt the Barbarians themſelues) what can be more glorious than this victorie which (as we haue heard, and beleeue) you, to your ſingular admiration, haue obtained, by the ouerthrow and vtter diſcomfiture of Alis Baſſa, with his ſo great and mightie a power? But now ô Scanderbeg (God ſo appointing it, who in his deepe and ſecret wiſedome hath reſerued you vnto theſe ſo dangerous times, for the Publique good, and comfort D of the Chriſtian Commonweale) there offers it ſelfe vnto you an obiect of farre greater glorie, with a faire and fit occaſion for you to reuenge your ſelfe of all the wrongs and iniuries both new and old, by Amurath the Turkiſh Sultan done, not in priuate to the perſon of your ſelfe onely, but vnto the whole State and Kingdome of Epirus alſo; and not the domeſticall and ciuile miſeries of your owne Countrey onely, but the publique calamities alſo, and thoſe opprobrious diſgraces done againſt the Chriſtian Faith and Religion in generall, now oppreſſed (I will not ſay extinguiſhed:) and that is, if you with your victorius Forces will ſuccour vs in this extreamitie of our affaires, not yet altogether deſperate. Hereunto doe all the Princes of Hungarie and Polonia, and all other men of courage inuite you; Iulian the Cardinall of S. Angell intreateth you; with all thoſe deuout and couragious Chriſtians, which long ſince here with vs, and readie in armes, wiſh for nothing more than the preſence of your victorious enſignes. Which ſo faire an occaſion (by God himſelfe now offered) if you refuſe not, will in all mens iudgment be a ſure meane to vanquiſh and ouerthrow our common enemie the Turke, and to driue him quite E out of Europe, wrongfully by him of ſo long time poſſeſſed. I need not therefore (as I ſuppoſe) to vſe any kind of perſuaſion vnto you in this cauſe and quarrel, the defence wherof doth purchaſe vnto vs health, light, and libertie: but being neglected, I feare and abhorre to forbode what may enſue thereof. We Chriſtians haue been too too ſlacke and backward in helping one another: the flame hath now wel neere conſumed vs all, whileſt no man thought it would haue come neere himſelfe. What do we ſee of the Greek Empire? What of the Bulgarians and Seruians? yea, myne owne loſſes, and many calamities, alreadie, and yet alſo to be endured, who is able to recount? The braue and moſt valiant Princes, the ſureſt Bulwarkes and defences of the Kingdome of Hungarie, from time to time loſt; and the puiſſant Armies with one and the ſame fatall chance of warre conſumed and brought to nothing, who is able to F reckon vp? In ſo much that there is no houſe, wife, nor Matrone, in all Hungarie, which is not in ſome meaſure partaker of this heauineſſe. All this doe the Chriſtian Princes heare of, and yet the miſerable eſtate and condition of their allies can nothing moue any one of them, but ſuffer vs thus as a ſacrifice for the reſt,to be on all parts expoſed to the rage and furie of the common and mercileſſe enemie. Only Eugenius the moſt holy Biſhop of Rome, and Philip Duke of Burgundie,haue not refuſed to beare a part of the burthen of this our afflicted fortune: the one hath ſent hither his Legat Iulian the Cardinall,with notable and puiſſant ſuccors; and the other with his fleet at ſea,and come as far as Helleſpontus,ſo much as in him lieth, doth notably hinder the Turks paſſage into Europe. And one other hope there is, not now far from vs, and that is your helpe, whereof we are ſo deſirous: which wee require of you,moued thereunto partly by your valour ſo well knowne,and partly in regard of the imminent peril and common danger of vs all. And albeit we are not ignorant, how euill you may be at leiſure to take ſuch an expedition in hand, for the late troubled eſtate of your affaires, and your new recouered Kingdome,as yet ſcarcely well eſtabliſhed: yet notwithſtanding, let it not with-hold you, or keepe you backe; aſſuring you,that as this expedition cannot be but vnto you moſt honorable, euen ſo this your preſent deſert ſhall not be beſtowed vpon vngratefull and thankleſſe men; but that which you ſhall now firſt begin and vndertake for our preſeruation and dignitie, we will from henceforth and euer continue for your glorie, and for the increaſe of your greatneſſe. Fare you well. From our regall citie of Buda the fourth of Iuly, 1444.

Of this the Kings motion Scanderbeg liking well, and thinking it farre better now in ſo fit a time,with his own forces joined vnto the Hungarians his friends,thorowly to buſie Amurath, than in ſhort time after,himſelfe alone to ſuſtaine his whole power; by the general conſent of the Albanian Princes his confederates and allies,yeelded vnto his requeſt; in liberall termes promiſing him by his letters,in good time to be preſent with him with thirtie thouſand good ſoldiers. The copie of which letters I thought it not amiſſe here to ſet downe alſo.

Scanderbeg Prince of the Epirots, vnto Vladiſlaus King of Hungarie and Polonia, greeting.

Scanderbeg his anſwere by Letters vnto King Vladiſlaus.

Your Letters, moſt inuincible King, I haue with like joy and contentment receiued: which I in the generall aſſemblie of my Chieftaines hauing cauſed publiquely to be read, there was not any one of them which was not of opinion, but that ſo juſt an occaſion of warre by you offered, was forthwith to be joyfully on our behalfe alſo embraced. And ſo euery man doth both publikely and priuatly affirme, That nothing could haue hapned vnto them more acceptable from God, than that they might by ſome notable ſeruice teſtifie their gratefull minds,and bind vnto them ſo excellent a Prince; as alſo to giue ſo fit ſuccors vnto the Chriſtian Commonweale. In which forwardneſſe of my people I my ſelfe tooke great contentment and pleaſure, both in regard of your ſelfe,and in the behalfe of the publike & common cauſe: ſeeing my men of warre,and all other my ſubjects, of what ſtate or degree ſoeuer (without any perſuaſion vſed on my part) to be ſo cheerefully and couragiouſly minded in defence of the faith,and of the Chriſtian Religion; and ſo well affectioned towards your moſt royall Majeſtie. And to ſay the truth, Who is he (if he be not hatefull vnto God and man) albeit there were no queſtion of Religion,or of the Common danger, that would refuſe ſo juſt and lawfull a war? for ſuch a King, as vnto whom alone we may and ought to attribute, That we Chriſtians do not only raigne, but euen liue, breath, and enjoy the libertie of our ſpeech. Who would not willingly take vp armes, and aduenture himſelfe into moſt manifeſt and certaine danger for the people of Hungarie; by whom in all ages the Chriſtian Commonweale hath with their ſo many trauels, and ſo much of their bloud,beene ſo mightily ſupported and defended? who euen from the verie cradle haue been continuall enemies vnto our enemies, and haue as it were euen vowed themſelues for the honour of the Chriſtian Religion and name. Would God (moſt mightie and redoubted Vladiſlaus*) it had beene in my power to haue brought vnto you ſuch forces to this honourable warre, as were anſwerable vnto my courage and deſire: then happily Europe ſhould not longer lie in this ignominious eſtate, oppreſſed by* Amurath*; neither ſhould the fields of Varna or Baſilia ſo often ſmoke with the bloud of the Hungarians; nor euerie corner of Macedonia with the bloud of the Epirots: both nations being as it were become the expiatorie ſacrifices of others ſinnes and offences; wee all now by turnes periſh, whileſt euerie man thinketh himſelfe borne but for himſelfe alone. But why doe I vnto my ſelfe poure forth theſe vaine complaints. Truly, it neither repenteth mee of my Forces, neither (as I ſuppoſe, if it ſhall pleaſe God that our Forces may once meet and ioyne together in ſo happie a warre) ſhall the Chriſtian Commonweale haue any cauſe to ſorrow or be agrieued with the iſſue and euent of our fortune. For vnto thoſe fifteen thouſand good ſoldiers which late-*

A ly diſcomfited Alis Baſſa on the borders of Macedonia, my purpoſe is to ioyne as many moe vnto them: with all which ſtrength as ſoone as conueniently they may, I wil begin to ſet forward, ready to follow your enſignes to all euents whatſoeuer. And ſo fare you well, from Croia the third of Auguſt 1444.

Theſe letters being diſpatched away vnto the king, Scanderbeg forthwith began to leuy his forces. And firſt of all hee cauſed with new ſupplies to bee made ſtrong, all thoſe companies wherwith hee had ouerthrowne Alis Baſſa; not ſuffering any one of them to abſent himſelfe from this expedition. Vnto whom being in number fifteen thouſand, al men of approued valor, he ioyned other fifteen thouſand moe, no leſſe valiant than they: ſuch a power as he neuer either before or after raiſed for the recouerie, or defence of his kingdom. And ſo furniſhed with B all things neceſſarie for ſo honourable a warre, cheerfully ſet forward, accompanied with the vows and hope of all his moſt faithfull and louing ſubiects. But being come to the borders of Seruia, he found the ſtrait and difficult paſſages of that rough country ſhut vp by George the Deſpot, (Lord thereof, a man adorned with all the graces of nature, but otherwiſe a wicked damned Atheiſt, and a Chriſtian but in name onely) who but lately before reſtored vnto his kingdom by the helpe of King Vladiſlaus, hauing changed his mind, did now mightily cleaue vnto the Turke his ſon in law (by whom he had bin before himſelfe exiled) and in fauour of his querrel, and deſpight of the Hungarians, but ſpecialy of Huniades, had ſtopped vp the ways and paſſages wherby Scanderbeg was with his armie to paſſe: who by his embaſſador ſent of purpoſe vnto the Deſpot, complained to him of that wrong, putting him in minde of the C periurious dealing of Amurath with him, notwithſtanding he had maried his daughter: and of the great pleaſures the Hungarians had done him; of both which he had good proofe: requeſting him if it were but in regard of the common cauſe of Chriſtianity to giue vnto him (as vnto his friend by whom he was neuer in any thing wronged) paſſage; and not to ſtaine himſelfe with the perpetuall note of infamie, That hee being a Chriſtian Prince, and of late ſo mightily oppreſſed by the Turke, ſhould now to the great hinderance of the Chriſtian common weale take part with him, againſt his friends and deliuerers. But what auaileth praiers or requeſts, be they neuer ſo reaſonable, with a man ſet downe to miſchiefe? Scanderbeg out of hope by any other meanes to open his way, but by plaine force, reſolued ſo to doe: although it much grieued him to ſpend thoſe forces vpon a Chriſtian Prince, which hee had prepared againſt the D capitall enemie both of himſelfe and all good Chriſtians, old Amurath the Turkiſh Sultan.

King Vladiſlaus ſetteth forward againſt the Turkes.

But whileſt hee thus diſcontented, ſpendeth his time with his armie vpon the borders of Seruia, beſet with many difficulties; Vladiſlaus prickt forward by the continual ſolicitation of Iulian the Cardinall, or elſe drawne on by his owne ineuitable deſtinie, hauing aſſembled a great armie of valiant and couragious ſouldiers out of Hungarie and Polonia (yet in number far inferiour to that he had in the yeare before, for that moſt of the voluntarie ſouldiers were returned home) ſet forward from Segedinum; and in the beginning of Nouember (a time vnfit for warres) paſſed ouer Danubius, and entring into Bulgaria, came to Nicopolis, the Metropoliticall Citie of that kingdome (but then in poſſeſſion of the Turkes) where hee burnt E the ſuburbs thereof, and in that fruitfull countrey thereabouts refreſhed his people three or foure dayes, where hee alſo muſtered his armie, and tooke a view thereof: At which time Dracula Vayuod of Valachia, a man of great experience in martiall affaires, being then preſent, and conſidering the ſmall number of the Kings armie, began to perſuade him to retire; ſaying, He had ſufficiently learned by his owne harmes, to deeme aright of the power of the Turkiſh Sultan: who (as hee ſayd) was wont many times to carrie more men with him into the fields into his diſport of hawking and hunting, than was there in the Kings campe: wherefore hee ſhould doe well, not to expoſe thoſe his ſmall forces vnto ſo manifeſt perill, in ſuch vnſeaſonable time of the yeare, but to reſerue them vnto a more fit opportunitie, when hee F might with greater power encounter his puiſſant enemie. This his counſell moſt men of greateſt experience, and not carried away with other priuate reſpects, thought wholeſome: but the Cardinall, author of this fatall warre, extolling with great words the laſt yeares victorie obtained againſt the Turke, with glorious promiſes of great aid, as well by ſea from the Pope, and the Venetians, as by land from the Emperour of Conſtantinople and other Chriſtian Princes; augmenting alſo the great troubles in Aſia, and promiſing an eaſie and happie ſucceſſe vnto theſe warres in Europe: perſuaded the King that Dracula his ſpeech proceeded G either of ignorance, vpon a ſuperficiall iudgement which hee made of the Kings power there preſent, without regard of further ſtrength from his friends; or elſe of the priuat reſpect of his owne ſecuritie, in regard of a commodious league made a little before betwixt him and the Turke. So that the poore Prince ſeeing his counſell mightily impugned by the Cardinal, and not ſo well taken, as it was meant by him, ſtood in a doubt whether to leaue him to his owne fortune, and himſelfe to his quiet peace, or caſting off the Turkiſh league, to ioyne with the King in this chance of war: but at length reſolued as a martial minded man, preferring the vncertaine glorie of the field before his owne aſſured reſt, ſaid vnto the King:

Seeing that either your princely fortune, which hath euer hitherto fauoured your high attempts; or elſe the hope of friends helpe, which I pray God faile you not at your need; or the ſecret deſignement of H your deſtinie, vnable to be auoyded, doth draw your maieſtie into a different opinion from me: that your reſolution, which I cannot by reaſonable perſuaſion alter, I will as the ſuddenneſſe of time, and my ſmall abilitie will permit, moſt gladly further.

Dracula aideth Vladiſlaus with his ſonne and 4000 horſe.

And therewith preſented vnto the king, his ſon, with foure thouſand horſemen wel appointed, to ſerue him in thoſe wars; wiſhing vnto him ſuch good ſucceſſe as he himſelfe deſired. Afterward when he was about to take his leaue of the King, he preferred vnto him two luſtie yong men, perfect guides for that conntry, with two horſes of incredible ſwiftneſſe, and with teares ſtanding in his eyes ſaid vnto him:

His laſt farewel vnto the King.

Take this ſmall gift in good part, as a poore refuge to flie vnto, if your fortune hap to faile you, which I tremble to thinke vpon: I pray God they be giuen in vain, and ſo they ſhall if my praiers may preuaile. I Yet if neceſſitie ſhall inforce you to vſe them, you ſhall find them ſeruiceable at your need.

And ſo taking his laſt farewell of the King, returned into Valachia. Vladiſlaus marching on from Nicopolis toward Thracia, tooke many townes and forts by the way, which the Turks for feare yeelded vnto him: at laſt he came to Sumium and Pezechium, where the Turkiſh garriſons truſting as much to the ſtrength of the places, as to their owne valour, ſtood vpon their guard: but the king layed ſiege to both the ſaid places, and took them by aſſault; where he put to ſword fiue thouſand of the Turkes.

The Turks Baſſaes terrified with thoſe vnexpected troubles, aduertiſed Amurath thereof, requeſting him to leaue his obſcure life, and to leuie the greateſt power he could in Aſia, for the defence of the Turkiſh kingdome in Europe, which otherwiſe was in ſhort time like to be K loſt: blaming alſo his diſcretion, for committing the gouernment of ſo great a kingdom to ſo young a Prince as was Mahomet his ſonne, vnto whom many of the great captaines did halfe ſcorne to yeeld their due obedience. Amurath heerewith awaked, as it had beene out of a dead ſleepe, left his cloiſter, and with great ſpeed gathered a ſtrong armie in Aſia, and came to the ſtraits of Helleſpontus, where hee found the paſſage ſtopped by the Venetian and Popes Gallies, and was therefore at his wits end. But marching alongſt the Sea ſide vnto the ſtraits of Boſphorus, hee there found meanes to conuey ouer his whole armie: vſing therein (as ſome write) the helpe of the Genoway marchants ſhips, paying vnto the Genowayes for the paſſage of euery Turke a ducat, which amounted to the ſumme of an hundred thouſand duckats: or as ſome others affirme, corrupting with great bribes them that were left L for the defence of this paſſage. And being now got ouer, ioyned his Aſian armie with ſuch other forces as his Baſſaes had in readineſſe in Europe: and ſo marching on ſeuen dayes, encamped within foure miles of Varna, a citie pleaſantly ſtanding vpon the Euxine ſea ſide in Bulgaria, where the Chriſtian armie lay: for Vladiſlaus hearing of Amurath his comming with ſo great an armie, had retired thither, hauing but a little before taken the ſame Citie of Varna from the Turkes, with Calachrium, Galata, Macropolis, and others vpon the ſea coaſt.

Vpon the firſt report that Amurath was with ſuch a mightie armie come ouer the ſtrait of Boſphorus, Vladiſlaus who before was in good hope that hee could not poſſibly haue found any paſſage, entered into counſell with the commanders of his armie, what courſe was now M beſt to take: where many which before had bin moſt forward in that action (preſuming that Amurath could by no means haue tranſported his army) was now ſo diſcoraged with the fame of his comming, that they aduiſed the king in time to retire home, & not to oppoſe ſo ſmal an army againſt ſuch a world of people as was reported to follow the Turke. But other captains

A of greater courage, and eſpecially Huniades, ſaid, It was not for the Kings honor firſt to inuade his enemies dominions, and preſently to turn his back vpon the firſt report of their comming; wiſhing him rather to remember the good fortune of his former warres, and that hee was to fight againſt the ſame enemie whom he had victoriouſly ouerthrowne the yere before: as for the multitude of his enemies, he had learned by experience (as he ſaid) not to be moued therewith, for that it was the manner of the Turkiſh Kings, more to terrifie their enemies with the ſhew of a huge armie, than with the valour of their ſouldiers, which were nothing to be accounted of, but as effeminate, in compariſon of the Hungarians. Whereupon the King reſolued to trie the fortune of the field.

Vladiſlaus vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that Amurath the night before encamped within B foure miles, was now putting his armie in order of battell; committed the ordering of all his forces vnto the valiant captain Huniades: who with great care and induſtrie diſpoſed the ſame, garding the one ſide of the battell with a fen or mariſh, and the other ſide with cariages, & the rere ward of his army with a ſteepe hil. Therein politickly prouiding, that the Chriſtian army being far leſſe than the Turks in number, could not be compaſſed about with the multitude of their enemies, neither any way charged but afront. The Turks armie approching, began to ſkirmiſh with the Chriſtians, which manner of fight was long time with great courage maintained and that with diuers fortune, ſomtime one partie preuailing, and ſometime the other; but with ſuch ſlaughter on both ſides, that the ground was couered and ſtained with the dead bodies and bloud of the ſlaine. At length the battell being more cloſely ioyned, the victorie C began to incline to the Chriſtians, for Huniades had moſt valiantly with his Tranſiluanian and Valachian horſemen, put to flight both the wings of the Turkiſh army, and made great ſlaughter wherſoeuer he came. Inſomuch that Amurath diſmaied with the flight of his ſouldiers, was about to haue fled himſelfe out of the maine battell, had he not bin ſtaied by a common ſouldier, who laying hands vpon the raines of his bridle, ſtaied him by force, and ſharpely reproued him of cowardiſe. The captaines and prelates about the King (whome it had better beſeemed to haue bin at deuout praiers in their oratories, than in armes at that boudie battell) encouraged by the proſperous ſucceſſe of Huniades, and deſirous to be partakers of that victorie, fooliſhly left their ſafe ſtations, where they were appointed by him to ſtand faſt, and diſorderedly purſued the chaſe, leauing that ſide of the battell where they ſtood, open vnto the D Turks: but they were not gone far, before they were hardly encountred by a great part of the Turks armie, for ſuch purpoſe placed in a vallie faſt by. In which fight Leſco one of the moſt valiant captaines of the Hungarians was ſlaine; and the Biſhop of Veradium, a better churchman than ſouldier, and the firſt man that diſordered the battell, ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe by flight thorow the fenne, was there ſtrangled in the deepe mud, after hee had with his horſe therein ſtruggled a great while. The Biſhop of Agria, a man of greateſt authoritie with the King, was at the ſame time alſo loſt, with many other churchmen more. The Cardinall, with ſome other of the expert captains retiring toward their former ſtandings, were hardly aſſailed by the Turks, who by the comming in of the king and Huniades, were with great ſlaughter forced to retire, and euen ready to flie. Amurath ſeeing the great ſlaughter of his men, and all E brought into extreme danger, beholding the picture of the crucifix in the diſplaied enſignes of the voluntarie Chriſtians, pluckt the writing out of his boſome, wherein the late league was compriſed, and holding it vp in his hand with his eyes caſt vp to heauen, ſaid:

The great battell of Varna, fought between king Vladiſlaus and Amurath.

> Behold thou crucified Chriſt, this is the league thy Chriſtians in thy name made with me: which they haue without cauſe violated. Now if thou be a God, as they ſay thou art, and as we dreame, reuenge the wrong now done vnto thy name, and mee, and ſhew thy power vpon thy periurious people, who in their deeds denie thee their God.

Amurath praieth vnto Chriſt.

The King with Huniades furiouſly purſued the chaſed Turks, with bloudie execution a great ſpace: when as the King in his heat hardly perſuaded by Huniades to returne againe vnto his F campe, at his comming thither found the Cardinall Iulian, with Franke, one of his chiefe captaines, and others, ouercharged with the Turks, which had againe made head againſt that part of the Chriſtian armie: and there yet fought couragiouſly, by reaſon of their multitude, being alſo backt by the Ianizaries, which all this while had ſtood faſt with their old King, as his laſt and moſt aſſured refuge, but were now come in. There began a moſt cruel and fierce fight: in the ſucceſſe wherof, the Turks wel ſaw the whole ſtate of their kingdom in Europ to conſiſt, King Vladiſlaus ſlaine.

Huniades flieth

many were there ſlain on both ſides: the Turks feeling their loſſe leſſe than indeed it was, by reaſon of their multitude; and the Chriſtians, by reaſon of their courage. A great while the victorie ſtood doubtfull, inſomuch, that at length the Turks began to ſhrinke backe, in that part of the battel where the King and Huniades fought. But in the left ſide they preuailed ſo vpon the Chriſtians, that they were euen readie to haue fled. Which when Huniades (hauing a vigilant eye vnto euery part of the armie) perceiued, he with ſpeed made thither, and there again with his preſence reſtored the battell almoſt before loſt. Which done, he returned again towards the King, who in the meane time had moſt valiantly repulſed a great number of the Turks, & now was come vnto the Ianizaries, Amurath his laſt hope. There was to be ſeene a thouſand manners of death, whilſt both the armies fought more like wild beaſts in their rage and fury, than wary and politick ſoldiers. In this confuſed medly, the yong king Vladiſlaus with greater courage than care of himſelfe, brake into the battell of the Ianizaries: at which time, Amurath himſelfe was by a valiant Frenchman a Knight of the Roads, firſt wounded with a pike, and after aſſailed with his ſword, and had there ended his days, but that he was ſpeedily reſcued by his guard, by whom this worthy knight after great proofe of his valour was there ſlain in the midſt of his enemies. Vladiſlaus being got alſo in among them, valiantly performed al the parts of a worthie ſoldier, till ſuch time as his horſe being ſlain vnder him, he was forthwith oppreſſed by the multitude of his enemies and ſlain: his head being ſtrucke off by Ferizes, one of the old Ianizaries, was by him preſented vnto Amurath, who commanded it preſently to be put vpon the point of a launce, and proclamation to be made, that it was the head of the Chriſtian king: which was afterwards ſo caried thorow the principal cities of Macedonia, and Grecia, as a trophey of the Turks victorie. Huniades after he had in vaine giuen diuers braue attempts, to haue reſcued the Kings bodie, retired with a few Valachian horſemen, and ſeeing no hope of better hap (for all the Chriſtians being diſcouraged with the death of the king, had now taken themſelues to flight) gaue place to neceſſitie, and reſeruing himſelf to his future fortune, fled ouer the mountains, into the thicke woods, from whence with much difficultie he got ouer Danubius into Valachia, and was there (as ſome write) by Dracula Prince of that country taken priſoner: In reuenge wherof, after he was inlarged by the Hungarians, he ſo aided Danus againſt Dracula, that in fine, Dracula & his ſon were both ſlaine, and Danus placed in his roome. Iulian the Cardinall flying out of the battell, was found by that worthie man Gregorie Sanoſe, lying in the deſart forreſt by the way ſide, mortally wounded, and halfe ſtripped, by whom he was in few words ſharply reproued, as the wicked author of that perfidious war, and there left giuing vp the ghoſt. Many of the Chriſtians which fled out of that battel, fel into the enemies hands, & ſo were ſlain: but greater was the number of them which were drowned in the fens, or that by hunger and cold periſhed in the woods, or elſe after long and miſerable trauell, finding no paſſage ouer Danubius, fell at length into the Turkiſh ſlauery. This great and mortall battel, as it was with diuers fortune fought, ſo was alſo the preſent report thereof moſt vncertaine: for the Turks that were at the firſt put to flight, reported in the towns there by as they fled, that the battel was loſt: & they which had al the day endured the fight, not altogether aſſured of the victory, & not knowing whether the Hungarians had retired themſelues, whilſt they ſuſpected ſome deceit in the Kings campe, by reaſon of the great ſilence therin, ſtaid two daies before they durſt aduenture to take the ſpoile therof. The number of them that were ſlain in this battell, as wel on the one ſide as the other, was great; as the mounts and little hils, raiſed of the bones & bodies of them that were there buried, do yet at this day declare. Howbeit, the certaine number was not knowne, ſome reporting moe, ſome fewer. Yet in this moſt agree, that of the Chriſtian armie, being not great, ſcarce the third part eſcaped: and that the Turks bought this victorie with a farre greater loſſe, although it was of them leſſe felt, by reaſon of their multitude; made leſſe by that ſlaughter, as they that report leaſt thereof affirme, by thirtie thouſand. Which may well ſeem rather to be ſo, for that Amurath after this victorie, neither farther proſecuted the ſame, nor ſhewed any tokens of ioy at al, but became very melancholie & ſad, and being of them about him demanded, Why after ſo great a victory, he was no merrier; anſwered, That he wiſhed not at ſo great price, to gain many ſuch victories. Yet in memoriall thereof he erected a great pillar, in the ſame place where the king was ſlain, with an inſcription of all that was then don: which, as they ſay, is yet there to be ſeen at this day. This bloudie battel was fought neere vnto Varna (in antient time called

Dioniſio-

A Dioniſiopolis (a place fatall vnto many great warriours, and therefore of them euen yet abhorred) the tenth day of Nouember, in the yeare of our Lord Chriſt 1444.

Some maliciouſly impute the loſſe of the battel of Varna, and the death of the King, to Huniades, who (as they ſaid) fled out of this battell with ten thouſand horſemen: but this report agreeth not with the noble diſpoſition of that couragious and valiant captaine, but ſeemeth rather to haue beene deuiſed, to excuſe the foule dealing of the clergie; who as moſt hiſtories beare witneſſe, were the chiefe authors both of the warre, and of the lamentable calamitie enſuing thereof.

From the battell of Varna Amurath returned to Hadrianople, hauing loſt the greateſt part of his beſt ſouldiers, and there with great ſolemnitie buried the bodie of Carazia, vice-roy of B Europe, ſlaine in that battell: and then calling together all his nobilitie, againe reſigned vp his kingdome vnto his ſonne Mahomet, retiring himſelfe vnto Magneſia, where he liued a ſolitarie and priuate life, hauing before vowed ſo to doe, in the great feare he was in, in the battell againſt Vladiſlaus: but after he had a ſhort time performed theſe his vowes in that obſcure & melancholie life, he weary thereof, as ſome ſuppoſe, as not a little reuiued with the late victorie, or elſe ſolicited by Cali Baſſa and other great counſellors, returned againe to Hadrianople, reſuming vnto himſelfe the gouernment of the kingdome, to the great diſcontentment of his ambitious ſonne Mahomet.

Amurath to performe his vow, reſigneth his kingdome to his ſon Mahomet, which he in ſhort time after taketh again vpon him.

Scanderbeg yet ſticking in the borders of Seruia, and hearing what had happened vnto king Vladiſlaus with the Hungarians, was therewith exceedingly grieued: and hauing now loſt the hope whereupon hee had vndertaken that ſo great an expedition, reſolued to returne home C againe into Epirus. Neuertheleſſe, to be in ſome part reuenged of the wicked Deſpot, he with his armie forcibly brake into his countrey, and there did exceeding great harme. In his returning homewards, great numbers of Hungarians and Polonians, lately eſcaped from the ſlaughter at Varna, repaired vnto him, whom he (according to the extremitie of their fortune) courteouſly relieued: and furniſhing them with ſuch things as they wanted, prouided them ſhipping to Raguſa, from whence they might in ſafetie returne into their owne countries. Thus by the diſloyaltie and trecherie of the faithleſſe Deſpot of Seruia, was Scanderbeg ſtaid from being preſent at the bloudie battell of Varna, to the vnſpeakable loſſe of the Chriſtian common-weale: for it could not be, but that ſo many thouſands of moſt reſolute and expert ſouldiers, vnder the leading of ſo worthie a chiefetaine, muſt needs haue done much for the gai- D ning of the victorie. And what more glorious ſight could a man haue wiſhed for, than to haue ſeene ſo puiſſant an armie in the field againſt the ſworne enemy of Chriſtendome, directed by two ſuch valiant and renowned chiefetaines, as neuer, either before or ſince their time, was ſeene the like in one battell againſt the enemie of Chriſt and the Chriſtian religion? They were both men of inuincible courage, of exceeding ſtrength and agilitie of bodie, wiſe, prudent, and ſubtill; both of long time exerciſed in the Turks warres, the greateſt terror of that nation, and moſt worthie champions of the Chriſtian religion, beeing therein both very zealous. Of the two, Huniades was at that time accounted the better commander, and the more politicke, as a man of greater experience in martiall affaires, by reaſon of his greater yeares; which was wel counteruailed by Scanderbeg his perpetuall good fortune, ſtill as it were atten- E ding vpon him, and by his experience afterwards gotten, as in the courſe of his Hiſtorie well appeareth.

The compariſon betwixt Huniades and Scanderbeg.

Amurarh aduertiſed of theſe proceedings of Scanderbeg, as alſo of the great harmes by him done in Macedonia, and that the frontiers of his dominions bordering vpon Epirus, were by his furie vtterly waſted and ſpoiled, and his people there for moſt part ſlaine, and that the reſt had for feare forſaken their dwellings, and left the country deſolate and vnpeopled: was therwith exceedingly moued. Yet for ſo much as he ſtill ſtood in dread of the Hungarians, and was now himſelfe clogged with yeares, and therefore more deſirous of reſt; conſidering alſo the young yeares of his eldeſt ſonne Mahomet, as yet vnfit for the gouernment of ſo great F and troubleſome a kingdome; with the perpetuall good fortune of Scanderbeg, and malice of Huniades: he thought it not beſt to conuert all his forces vpon him, but to proue if he could cunningly draw him into ſome diſhonourable peace for a time, that ſo he might afterwards at leiſure bee the better reuenged of him. For which cauſe he writ vnto him letters, mixt with grieuous threats, and ſome feigned courteſies, as followeth:

Amurath

Amurath Othoman, King of the Turks, and Emperour of the Eaſt, to the moſt ingratefull Scanderbeg, wiſheth neither health nor welfare.

The ſullen and craftie letters of Amurath to Scanderbeg.

I neuer wanted honourable preferments to beſtow vpon thee all the while thou diddeſt liue in my court, of all others moſt vnkind Scanderbeg, but now I want wordes wherewith to ſpeake vnto thee, thou haſt ſo highly offended my minde, and touched mine honour, that I know not in diſcretion what words to vſe vnto thee, but of late one of my domeſticall ſeruants. For neither will hard ſpeech mollifie the naturall fierceneſſe of thy proud diſpoſition, neither art thou worthie of better, which haſt farre exceeded all hoſtilitie. And becauſe thou wouldeſt omit no occaſion to prouoke mee, haſt of late proceeded to that point of follie, that thou haſt had thine owne affaires, nnd the welfare of thine owne ſubiects, in ſmall regard, by confederating thy ſelfe in armes with the Hungarians againſt mee. It grieueth mee to rehearſe other thy vnkindneſſe, and as it were to touch thoſe ſores, if my minde would euer ſuffer mee to forget the ſame, or that thine ſo manifold and horrible treaſons, and ſtrange examples of a moſt vnthankfull mind, were to be couered with ſilence. Yet I thought good to aduertiſe thee (although perhaps too late) leaſt that thy vnſtaied heat doe vntimely ouerthrow thee, with thy vnluckie kingdom: and then thou wouldeſt make humble confeßion of thy long tranſgreßion, when thou haſt loſt thy ſelfe, and left no hope of refuge in thy deſperate eſtate. Wee haue hitherto ſufficiently ſuffered thy manifold iniuries: thou haſt ſufficiently prouoked the maieſtie of the Othoman Empire, with wrong and contumelious deſpight; and I with patience haue born all theſe thy contempts. Thinkeſt thou that my armie by thee betraied vnto the Hungarians ſhall bee vnreuenged? Thinkeſt thou that ſo many cities and townes in Epirus, by thee rent from the bodie of my Empire, with my garriſons there ſlaine, ſhall bee forgotten? Or thinkeſt thou with thy late committed outrages to eſcape my reuenging hands? Remember the deſtruction of mine armie vnder Alis Baſſa; the waſting and burning of my dominions; and lately, the Hungarian warres, by thee ſo farre as in thee was, countenanced; with the territories of George, the Deſpot of Seruia, my father in law by thee ſpoiled. At length amend thou graceleſſe man, and expect not further, whether my indignation will breake out. Let not theſe trifling allurements of thy good fortune, ſo puffe vp thy fooliſh deſires, and ſharpen thy conceits, that thy miſerable fortunes afterwards may moue euen thy greateſt enemies, or my ſelfe to compaßion. I would thou ſhouldeſt at length remember my courteſies (if any ſparke of humanitie remain in thy ſauage nature) and make me not longer ſorrie, that I haue ſo euill beſtowed the ſame. And although it is not the part of an honorable mind, to rehearſe thoſe things which we haue in bountie beſtowed vpon any man; yet is it the token of a moſt vnthankful nature, ſo eaſily to forget all kindnes paſt, as to need to be put in remembrance thereof: wherfore Scanderbeg, I cannot but bewaile thy hap, and lament thine eſtate: For to let paſſe the health of thy ſoule (which thou a very reprobate, eſteemeſt as nothiug) not to ſpeake of the lawes of Mahomet by thee deſpiſed, and the holy Prophet by thee contemned, for the zeale thou haſt vnto the Chriſtian ſuperſtition: what haſt thou (which now holdeſt thy poore and baſe kingdome in ſuch price) euer wanted at my hands of all thoſe things which moſt delight the deſires of men? Diddeſt thou euer want armour, horſes, a great traine of followers and ſeruants, mony, or other ſuperfluities, the allurements of al ages? Or diddeſt thou want matter to exerciſe thy valour, for encreaſe of thine honour? Waſt thou euer denied preferments, dignities, and honours of all ſorts fit for thine age, both at home and abroad? Was any man in my court dearer vnto mee, than thy ſelfe? what growing wit, not of ſtrangers only, but of them that were neerſt vnto my ſelfe, was better welcome vnto me than thine? With what carefull inſtruction did I cauſe thee to be brought vp? When thou waſt deliuered vnto mee almoſt a child, I daily cheriſhed and encreaſed thy hoped towardlineſſe, with learning and nurture: I haue at all times honoured thee with rich rewards, magnificall praiſes, and honours of the field (which of all worthie things is moſt glorious) ſo that in all feats of armes no ſouldier was to me better knowne, or captaine of mee more honoured. For all theſe great benefits, Scanderbeg, thou now ſheweſt thy ſelfe ſuch an one, that I may be thought not to haue brought vp ſuch a man as I hoped for, but a very ſerpent in mine owne boſome. But the loue of thy countrey did moue thee; which if thou hadſt asked of me, would I haue denied the ſame vnto thee? which (if thou doeſt well remember) I ſo oftentimes voluntarily profered vnto thee? But thou hadeſt rather to gaine the ſame by treacherie, than to receiue it at my hands of courteſie. So thine be it therefore on God his name, and that with my very good will. And verily, according to my accuſtomed clemency towards all them whom I haue once well knowne, and beene familiarly acquainted

A with, I now pardon thee all thou haſt offended me; not for any thy preſent deſerts, which are none, but becauſe in this publique enmitie it pleaſeth me to remember my former kindneſſe in priuat towards thee, and thy faithfulneſſe ſometimes in my affaires; eſpecially for that the time was much longer wherein thou ſerued'ſt me, than the time wherein thou haſt offended me. Croia and thy fathers Kingdome (although thou haſt gained the ſame by foule treacherie) I giue vnto thee, vpon condition thou willingly reſtore vnto me the other townes of Epirus, which by no right belong vnto thee, but are myne by Law of Armes, by my ſelfe honourably woon. Whatſoeuer thou haſt taken from my father in law the Prince of Seruia, thou ſhalt forthwith reſtore, and make him an honorable recompence for the other harmes thou haſt done vnto him; and for euer hereafter, thou ſhalt as well forbeare to offer violence to any our friends, as to ayd any our enemies. So ſhalt thou for euer auoyd the diſpleaſure of the Turkes, and ſtand B in my good grace and fauour, as thou haſt done before: except thou hadſt rather (being taught by thine owne harmes) then in vaine crie for mercie, when thy furious outrage ſhall haue me in perſon an implacable reuenger. Thou knoweſt thy Forces, thou knoweſt the ſtrength of myne Armes; thou haſt before thyne eyes the freſh example of the Hungarian fortune, ſo that thou needeſt no further admonitions. Yet I would thou ſhouldeſt write at large, what thou intendeſt to do. Thou mayſt alſo confer with Ayradin our ſeruant, our truſtie and faithfull meſſenger, of whom thou ſhalt vnderſtand more than are in theſe letters compriſed. Farewell if thou be wiſe. From Hadrianople.

To theſe letters Scanderbeg gaue ſmall credit, and leſſe to the meſſenger, but leaſt of all to the old Fox himſelfe, whome hee well knew to haue written nothing ſimply of good meaning, but onely to gaine a ceſſation from warres, vntill he might at better leiſure ſet vpon C him with all his Forces. Wherefore calling Ayradin the meſſenger vnto him, whom he rather held for a craftie Spie, than an honourable Embaſſadour, after he had many times both publiquely and priuately diſcourſed with him, ſo farre forth as was poſſible to ſound the depth of his comming, and had alſo further entertained him with all honourable courteſies, he ſhewed him all his campe, with the ſtrength thereof; which he did, becauſe he would not haue the craftie meſſenger to thinke, that hee was any thing affraid of his Maſters greatneſſe. And at laſt, greatly complaining of Amurath his cruell and perfidious dealing againſt his father, his brethren, and himſelfe, he ſent him away with ſuch anſwere in writing, as followeth:

The Souldier of Chriſt Ieſus, George Caſtriot, ſyrnamed Scanderbeg, Prince of Epirus, to Amurath Othoman King of the Turks ſendeth greeting.

The reſolute anſwer of Scanderbeg to Amurath his letters.

Thou haſt in times paſt, as thou writeſt, exceeded me in many kinds of courteſies; and at this preſent I will exceed thee in modeſt and temperate ſpeech: for I thinke there is no greater token of a baſe mind, than not to be able to forbeare to giue railing and opprobrious words, euen vnto our moſt mortall enemies. Wherefore we haue with patience receiued and ſeen both thy letters and meſſenger; and to confeſſe a truth, they haue miniſtred vnto me greater occaſion of ſmile, than choler: whileſt at the firſt thou ſhameſt not to accuſe me of much ingratitude and treaſon: and preſently following a wilder paſſion, ſeemeſt E carefull of my ſoules health, being ignorant of thyne owne eſtate, as a ſtudious defender of a moſt damnable errour. And at laſt, keeping neither law of armes, nor orderly courſe anſwering to our affaires, do'ſt moſt inſolently and vnaduiſedly, as a valiant conqueror to his vanquiſhed enemie, propound many conditions of peace, of ſuch qualitie and condition, that myne eares ſcorne to heare the ſame. Truly Amurath, although thy immoderate rayling might moue a man of greateſt patience to intemperate ſpeech; yet I impute the ſame partly to thy great age, and partly to the waiwardneſſe of thy nature, and the reſt, to thy conceiued griefe, which I know thou canſt hardly moderate: and the rather, for that I haue not ſet downe my ſelfe to contend with thee in foule and vnſeemely language, but with armes, and the iuſt furie of war. Yet I pray thee, wherefore do'ſt thou ſo exclaime againſt me before God and man? as though F thou hadſt firſt ſuffered wrong and iniurie from me, and that thou hadſt not in truth firſt done the ſame. Do'ſt thou call my neceſſarie departing, a perfidious treacherie? my natiue countrey by my policie and valour recouered; do'ſt thou obiect to me as a villanie? obiect the ſame ſtill and ſpare not; charge me with ſuch crimes for euer, I care not. The long catalogue of thy kindneſſe towards me, which thou rehearſeſt, I could willingly remember, if it drew not with it the wofull remembrance of my greateſt miſeries: which if they were to be compared together, the greatneſſe of thy good deſerts would be ouerwhelmed with the multitude of thy greater tyrannies; which I had rather thou ſhouldeſt count with thy ſelfe, than bluſh whileſt I repeat them. Euery man that knoweth them, may maruell how I had power to endure them, or that thou waſt not wearie at laſt of thy crueltie and ſecret hatred. Thou tookeſt away my fathers Kingdome by force; thou diddeſt murther my brethren, and my ſelfe thou didſt moſt wickedly vow to death, when I little feared any ſuch cruelty: & doth it now ſeeme ſtrange to thee, ô Amurath, that an inuincible mind, deſirous of libertie, ſhould ſeek to break out of the bonds of ſo great & inſolent ſlauerie? How long at length didſt thou thinke I would endure thy proud bondage? which for all that, I many yeres endured, and refuſed not thy command. I expoſed my ſelfe to publique and priuat dangers, both voluntary, and by thy deſignement: ſpeeches were giuen out dayly by thy ſelfe, and the admonition of my friends concerning thy deepe treacherie, was rife in myne eares: Yet for all that, of long time I ſimply beleeued both thy words and deeds to haue been deuoyd of all fraud, vntill thy cankered malice began too too apparently to ſhew it ſelfe; then began I alſo to gloſe with thee, wholly metamorphoſed into thyne owne conceits, until I found occaſion to recouer my libertie. Wherefore there is no cauſe thou ſhouldeſt now grieue, if thou be wel beaten with thyne owne rod. But theſe are but trifles, Amurath, in compariſon of thoſe things which I haue layd vp in hope and reſolution of mind. Therefore hereafter ſurceaſe thyne angrie threats, and tel not vs of the Hungarian fortune: euery man hath his own reſolution, and euery man a particular gouernor of his actions; and ſo will we with patience endure ſuch fortune as it ſhall pleaſe God to appoynt vs. In the meane time, for direction of our affaires we will not requeſt councell of our enemies, nor peace of thee, but victorie by the helpe of God. Farewell. From our Campe.

When Amurath had read theſe letters, and further conferred with Ayradin, he was filled with wrath and indignation, wondering at the great reſolution of ſo ſmall a Prince, preſently caſting in his mind (as was thought) the difficultie of that warre. Yet becauſe he would giue no token of feare, oftentimes ſtroking his white beard, as his manner was when he was thorowly angrie, with a diſſembled cheerefulneſſe of countenance ſayd, Amurath his paſſionat ſpeech in his rage, againſt Scanderbeg.

Thou deſireſt (wicked man) thou deſireſt the title of ſome honorable death: We will giue it thee (beleeue vs.) we will giue it thee; we our ſelues will be preſent at the buriall of our foſter child, and in perſon (though vnbidden) honour the funerall pompe of the great King of Epirus, that thou ſhalt neuer complaine among the damned ghoſts, that thou diddeſt die a baſe or obſcure kind of death.

And for becauſe at that time, by reaſon of many great occurrents, he could not conuert his whole power into Epirus, he ſent Feriſes one of his beſt Captaines, with nine thouſand choice horſemen, to keepe Scanderbeg in doing, and to ſpoyle his countrey ſo much as he could. Which was with ſuch ſpeed done, as it was thought Feriſes would haue bin in the heart of Epirus, before Scanderbeg could haue had knowledge of his comming. But for all his haſt, he could not ſo preuent the flying fame, but that Scanderbeg hearing thereof, and hauing his men alwayes in readineſſe, placed fifteene hundred good footmen in ambuſh vpon the rough mountaines leading into the valley of Mouea, whereby the Turks muſt needs paſſe into Epirus, placing alſo two thouſand horſemen, as he thought moſt fit and conuenient for his purpoſe. Feriſes deſcending from the high mountaines full of woods and buſhes, by the broken and ſtonie wayes leading into the valley, was in that troubleſome and intricate paſſage fiercely ſet vpon by Scanderbegs readie footmen, ſuddenly ariſing out of ambuſh, where the Turkes hauing no vſe of their horſes, but rather by them encombered, were ſlaine as Deere encloſed in a toyle. In this conflict ſeuen hundred and ſixtie Turks were taken priſoners, and a great number ſlaine, and Feriſes himſelfe, with the reſt, enforced to flie, crying ſtill out as he fled, Better ſome ſaued, than all loſt. Scanderbeg hauing thus ouerthrowne Feriſes, purſued him into Macedonia, and with the ſpoyle there taken, rewarded his ſoldiers, as he had alſo many times before done.

Amurath grieued with the ouerthrow of Feriſes, preſently ſent Muſtapha a politique and hardie captaine, with a new ſupplie of ſix thouſand ſoldiers, to take the charge from Feriſes; commanding him in no caſe, nor vpon any occaſion to enter farre into Epirus: but onely to burn and ſpoyle the frontiers thereof, ſaying, That he would account it for good ſeruice, if he might but vnderſtand, that the trees and fruits of that country had felt the force of his anger.

A Muſtapha hauing receiued his charge, when he began to draw neere the borders of Epirus, continually ſent out ſcouts before his armie, to ſee if the paſſages were cleere, & ſo warily entred the vallie of Mocrea, where Ferizes not long before was ouerthrowne. In this fruitful vallie, being the frontiers of Scanderbegs dominion, Muſtapha intrenched his armie, vpon the riſing of a hill, and placed eſpials vpon the top of the high mountains round about, by them to diſcouer the comming of the enemie, and to haue notice thereof by ſignes into the campe: then reſeruing 4000 horſemen with himſelfe, to keepe his campe, he ſent forth the reſt of his armie, about 9000 horſemen, to forrage and ſpoyle the country; giuing charge before, That euerie man vpon pain of death ſhould preſently retyre to the campe, vpon ſigne giuen from thence, as to a place of ſafetie and refuge. The Turkiſh armie ranging ouer that rich and pleaſant vallie, B burnt the villages, cut down trees, ſpoyled the Vineyards, and made hauocke of all things that fire and ſword could deſtroy; in that point executing Amuraths command to the ful. At length Scanderbeg drawing neere to this vallie with 4000 horſemen and 1000 foot, was aduertiſed of all the enemies doings, by an Epirot ſoldier, who grieuouſly wounded, had hardly eſcaped from the Turks: of him he vnderſtood, what number of Turks were burning and deſtroying the country, of the campe alſo kept by Muſtapha, and how eſpials were placed vpon the mountains. Scanderbeg hauing well conſidered Muſtapha his warie proceedings, and ſeeing no policie to be vſed againſt ſo careful an enemie, reſolued to vanquiſh him by plaine force, by aſſaulting him ſuddenly in his trenches, before his diſperſed ſoldiers could repaire to the campe: and hauing to this purpoſe with effectuall perſuaſions incouraged the minds of his valiant ſoldiers, readie of themſelues to follow him thorow all dangers; when he had ſet C all things in order for the aſſaulting of the enemies campe, ſpeedily entred the vallie, and was preſently diſcouered by the enemies eſpials, from the tops of the high hils, and a ſigne giuen to the camp, from whence alſo the appointed ſigne was giuen for the diſperſed ſoldiers to retire: but moſt of them being ſtrayd from the campe, & buſied in taking the ſpoile of the country, heard not or ſaw not the ſigne giuen. Thoſe which were within the hearing therof, retired to the campe, and at their heeles followed Scanderbegs ſouldiers, terrifying them with calling vpon the name of Scanderbeg. Many of the Turks were by the Chriſtians ſlain in the entrance of the campe, with their booties in their hands, and preſently the Turks trenches were now by Scanderbegs ſouldiers couragiouſly aſſaulted, and the Turks beaten from the top of them. They hauing won the trenches, preuailed ſtil vpon the Turks, filling all their camp with feare D and ſlaughter. There was no vſe of ſhot in that medly, by reaſon of the ſtraitnes of the place, for they were now come to pell mell. Muſtapha ſeeing his ſouldiers put to the worſt, and that the campe was not long to be defended, tooke horſe and fled by the port which was furtheſt from the enemie. The reſt of the ſoldiers fled alſo, making ſuch poore ſhift for themſelues as they could. In this battel 5000 Turks were ſlain, and but 300 taken; for the Chriſtians inraged with the ſpoyle of the countrey, reuenged themſelues with the ſlaughter of the Turkes. Scanderbeg loſt in this conflict but 20 horſemen and 50 footmen. The reſt of the Turks armie diſperſed in the country, hearing the tumult in the camp, miſdoubting the fortune of their fellows, fled alſo; yet many of them were in that flight purſued and ſlaine.

Scanderbeg his valiant reſolution for the aſſaulting of Muſtapha in his campe.

E After this ouerthrow, Muſtapha returning to Amurath, the better to excuſe the misfortune of himſelfe and the other captains before ſent, greatly commended the inuincible courage of Scanderbeg, and his wonderful skil in feats of arms; perſuading Amurath, either to ſend a greater power againſt him, or elſe none at all: ſaying, That to ſend ſuch ſmall armies, was but to miniſter matter to the increaſe of his glorie, and the infamie of the Turks; and to vſe policie againſt him, the maſter of policie, was but meere follie. It grieued Amurath to heare the prayſes of his enemie, although he knew the ſame to be true, by the continuall fortune he had always againſt his great captains, Alis Baſſa, Ferizes, and Muſtapha: wherefore he determined for a time not to prouoke him further, but to ſuffer him to liue in peace: yet commanded Muſtapha to renew his armie for defence of the borders of his kingdom towards Epirus, againſt the F innouation of Scanderbeg; but ſtraitly commanding him, in no caſe to inuade any part of Epirus, neither vpon any occaſion offered, or conceiued hope of victorie, to joyne battell with Scanderbeg, for feare of ſuch euill ſucceſſe as before.

At this time alſo the Grecians of Peloponeſus (now called Morea) hauing before fortified the ſtrait of Corinth from ſea to ſea, with a perpetuall wall which they called Hexamylum, and deepe trenches about ſix miles in length, had alſo built fiue ſtrong Caſtles in the ſame wall, of purpoſe to take away all paſſage by land into that rich countrey, and began now not only to denie the yerely tribute they were woont to pay vnto the Turkiſh King, but alſo to inuade ſuch Princes of Achaia their neighbors, as were content to remaine ſtill the Turks tributaries: among whom Neceus Prince of Athens, and Turacan gouernor of Theſſalia for Amurath, ceaſed not by continuall complaints to incenſe him againſt them of Peloponeſus. Who hauing his armie in readineſſe, although it was now Winter, and he himſelfe very aged, ſet forward from Hadrianople, and marching thorow Theſſalia, came into Achaia, where moſt of the Grecians were before fled for feare into Peloponeſus. So paſſing on with his armie, he came to the ſtrait commonly called Iſtmus, where the famous city of Corinth ſomtime ſtood; and there incamped his armie neere vnto the ſtrong wal and caſtles, lately before built, hoping that the Grecians of Peloponeſus, terrified with the multitude of his army, would without reſiſtance ſubmit themſelues: but when he perceiued them to ſtand vpon their guard, and to truſt to their ſtrength, he laid batterie to the wall foure dayes, and hauing made it ſaultable, brake thorow the ſame with his army. The Grecians hauing loſt the wal(their chiefe ſtrength) fled, ſome to one ſtrong hold, and ſome to another, as their fortune led them; the Turkes at their pleaſure ſpoyling and deſtroying that rich and pleaſant country, ſometime the nurſe of worthie wits, and famous captaines: where they found wonderfull riches, and tooke priſoners without number; in ſo much that they were ſould among the Turkes at moſt vile price. There Amurath for his pleaſure cruelly ſacrificed ſix hundred Chriſtian captiues, to the helliſh ghoſt of his dead father Mahomet: and afterwards impoſing a yerely tribute vpon the Peloponeſians, and other Grecian princes now yeelding againe vnto him, as an induction to their further ſlauerie vnder the Turkiſh tyrannie, he returned, taking in his way the two famous cities of Patras and Sicyone. Thus the rich country of Peloponeſus, and all the reſt of Grecia, ſometime fountaine of all learning and ciuilitie, became tributarie to the barbarous & cruell Turks, in the yeare of our Lord 1445.

Peloponeſus made tributarie vnto the Turke.

Old Amurath now clogged with yeares, and wearied with long wars, was content to take his reſt at Hadrianople: during which time, Bajazet the ſon of Mahomet was borne in the yere 1446; who afterwards of long time with great glorie gouerned the Turkiſh empire at Conſtantinople, as in his place ſhall appeare.

Bajazet borne. 1446.

The Hungarians after the calamitie of Varna (wherein they had together with Vladiſlaus their king, loſt moſt part of their nobilitie alſo) in a generall aſſemblie of their States, made choice of Ladiſlaus the poſthumos ſon of Albertus(and then in keeping of Frederick the emperor)for their king. But foraſmuch as he being then but a child of fiue yeres old, & choſen king more for the remembrance of the Emperor Sigiſmund his grandfather, and Albertus his father, and the good hope conceiued of hm, than for any other thing preſently to be expected from him; it was thought more than neceſſary, to make choice of ſome notable and worthie man, vnto whom they might, during the time of the kings minoritie, commit the gouernment and protection of that ſo great and turbulent a kingdome. Many there were in that honorable aſſemblie well thought of, both of themſelues and others; but ſuch was the glorie and valor of Huniades, and ſo great the remembrance of his worthie deſerts, both of the kingdom of Hungarie, & of the Chriſtian commonweale in general, as without his ſeeking, procured vnto him the general fauor and ſuffrages of all; yea ſo far, that euen they which moſt enuied at his honor(as ouerſhadowing their own)were glad to hold their peace, for that without him, it was commonly thought the ſtate of that ſhaken kingdom could not long ſtand: So by the general conſent of al the States there aſſembled, he was with the great applauſe of the people choſen and proclaimed gouernor, as of all others moſt fit for ſo great & heauie a charge: wherein he quietly ſpent ſome few yeres in deciding of ciuil controuerſies, in compoſing the quarrells of the nobilitie; not forgetting in the meane time the indifferent adminiſtration of juſtice to all men, ending many controuerſies far from the place of judgment, and that without all ſuſpition of corruption; vſing therein ſuch expedition & neuerwearied patience in hearing euery mans cauſe, that ſitting, going, ſtanding, riding, he diſpatched many great and waightie matters: alwayes ſhewing himſelfe affable and curteous, as well vnto them of the poorer ſort, as others of greater calling, that had any ſutes vnto him. So that it was of him truly ſaid, That no man was than he vnto his friends more friendly, or vnto his enemies more croſſe and contrarie.

Huniades in the minoritie of the king, choſen gouernor of all the Kingdome of Hungarie.

A In time of peace he was alwayes prouiding for war, heaping vp great treaſure, and ſuch other things, as without which the wars could not be maintained. But aboue all things, he was care-full of the good agreement of the Nobilitie, taking great paines in reconciling their diſplea-ſures conceiued one againſt another, and that with ſuch dexterity, as that he was both of them and others generally both beloued and feared.

Huniades goeth againſt the Turkes.

In the meane time, whileſt he was thus buſied in diſpoſing of the ciuill affaires of the commonweale, & the adminiſtration of iuſtice, he was aduertiſed by his eſpials, how that the old Sultan Amurath was raiſing great forces both in Aſia & Europe, and that as the common fame went, for the inuaſion of Hungarie. For the withſtanding whereof, Huniades not vnprouided, as neuer vnmindfull of ſo dangerous an enemie, or of any thing more deſirous, than in ſome B ſort to be reuenged of the great loſſe receiued at Varna; in the fourth yeare of his gouerne-ment, and in the yeare of our Lord 1448, accompanied with moſt part of the Nobilitie of Hungarie, and the Vayuod of Valachia his friend and confederat, ſet forward againſt the Turk with an army of two and twentie thouſand choice ſoldiers. So hauing paſſed the riuer Tibiſcus, or Teiſe, and trauelling thorow Valachia, a little beneath where the riuer Moraua running thorow Seruia, falleth into Danubius, he with moſt part of his armie paſſed that great riuer; the reſt in the mean time taking paſſage ouer at a towne called Seuerin. Huniades with his armie being thus gotten ouer into Seruia, by his Embaſſadors requeſted the Deſpot, as he had oftentimes before, to put himſelfe into that moſt Chriſtian warre; and remembring the great benefits he had receiued from the Hungarians, not to ſhew himſelfe therefore vngrate-full, than which, nothing could be more diſhonorable: and to encourage him the more, certi-C fied him both of his owne ſtrength, and of the ayd brought vnto him by the Vayuod; & that for the good ſucceſſe of the warre there wanted nothing but his preſence and direction, with ſuch troupes of light horſemen as he knew he had alwayes in readineſſe: wherewith hee requeſted him with all ſpeed to follow him. But he being a man of no religion, and better affected vnto the Turke than Huniades, the more cleanly to withdraw himſelfe from this war, pretended many excuſes: firſt, The league he had with Amurath his ſonne in law, which he ſaid he might not breake, for feare that if things chanced not wel, he might ſo fall again headlong into his old miſerie: then, The vnſeaſonableneſſe of the time, Autumne being now paſt; which difficulties in thoſe cold countries they had to their coſt too much felt in the late war: D Theſe with many other ſuch like he alledged in excuſe that he came not: but the truth was, the malice of the man, grieued to ſee Huniades preferred before him in the gouernment of the kingdome, & diſdaining to ſerue vnder his enſignes, being himſelf Deſpot and King of Seruia, diſcended of the royal race, was the cauſe of his backwardnes: ſo that blinded with enuie, he could not there rightly judge of himſelf, or what was fit for him in this caſe to haue done. But Huniades angrie with his vnkinde anſwer, threatned him with his owne hands to be reuenged vpon him, and to giue away his kingdome to one more worthie thereof than he, if he ſhould with victorie returne. So paſſing thorow Seruia, as thorow the enemies country, he came into Bulgaria. After whoſe departure, the falſe Deſpot by ſpeedie meſſengers aduertiſed Amurath both of the comming of the Hungarians, and of their ſtrength; yea he certified him of euerie days march, and how that Huniades was but with a ſmall companie of his owne, and ſome weake ſupplies of the Vayuods, come ouer Danubius: whom if he ſhould not preſently meet, but ſuffer him to come on further, and ſo with his armie to get betwixt him and home, E he might ſo ſhut him in, as that he ſhould be hardly able to ſcape his hands. All which he did, partly for enuie, partly to gratifie the Turke, and the better to keepe friendſhip with him. So Amurath not contemning the Deſpots councell, ſuffered Huniades without reſiſtance to enter a great way into his country, and comming two or three days march behind him, ſo ſtopped the paſſage, as that he could not poſſibly retyre, but that he muſt needs fight. And now they were both come vnto a great plain in Bulgaria, which the Hungarians call Rigomezu; and the Raſcians, the Plaine of Coſſoua: through the middeſt whereof the riuer Schichniza riſing out of the mountaines of Illyria, running, at length falleth into Moroua, and ſo into Danubi-F us. This Plain is about 20 miles in length, & in bredth fiue, enuironed on each ſide with pleaſant mountaines in manner of a Theatre, the riuer and low valleys at the foot of the moun-taines being garniſhed with many countrey villages and towns. Into this fatall Plaine, when as the Hungarians firſt, and after them the Turkes, were as into a place of combat deſcended;

The falſe Deſpot giueth Amurath knowledge both of Huniades his comming, and of his ſtrength.

an old woman dwelling in one of the villages vpon the riuer ſide faſt by, where both armies G of late paſſed, with a loud voice cried out, O, how much I now feare the hard fortune of the Hungarians.
When as their paſſage ouer by the foord troubled the riuer but one day, and the Turks three; by the ſmall number of their armie, diuining their enſuing ouerthrow. In the midſt almoſt of this Plain ariſeth a ſmall hill, by the foot whereof the riuer Schichniza runneth, not far beyond which, toward the head of the Plaine, was a certain tower built like a pyramides, in memoriall of Amurath the firſt of that name, and third king of the Turks, there ſlain: which tower Amurath fearing leſt Huniades marching before him, ſhould take, and ſo become vnto him ominous, (for in ſuch matters the Turks are verie ſuperſtitious) he made haſt, of purpoſe to joyne battell with him before he ſhould come to the foreſaid tower. Huniades being come vnto the hill, eaſily ariſing in the midſt of the Plaine, there incamped, expecting the comming H of Scanderbeg; who was ſaid (according to appointment made betwixt him and Huniades) to be euery houre comming. Wherefore Amurath fearing leſt the tower faſt by ſhould be taken, and the enemies power ſtrengthned by the comming of the Albanois, prouoked Huniades to battell; who ſtill refuſed the ſame in hope of his friends comming: which made the Turke more fierce vpon him, ſeeking by all means he could to draw him to battell, but eſpecially by cutting him off from water and forrage: for why, he much preſumed vpon his multitude, hauing in his armie about foureſcore thouſand fighting men. At length Huniades, for want of water and other neceſſaries enforced to fight, vpon S. Lukes day, being then Thurſeday, commanded his ſoldiers to make themſelues readie: and diuiding his Armie into two and thirtie battalions, in ſuch order as he meant to giue battell, the more to encourage them, ſpake vnto I them as followeth:

The notable ſpeech of Huniades to encourage his ſouldiers againſt the Turks.

At length (valiant ſouldiers, and fellowes in Armes) the day is come, wherein you may reuenge that diſhonour, or diſgrace, you receiued in the battell of Varna; and recouer your former credit of conſtancie, and praiſe, if you will play the men. The Enemie oppoſeth againſt you but theſe reliques of his armies, by you ſo often broken and diſcomfited, who although they be in number more than you, yet are they in hope, quarrell and ſtrength, farre inferiour. For what can they hope for, which fight not for their owne, but for another mans Kingdome? and in conquering, procure vnto themſelues nothing but bondage in this life, and torment in the life to come, and in both, perpetuall and endleſſe miſerie?
Whereas you on the other ſide, howſoeuer the matter fall out, fighting for your owne Kingdome, K your Children, your Countrey, your Houſes, your Altars, may aſſuredly hope for in both, eternall and vndoubted bliſſe. You haue alſo farre greater cauſe to fight, as they which if they do not valiantly ouercome their enemies, are in danger, with themſelues, to loſe alſo all that theirs is. The ſtrength of both is ſufficiently tried. Once we vnfortunatly joyned battell at Varna, where if we might make exchange of our fortunes there found, haply the Turke would make choice of our flight, rather than of the great ſlaughter of his owne men: who being not able to ouertake vs, was there notably beaten, with the loſſe of a great part of his Armie: whoſe great loſſe there receiued, might counteruaile our diſhonour; although the loſſe, he ſuffered perforce, but we our flight by choice. But of that our ouerthrow, the angrie Powers from aboue (willing to reuenge our breach of Faith) were, as I verily beleeue, the cauſe, rather than our cowardiſe: for euen there, all the authours of that perfideous dealing, euen there I ſay, euerie L one receiued the juſt guerdon of their treacherie. Whereas we, againſt our wills drawne into that woful Warre, by the mercie of God yet liue with you, preſerued for the defence of the Chriſtian Commonweale, and eſpecially of Hungarie, that it ſhould not be ouer-runne with the Turkiſh power and rage.
The number of your enemies is not of you to be feared, when as you with few, haue oftentimes learned to fight with their multitudes, and carried away from them the victorie. Hitherto we haue rather fought by the power of God than man, and in the name of Chriſt Ieſus our Sauiour, haue eaſily ouerthrowne their prophane battels. Which way ſoeuer we haue turned our ſelues in his moſt mightie name, we haue with our victorious Armes opened our way, for that we fought vnder the leading and conduct of the Higheſt, whoſe helpe we haue alwayes felt at hand: neither ſhall we thereof this day faile, if we be mindfull of his forepaſſed loue towards vs, and of our woonted valour. God is always preſent with them that M in his juſt quarrell fight couragiouſly. Hereunto is joyned the ſafe manner of our fight, by reaſon of our men at armes, and barbed horſes, who like a ſtrong caſtle cannot eaſily be ouerthrowne. Our battalions are ſuch as may eaſily be commanded, and yet ſtrong enough againſt our enemies: whereas their great multitude breedeth but confuſion. We haue many notable and forcible Engines of warre, which they

A haue not. Beſides that, euery houre we looke for the worthie Scanderbeg his comming. The danger is not ſo great, as that we ſhould feare it; or ſo little, as that we ſhould contemne it. Backe againe without victorie we may not goe, for that our armie is hardly by the ſtraits of theſe mountaines to be led: and if the way were neuer ſo eaſie, yet without doing that we came for, and glorie with victorie, we may not retire. Vnto the valiant, all difficulties are propounded. Wherefore ſith this your laſt labour is at hand, wherein the whole ſtrength of the Turks may be for euer cut off, I pray and beſeech you (fellow ſouldiers) by that God vnder whoſe power and protection wee ſerue, and by the loue you beare vnto your countrey, your wiues, your children, and wealth, vpon the ſignall of battell giuen, ſo to ſhew your valour, as men reſolued to be fully reuenged of the iniuries by that filthie and wicked nation done both to God and man: and eſpecially of the loſſe receiued at Varna. Wee loſt there a deuout King, who for our ſafetie, and B for the breach of his faith, ſacrificed himſelfe; by which royall ſacrifice, that diuine anger is appeaſed: vnto whoſe ghoſt I beſeech you, in this battel to make an honorable ſacrifice. Not forgetting withal, to reuenge the death of other worthie men in that battell ſlaine. This feare of the Turkes, is at once and euen this day to be cut off; and ſo, as that it ſhould neuer grow againe: and the kingdome of Hungarie, ſo to be deliuered from the danger of moſt cruell ſlauerie, as that it may by this dayes worke gaine perpetuall reſt and glorie, vnto the enioying of the pleaſures both of this life, and of the life to come. Wherefore (worthie ſouldiers) we muſt fight with all our force, for that our honour ſo requireth, our profit ſo perſuadeth, and neceſſitie enforceth. As for our ſelues, howſoeuer the matter fall out, all ſhal be with vs well: If victorie, perpetuall bliſſe and happineſſe ſhall thereby be procured vnto our countrey, and immortall fame vnto our ſelues: but if we ſhall be ouercome, here we ſhall be moſt honourably buried in the bed of fame, to liue in heauen with God and his Saints for euer. Wherefore I beſeech you C ſo to fight, as men reſolutely ſet downe to ouercome, or if it ſhould otherwiſe fall out, as men reſolued honourably to die.

With this the Generals ſpeech, all the minds of the hearers were greatly enflamed, & they all by his words, and their owne hot deſires, ſufficiently encouraged: neither did old Amurath on the other ſide with leſſe care or diligence marſhal his army, & incourage his Turks, ſparing neither cheerful ſpeech, glorious promiſes, or ſeuere command: whoſe armie being brought into the plain, & ranged in order of battel, filled the ſame from the one ſide to the other, euen vnto the very mountains, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Chriſtians: and ſo about nine a clock in the morning ſet forward. Huniades had from the hill where hee lay, ſent downe both the D wings of his army, & had afront on both ſides before them, ſtretched out certain long troups of light horſemen to begin the ſkirmiſh. In the midſt betwixt both he had placed Zechel, his ſiſters ſon, with a ſtrong ſquare battel of men at armes: and ſuch as he had kept aloft vpon the hill for reſcues, he had compaſſed about with his waggons, as with trenches. The ſignal of the battell being giuen, the fierce and courageous ſouldiers on both ſides, with cheerefull minds, began at firſt to ſkirmiſh a far off: but afterwards fortune as it were fawning vpon both ſides, and their courage thereupon increaſing, they began with greater force to fight foot to foot, & hand to hand. Which hot fight continued about three houres: at length the Turks battel was put to the worſt, by Benedict Loſonicus, who had the leading of the right wing; and ſo likewiſe E in the left alſo by Stephen Bamffi, who with great ſlaughter had notably foyled the great Baſſa of Europe, ſtill preſſing hard & deſperatly vpon him. Which diſcomfiture of his men in both wings Amurath beholding, preſently ſent in ſtrong ſupplies, & in both places renewed the battell: wherby the Hungarian and Valachian light horſemen, before wearied, were enforced to retire vnto the men at armes; who ſerred together, and ſtanding as a ſtrong wall, eaſily repulſed the greateſt aſſaults of the Turks. In which maner of fight many were on both ſides ſlain, but far more of the Turks, by reaſon they were neither ſo well horſed nor armed as were the Chriſtians. Huniades in the meane time with the artillerie from the hill, did the Turkes great harme: which Amurath perceiuing, drew as cloſe vnto the hill as hee could, by that mean ſauing his people (ſo much as was poſſible) out of the danger of the artillerie, mounted on high F aboue them in ſuch ſort, as that it could little or nothing now hurt them: which Huniades from the hil beholding, came downe to the releefe of his men, ſending new ſupplies to both wings, ſometime encouraging them with cheerfull ſpeech, and ſometime with his own moſt valiant hand: vnto the wearie he ſent reliefe, the fearful he encouraged, them that were flying he ſtaied, and where he ſaw the enemies faſteſt comming on, there was he himſelfe preſent to meet them:

The great battell of Coſſoua fought betwixt Amurath and Huniades three daies together.

them, omitting nothing that was of a good General or worthy ſoldier to be done. The valiant he commended, the coward he reproued, & as a careful Generall, was himſelfe in euery place preſent. Whereby the battell became ſo fierce and terrible, that in euery place a man might haue ſeen all fouly ſoiled with bloud and the quarrey of the dead. Amurath in like manner ſtil ſent in new ſupplies, nothing diſcouraged with the great loſſe of his men, preſuming vpon his multitude, as fully reſolued orderly to fight, & to make vſe of all his forces, in hope at length by continual ſending in of freſh ſupplies, to wearie his enemies, whom he ſaw he could not by force ouercome. Wherin he was not deceiued, for one battalion of the Hungarians was oftentimes enforced to wearie foure or fiue of the Turks before they could be relieued, they came on ſo faſt. That day they dined & ſupt in the battell refreſhing themſelues with ſuch ſhort repaſt as they could eat ſtanding, going, or riding. The Turks armie was that day in euery place put to the worſt, and oftentimes with great ſlaughter enforced by the Hungarians to retire almoſt vnto their trenches; yet was the battell ſtil againe renewed, & ſo fought on both ſides, as well appeared they were reſolued either to ouercome, or there to die. This cruel fight maintained all the day, was by the comming on of the night ended, both the armies retiring into their owne trenches, but with purpoſe the next day to renew the battel, & not to giue ouer or turn their backs, til the victory were by dint of ſword determined. So with little reſt, was that night ſpent, both armies keeping moſt diligent watch, all carefully expecting the next day, as by battel therin to trie whether they ſhould liue or die. It was yet ſcarce faire day, when both the armies in good order ready ranged began again the battel: which at the firſt, was not by the Hungarians fought with ſuch force and courage as before, for there was none of them which had not the day before ſpent their whole ſtrength; wheras there was yet 40000 of the Turks which either had not fought at all, or but lightly skirmiſhed. Yet Huniades exhorted his ſouldiers, not by fainthearted cowardiſe to breake off the courſe of the victorie by them the day before ſo wel begun, but couragiouſly to proſecute the ſame; beſeeching them not to be now wanting vnto themſelues & their country, but to remember how they had fought the day before, how many thouſands of their enemies they had ſlain, & not now at laſt to giue ouer, & ſo ſhamefully to fruſtrat all the pains and dangers by them before endured: for that they (as hee ſaid) were to be thought worthy of honor, not which began, but which ended honorable actions. He wiſht them to ſet before their eyes the calamities like to enſue, if they ſhould as cowards be ouercome: firſt, the diuers kinds of death and torture; then, the ſlauerie of their wiues and children; the rauiſhment of their virgins and matrons; and laſt of all, the vtter deſtruction of their kingdom, with the horrible confuſion of all things, as wel ſacred as prophane: al which were by that one daies labor (ſaid he) to be auoided. And therfore he beſought them for the loue both of God and man, with their wonted valor, that day to ſet at liberty for euer, themſelues, their country, their wiues & children, and whatſoeuer els they held deere. In like manner alſo did Amurath encourage his ſoldiers, with great promiſes and threats, perſuading them rather to endure any thing, than by that days ouerthrow to be driuen out of Europe. He carefully viewed his army, ordered his battels, & with many great reaſons perſuaded them to play the men. But after that ſome light skirmiſhes being paſt, both the armies were fuly ioined, the battel was fought with no leſſe force & fury than the day before. Of the Chriſtians many then wounded, came now again into the battell, there either by ſpeedy death or ſpeedy victorie to cure their wounds before receiued, & there did right good ſeruice. Great was the ſlaughter in euery place, neither could the force of the Hungarians be withſtood; whoſe furious impreſſion, when the Turks could not by plaine force endure, they began with their freſh horſemen, cunningly to delude their deſperat fiercnes: at ſuch time as the Hungarians began moſt hardly to charge them, they by & by turned their backs, ſuffering them a while to follow after them, far ſcattered & diſperſed: who allured as it were with the hope of preſent victory, eagerly purſued them, & in the purſuit ſlew diuers of them: and they again vpon a ſignall giuen, cloſing together, & turning back vpon the diſperſed troups, well reuenged the death of their fellowes: & with their often charges & retraits, wonderfully wearied the Hungarians, notably deluding their furious attempts with that vncertain kind of fight, al the day long. Many of the Hungarians were ſlaine, and the Turks had that day the better, and ſo both armies being wearied night and wearines ended the fight; both retiring into their trenches, there keeping moſt carefull watch. The next morning by the dawning of the day, the battel was again begun. Huniades his bro-

A brother, General of the Valachians, with his light horſemen ſetting firſt forward, after whom in ſeemely order followed the reſt of the nobilitie, with their companies. Where for certaine houres, the battell was hardly fought with like hope on both ſides, & a great ſlaughter made, but ſpecially of the Hungarians; who wearied with the long fight, & moſt part of them wounded, were now al to endure this third daies labour. Zechel (Huniades his ſiſters ſonne) valiantly fighting in the front of the battell, was the firſt of the leaders there ſlain in the thickeſt of the Turks. Emericus Marzalus and Stephen Bamffi, both great commanders, encloſed by the Turks, there died alſo. Amurath ſeeing the formoſt enſignes of the Chriſtians, which ſtood in Zechels regiment, taken, and his ſouldiers (diſcomfited with the death of their colonell) turning their backs, preſently commanded al the companies, which were many (yet left in the trenches, for B freſh ſupplies) to iſſue forth, & at once to ouerwhelm the Chriſtians, being (as he ſaid) but few and ouerwearied with three dayes continuall fight. Vpon which the Kings command, they fiercely breaking out, preſently ouerthrew both the wings of the Chriſtians, before wauering; and in a great battell (wherin moſt of the chiefe commanders were ſlaine, and their enſignes taken) diſcomfited the reſt, and with a great ſlaughter put them to flight. Huniades ſeeing his brother now ſlaine, the enſignes taken, and the battel quite loſt, betook himſelfe to flight alſo; leauing behind him his tents and baggage, al which ſhortly after became a prey to the Turks: who from noon vntill night furiouſly followed the chace, with moſt cruell execution; but at length, ſtaid by the comming on of the darknes, they returned again vnto their trenches. The reſt of the Turkes army that followed not the chace, compaſſing in the Hungarian campe, were there by the wounded ſoldiers, the waggoners, & other drudges of the army, kept out ſo C long as they had any ſhot left, but yet were in the end euery mothers ſon ſlain, though not altogether vnreuenged, two or three of the Turks in many places lying dead by the bodie of one Hungarian. Amurath to couer the greatnes of the loſſe he there receiued, commanded the bodies of his captains there ſlain, to be forthwith buried; and the bodies of his common ſouldiers, to be for the moſt part caſt into the riuer Schichniza: for which cauſe the inhabitants of the country there by, of long time after abſtained from eating of any fiſh taken in that riuer.
The plain by this great battell made once againe famous, lay neuertheleſſe many yeares after couered with dead mens bones, as if it had bin with ſtones: neither could be ploughed by the countrey people, but that long time after armour and weapons were there ſtill in many places turned vp and found. Thus albeit that this bloudy victorie fel vnto the Turks, yet was their D loſſe far greater than the Hungarians; hauing loſt (as was reported by them that ſay leſt) foure and thirtie thouſand of themſelues, for eight thouſand of their enemies. Howbeit they themſelues report the loſſe to haue bin on both ſides far greater; as that of the Chriſtians were ſlain ſeuenteen thouſand, and of themſelues fortie thouſand: which in ſo long and mortal a fight, is not vnlike to haue bin true. In this vnfortunate battell, fell moſt part of the Hungarian nobilitie: all men worthie eternall fame & memorie, whoſe names we for breuitie wil paſſe ouer.
Many in the chace taken, and the next day brought to Amurath, where by the commandement of the angry tyrant ſlaine. Such as eſcaped out of the ſlaughter by the way of Illyria, returned in ſafety: but ſuch as thought to ſaue themſelues by returning back again through Seruia, the Deſpots countrey, found the ſame ſo troubleſome as that few of them eſcaped, but that they were by the way either ſlaine, or quite ſtripped of all they had.

The battell againe began the third day.

Huniades flieth.

The number of the Turks and Chriſtians ſlain in the battell of Coſſona.

Neither was the fortune of the noble Huniades much better than the fortune of the reſt, E who hauing on horſeback all alone by vncouth and vntract waies trauelled three daies without meat or drinke, and the fourth day tyred his horſe and caſt him off, being on foot and diſarmed, fel into the hands of two notable theeues, who in diſpoiling him of his apparel, finding a faire crucifix of gold about his neck, fell at ſtrife betwixt themſelues for the ſame; whereby he tooke occaſion to lay hand vpon one of their ſwords, & with the ſame preſently thruſt him through; and then ſuddenly aſſailing the other, put him to flight alſo. So deliuered of this danger, trauelling on, and almoſt ſpent with thirſt and hunger, the next day he light vpon a ſhepheard, a ſturdie rough knaue, who hearing of the ouerthrow of the Hungarians, was (in hope F of prey) roaming abroad in that deſolate country: who at the firſt meeting, ſtrucken with the maieſtie of the man, ſtood at gaze vpon him, as alſo did Huniades, fearing in his ſo great weakneſſe to haue to do with him. Thus a while hauing the one well regarded the other, they began to enter talke, the ſheepheard bluntly aſking him of his fortune; and he for Gods ſake crauing of him ſomething to eat. When as the ſhepheard hearing of his hard hap, mooued with his eſtate, and hope of promiſed reward, brought him vnto a poore cottage not far off, cauſing to be ſet before him bread and water, with a few oynions. Who in the pleaſant remembrance of that paſſed miſery, would oftentimes after in his greateſt banquets ſay, That he neuer in his life fared better, or more daintily, than when he ſupped with this ſhepheard. So well can hunger ſeaſon homely cates. Thus refreſhed, he was by the ſhepheard conducted to Sinderouia: whereof the Deſpot hauing intelligence (whoſe country was all layd for the ſtaying of him) cauſed him by the Captain of the caſtle to be apprehended, and impriſoned. But after certain daies ſpent in talke about his deliuerance, it was at length agreed, that all ſuch ſtrong townes in Raſcia and Seruia, as had by the Hungarians bin detained from the Deſpot, at ſuch time as his kingdome was by king Vladiſlaus reſtored vnto him, ſhould now be againe to him deliuered; and that Matthias Huniades his youngeſt ſonne, ſhould for the confirmaaion of further friendſhip, marrie the Deſpots daughter: with ſome other ſuch condititions as it pleaſed the vngratefull Prince for his owne behoofe to ſet downe. For performance wherof, he required to haue Ladiſlaus, Huniades his eldeſt ſon, in hoſtage. All which Huniades was glad forthwith to yeeld vnto, for feare the falſe Deſpot ſhould haue deliuered him into the hands of Amurath his mortall enemie. So the hoſtage being giuen, Huniades was again ſet at libertie. Who vpon Chriſtmas day comming to Segedinum, was there by all the nobilitie of Hungarie, and great concourſe of the people, honorably receiued. This ingratitude of the Deſpots no leſſe grieued this worthie man, than the diſhonour receiued from the Turke. Wherefore vpon the ſudden raiſing a great armie, he inuaded the territorie, long before giuen to the Deſpot by the Emperor Sigiſmund in Hungarie, in exchange of the ſtrong towne of Belgrade, deſtroying the country before him, and burning the villages, neuer reſting, vntil he had got into his power whatſoeuer the Deſpot had in Hungarie, & not ſo contented, preſently entred into Raſcia, where the Deſpots embaſſadors met him, bringing with them Ladiſlaus the hoſtage, honorably rewarded, & humbly crauing peace at his hands; which he, at the requeſt of the nobilitie eaſily granted, with forgiuenes of al former wrongs or iniuries: and ſo hauing with him concluded a peace, returned back again into Hungarie. But fortune neuer ſuffereth long the valiant man to reſt, but ſhill keepeth him buſied, leaſt he ſhould at too much eaſe attaine vnto honors glorie.

The Deſpot inuaded by Amurath, craueth aid of Huniades

The yeare following, Amurath certainly informed, That George the Deſpot hauing of late Huniades in his power, had again ſet him at liberty: was therewith exceeding wroth, blaming him of great ingratitude, That for a kingdom which he had at his hands receiued, he had not deliuered to him his enemy, in ful recompence therof; whom of all others he moſt feared, & therfore likewiſe wiſht to haue had him periſh. In reuenge of which iniurie (as he took it) the melancholie tyrant, ſent Fritze-beg and Ioſe-beg, two of his moſt expert captaines, with a ſtrong power to inuade Raſcia, the Deſpots country: who accordingly entring therinto, ſtrongly fortified Chryſonicum, a town before ruinated, vpon the ſide of the riuer Moraua, & from thence with fire and ſword deſtroied the country both far and neere. The Deſpot diſmaied with this ſudden and vnexpected inuaſion, wiſt not well which way to turne himſelfe: the angrie Turk he well knew, was not to be appeaſed without yeelding vnto ſome great inconuenience; and to pray aid of Huniades, without which he was not able to withſtand the Turkes, hee thought but vaine, for the wrong he had before done him. So that what to do he wiſt not: yet had he rather to endure any thing, than again to ſuffer the heauy bondage of the Turk. In this extremitie he thought beſt to make proofe of Huniades, of whom he humbly, & not without great ſhame, craued aid. Which the courteous gouernor, according to his honorable nature, forgetting all former iniuries, eaſily granted: and the rather, for that he deſired nothing more, than to be of the Tutks in ſome part reuenged of the ouerthrow from them of late receiued in the plaines of Coſſoua: as alſo for that he wiſely foreſaw, That the Deſpots country being loſt, he ſhould haue the Turks ſtill brauing him euen as it were in the gates of Hungarie. Wherefore hauing with great ſpeed raiſed a conuenient power, he forthwith in perſon himſelfe ſet forward, and at Synderouia paſſing ouer the riuer Danubius into Raſcia, there ioined his power with the Deſpots, which he found there ready. And ſo marching forward with ſuch expedition, that he preuented the fame of his comming; and the weather alſo at the ſame time as it were fauouring his purpoſe, and couering the country with a thick miſt, he was the fourth day vpon the Turkes before they were aware of him. Who wonderfully diſmayed with

A the ſudden comming of the Chriſtians, and vpon the breaking vp of the miſt, diſcouering alſo Huniades his enſignes (alwaies vnto them dreadfull) thought now no more of reſiſtance, or of the ordering of their battel, but as men diſcouraged, betook themſelues to ſpeedie flight. After whom followed the Hungarian and Seruian light horſemen, with moſt bloudie execution hauing them in chaſe all that day; Huniades with his men at armes following ſtil after in good order, for feare the Turks ſhould againe make head vpon the light horſemen that had them in chaſe. And had not the comming on of the night ended the ſlaughter, few of the Turkes had there eſcaped: but by the approch thereof many of them got into the woods, and ſo ſaued themſelues. Fritze-beg the Generall, with moſt part of the Turkes beſt commanders, were in that flight taken. Huniades after this victory entering into Bulgaria, came to Budina, the metropoliticall B citie of that countrey, which (as the cauſe oftentimes of great wars) he burnt downe to the ground. And ſo hauing well reuenged himſelfe, and cleared the countrey of the Turks, he returned backagaine into Seruia, & there gaue to the Deſpot for a preſent all the priſoners he had taken; and contenting himſelfe with the honor of the victorie, returned with triumph to Buda, there to find no leſſe trouble with the Bohemians, and ſome of the diſcontented nobilitie of Hungarie, than hee had with the Turks, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian common-weale.

All this while that Amurath was thus troubled with Huniades and the Hungarians, Muſtapha lying ſtill vpon the borders of Macedonia, as Amurath had commanded; it chanced that a great quarrell grew betwixt the Venetians and Scanderbeg, about the inheritance of Lech Zacharie C (a noble man of Epirus) then ſhamefully murdered by his vnnaturall kinſman Lech Duchagne; part of whoſe inheritance lying in the frontiers of Epirus, the Venetians claimed, as belonging to their ſeigniorie: and hauing got poſſeſſion of the city of Dayna, part thereof, by force held the ſame againſt Scanderbeg: vpon which quarrell great wars aroſe betwixt the Venetians and him, who had before been very great friends: inſomuch that in the end they ioined in battell at the riuer of Drine, where the Venetians were by him in a great battell ouerthrowne.
Of which troubles Muſtapha daily vnderſtood, and how that Scanderbeg ſo buſied, had left but a ſmall garriſon vpon the borders of Epirus. Wherefore being deſirous to redeem his former diſgrace with ſome better hap; hee would faine haue taken the opportunitie now preſented, but that his great maſters command lay ſo heauie vpon him, as that hee durſt not D without his leaue attempt the ſame, knowing that the danger of his euil fortune, if it ſhould ſo fall out, would far exceed the vncertaine glorie of his better ſucceſſe. Yet ceaſed he not from time to time to giue Amurath intelligence of theſe troubles and warres in Epirus, earneſtly requeſting him not to let ſlip ſo faire an opportunitie, but to giue him leaue to enter into the country: in manner, aſſuring him before hand of the victorie. Yet the ſuſpitious old King was long in reſoluing what to doe, ſtill fearing the fortune of his enemie. At length diſcharged of the feare of the Hungarians, and commending Muſtapha his forwardneſſe, he ſent vnto him a meſſenger with letters of this purport, anſwerable to his deſire.

The wars thou ſo greatly deſireſt, behold Muſtapha we grant vnto thee: the glorie thereof (if theſe E things bee true which we heare of the Venetian warre) thine owne valour, and worthy right hand ſhall giue thee: yet thou muſt warily deale with that enemie, and not raſhly take vp armes, which thou maieſt be enforced ſhamefully to caſt away, when thou thinkeſt leaſt. Peraduenture the counterfeit ſhew of war and faigned falling out among the Chriſtians, do too much allure thee; for the common ſaying is, There is no quarrell ſooner ended, than betwixt the father and the ſonne: we in perſon abſent, can neither aduiſe thee as preſent, nor commend a fooliſh forwardneſſe in armes. Thou muſt before thou put on armes, diſpoſe of all things, and conſider of euery particular; which is to be put in execution when thou art in the field. Thou haſt a great armie of freſh and luſtie ſouldiers, thine enemies are with continuall wars wearied and ſpent: in that remaineth, do as thou thinkeſt good; for I forbid thee the doing of nothing, which F thou thinkeſt may be for the aduancement of our honour.

Amurath his graue letters of aduertiſement to Muſtapha, concerning his going againe into Epirus.

Muſtapha hauing thus obtained leaue, and well appointed, with all his forces entered into Epirus, hoping in one battell to end that warre: which he (preſuming vpon the ſtrength of his armie) many times offered in the plaine field. News herof was brought to Scanderbeg (then lying at the ſiege of Dayna againſt the Venetians) from his garriſons lying vpon the frontiers of Epirus, to whom hee addreſſed a ſpeedie meſſenger: commanding them in no wiſe to encounter with the enemie, but to keep themſelues within the ſafegard of their ſtrong holds, & to protract the time vntil his comming. Afterwards ſelecting out of his armie 500 horſemen, and 1500 choſen footmen, all old beaten ſoldiers, he with that ſmall number marched to the place where he knew lay his garriſons intrenched, in the vpper country of Dibra: leauing Ameſa his nephew at the ſiege of Dayna. Muſtapha hauing many times in vaine ſought to draw the garriſon ſoldiers out of their trenches by offring them many faire opportunities of aduantage, & now out of hope that way to circumuent them, began to ſpoile and burne the country round about. But when he vnderſtood by his ſcouts of Scanderbeg his comming, hee ſpeedily called together his armie, and encamped within two miles of Scanderbegs camp, at a place called Oronoche, in the vpper country of Dibra. Scanderbeg had there in his camp, of his garriſon ſoldiers and thoſe he brought with him, fourethouſand horſemen, and two thouſand foot, all old expert ſouldiers, where, after hee had made his trenches ſtrong, he left there in three hundreth of them, and brought the reſt into the field in order of battel. Muſtapha on the other ſide likewiſe brought on in good order his armie alſo. But whileſt both armies thus ſtood ranged one within the view of the other, expecting nothing but the ſignall of battell, ſuddenly a man at armes, in gallant & rich furniture, iſſued out of the Turks armie into the midſt of the plaine betwixt both armies, & from thence with a loud voice challenged to fight hand to hand with any one of the Chriſtian armie. This Turke was called Caraguſa. At the firſt Scanderbegs ſoldiers vpon this challenge ſtood ſtill, one looking vpon another; for as they were all aſhamed to refuſe ſo braue an offer, ſo the danger ſo ſuddenly offered, ſtayd euery mans forwardneſſe for a while: vntill that one Paul Maneſſi, accounted the beſt man at armes in Scanderbeg his armie (vpon whom euery mans eye was now caſt, as if he had bin the man by name called out by the proud challenger) not able longer to endure the Turks pride, with great courage & cheerfull countenance came to Scanderbeg, requeſting him that he might be the man to accept that challenge. Who greatly commended him, and willed him on God his name to ſet forward, firſt to win honour to himſelfe, and then to giue example of his valour for all the reſt of the armie to follow. Paul ſtaying a while, vntill he had for that purpoſe moſt brauely armed himſelfe, mounted preſently to horſe, & riding forth into the plain, called aloud vnto the Turke, that he ſhould make himſelfe ready to fight. Whom Caraguſa required to ſtay a while, that he might ſpeake vnto him a few words, indifferently concerning them both.

The ſpeech of Caraguſa the Turke, to Maneſſi.

The victorie (ſaid he) our force and fortune ſhall determine: but the conditions of the victorie, we are now to appoint our ſelues. If the Deſtinies haue aſſigned vnto thee the honour of this day, I refuſe not, but that thou mayeſt by law of armes, when I am ouercome, carry away with thee my rich ſpoiles, and at thy pleaſure diſpoſe of my dead bodie. But if thou ſhalt fall vnder my hand, I require that I may haue the ſame right, and power ouer thy captiue bodie: and that the Generalls will grant that no man ſhall mooue out of either armie, to better the fortune of either of vs in the time of the combat, or after.

Maneſſi his ſtout anſwere to Caraguſa

Whereunto Maneſſi anſwered, That he agreed to thoſe conditions of the combate, which he vpon a needleſſe feare had ſo required to bee kept: ſaying, That where the fierce ſoule had yeelded, there of good right all the reſt out to be the conquerours; and that therefore he ſhould fight without feare of any more enemies than himſelfe: whom ſo ſoone as hee had depriued of life, he ſhould haue free power to doe with his dead bodie what he would. Which if thou wouldeſt giue (ſaid he) vnto the teares of my fellow ſouldiers, yet would not worthie Scanderbeg ſuffer the carkaſſe of a vanquiſhed coward to be brought backe againe into his campe.

Caraguſa maruelled to heare his ſo braue reſolution, & as it was thought, repented him of his challenge. But after that both the Generals had vpon their honors confirmed the laws of the combat before rehearſed, both the champions were left alone in the middeſt of the plaine between both armies, with al mens eys fixed vpon them. Now both the armies betwixt feare & hope, ſtood in great expectation of the euent of the combat, preſaging their owne fortunes in the fortune of their Champions. In which time they both hauing withdrawn themſelues one from the other a conuenient diſtance, for the making of their courſe, & after with great violence running together, Caraguſa was by Maneſſi, at the firſt encounter ſtruck through the head and ſlain. Maneſſi alighting, diſarmed the dead body, & ſtruck off his head: and ſo loaded with the armor and head of the proud challenger, returned with victory to the army, where he was

A joyfully receiued and brought to Scanderbeg, of whom he was there preſently honorably both commended and rewarded. Scanderbeg ſeeing his men by this good fortune of Maneſſi, greatly encouraged, and the Turks as men diſmaied with the death of their Champion, hanging their heads, like an inuincible Captaine, himſelfe ſet firſt forward toward the enemie, as it were in contempt of their multitude: and had charged them as they ſtood; before they had ſet one foot forward, had not Muſtapha to incourage his ſoldiers, with certain diſordred troups oppoſed himſelfe againſt him; which the whole armie ſeeing, faintly followed; but as they ſet forward with ſmall courage, ſo were they at the firſt incounter eaſily driuen to retire. Which when Muſtapha ſaw, he called earneſtly vpon them to follow him, and the more to encourage them by his own example, put ſpurs to his horſe, and fiercely charged the front of Scanderbegs B armie, as one reſolued either to gaine the victorie, or there to die: after whom followed moſt of the principall captains of his armie, which would not for ſhame forſake their General: thus by his valor the battell was for a while renewed. But Moſes preuailing with great ſlaughter in one part of the Armie, the Turkes began to flie: in which flight Muſtapha the Generall, with twelue others of the chiefe men in that armie, were taken priſoners, but of the common ſoldiers few were ſaued. There was ſlaine of the Turks armie ten thouſand, and fifteen enſignes taken; whereas of the Chriſtians were ſlaine but three hundred. The Turks tents and campe, with all the wealth thereof, became a prey to Scanderbegs ſoldiers: wherwith although he had ſatisfied the deſires of them all, yet to keep his old cuſtom, he entred into the confines of Macedonia, and there burnt and ſpoyled all that he could. And afterwards leauing a garriſon of C two thouſand horſemen and a thouſand foot for defence of his frontiers, returned againe with the reſt of his armie to the ſiege of Dayna.

The battell betwixt Scanderbeg and Muſtapha.

Not long after, the Venetians made peace with Scanderbeg; and Amurath deſirous to redeeme his Captaines, about the ſame time ſent great Preſents vnto Scanderbeg, with fiue and twenty thouſand duckats for the ranſome of Muſtapha and the other chieftaines; whom Scanderbeg ſo honorably vſed, as if there had neuer been any hoſtilitie betwixt him and them: and ſo with a ſafe conuoy ſent them out of his country. The ranſome of Muſtapha and the other Turks he diuided amongſt his ſoldiers. When Scanderbeg had thus made peace with the Venetians, he forthwith led his armie againe into Macedonia, with the ſpoyle of that country to make his ſoldiers better pay, as his vſuall manner was. And to do the greater harme, he D diuided his armie into three parts, wherwith he ouer-running the country, waſted and deſtroyed all before him, putting to the ſword all the Turks that came in his way. As for the Chriſtians that there liued amongſt them, he ſpared, but left them nothing more than their liues: the buildings of the Countrey he vtterly conſumed with fire, ſo that in all that part of Macedonia which bordereth vpon Epirus, nothing was to be ſeene more than the bare ground, and the ſhews of the ſpoyle by him there made. Which vnmercifull hauocke of all things he made, to the end that the Turks ſhould finde no reliefe in thoſe quarters, whenſoeuer they ſhould come either to lie in garriſon in that country, or to inuade Epirus. The ſpoyle he made was ſo great, that it was thought he left not in all that country, ſo much as might relieue the Turks armie for one day.

Muſtapha ranſomed.

E Of all theſe great harms by Scanderbeg done in Macedonia, Amurath was with all ſpeed aduertiſed, and therwith exceedingly vexed: howbeit he reſolued with his great counſellors, no more to ſend any of his Baſſa's or captains, but to go himſelfe in perſon, with ſuch a royall armie as ſhould be ſufficient not to conquer Epirus, but if need were, to fil euery corner thereof. Wherefore he commanded Commiſſions to be ſpeedily directed into all parts of his Kingdomes and prouinces, for the leuying of a great armie for Hadrianople: yet whither he intended to imploy the ſame, was not known to any in the Turks court, more than to the Baſſa's of the councel. Which cauſed all the bordering Chriſtian Princes to make the beſt preparation they could for their own aſſurance, euery one fearing leſt that growing tempeſt ſhould break F out againſt himſelf. But Scanderbeg of long acquainted with the Turkiſh policie, eaſily perceiued all that great preparation to be made againſt him: which hee was the rather induced to think, by reaſon of the vnaccuſtomed quietnes of Amurath, who al that while had neither ſent any armie to reuenge Muſtapha's ouerthrow, nor ſo much as a garriſon for defence of the borders of his kingdome, but had let all things negligently paſſe, as if he had bin in a dead ſleepe. Beſides that, it was alſo thought that he had ſecret inteligence from ſome of his old friends & acquaintance in Amuraths court, who probably ſuſpected the matter. Wherefore Scanderbeg G ſetting all other things apart, gaue himſelf wholly to the preparing of things neceſſary for the defence of his ſmall kingdome againſt ſo mightie an enemy. Firſt, he by letters & meſſengers aduertiſed all the Chriſtian Princes his neighbours & friends, of the greatnes of the danger of that war: wherein Amurath (as he ſaid) ſought not only his deſtruction, but the vtter ruine of them all; exhorting them therefore to conſider, how far the danger of ſo great an armie might extend, and therefore to ſtand faſt vpon their guard. Then he ſent Moſes and other his expert captains into all parts of Epirus, to take vp ſoldiers, and all the prouiſion of corne and victuals that was poſſible to be had. Wherin he himſelf alſo buſily trauelled day and night, not reſting vntill he had left nothing in the country, whereupon the enemie might ſhew his cruelty. Moſt part of the common people, with their ſubſtance, were receiued into the ſtrong cities; the reſt H took the refuge of the Venetian and other Chriſtian Princes towns and countries farther off, vntill this furie were ouerpaſt: all ſuch as were able to beare armes, were commanded to repaire to Croia; where when they were all aſſembled, they were ynow to haue made a right puiſſant armie. But out of all this multitude, Scanderbeg made choice only of 10000 old expert ſoldiers, whom he purpoſed to lead himſelfe, to incounter with the Turks great army, as he ſhould ſee occaſion, and placed 1300 in garriſon in Croia. The Citiſens alſo themſelues were thorowly furniſhed with all manner of weapons & other prouiſion meet for the defence of their citie. Then proclamation was made, That all the aged men vnfit for wars, with the women and children, ſhould depart the citie, and none to be therein left, but the garriſon ſoldiers, and ſuch citiſens as were willing to tarrie, and able to beare armes. This citie of Croia I was the chiefe citie of Epirus, and of the fortune thereof ſeemed to depend the ſtate of all the other ſtrong towns and cities, and ſo conſequently of the whole kingdome: for which cauſe, Scanderbeg had the greater care for the defence thereof. It was a miſerable ſight, to ſee the lamentable departure of this weake companie out of Croia; all was ful of weeping & wailing; no houſe, no ſtreet, no part of the citie was without mourning: but eſpecially in the churches was to be ſeen the very face of common ſorrow and heauineſſe; where all ſorts of people in great numbers flocking together, poured forth their deuout prayers, with fountains of tears, ringing their hands; yea, and ſome in the impatiencie of their grief forgetting themſelues, ſeemed to expoſtulate their grief with God. But when their ſorrow was with tears aſſuaged, and their hearts ſomewhat eaſed, the aged mothers kiſſing their ſons, gaue them many a fearefull K commandment: ſometime rehearſing, how louingly and tenderly they had brought them vp, and otherſome times ſhewing vnto them their feeble limmes & hoarie hairs, willing them to be mindfull of them. The wiues preſented their children vnto their husbands, bewailing to leaue them as childleſſe widowers, & their houſes deſolate. The old men mute with ſorrow, and careful of their children, durſt neither incourage them, for feare of making them too forward, neither diſſuade them from aduenturing themſelues, leſt they ſhould ſeem to loue them more than their natiue country. In the middeſt of theſe paſſions commandement came from Scanderbeg, that they muſt now depart, that the ſouldiers might take their places and charge.

Then began their ſorrows afreſh, with pittious ſcriching & tears: a man would haue thought the city had euen then bin preſently taken by the Turks. They could hardly be drawne from L the imbracing of their friends, all now deſiring to remain ſtil with them in the city, partakers of their common dangers. But when they ſaw the officers begin to be earneſt vpon them, and to haſten their departure, then with heauy hearts they took as it were their laſt farewel, & departed out of the citie, ſetting their feet many times they wiſt not where, for deſire they had to looke backe again vpon the city. This great multitude was conueyed alſo into the Venetian cities, & other places free from danger: whither al the country people which were not before receined into the ſtrong cities, reſorted alſo, with al their ſubiects & cattel, leauing nothing in all the country of Epirus, but the bare ground for the Turks to prey vpon. After this multitude was departed, and all wel quieted, & none left in the city but men fit for ſeruice, Scanderbeg thorowly ſtored it with all things needful for the defence thereof, and for the induring of M a long ſiege: beſides that, he gaue to euery ſoldier conuenient armor, with ſome ſmal reward.
Then he placed Vranacontes (a valiant and famous captaine, honorably diſcended) Gouernor of the citie. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order for the ſafegard thereof, after he had in few words exhorted them couragiouſly to endure the ſiege, and not to liſten to Amuraths flattering ring and deceitful charms, he departed out of the city vnto his armie, then lying within view, and began preſently to march towards Dybra. But he was not farre gon, before he met with Moſes with a gallant troupe of horſmen comming from Sfetigrade, a ſtrong citie of Dybra, ſcituate in the confines of Epirus, bordering vpon Macedonia: which citie was Scander beg his ſecond care, for that it was like to be the firſt that ſhould indure the angrie tyrants fury, ſtanding firſt in his way, as it were the fortreſſe of that country. Moſes had there ſet all things in like order, as had Scanderbeg in Croia, and had there placed one Peter Perlat (a graue and politique man) Gouernour, with a ſtrong garriſon of ſoldiers choſen out of all the country of Dybra, which were alwayes accounted the beſt men of war in all Epirus, and was for ſo doing greatly commended of Scanderbeg. Who deliuering vnto him all the forces he had prepared for the defence of the other caſtles and cities of Epirus, ſent him with diuers other of his nobilitie and captaines, to take order for the ſafetie of thoſe places, appointing vnto euery man his charge. As for himſelfe, he with a ſmall troupe of horſmen went to Sfetigrade, careful of that citie aboue meaſure, as it were before diuining the inſuing danger. Being come thither, and all the ſoldiers aſſembled by his commandment into the market place, he there in open audience ſpake vnto them as followeth:

Scanderbeg commeth to Sfetigrade.

Almightie God could not this day offer vnto you (worthie ſouldiers of Sfetigrade) better matter, neither could a fairer occaſion be preſented vnto braue minds and ſoldiers deſirous of honour, than that which now hath cauſed you to take vp moſt juſt armes. Wherein you may for euer, by worthie example, make knowne your conſtant faith and worthie valour, both towards me in priuat, and the people of Epirus in generall. Hitherto we haue borne armes for the honour of our kingdome, but now we muſt fight for our liues, our libertie, and the walls of our countrey. You muſt now force your ſelues, that you doe not by reproch and cowardiſe ſtaine the worthie praiſes you haue alreadie deſerued, by the great victories by you obtained vnder my conduct. The greateſt part of the fortune of this war dependeth vpon you: For, the firſt paſſage of Amurath into Epirus (that I my ſelfe may be vnto you the firſt meſſenger of that danger) will be this way; the firſt furie of the Turks will aſſaile you, that hauing here as it were broken downe the ſtrongeſt fortreſſe of Epirus, he may afterwards breake into the country, more ſubiect to danger. The firſt fruits of this war is yours, you (if you beare the hearts of couragious men, mindful of your libertie) may beat down the proud ſtrength of the haughtie enemie, and diſcouer his high conceits. The Othoman King ſhall haue the beginning both of his hope and feare, of you: if he ſhall find you ſo minded, as I now ſee you gallantly mooued, and with joy heare your violent indignation; he will in euery place feare a great force of danger, and thereby learne to abſtaine from the other cities of Epirus. Neither will he lie here long at a vaine ſiege, except the wayward old man will fooliſhly hereupon gage all his whole forces: for ſuch is the ſcituation and ſtrength of this citie, that it may eaſily ſet at nought an angrie enemie. Wherefore reſolue with you ſelues (worthie ſoldiers and citiſens) only by conſtancie and faithfulneſſe, without bloudſhed, to gaine vnto your ſelues an honorable victorie. Of your valour (which I willingly ſpeake of) dependeth for the moſt part the faithfulneſſe of all the reſt; they will looke vpon you, whom they may praiſe or accuſe, and whoſe example they may follow in the fortune of theſe warres. But to what purpoſe ſhould men of worth in their actions pretend the neceſſitie of faith, or chance af fortune? whereas by Reaſon things are both beſt begun and accompliſhed. It ſeldome chanceth, that fortune faileth the ſecond aduice, or is not obedient to vertue: and you haue all things which moſt politique care could prouide for your ſafetie. You want not armor, you want not plentifull prouiſion of victuals, you want not valiant men: the ſuperfluous multitude of vnneceſſary people, the pittifull lamentation of women, and troubleſome crying of children ſhall not withdraw you from your publique charge, from your ſeruice and defence of your countrey; I haue left you alone to your ſelues, for defence of your citie, your Religion, and dwellings, that you might be encouraged only with the prouocations of honour and liberty, with the emulation of aduenture and danger, and the verie ſight one of another; and I my ſelfe will not be far off with my couragious ſoldiers, a ſilent beholder and encourager of your vertue: where although I may not auert from you all the force of the cruell enemie by raſh aduenture, nor trie the whole fortune of this warre in plaine field; yet will I turne a great part of your dangers vpon my ſelfe, and trouble the enemies deſignes with many a hot skirmiſh. For as much as there is no better manner of fight, nor ſafer kind of war for vs, amongſt ſuch a multitude of men, and ſo many thouſands of ſouldiers, than neuer to offer battell vnto the enemie in plaine field, neither to aduenture all vpon the fortune of one conflict, although a man did ſee apparent ſignes of victorie. He will of purpoſe at the firſt giue vs the opportu- nitie of good hap; he will feed our hardineſſe with the bloud of his baſe ſoldiers, the eaſilier to intrap and oppreſſe our raſhneſſe, allured with the ſweet baits of good fortune: but the craftie deuices of the Othoman King are by great policie and conſideration to be fruſtrated: this mightie enemie is by little & little to be cut off, as time and place ſhall giue occaſion. For truly that victorie ſhould be vnto me lamentable, which I ſhould buy with the bloud of my ſoldiers: and beleeue me, it would be vnto me a more ſorrowfull than pleaſant ſight, to ſee eight or ten thouſand of my enemies ſlaine, with the loſſe of a few of you. I praiſe and honor my ſubiects of Epirus for valiant conquerors, if they ſhall not ſuffer themſelues to be conquered of the Turkiſh King. The reſt I had rather you couragious ſouldiers of Dybra ſhould conſider with your ſelues, than that I ſhould ſeeme to diſtruſt of your aſſured faith, by giuing you a carefull and tedious admonition.

When Scanderbeg had with cheerefull perſuaſion thus encouraged the minds of them of Sfetigrade, he departed thence, and viſited diuers other cities of Epirus; where finding all things politiquely ordered by Moſes and the other captaines, whom he had put in truſt, he returned to his armie, then lying neere vnto Croia.

Whileſt Scanderbeg was with great carefulneſſe yet thus prouiding for the ſafegard of his Kingdome, in the meane time Amurath his armie was aſſembled at Hadrianople, to the number of a hundred and fiftie thouſand men, whereof many were pioners, and men appointed for other baſe ſeruices neceſſarie at the ſiege of townes. Of this great armie Amurath ſent fortie thouſand light horſemen before him to Sfetigrade; who according to his command came and incamped before the citie. The newes of their comming, with a great deale more than truth, was forthwith brought to Scanderbeg, then lying with his ſmall Armie neere Croia: whereupon he with foure thouſand horſe, and a thouſand foot, tooke the way toward Sfetigrade, and ſtrongly incamped his armie within ſeuen miles of the citie. Where hauing ſet all things in good order, he, accompanied with Moſes and Tanuſius, went by certaine blinde wayes thorow the mountaines and woods, vntill he came ſo neere vnto the citie, that from the place where he ſtood, he might eaſily diſcouer in what ſort the enemie lay incamped: and ſo returning backe againe to his campe, roſe with his armie in the night following, and drawing as neere vnto the Turks armie as he could, vndiſcouered, placed all his armie in the couert of the woods and ſecret vallies, vnperceiued of his enemies. After that, he ſent forth Moſes and Muſachi his nephew, with thirtie of his beſt horſemen, apparelled as if they had been but common ſouldiers, but paſſing well mounted, driuing before them certaine horſes laden with corne, by a by-way, as if they had ſecretly purpoſed to haue got into the citie. The day then breaking, they were diſcouerd by the Turks ſcouts, and ſet vpon: where at the firſt Moſes and the reſt began of purpoſe to flie; but when he ſaw that they were purſued but with like number to themſelues, he turned backe vpon the Turks, and flew fiue of them, and chaſed the reſt vnto the campe. The Generall ſeeing what had happened, ſent forth foure thouſand horſemen to purſue theſe ſuppoſed victuallers: whom they quickely recouered the ſight of, for that Moſes of purpoſe had made ſmall haſt to flie: but when the Turks began to draw nigh, Moſes left the horſes laden with corne, and fled; yet ſo, that he ſtill drew on the Turkes with hope to ouertake him, vntill he had brought them where Scanderbeg with his armie lay in wait: by whom they were ſuddenly aſſailed on euerie ſide, and with great ſlaughter put to flight. In this conflict two thouſand of the Turks were ſlaine, and a thouſand of their horſes taken: of the Chriſtians were loſt but two and twentie. This was the firſt welcome of the Turks armie to Sfetigrade.

A notable ſtratagem of Scanderbeg for the intrapping of his enemies.

About eight dayes after came Amurath with all his armie, in the beginning of May, Anno Dom. 1449, and hauing made the greateſt ſhew he could with his huge army to terrifie the defendants; he incamped the baſer ſort of his footmen at the foot of the hill whereon the citie ſtood, and lay himſelf with his Ianizaries, & other his moſt valiant ſoldiers, about three quarters of a mile further off: where after he had lien ſtill one day, & well conſidered the ſtrength of the place, toward euening he ſent a meſſengers to the city, who requeſted to ſpeak with the Gouernour Perlat. Wherof he hearing came to the wall: of whom the meſſenger requeſted, That he would command the ſouldiers ſtanding by, to go further off, for as much as he had ſomething in ſecret to ſay vnto him from his maſter. Vnto whom Perlat merrily anſwered; It is like indeed to be ſome great ſecret, that you would haue kept not onely from the hearing

A ring of my ſoldiers, but from the verie light of the day, and therefore haue choſen the night: but I haue not learned of myne elders, to heare any meſſage from mine enemies by night, neither at any time elſe out of the hearing of the gariſon ſoldiers, to whom Scanderbeg hath committed the defence of this Citie, and I the ſafegard of my perſon: you muſt therefore at this time pardon me, and to morrow if your Maſter ſo pleaſe, I will heare you at large. And therewith commanded him to depart from the walls. So he returned for that time without audience as he came. It grieued Amurath not a little, to ſee his meſſenger ſo lightly regarded: yet for as much as he had more hope to gaine the citie by large offers, or ſome reaſonable compoſition, than by all his great force, he diſſembled his wrath, and the next day ſent the meſſenger againe, with one of his Baſſa's, a graue and well ſpoken man, himſelfe borne in Epirus. This B Baſſa, with three ſoldiers, and two ſeruitors, was by the Gouernors commandement, by one of the ports receiued into the citie, and brought into Saint Maries church. Where after he had with great eloquence ſought to inſinuate himſelf into the minds of the Gouernor & the hearers, and afterwards augmented the terror of Amuraths power beyond all meaſure, laying before them the great victories by him obtained againſt the Hungarians and the other Chriſtian Princes: in fine, he exhorted them to yeeld the citie vnto him; in whoſe name hee promiſed firſt, That the citiſens ſhould in all reſpects vnder his gouernment liue as they had before done vnder Scanderbeg: then, That the gouernour ſhould receiue at Amurath his hands moſt honorable preferments, with many rich and princely gifts: and, That it ſhould be lawfull for the garriſon ſoldiers to depart in ſafetie whither they would, & to haue three hundred thouſand Aſpers diuided amongſt them in reward. But when the Baſſa had ended his ſpeech, the C Gouernor in this ſort replied:

The reſolute anſwere of Perlat the Gouernour, vnto the Baſſa.

If you had not deliuered this ſpeech vnto reſolute men, deuoted vnto the defence of their libertie, it might perhaps haue wrought ſome effect; and we (ſaid he) might peraduenture liſten vnto your offers, if we were either affraid of the Othoman King, and the vaine threats of our enemies, or elſe were wearie of the gouernment of the noble Scanderbeg. But foraſmuch as no euill deſert of his, nor good deſert of your maſters, hath yet paſſed, for which we ſhould preferre a ſtranger before our naturall Soueraigne, an enemie before a friend, a Turke before a Chriſtian; let your maſter proceed firſt in his action begun, let him prooue his fortune, let him by force terrifie vs, beat downe our walls, make hauocke of our D men, and by ſtrong hand driue vs to humble our ſelues at his feet, and to ſue for peace. But it were a great diſhonour, yea a thing almoſt to be laughed at, if we ſhould cowardly accept of theſe conditions by him offred, before any aſſault giuen, before one drop of bloud ſpilt, before any ſold er did ſo much as once groan for any wound receiued, before one ſtone were ſhaken in the wall, or any ſmall breach made: But your maſter ſhall do better to raiſe his ſiege, and get him backe againe to Hadrianople, there to ſpend the ſmall remainder of his old yeares in quiet, and not to prouoke vs his fatall enemies, whoſe courage in defence of our liberties, and fidelitie towards our Prince, he hath ſo oftentimes prooued to his great diſhonor, & loſſe of his armies. The faith I haue once giuen to my Soueraigne, for the defence of this citie, I wil neuer forget, vntill the effuſion of the laſt drop of my bloud. It ſhall be vnto me reward and honour enough, if I either liuing defend this citie, or with loſſe of my life ſhall leaue my guiltleſſe ſoule at libertie, & my carkaſſe amongſt the dead bodies of worthie ſoldiers, when I ſhall find a way into a far better place.

The General hauing giuen this reſolute anſwer vnto the Baſſa, bountifully feaſted him that E day at dinner, and afterwards led him thorow the midſt of the citie; where he ſaw great ſtore of victuals, by the gouernor commanded of purpoſe to be ſet in ſhew, to put Amurath out of hope of winning the citie by long ſiege. And ſo ſent the Baſſa out by the ſame port whereby he came in, much diſcontented with the anſwer he was to returne to his Maſter.

When Amurath vnderſtood by the Baſſa, of the gouernors reſolution, he was therwith exceeding wrath, and thereupon with his great Ordnance battered the citie three days without intermiſſion. And hauing by the furie of his artillerie made a ſmall breach, he forthwith gaue thereunto a moſt terrible aſſault, laboring firſt to win the ſame by the force and multitude of F his common ſoldiers, which the Turks call Aſapi, whom he forced by great numbers to that ſeruice. Of theſe ſouldiers the Turke in his wars maketh no great reckoning, but to blunt the ſwords of his enemies, or to abate their firſt fury, therby to giue the eaſier victory to his Ianizaries and other his better ſoldiers: which the Othoman Kings hold for good policie. Whilſt

theſe forlorne ſoldiers, without reſpect of danger preſſing forward, are ſlaine by heapes at the breach, the Ianizaries at the ſame time in another place attempted to haue ſcaled the walls of G the citie: but whilſt they with much labor & difficultie firſt crawle vp the ſteep rock wheron the citie was built, and afterward deſperatly mount vp their ſcaling ladders, they were by the defendants, with huge ſtones and weightie pieces of timber caſt vpon them, beaten downe, wherewith they were driuen headlong to the bottom of the rock, and ſo miſerably ſlain. Manie of them together with their ſkaling ladders, were by the Chriſtians thruſt from the wall, and tumbling from the rocke, violently carried with them others comming vp behind them. Some few got to the top of the ladders, and taking hold of the battlements of the walls, loſt ſome their fingers, ſome their hands, but moſt their liues, being beaten downe as the other were. Many of them which ſtood farther off, were then wounded alſo, & with ſhot from the H wals ſlain. With this miſerable ſlaughter, & no hope to preuaile, the Turks diſcouraged, began to withdraw themſelues from the aſſault: but the Baſſa's and captains ſtanding behind them, forced them again forward, exhorting ſome, threatning others, and beating the reſt forward with their trunchions. By which means the aſſault was again renewed, but not with ſuch courage as before, though with no leſſe ſlaughter: which the defendāts ſeeing, gaue from the wals great tokens of joy & triumph. Amurath perceiuing his diſcouraged ſoldiers readie of themſelues to forſake the aſſault, preſently ſent Feri-Baſſa (one of his moſt valiant captains) with a new ſupplie of 3000 choſen ſoldiers to renew the fight. The Chriſtians well aware of their comming, ceaſed not with continuall ſhot to beat them from the walls: but ſuch was the forwardnes of that fierce captain, that without regard of danger, he brought his men to the wals, I where the defendants from aboue ouerwhelmed them with ſtones, timber, wild-fire, and ſuch other things as are vſually prepared for the defence of towns beſieged. For all that, Feri-Baſſa gaue ſo great an aſſault, that he ſlew diuers of the defendants vpon the wals, and had there forcibly entred, had not the gouernor, perceiuing the danger, with a companie of freſh ſouldiers come with ſpeed to the defence of that place; wherby the enemie was preſently repulſed, and driuen again from the walls. Amurath ſeeing the great ſlaughter of his men, and no hope of ſucceſſe, cauſed a retrait to be ſounded, and ſo leauing the aſſault, retyred again into his camp. The great loſſe and diſhonor at this aſſault receiued, much troubled his waiward minde; who for all that yet ceaſed not to giue the like vaine attempts. At length, the captain of the Ianizaries perceiuing that part of the citie which was fartheſt from the campe, to be commonly but K ſlenderly manned, by reaſon that it ſeemed a place impregnable, both for the height & ſteepnes of the rock; told Amurath, That he would aſſay (if it ſo pleaſed him) ſecretly in the night to attempt by that place to enter the city; whereas they thought nothing was more to be feared, than the height thereof, which they, ſupported with the wings of deſire, doubted not to mount vnto. This his deuice exceedingly pleaſed the King, and was the next night with great ſilence put in execution. But ſuch was the carefulneſſe of the gouernor ouer euery part of his charge, that nothing could be done againſt the ſame, but that it was forthwith by him diſcouered. The gouernor aduertiſed by the Watch, of the Turks attempt; with great ſilence preſently repaired to the place with a great companie of the garriſon ſoldiers, and ſtanding cloſe, from the top of the wall beheld the Turks, as it had bin a ſwarme of Emmets, climing vp the L high rocks, and one helping vp another, by ſuch deſperat way, as was in reaſon to haue beene thought no man would haue attempted. But when they were come to the top of the rock, and now euen readie to enter, they were from aboue ſuddenly ouerwhelmed, as it had been with a ſhoure of ſhot, and ſo violently forced down that high rocke, that moſt part of them which had got vp to any height, were miſerably cruſhed to death, either with the weight of themſelues, or with others falling vpon them, and many of the reſt ſlaine with ſhot from the top of the rocke: whereof Amurath preſently vnderſtanding, was therewith exceedingly grieued.

The Turkes repulſed, retyre.

The Ianizaries deſperately attempt to ſurpriſe the citie.

The Ianizaries repulſed.

During the time of this ſiege, Scanderbeg neuer lay long ſtill in one place, but remoued continually from place to place, as beſt ſerued his purpoſe, breaking ſomtimes into one quarter of the Turks campe, & ſometime into another, & ſtraitway ſo ſuddenly gon again, and as it were M vaniſhed out of ſight, that Amurath many times wondered what was become of him. At this time, being the latter end of Iune, he was come with his army within eight miles of Amuraths campe: and from thence ſent Moſes his greateſt captaine, in the attyre of a common ſouldier, with two other, to take view how the enemie lay incamped. By which truſtie eſpials he was informed,

A enformed, That the Turks lay in great ſecuritie, as men without feare, keeping but negligent watch. Of which opportunitie, Scanderbeg reioycing, the night following ſuddenly aſſaulted one quarter of the Turks camp. Whoſe comming, although it was a little before by the Turks ſcouts diſcouered, yet his furious aſſault was ſo ſudden and ſo forcible, that he ſlew two thouſand of the Turks, and filled euery corner of that great campe with feare and tumult, before they could well arme themſelues or make reſiſtance. After which ſlaughter he ſafely retired, carrying away with him two hundred and thirtie horſe, with ſeuen of the Turks enſignes, hauing in this skirmiſh loſt of his men but two and fortie: whoſe dead bodies the Turkes the next morning in reuenge of their ſlaine friends hewed into ſmall pieces.

Vpon theſe great diſgraces one following in the neck of another, Amurath hauing no other B obiect but the citie to ſhew his furie vpon, gaue three fierce aſſaults vnto the ſame, one after another, & was alwaies with loſſe both of his men & honor repulſed. But the more he loſt, the more he burnt with deſire of reuenge, perſuading his ſoldiers, That as the ſtrongeſt cities and fortreſſes were built by mens hands, ſo were they to be ouerthrowne and laied euen with the ground by reſolute and valiant men: incouraging them to a freſh aſſault, with greater promiſes of reward than euer he had done before in all his wars, from the firſt beginning of his raigne. And becauſe he would with more ſafety giue this his laſt & greateſt aſſault, he appointed Feri-Baſſa, with twelue thouſand horſemen and ſix thouſand foot to attend vpon Scanderbeg, if he ſhould hap to come (as he thought he would) to trouble the aſſault, by aſſailing of his camp. Feri-Baſſa glad of this charge, wel hoping now to redeeme his former ouerthrow with ſome great victorie, and leading forth his armie a little from the camp, as he was commanded, ſo lay; C wiſhing for nothing more than the comming of Scanderbeg; vainely boaſting, That he would ſeek him in the field, and there trie his force and fortune with him hand to hand: which he did ſhortly after to his coſt. When Amurath had thus ſet in order all things requiſit, as wel for the ſiege, as for the ſafegard of his campe, the next morning he compaſſed the citie round about with his army, & couered the ground with his men of war, purpoſing at that time to gage his whole forces vpon the taking therof. The wals he had before in ſome places battered, ſo much as was poſſible; & yet but ſo, as that they were not without ſcaling laders to be aſſaulted: partly for the naturall ſtrength of the place, & partly for that the defendants had with great diligence continually repaired & filled vp with earth what the fury of the cannon had throwne down. This aſſault Amurath began firſt with his archers and ſmal ſhot, which deliuered their D arrows and bullets vpon the top of the wall, & into the city, as if it had bin a ſhower of hayle, therby to trouble the ſtationary ſoldiers. In this heat, ladders were clapped to the wals in euery place where any could be poſſibly reared, and the Turks began deſperatly to ſcale the wals; but the Chriſtians nothing diſmaid therat, with great courage reſiſted them, & with ſhot from their ſafe ſtandings wounded and ſlew many of them: yet others ſtil preſſed vp in the places of them that were ſlain, ſo that the aſſault began moſt terrible in many places at once, but eſpecially neere to the great gate of the citie; where the Turks had vpon the ſudden with ladders, timber, and plancks clapt together, raiſed cloſe vnto that tower, as it had bin a wooden tower, equall in height to the wall; from whence the Turks greatly diſtreſſed the Chriſtians in that E place, fighting with them as if it had bin vpon euen ground, ſtill ſending vp freſh ſouldiers in ſtead of them that were ſlain: & thereby preuailed ſo far, that they had ſet vp certain of Amuraths enſignes vpon the wall, to the great comfort of the Turkes, & aſtoniſhment of the beſieged Chriſtians. The Gouernor ſeeing the eminent danger, haſted to the place with a company of freſh and valiant ſouldiers, by whoſe force the Turks were quickly repulſed from the wal, their enſignes taken and ſent into the market place: the tower of wood with many ladders and much timber by the Turks brought to that place, was quickly conſumed with wilde fire caſt vpon the ſame from the wals. Perlat hauing deliuered the citie of this feare, preſently placed freſh ſouldiers in ſtead of them which were ſlaine or hurt, and ſo worthily defended the citie.

Whileſt Amurath was giuing this great aſſault to Sfetigrade, Scanderbeg to withdraw him F from the ſame, came with nine thouſand ſoldiers to aſſaile the Turks campe, as Amurath had before ſuſpected, & was now come very neere the ſame. Feri-Baſſa glad of his comming, oppoſed his armie againſt him: which Scanderbeg ſeeing, retired a little of purpoſe to draw the Baſſa farther from the campe, and then forthwith began to ioyne battell with him. The Baſſa conſidering the ſmal number of his enemies, & his own greater power, withdrew foure thouſand ſand horſmen out of his armie to fetch a compaſſe about, & to ſet vpon the rereward of Scanderbegs G army:hoping ſo to encloſe him,that he ſhould neuer eſcape thence,but there either to be ſlaine or taken aliue,and his army vtterly defeated. But the expert captaine perceiuing his purpoſe, to meet therwith, left Moſes to lead the main battel,and he himſelfe with two thouſand horſmen,ſo valiantly charged thoſe foure thouſand of his enemies before they were wel departed from the reſt of the Baſſaes army,that they had now more cauſe to look to their own ſafety, than how to circumuent others. In this conflict Feri-Baſſa hand to hand, as he had oft times before deſired,encountring with Scanderbeg,was by him there ſlain. All this while that Scanderbeg was in fight with Feri-Baſſa in the right wing of the army,and Muſachy in the left, Moſes ſtood faſt,receiuing the aſſault of the enemy without mouing any thing forward,expecting the ſucceſſe of the wings. But Scanderbeg hauing diſcomfited the right wing, and ſlaine H the General,comming now in,he ſet forward with ſuch force & courage,that the Turkes not able longer to abide his force, turned their backs and fled: of whom many were ſlaine in this chaſe,though Scanderbeg doubting the great power of his enemy ſo nigh at hand,durſt not follow them far; but ſounding a retrait,put his army again in good order,for feare of ſom ſudden attempt from the campe, and after appointed ſome of the meaneſt of his ſouldiers to take the ſpoile of the ſlain Turks. When Amurath had vnderſtood what had hapned to Feri-Baſſa, hee was ſo ouercome with anger and melancholy,that for a while he could not ſpeake one word: but after the heat was a little paſt,he commanded certain ſmall pieces of ordnance, which he had before vſed againſt the citie, to bee remoued into the campe,and there placed vpon that ſide which was moſt in danger to the enemie. He alſo preſently ſent thither foure thouſand I ſouldiers to ioyne with the remainder of Feri-Baſſaes armie, for defence of the campe, with ſtrait charge that they ſhould not iſſue out of the trenches. Neuertheleſſe he himſelfe continued the aſſault of the citie all that day: but when night drew on,& no hope appeared for him to preuaile,he cauſed a retrait to be ſounded; and leauing the aſſault,he returned again into his campe. At this aſſault Amurath loſt ſeuen thouſand men, beſide many that died afterwards of their wounds; but of the garriſon ſouldiers were ſlaine but ſeuentie,and ninetie moe hurt.

The terrour of the Turkiſh armie began now to grow in contempt throughout Epirus; and Scanderbeg was in good hope,that Amurath after ſo many ouerthrowes and ſhameful repulſes, would at length raiſe his ſiege and be gone: yet hee ſent ſpies continually to diſcouer what was done in the Turks campe, and he himſelfe with two thouſand ſoldiers would oftentimes K ſhew himſelfe vpon the ſides of the mountaines neere vnto Amurath his campe, of purpoſe to draw the Turkes out, that he might take them at ſome aduantage. But the old King had giuen commandement vpon paine of death, That no man ſhould goe out of the trenches without leaue,or once to ſpeake of giuing battell or aſſault: ſo that he lay certaine dayes in his camp, not like a King beſieging of a citie, but more like a man beſieged himſelfe: the which his ſtill lying, Scanderbag had the more in diſtruſt, fearing greatly that hee was hatching ſome miſchiefe, which ſo ſoone as it was ripe would violently breake out.

Amurath by great promiſes ſeeketh to corrupt the gariſon of Sfetigrade.

Amurath conſidering with what euill ſucceſſe he had many times aſſaulted the city,& holding it for a great diſhonour to raiſe his ſiege and depart, hauing done nothing worth the remembrance; thought good once againe to proue, if it were poſſible to ouercome the mindes L of the garriſon ſoldiers with gifts, whom he was not able to ſubdue by force. For which purpoſe he ſent an embaſſador vnto the city,offering vnto the beſieged and garriſon ſoldiers eaſie conditions of peace, with ſuch large gifts & rewards as had not bin heard offered to any garriſon in former time. Al which his magnificall promiſes were lightly reiected by the common conſent of al the whole garriſon,preferring their faithful loyalty before al his golden mountains.
For all that, Amurath was in good hope,that amongſt ſo many, ſome would be found,into whoſe minds his large offers might make ſome impreſſion; wherein he was not deceiued.
For one baſe minded fellow amongſt the reſt, corrupted with the Turks great promiſes,preferring his owne priuat wealth, before the welfare of his country,waiting his time had ſecret confrence with the Turks eſpials, promiſing vpon aſſurance of ſuch reward as was before by M Amurath profeſſed,to find means that in few daies the citie ſhould be yeelded into his power.
This corrupted traitor,had laid many miſchieuous plots for the effecting of this horribie treſon: but the firſt deuice he put in practiſe, which of al others a man would haue thought to haue bin of leaſt moment, ſerued his wicked purpoſe in ſtead of all the reſt. All the garriſon ſouldiers diers of Sfetigrade were of rhe vpper country of Dibra, put into thatcitie,by Moſes,for their A approued valor aboue all the other ſoldiers of Epirus.But as they were men of great courage, ſo were they exceeding ſuperſtitious both in their religion and manner of liuing,putting nice difference betwixt one kind of lawfull meat and other : accounting ſome clean,ſome vnclean; abhorring from that,which they fondly deemed vncleane,with more than a Iewiſh ſuperſtition, chuſing rather to die than to eat or drink thereof: ſuch is the ſtrong deluſion of blind error, where it hath throughly poſſeſſed the minds of men. The citie of Sfetigrade (as is aforeſaid) is ſcituate vpon the top of a great high rock,as moſt of the cities of Epirus now bee, and was then watred but with one great well in the midſt of the citie, which ſunke deepe into the rock,plentifully ſerued both the publick and priuat vſe of the inhabitants.Into this common well the malicious traitor in the night time caſt the foule ſtinking carrion carkaſſe of a dead B dod,knowing,that the conceited garriſon ſouldiers of Dibra, would rather indure the paines of death,& ſtarue,or els yeeld vp the citie,vpon any condition,than to drink of that polluted water. In the morning when that ſtinking carion was eſpied,and drawne out of the well, the report therof was quickly bruted in euery corner of the citie,& that the wel was poiſoned:ſo that al the people were in maner in an vprore about the finding out of the traitor.The citizens were exceeding ſorrie for that had hapned,but the garriſon ſoldiers deteſted that loathſom and vnclean water(as they accounted it)more than the Turkiſh ſeruitude,proteſting,that they would rather periſh with thirſt,than drink therof. Wherupon ſome of them deſired to ſet fire vpon the citie,and whileſt they had yet ſtrength,to break through the enemies camp or there manfully to die. And they which thought beſt of the matter,requeſted,that the city might be C yeelded vp; for now,they diſcouraged with a ſuperſtitious vanitie,could be content to hearken to the former conditions of peace, yea they were ready enough of themſelues to ſue to Amurath for peace, though it had bin vpon harder tearmes. The Gouernour troubled with that had hapned,and aſtonied to ſee ſo great an alteration in the minds of his ſoldiers vpon ſo ſmal occaſion:could not tell whether he might thinke it to proceed of a ſuperſtitious conceit, or of ſome ſecret compact made with Amurath. But the better to pacifie the matter,he came into the market place,and there in the hearing of al the garriſon,with many effectuall reaſons, exhorted them to continue faithful vnto their Prince and country in that honorable ſeruice; and in a matter of ſo great conſequence to make ſmall reckoning to vſe that water, which would eaſily in ſhort time be brought again to the wonted puritie and cleanneſſe: and to perſuade D them the rather,he went preſently to the wel himſelf,and in the ſight of them al drunk a great draught of the water,whoſe example the citizens following,drank likewiſe. But when it was offered to the captains and ſoldiers of the garriſon, they all refuſed to taſt therof, as if it had bin a moſt loathſome thing,or rather ſome deadly poiſon, & with great inſtance cried vnto the Gouernor, to giue vp the citie: for which cauſe many thought they were corrupted by Amuraths great promiſes. Howbeit none of the garriſon (except that one traitor)did euer afterwards reuolt to the Turkiſh king,or yet appeared any thing the richer for any gift receiued, whereby ſuch ſuſpition might be confirmed. When the Gouernor ſaw that the obſtinate minds of the garriſon were not to be mooued with any perſuaſion or reward (whereof he ſpared not ro make large promiſe)nor by any other means which he could deuiſe;he called vnto him his chief captains,with the beſt ſort of the citizens,& reſolued with them ful ſore againſt his wil,to yeeld vp the city to Amurath,on ſuch conditions as they themſelues there agreed E vpon: which were,That it ſhould be lawfull for all the captains and ſoldiers to depart in ſafetie with their armor and al other things;and that ſo many of the citizens as would ſtay,might there ſtil dwel in the city,in ſuch ſort,as they had done before,vnder the gouernment of Scanderbeg; the reſt that liſted not to remain there ſtil,might at their pleaſure with bag & baggage depart whether they would. Glad was Amurath when this offer was made vnto him,& granted them al that was deſired,ſauing that he would not conſent that the citizens ſhould continue in the citie,yet was he content that they ſhould liue vnder him as they had don before, quietly enioying all their poſſeſſions, but to build their houſes without the wal of the city : which condition ſome accepted, & ſome forſaking al, went to Scanderbeg. When all was thorowly F agreed vpon,the keys of the gates were deliuered to Amurath,& the gouernor with the captains,& al the garriſon ſoldiers ſuffered quietly to paſſe through the Turkiſh camp,as the King had promiſed. Howbeit, Mahomet the ſon of Amurath, a Prince of a cruell diſpoſition,

The carkas of a dead dog caſt by the traitor into the common wel that ſerued the citie.

The Gouerner in vaine ſeeketh to perſuade the garriſon ſouldiers to drinke of the water of the well.

earneſtly perſuaded his father, to haue broken his faith, and to haue put them all to the ſword: G ſaying, it was one of their Prophet Mahomets chiefe commandements, to vſe all crueltie for the deſtruction of the Chriſtians. But the old king would not therin hearken vnto his ſon, ſaying, That he which was deſirous to be great among men, muſt either be indeed faithful of his word and promiſe, or at leaſtwiſe ſeeme ſo to be, therby to gain the minds of the people, who naturally abhor the gouernment of a faithleſſe and cruel Prince. The traitor which corrupted the water, remained ſtill in the city, and was by Amurath rewarded with three rich ſuits of apparell, and fiftie thouſand aſpers, and had giuen vnto him beſides a yearely penſion of two thouſand duckats. But ſhort was the ioy the traitor had of this euil gotten goods: for after he had a few daies vainely triumphed in the midſt of Amurath his fauors, he was ſuddenly gone, and neuer afterwards ſeen or heard tell of; being ſecretly made away (as was ſuppoſed) by the H commandement of Amurath: whoſe noble heart could not but deteſt the traitor, although the treaſon ſerued well his purpoſe. Amurath entring into Sfetigrade, cauſed the wals to be forthwith repaired, and placed one thouſand two hundred Ianizaries in garriſon there. And raiſing his campe the firſt of September, departed out of Epirus, hauing loſt thirtie thouſand of his Turks at the ſiege of Sfetigrade; much grieued in mind for all that, that he could not vanquiſh the enemie, whom he came of purpoſe to ſubdue. In his returne, the viceroy of Aſia marched before him with the Aſian ſouldiers; in the rereward followed the viceroy of Europe with his Europeian ſouldiers: in the middeſt was Amurath himſelfe, compaſſed about with his Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the court. Scanderbeg vnderſtanding of Amurath his departure, followed ſpeedily with eight thouſand horſemen, and three thouſand foot, and taking the aduantage I of the thicke woods and mountaine ſtraits (to him well knowne) whereby that great armie was to paſſe, oftentimes skirmiſhed with the Turks, charging them ſometime in the vaward, and ſomtime in the rereward, ſometime on the one ſide, and ſomtime on the other, and ſlew many of them: whereby he ſo troubled Amurath his paſſage, that he was glad to leaue the viceroy of Romania, with 30000 to attend vpon Scanderbeg, that he himſelfe might in the meane time with more ſafety march away with the reſt of his army. Scanderbeg perceiuing the ſtay of the viceroy, ceaſed to follow Amurath further, fearing to be encloſed betweene thoſe two great armies. The viceroy ſeeing that Scanderbeg was retired, after hee had ſtaid a few dayes, followed his maſter to Hadrianople, and ſo Scanderbeg returned to Croia.

A traitor worthily rewarded according to his treaſon.

Sortly after the departute of Amurath out of Epirus, Scanderbeg left two thouſand ſouldiers K vpon the borders for defence of the country againſt the Tutks. Theſe ſouldiers ſo ſtraightly kept in the Ianizaries left in garriſon at Sfetigrade that they could not looke out of the citie, but that they were intercepted and ſlaine. And within a few daies after came himſelfe with an army of eighteen thouſand, and laid ſiege to Sfetigrade the ſpace of a month, which was from middle of September vntill the middle of October. In which time he gaue two great aſſaults to haue recouered the citie, but was both times repulſed, with the loſſe of fiue hundred men. Amurath vnderſtanding that Scanderbeg lay at the ſiege of Sfetigrade, ſent with al ſpeed to recall his armie, but lately before diſperſed. Whereof Scanderbeg hauing intelligence, conſidering alſo the difficultie of the enterpriſe, with the approch of Winter, raiſed his ſiege, and returned to Croia: where he ſet all things in the ſame order he had done before the comming L of Amurath to the ſiege of Sfetigrade, and put two thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers there in garriſon, vnder the charge of the famous captaine Vranacontes, and ſtored his citie with ſufficient victuall for a yeares ſiege, wherein he had great helpe from the Venetians and other Chriſtian Princes, for that there was then great ſcarcitie of all things in Epirus, by reaſon of the late warres. The like care he had alſo of all the reſt of his cities, being continually aduertiſed from his ſecret friends in the Turks court, of the great preparation intended againſt him by the Turkiſh King, againſt the beginning of the next Spring.

Amurath vnderſtanding that Scanderbeg was departed from Sfetigrade, changed his former determination for the calling backe againe of his armie, and appointed it to meet againe at Hadrianople, in the beginning of March following: whether the Baſſaes, and other great commanders, M at the time appointed, aſſembled with their companies, according as Amurath had before commanded. So that by the latter end of March, he had there in readineſſe an army of an hundred and threeſcore thouſand men ſtrong. Of which great multitude, he after the manner of the Turkiſh wars, ſent forty thouſand horſemen, vnder the leading of Sebalyas a politick

A captaine, as his vauntcourriers into Epirus, in the beginning of Aprill, in the yeare 1450. The valiant captaine with great ſpeed and no reſiſtance entred into Epirus, as was giuen him in charge, and without let came to Croia: where, after he had aduiſedly conſidered of the ſcituation thereof, and of the places thereabouts, he ſtrongly encamped himſelfe neere thereunto in the pleaſant plaine called Tyranna: and there within his trenches kept his ſouldiers cloſe, attending nothing more, but that no new ſupplie of men, munition, or victuals, ſhould be conueied into the citie, more than was therein before his comming. For he was not able with his horſemen to doe any thing againſt the citie: and Scanderbeg had left nothing abroad in the countrey ſubiect to his fury. Beſides that, he was expreſly by Amurath forbidden, to attempt any thing againſt Scanderbeg himſelfe.

B After Sebalyas had twentie dayes thus lyen encamped before Croia, neither doing nor taking harme; Amurath by reaſon of his great age, hauing marched oftentimes but fiue miles a day, came thither alſo with his whole armie, wherewith he filled al the country round about: the very ſight whereof, had bin enough to haue diſcouraged the ſmall garriſon in Croia, had they not bin men both of great experience and reſolution. Where after he had ſpent foure dayes in ſettling of his campe, he ſent two meſſengers vnto the Gouernour (as the manner of the Turks is) offering him if he would yeeld vp the citie, that it ſhould be lawful for him with all his ſouldiers in ſafetie with bag and baggage to depart; and the Gouernor himſelfe to receiue in reward two hundred thouſand aſpers, with an honourable place amongſt the great Baſſaes of his court, if it would pleaſe him to accept thereof: and further, that the citizens ſhould enioy all their antient liberties as in former time, without any alteration; with promiſe C alſo of greater. Theſe meſſengers comming to the gates of the citie, could not be ſuffered to enter, but ſtanding without, were commanded there to deliuer their meſſage: which when the Gouernor had heard, he ſcornefully reiected their offers, and returned the meſſengers ſhamefully derided by the ſouldiers which ſtood vpon the wall. Amurath more offended with this contempt, than the refuſall of his offers; and ſeeing no other means to gaine the citie, conuerted all his deuices vnto the ſiege thereof. Wherefore he firſt commanded ten great pieces of artillerie to be forthwith caſt, for he had brought with him none readie made, becauſe of the difficult paſſage ouer the high mountaines into Epirus; whereby it ſeemed to be a matter of infinit trouble to haue brought his great ordnance: and therefore carried with him great ſtore of mettall in maſſe, whereof at his pleaſure to make his great artillerie as he ſaw cauſe. In fif-D teen daies this worke was brought to perfection, and ten pieces of huge greatneſſe were ready mounted vpon carriages. Six of them hee placed againſt the Eaſt ſide of the citie, towards the plaine of Tyranna, and the other foure againſt the gate: in which two places onely, Croia was ſubiect to batterie, being on all other parts naturally defended with impregnable rocks, vpon the tops whereof were built faire battlements, more for beautie than needfull defence. Theſe two places Amurath battered foure dayes continually, and with the fury of his artillery had in both places beaten downe halfe the wall, & ſore ſhaken the reſt. Wherewith the Turks were exceedingly encouraged, & with great cheerfulnes made all things ready to aſſault theſe breaches, whenſoeuer Amurath ſhould command, ſtriuing among themſelues who ſhoud ſhew himſelfe moſt forward in that dangerous enterpriſe. And Mahomet the yong Prince, the more to encourage the ſoldiers, beſides the great rewards by his father propoſed, promiſed of himſelfe to giue an hundred thouſand aſpers vnto him that ſhould firſt ſet vp an enſigne vpon the E wals of the citie. The garriſon ſoldiers on the other ſide, conſidering that the whole ſtate and welfare of Epirus was repoſed in their valour, and that the eyes of moſt part of Chriſtendome were as it were fixed vpon them, were nothing diſmayed with the breaches made, but manfully comforted and encouraged one another to endure all manner of perill and danger that might poſſibly chance: but eſpecially the worthie Gouernour Vranacontes, who going through the middeſt of his ſouldiers, and ſhaking ſome of them by the hands, withall ſaid:

Croia battered.

Theſe, theſe are the fortreſſes of our citie, theſe are the inuincible bulwarkes, theſe are the irremoo-F uable ſtones and ſureſt ſement. What honour? what praiſe? what triumph ſhould we hope for? if theſe wals ſtanding whole and ſtrong, wee ſhould lie ſhrouded vnder the defence of them, and not they defended by vs? So can cowards defend cities, and ſheepe feare not the wolues rage, when they are ſafely ſhut vp within the wals of their ſheepecoats: But that is the praiſe of the walls, and not of the men.

The cheerefull ſpeech of Vranacontes the Gouernour to encourage his ſouldiers.

worthie Caſtriot our Prince hath commended this his city to be defended by vs, and not vs by it. Honor is attended vpon with danger, and foſtered vp amongſt perils : euery baſe mariner may be a maſter in faire weather : and firme things ſtand of themſelues, and need not our vpholding. Wherefore, men of worth ſhun ſuch things, which being kept or loſt, yeeld like praiſe. Things readie to fall, need ſhoaring, and thither haſteth honour, and there (worthie ſouldiers) appeareth courage and valour. Wherefore let our valiant right hands defend theſe broken breaches, and in ſtead of theſe dead wals, couragiouſly oppoſe our luſtie and liuely armed bodies againſt the force of our enemies. If theſe wals ſtood ſtill firme, and vnbattered, you ſhould then fight from the top of them like women; but now that they are ſomething ſhaken, you ſhall as men ſtand vpon ſomewhat more euen ground, and encounter your enemies hand to hand, the better to ſatisfie your furious deſire. Where I alſo in the thickeſt, ſhall eaſily view and iudge of euery mans priuate courage in particular, and of all your valour in common. And yet if wee well conſider of the matter, the place it ſelfe doth yet notably make for vs; and our former good hopes are little or nothing by theſe ſmall breaches diminiſhed: for, this riſing of the hil (not poſsible to be taken from vs) although it be not ſo high as it is in other places, yet, doth it not ſerue vs ſufficiently at great aduantage to charge our enemies, and hinder their aſſault? The ſteepneſſe whereof, as it wil bee troubleſome vnto them, ſo will it keepe vs moſt freſh in ſtrength, and make our ſhot more forcible. Wherefore this had beene a thing of vs to haue beene wiſhen for, if wee deſire the ſlaughter of our enemies at this ſiege, or if we wiſh for perpetuall honour and glorie by this warre. For this breach of the wals will encourage theſe Barbarians, and allure their armed men to clime vp in greater multitude than if the wals were whole; whereof ſo many ſhall on euery ſide be eaſily ſlaine, as we ſhall but aime at: except you had rather ſit ſtil, holding your hands together in your boſomes as cowards. Their dead bodies ſhall fill vp the breaches againe, if you be men mindfull of your libertie. What is there (worthie captaines and ſouldiers) that letteth our victorie? or memorable ſlaughter of our enemies? by whom onely theſe two places of the citie can be aſſaulted: all the reſt is out of danger, and feares no enemies force. Here onely is the pains to be taken, this onely is left for you to defend, and here ſhall you all be : the courage, force, and ſtrength of you all ſhall in this place appeare. How will you ſo many worthie captains, and valiant ſouldiers, in ſo little roome beſtow your ſelues? We are too many defendants for ſo ſmall breaches. Yet let vs play the men, & doe our endeuour : let vs in one conflict weaken the tyrants ſtrength, and burſt his proud heart; he will forſake this city, and raiſe his ſiege vnfortunatly begun, ſo ſoone as he ſhall ſee his firſt aſſault to coſt him the liues of ſo many thouſands of his men.

Croia aſſaulted

When Vranacontes had with this comfortable ſpeech thus encouraged his ſouldiers, againſt the aſſault which he expected the next day ; and had with great care & diligence ſet al things in order for the ſame, & repaired the breaches as wel as was poſſible in that caſe, he gaue them leaue for that night to take their reſt. In the morning Amurath commanded the aſſault to be giuen to both the breaches, which was forthwith by the Turks cheerfully begun, and euery man buſie to perform the ſeruice he was appointed vnto. But by that time that the aſſault was well begun, a ſudden alarum was raiſed throughout all the Turks campe: for Scanderbeg with fiue thouſand valiant ſouldiers, had ſuddenly broken in vpon one ſide of the Turkes great camp, and at the firſt encounter had ſlain ſix hundred of the Turks, and was now ſpoiling their tents. The rumor wherof, troubled the whole campe, and made the Turks with leſſe courage to aſſault the breaches, for feare of the danger behind them. Amurath although he had great confidence in them whom he had before left for the ſafegard of his tents, yet for more ſurety ſent Seremet one of his greateſt captains, with forue thouſand ſoldiers back into the camp, for more ſurety; ſaying, that nothing could be too ſure, againſt that wild beaſt: meaning the fury of Scanderbeg. Mahomet alſo the yong prince, haſted thither in great choler with his guard, much againſt his fathers wil. But Moſes, Scanderbegs lieutenant, knowing himſelfe too weak to withſtand the multitude that was ſwarming thither (contenting himſelf with that which was already don) had before Mahomets comming, ſpeedily retired with all his army into the ſafegard of the mountains, from whence he came : hauing done great harme in the Turks campe, with the loſſe but of ten men.

Scanderbeg in danger.

Scanderbeg in the heat of this skirmiſh, forgetting himſelf, had ſo far engaged himſelf among the Turks, that he was by them on euery ſide encloſed, & in great danger to haue bin ſlaine or taken : yet valiantly breaking through them, he eſcaped the danger, and recouered the mountains, and with much ado came at length to his camp, to the great ioy and comfort of them all, being before in great feare he had bin loſt. This was accounted

A the greateſt ouerſight of Scanderbeg in all his wars; for ſo much as the office of a good Generall conſiſteth not in aduenturing of his perſon to manifeſt danger,but in the politick gouernment of his charge. During the time that Scanderbeg thus aſſailed the Turks campe, Amurath but faintly aſſaulted the breaches, expecting the ſucceſſe in the campe: but when he vnderſtood that Scanderbeg was retyred, and all quieted, he brought all his forces to the walls, and firſt with the multitude of his archers and ſmall ſhot laboured to driue the defendants from the wals,ouerwhelming them with arrows falling as thicke as haile. And likewiſe at the ſame time other common ſoldiers of baſer account,brought ſcaling ladders and other things needfull for the ſcaling of the walls. After whom alſo followed the Ianizaries and other choſen ſoldiers,readie to mount the ladders ſo ſoon as they ſhould be ſet to the wals. But whilſt they B climbe vp the high hills in this order,the garriſon ſoldiers made ſuch ſlaughter of them with ſhot from the wals and out of the citie,that they would haue preſently retyred, had they not bin forced forward by their captaines, who ſpared neither ſtripes nor wounds, when words would not ſerue. By this tyrannicall means, the ſcaling ladders were with great ſlaughter of the common ſoldiers ſet vp againſt the walls,and the Turks climing vp,came to handy blows with the defendants at the breaches: nothing was to be heard but the crying of people, the clattering of armor,& the inſtruments of war,which was terribly redoubled with the eccho's from the mountaines round about. The Turks doing what they might to win the breaches, were by the Chriſtians worthily repulſed, & with their ladders tumbled headlong down the mountain,with ſuch horrible ſlaughter and diſcomfiture, eſpecially of the common ſoldiers, that none of them would ſet one foot forward again toward the wals,although they had ſmall C hope to ſaue themſelues by retyring back: for the fierce yong prince Mahomet euen then making ſhew of his cruell diſpoſition,cauſed them that returned,to be ſlain,by the terror thereof to driue others forward. Theſe common ſoldiers,whom the Turks make ſmall reckoning of, are for the moſt part miſerable Chriſtians,which liue in ſuch countries as had ſomtimes receiued the faith of Chriſt, but are now vnder the Turkiſh ſlauerie; of which ſort of wretched people the Turkiſh tyrants draw with them great multitudes in their warres,moſt commonly vnarmed,becauſe they dare not wel truſt them in wars againſt the Chriſtians: theſe carry all the baggage of the campe;theſe ſerue to fetch wood and water for other ſoldiers of better account; theſe ſerue in ſtead of pioners, to caſt trenches and raiſe bulwarks; and when battell is D to be giuen,if it be in plain field,theſe haue then weapons put into their hands,and thruſt into the fore front of the battel,to blunt the enemies ſwords: but if a city be to be beſieged,theſe ſerue as fit matter to fill vp the breaches with their dead bodies,or to make bridges for other ſoldiers to paſſe ouer vpon:and if they ſhrink to attempt any thing they are commanded,then are they more cruelly vſed by their commanders than by their enemies. When Amurath ſaw his ſoldiers ſo diſcouraged,he ſtood in doubt whether it were better for that time to ſound a retrait, or to ſend a new ſupplie: but being inraged with the loſſe of his men, and deſirous to be in ſome part reuenged,he ſent diuers companies of his better ſouldiers,for the incouragement of them which were before diſcouraged,and ſo gaue a freſh aſſault: but with as euill or worſe ſucceſſe than before; for Vranacontes had withdrawn from the breaches all thoſe ſoldiers which had indured the former aſſault,and placed other freſh & luſtie men in their ſtead; who incouraged with the former victorie, and loth to be accounted inferior to their fellows, repulſed the Turks with double ſlaughter: vntil that the aged King,not able longer to behold E the endleſſe loſſe of his men,cauſed a retrait to be ſounded; which al his ſoldiers were glad to heare, and ſo returned into his campe, hauing loſt in thoſe two aſſaults eight thouſand men, without any notable harme done vnto the defendants worth the remembrance.

Mahomet thinking to deceiue Scanderbeg, is himſelfe by him deceiued.

This ſhameful repulſe much grieued all the captains & commanders of Amuraths army, but eſpecially Mahomet the young Prince,whoſe violent nature vnacquainted with miſhap,burnt impatiently with reuenge. Wherefore vnderſtanding that Scanderbeg lay intrenched vpon the mountain of Tumeniſt,not far from his fathers army,he drew moſt of the beſt & readieſt ſoldiers of all the whole camp,into that quarter which was neereſt vnto Scanderbeg: of purpoſe F that if he ſhould again aſſaile the campe in that place (as it was moſt like he would) he ſhould be incountered with ſo many braue and valiant men there in readineſſe, as that it ſhould be hard for him either to do any great harme,or for himſelfe to eſcape. Of all which, Scanderbeg by certaine fugitiues had intelligence, as alſo in what order the campe lay: whereupon hee left Moſes with fiue hundred ſoldiers in the place where he lay ; taking order with him before his departure , that he at a certaine appointed houre in the night following, ſhould aſſaile the Turks campe in the quarter next vnto him where Mahomet lay ; and hauing there raiſed ſome tumult, ſpeedily to retyre again to his aſſured ſtrength in the mountaine. Scanderbeg himſelfe with the whole ſtrength of his armie, in number about 8000, in the meane time tooke a compaſſe, and by certaine ſecret by-wayes through the woods and mountaines, came vnto the farther ſide of the Turks campe, to a place called Mountecle. The night following, Moſes at the appointed houre with his 500 ſouldiers aſſailed that part of the Turks campe next vnto him, with ſuch noyſe and tumult as if it had been ſome great armie. By occaſion whereof, all the Turks camp was in alarm, and drew in haſt to that place where they heard that great tumult, as was before by Mahomet commanded. When at the ſame inſtant, Scanderbeg with all his Armie brake into the other ſide of the Turks campe, where he was leaſt feared or looked for, and from whence the beſt ſoldiers were before drawne by Mahomet; and there made ſuch ſlaughter and hauocke of the reſt (not knowing which way to turne themſelues) that the loſſe a little before receiued vnder the walls of Croia, was now forgot, as a ſmall thing in compariſon of this. Moſes hauing raiſed a great feare, and done little harme, returned in ſafetie to his well known ſtrength ; and Scanderbeg hauing made great ſpoyle in the campe, fearing to be oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies, if he ſhould there longer ſtay , returned in good time, hauing ſcarce loſt one man.

Amurath after this great loſſe and trouble of his campe, withdrew moſt of his ſmall Ordnance which he had before bent againſt the citie, into his trenches, placing it as commodiouſly as he might, for the defence thereof againſt the ſudden attempts of Scanderbeg. Yet for as much as he could not in that hot ſeaſon of the yeare ſo cloſely incampe his great armie, but that ſome part thereof would ſtill be in like danger as before ; he therefore appointed Sebalias with 16000 ſoldiers to attend vpon Scanderbeg, that he ſhould no more trouble the campe. After which order taken, he battered the walls of Croia afreſh, and with his great ordnance ouerthrew whatſoeuer the citiſens had repaired, making the breaches greater, and more ſaultable than before, intending once againe by a new aſſault to proue his fortune, and the force of his ſoldiers : which he appointed to be the next day. But when he perceiued no ſigne of courage or good hope in the heauie countenances of them diſcouraged, and that they yeelded to him their conſents, rather for feare and ſhame, than for hope of victorie ; he called them cowards, diſcouraged with the leaſt frowne of fortune ; and ſaid, Euerie weake caſtle is able to hold out one aſſault : but if you will draw theſe wilde beaſts out of their dens, you muſt arme your ſelues like reſolute men of inuincible courage, to indure what thing ſoeuer ſhal happen. Great Captains with their puiſſant armies haue growne old vnder the walls of their enemies, vpon light and ſmal diſpleaſures : and will you hauing receiued ſo many diſgraces of theſe perjured Epirots , leaue them all vnreuenged? What great victorie was euer yet by any man gained without bloudſhed? Remember the moſt glorious victorie of Varna. It is hard without bloudie hands to put the yoke vpon the fierce enemies necke. All honorable things are brought to paſſe with aduenture and labour; and the end of this war dependeth of the taking of Croia : if it were once woon, all this warre were at an end: which if Scanderbeg loſe (being the ſtrength of his kingdome, he will not tarrie one day longer in Epirus. Wherfore be of good cheere, and couragiouſly ſet vpon it : there is not more vncertainty in any thing, than in matters of war : Fortune is to be prooued, and oftentimes prouoked of him that wil wed her. And yet I will not denie, but that we muſt goe more warily to worke againſt this enemie, and hazard our ſelues with better aduiſement, and not without reaſon like wild beaſts to run headlong vpon our owne death. At length we ſhall weare them out, if we kill but ten of them at an aſſault : yet are they dayly to be aſſailed, that they may haue no leiſure to refreſh themſelues, and to make vp their breaches : and peraduenture if force may not preuaile, fortune may find ſome meane that we looke not for, as it fell out at the ſiege of Sfetigrade, beyond all our expectation. Treaſon is ingenious, and mens deſires great, where great rewards are propounded.

With theſe and like ſpeeches old Amurath encouraged his captains & ſoldiers, and the next day early in the morning began the aſſault, which the Turks valiantly attempted ; and without regard of danger came to the gates of the Citie, aſſaying, but with vaine and deſperat labour, A bour to haue broken them open. In this aſſault wild fire was caſt into many places of the city, and the great artillerie oftentimes diſcharged into the breaches: whereby many of the Turks themſelues were ſlain with their owne great ſhot, together with the Chriſtians: for Amurath deſperately ſet, was content to buy the life of one Chriſtian with the loſſe of twenty of his Turks. But the Chriſtians ſtill valiantly repulſed their enemies, ſo that of them that came to the gates, none eſcaped aliue; and of them that aſſaulted the great breach, they which were moſt forward, were firſt ſlaine, and they which ſtood farther off, were ſore wounded with ſhot. Yet for all that, Amurath ſtill maintained the aſſault, by ſending in of new ſupplies, delighting to ſee them goe forward, but grieued at the heart to ſee them ſo ſlaine: vntill at laſt wearie with beholding the ſlaughter of his men, hee cauſed a retrait to be ſounded, and ſo ended the aſſault; B perſuaded by his Baſſaes, not wilfully to caſt away his valiant ſoldiers where there was no hope to preuaile, but to reſerue them for his better ſeruice.

The Turkes retire.

Amurath ſeeketh to vndermine Croia.

Amurath now out of hope to win the city by aſſault, thought good to proue what might be don by vndermining of the ſame: during which worke he cauſed ſmall alarums daily to be giuen vnto the citie, to the intent that the defendants buſied therewith, ſhould not perceiue the ſecret worke of the mine. About which time his prouiſion of corn began to faile in his camp; for which cauſe he ſent his purueyors for corne to Liſia, a citie of the Venetians, with whom he was at that time in league, and bought of them great ſtore of corne. But as his officers were conueying it to his campe, Scanderbeg hauing intelligence thereof, ſlew the conuoy, & carried away with him all that prouiſion, diuiding it among his owne ſoldiers. Howbeit, not long after, C Amurath receiued great aboundance of corne and other prouiſion out of Macedonia: beſide that, the Venetian marchants afterward furniſhed him with plentie of corne, oyle, hony, and other neceſſaries; which Scanderbeg might well haue hindered, but that he would not in ſo doing offend the Venetians, which were alſo his ſecret friends, conſidering that Amurath might haue had all the ſame prouiſion out of the further part of Macedonia, Thracia, Myſia, and ſuch other places, if he had not otherwiſe had it from the Venetians.

Whileſt Amurath thus lay expecting the ſucceſſe of his mine, foure hundred of the garriſon ſouldiers of Croia ſallying out of the citie, chaſed diuers of the Turks that were come forth backe againe vnto the campe: wherof Amurath was glad, hoping, that they encouraged with that good hap, would to their further loſſe giue the like attempt afterwards. But the ſtaid diſcretion D of the Gouernour deceiued that his expectation; who conſidering the danger, would not ſuffer his ſoldiers any more to ſallie out of the citie. Scanderbeg alſo at this time hauing encreaſed his army with a new ſupply of two thouſand ſouldiers, diuided the ſame into three parts; deliuering one part to Moſes, another to Tanuſie; and reſeruing the third vnto himſelfe. With this armie of nine thouſand thus diuided, he determined by night at one inſtant to aſſaile the Turks great camp in three diuers places, apointing in which quarter euery one ſhould charge. But as Scanderbeg in the night appointed, was comming towards the Turks campe, hee was diſcouered by their ſcouts: wherupon a ſudden alarum was raiſed in the campe, & al mens minds turned that way, & ſoldiers appointed with al diligence to guard that ſide of the camp. But whilſt the Turks were al at gaze this way for feare of Scanderbeg, Moſes and Tanuſie, in the E dead of the night, at one time aſſailed the Turks camp in two diuers quarters, as they were appointed, where they ſlew a number of the Turks, and made great ſpoile. At which time Scanderbeg did alſo what he might: but by reaſon he was before diſcouered, did not much harme. Vpon the approch of the day Scanderbeg retired againe to the hils, & by that time it was faire daylight, ſate down vpon the ſide of a great mountain, about twenty furlongs off; in the open ſight of all the Turks camp: which he did of purpoſe, that Moſes and Tanuſie, which were by night retired into the mountains, might ſee which way to hold, to meet with him again. But the Turks thinking that he ſtood there to braue their whole camp, & as it were to deface them to the great encouragement of the defendants: diuers of them earneſtly craued leaue of Amurath, F that they might goe vp to him, & at leaſtwiſe beat him out of ſight: which he granting, 12000 of his beſt ſouldiers, whereof 7000 were horſemen, and the reſt foot, preſently ſet forward to encounter him. Scanderbeg ſeeing them all the way they came, vpon their approch ſoftly retired a little farther vp into the mountaines, ſtil expecting the comming of Moſes and Tanuſie. The Turkes vnacquainted hith ſuch difficult waies, marched vp the ſteepe hils after Scanderbeg with much labour and pain, wel wearied of themſelues: but when they were come a great way into the mountaines, they perceiued by the riſing of the duſt, that ſome greater force was comming croſſe thoſe mountaines; and not long after they might plainely ſee the foremoſt of their enemies. Wherefore fearing to be encloſed, they began to retyre, in which retrait Scanderbeg hardly purſued them, and hauing the aduantage of the ground, ſlew many of them but eſpecially with his archers. Moſes alſo comming afreſh on another ſide, cauſed them to flie down the hill amaine, and beſide the ſlaughter that he made, tooke diuers priſoners. After which victorie by Scanderbeg obtained in the ſight of Amurath and his whole Armie, he retyred again into the mountaines.

The late ſpoyle of the Turks campe, with this ouerthrow of the ſouldiers but now ſent againſt Scanderbeg, much grieued the old tyrant: but the worke of the mine, wherein he had of long layd vp his greateſt hope, ſorting now to no good purpoſe, being deemed as wel an endleſſe peece of worke, for the naturall hardneſſe of the rocke, as alſo of ſmall importance, for that it was by the defendants diſcouered, draue him to his wits end. His forces he had to his great loſſe ſufficiently proued, and ſtil found them too weake: and policie preuailed not. Nothing now remained, but to prooue if by great gifts and glorious promiſes he could firſt corrupt the faith of the Gouernor, and afterwards the garriſon: wherein he determined to ſpare no coſt. Vpon which reſolution he ſent one of his Baſſa's (a man of great authoritie and dexteritie of wit) vnto Vranacontes, with ſuch rich gifts and preſents as might haue mooued a right conſtant mind: commanding the Baſſa (if it were poſſible) firſt to faſten the ſame vpon the gouernor, as preſents ſent from Amurath of meere bountie, in the honor of his valiant mind; and afterwards to deliuer his meſſage, not ſparing to promiſe any thing for the giuing vp of the citie, yea more than ſhould be deſired. The Baſſa attended on but with two ſeruants, came with this rich Preſent neere to the gates of the citie, and there ſtayed vntill the gouernors pleaſure were known: by whoſe command he was receiued into the citie, and brought to his preſence. Then the Baſſa with much reuerence, and many magnifical words, preſented vnto Vranacontes the rich gifts ſent from Amurath, and would forthwith haue deliuered them vnto him, as the rewards of his valour. But Vranacontes willed him firſt to declare his meſſage from Amurath, vpon the hearing wherof he would (as he ſaid) as he ſaw cauſe, either receiue or refuſe them: before which time he would not be beholden to his enemie, by receiuing from him the leaſt courteſie. With which anſwer the ſubtill Baſſa nothing diſmayed, with great conſtancie thus began to deliuer his meſſage:

The craftie ſpeech of the Baſſa ſent from Amurath to corrupt the Gouernour, and to perſuade the ſoldiers to yeeld vp the citie.

Howſoeuer we agree (ſaid he) vpon other matters we come for, we brought not theſe gifts of purpoſe to deceiue any: for ſo men vſe to deale with their children and ſeruants, and not with men of courage and valour. And albeit that enemies gifts are euer to be ſuſpected, (as you haue right wiſely ſaid, and we our ſelues know) yet we durſt not for ſhame come vnto ſo worthie a Gouernour (as the common ſaying is) emptie handed: neither ought you, if you be the man you ſeeme to be, and whom men report you are, to refuſe our courteſie. Take theſe Preſents in good part, which ſhall no way inforce or hinder you to determine or diſpoſe of your affaires otherwiſe than ſhall ſeeme vnto you good: neither ſhall we once obiect vnto you theſe gifts, which we ſo franke and freely offer in the great Sultans name, whether you reject or admit our demaunds and meſſage; wherein there is (perhaps) no leſſe regard had of your good, than of ours. For there is no greater token of a baſe mind, than to giue, in hope to receiue againe. We come vnto you frankely, (worthie Gouernour) I ſpeake it from my heart: we goe not about with filed ſpeech and rich rewards to circumuent thee, whoſe inuincible mind we haue ſo often in vaine prooued with our Forces and power. That is it for which Amurath loueth thee; he doth wonderfully admire the vertues of his enemies, and if it were poſsible, deſireth to haue them with himſelfe. There verily with ſo mightie a Monarch might thy inuincible mind and pregnant finde a better way vnto the higheſt type of Fortunes bliſſe. Not that I condemne Scanderbeg, whom we his enemies doe highly commend, for his Countrey ſo well recouered, and ſo oftentimes worthily defended, yet chiefely by your helpe: but you are worthie of another manner of Soueraigne, and of another manner of Calling, and not to ſpend all the dayes of your life, and ſuch heroicall vertues, in obſcuritie, and (without offence be it ſayd) in contemptible baſeneſſe. Beſides that, Scanderbeg his eſtate is but momentarie, the Deſtinies haue aſsigned vnto him too too mightie an Enemie; his deſtruction may well be deferred, but not by any means auoyded. Amurath hath conceiued againſt him an implacable diſpleaſure, and prepared his forces accordingly: he hath ſworne to ſpare no coſt, no labour, no danger: and that he will

A wil neuer whilſt he liueth depart out of Epirus, before he haue impoſed a deadly yoke on his neck. And behold, the firſt of this miſerie beginneth at this citie, and vpon your ſelues. We dayly heare his pauilions ſound with theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches, That he will neuer depart out of this place before he haue taken this citie, and ſatisfied his angrie mind with the torture of your bodies; no, not if he ſhould therefore loſe Hadrianople, yea, and that more is, his whole kingdome. And verily he will do it, which I feare to diuine or thinke vpon: For although I with others, beare againſt you the mind of an enemie; yet am I a man, and moued with humane compaſſion: beleeue me (ye men of Croia) beleeue me, my eyes would ſcarcely endure to behold the horrible ſpectacle of your miſerable fortune. I tell you againe, he will do it, except you change your purpoſe, and now receiue health, life, libertie, and peace, whileſt it is ſo freely offered. For albeit that this notable ſtrong place, theſe impregnable walls, and eſpecially your own valor, do yet defend you; how long will it hold out? Verily no longer than you haue victuall, no longer than you haue meat B to ſuſtaine your bodies. Do you thinke that Amurath will raiſe his ſiege in the middle of the heat of this war, and be gon? No, no, if force will not preuaile, if all his attempts faile, yet ſhall you ſee and feele theſe enemies continually to your hurt; you ſhall always haue theſe tents in your eyes, and at your gates, vntill long famin, which maſtereth all things, tame your courage alſo. I pray you, what hope haue you left? from whence ariſeth in your reſolute minds ſuch deſperat contempt of danger? Can Scanderbeg victuall you, being ſo ſtraightly beſieged? which hideth himſelfe (poore man) in the woods all day, and flieth ouer the tops of the mountaines, loaden with trauell and care, ſcarce able to relieue his owne miſerie.
Or will the Venetians relieue you, which dayly bring vnto vs and ſtore vs with too too great plentie of all things neceſſarie for this war againſt you. Wherefore repent your too much hardineſſe, and gather your wits together: behold, I your enemie aduiſe you: you haue long enough continued in C your obſtinacie: your countrie and libertie is not ſo far to be defended, as that you ſhould therefore fight againſt God. But wherefore do I call this, libertie? you muſt giue place vnto your fortune, and learne to obey them that be too ſtrong for you. You ſhal find aſſured libertie, rich rewards, perpetual reſt with Amurath. Prouide for your ſelues, if you be wiſe, whileſt all things are yet whole for you to determine of; whileſt we your enemies exhort and requeſt you, and had rather haue you our voluntary companions and friends, than our enforced ſeruants and ſlaues.

This the Baſſa ſpake with great grauitie, and no leſſe vehemencie, expecting ſome great motions to haue riſen in the minds of the ſouldiers. But when he perceiued that his ſpeech had rather filled them with indignation, than with feare; and that it was but a vaine thing to D go about to terrifie them with words, whom all the power of Amurath could not make afraid with weapons, he requeſted to talke alone with the gouernor in ſecret: which was alſo granted.
For all men had no leſſe good opinion of the worthie Gouernours fidelitie, than of his great wiſedome and valour. The craftie Baſſa hauing him by himſelfe, began with great cunning to deliuer his more ſecret meſſage: when Vranacontes perceiuing by a little, what the whole tale meant, interrupted him in the middle of his ſpeech, and without more adoo commanded him to depart: ſtraitly charging him, That neither he nor any other ſhould after that time preſume to come from his Maſter to the citie, to ſpeake with him about any ſuch diſhonourable matter; for if he did, he would in deteſtation thereof cauſe their hands, their noſe, their eares to be cut off, and ſo returne them diſmembred, in ſtead of anſwer. And ſo the Baſſa E was with his Preſents againe turned out of the Citie, and no man ſuffered to receiue any thing of him in reward, although the ſouldiers could haue beene well content to haue eaſed him and his Seruants of that carriage, if the Gouernour whould but haue winked thereat.

Vranacontes rejecteth Amuraths Preſents, and threatneth the Baſſa.

Great was the expectation in the Turks camp, of the Baſſa's returne: but when they ſaw the Preſents were not receiued, they eaſily gueſſed that all went not as they wiſhed. But when Amurath himſelfe vnderſtood the gouernors reſolute anſwer, he in great rage commanded all things to be made readie for a freſh aſſault: which he did rather to ſatisfie his anger, than vpon any hope he had to preuaile therein. The next day he cauſed a furious aſſault to be giuen to F the citie, but with greater loſſe to himſelfe than before; the Chriſtians ſtill valiantly defending the citie againſt the Turkiſh furie. In this aſſault many of the Turkes were ſlaine at the breach with their own great ſhot: for whileſt Amurath ſought therewith to driue the Chriſtians from the defence of the breach, he ſlew a great number more of the forwardeſt of his own men, than he did of the defendants. But wearied at length to behold the endleſſe ſlaughter of

Croia againe in vaine aſſaulted his men, he gaue ouer the aſſault, and returned into his camp, as if he had bin a man halfe franticke or diſtract of his wits; and there ſate downe in his tent, all that day full of melancholie paſſions, ſometimes violently pulling his hoarie beard and white locks, complaining of his hard and diſaſter fortune, that he had liued ſo long to ſee thoſe daies of diſgrace, wherein all his former glorie and triumphant victories were obſcured, by one baſe towne of Epirus. His Baſſaes and graue counſellors labouring in the meane time with long diſcourſes to comfort him vp: ſometimes recounting vnto him his many and glorious victories, and other whiles producing antient examples of like euent. But darke and heauy conceits had ſo ouerwhelmed the melancholie old tyrant, that nothing could content his waiward mind, or reuiue his dying ſpirits: ſo that the little remainder of naturall heat which was left in his aged bodie now oppreſſed & almoſt extinguiſhed with melancholie conceits, & his aged body dried vp with ſorrow, he became ſick for griefe. Wherupon by the counſell of ſome of his Baſſaes, he ſent an embaſſador to Scanderbeg, offering him peace, if he would yeeld to pay to him a yerely tribute of ten thouſand duckats: thinking by that means his honor to be wel ſaued, if before his departure out of Epirus, he could but make Scanderbeg his tributarie. This embaſſador was by Scanderbeg honourable entertained in his campe, but the offered peace at the ſame time vtterly refuſed. The embaſſador returning to Amurath, declared vnto him the euill ſucceſſe of his embaſſage, which greatly increaſed his melancholie ſickneſſe. And Scanderbeg to grieue him the more, vnderſtanding that he was dangerouſly ſicke, and that the great Baſſaes were more carefull of the Kings health, than of the ſucceſſe of the warres; diuers times aſſailed the Turkes campe. Which thing though the Baſſaes kept from his knowledge with all carefulneſſe; yet he oftentimes ſuſpected the matter, by the often alarums and tumults in the campe, and with the griefe thereof languiſhed. So feeling his ſickneſſe daily to encreaſe, and that he could not longer liue, lying vpon a pallet in his pauillion, grieuouſly complained to his Baſſaes, That the deſtinies had ſo blemiſhed all the former courſe of his life, with ſuch an obſcure death, that hee which had ſo often repreſſed the furie of the Hungarians, and almoſt brought to nought the pride of the Grecians together with their name, ſhould now bee enforced to giue vp the ghoſt, vnder the walls of an obſcure caſtle (as he termed it) and that in the ſight of his contemptible enemie. After that, turning himſelfe to his ſon Mahomet, he earneſtly commended him to the faithfulneſſe of his Baſſaes, and gaue him many graue aduertiſements, ſometimes in ſecret betwixt themſelues, & ſometimes in the hearing of others: want of ſtrength, & abundance of teares running downe his aged face (vpon the ſight of his ſon) oftentimes interrupting his ſpeech. Yet ſicke vnto death as he was, and drawing faſt vnto his end, he forced himſelfe, to warne his ſon of ſuch things as now at his death grieued him moſt.

The laſt ſpeech and admonition of Amurath to his ſonne Mahomet vpon his death bed.

Let mine example (quoth he) be a warning vnto thee my ſonne, neuer to contemne thine enemie, bee he neuer ſo weake: of which one thing aboue all others, I haue repented my ſelfe of long, and ſhall doe after my death, if any feeling of humane things remaine in the dead. And that I was ſo fooliſh, and inconſiderate, as to foſter vp as it were in my boſome this my domeſticall and neglected enemie, whereby I haue purchaſed vnto my ſelfe this calamitie, and for euer blemiſhed the honour of the Othoman kings: whileſt I ſo baſely ending my daies vnder the wals of Croia, ſhall become a by-word vnto the world, and all poſteritie for euer. This traitour ſhould euen then haue beene oppreſſed, when hee by great treacherie, firſt recouered his wicked kingdome: in that newneſſe of his eſtate, and before the mindes of the people were aſſured vnto him, then it had beene an eaſie matter, without bloudſhed to haue vtterly extinguiſhed the wretch, together with his name. Alis Baſſa, whoſe euill fortune was the firſt beginning of his good: Nor the other Generals, who by him ſlaine or taken priſoners, increaſed his ſtrength and credit vnto his ſubiects, ſhould not haue beene ſent againſt him: a thing which I haue oftentimes thought vpon, but could ſcarce haue beleeued, that euer I ſhould haue thereby receiued ſuch diſgrace, together with the ignominious renting of my kingdome, if I had not beene taught the ſame by mine owne experience, to my great loſſe and hearts griefe. Wee entered into Epirus, and here encamped an hundred and threeſcore thouſand men ſtrong: now if leiſure ſerue you, take view of them, examine the matter, you ſhall find a great want of that number. The fields could not containe our regiments and the multitude of our men: but now, how many tents ſtand emptie? how many horſes want riders? You ſhall goe to Hadrianople with our forces much impaired. As for me, the Deſtinies haue vowed my ſpirits to this countrey of Epirus, as vnto me fatall. But wherefore do I impute vnto my ſelfe theſe impediments and chances of fortune? for then firſt began this ſeed of miſchiefe in Epirus, when the

A Hungarians with other the Chriſtian Princes, roſe vp in armes againſt vs: at which time we fought not with them for ſoueraigntie, but for the whole ſtate of our kingdome: as the bloudie battels of Varna and Coſſoua ſtill witneſſe vnto the world. So whileſt I had neither leiſure nor ſufficient power to take order for all my important affaires at once; in the meane time this enemie grew as you ſee. But how, or in what order you are hereafter to wage warre againſt him, you may not looke for any direction from mee, which haue in all theſe matters ſo euill directed my ſelfe: Fortune neuer deceiued my endeuours more than in this. But happily thou Mahomet my ſonne, maieſt proue a more fortunat warriour againſt him: and for ſo many honours alreadie giuen vnto me, the Deſtinies haue reſerued the triumph of Epirus for thee Wherfore my ſonne, thou ſhalt receiue from me this ſcepter, and thoſe royall enſignes: but aboue all things, I leaue vnto thee this enemy; charging thee not to leaue my death vnreuenged. It is all I charge thee with, for ſo great and ſtately a patrimonie as thou art to receiue from me: it is the only ſacrifice that B my old departing ghoſt deſireth of thee.

Shortly after he became ſpeechleſſe, & ſtriuing with the pangs of death halfe a day, he then breathed out his gaſtly ghoſt, to the great ioy and contentment of the poore oppreſſed Chriſtians. He died about the middle of Atumne, in the yeare of our Lord 1450, when he had liued 85 yeares, as moſt write: and thereof raigned 28 (or as ſome others report 30) about fiue moneths after the ſiege laid before Croia.

Amurath his death.

Thus lieth great Amurath, erſt not inferiour vnto the greateſt Monarchs of that age, dead almoſt in deſpaire: a worthie mirror of honors frailty; yeelding vnto the worldly man in the end, neither comfort nor reliefe. Who had fought greater battels? who had gained greater C victories, or obtained more glorious triumphs than had Amurath? who by the ſpoiles of ſo many mightie Kings and Princes, and by the conqueſt of ſo many proud and warlike nations, againe reſtored and eſtabliſhed the Turks kingdome, before by Tamerlane and the Tartars in a manner cleane defaced. He it was that burſt the heart of the proud Grecians; eſtabliſhing his empire at Hadrianople, euen in the center of their bowels: from whence haue proceeded ſo many miſeries and calamities into the greateſt part of Chriſtendome, as no tongue is able to expreſſe. He it was that firſt brake downe the Hexamile or wal of ſeperation on the ſtrait of Corinth, and conquered the greateſt part of Peloponeſus. Hee it was that ſubdued vnto the Turks ſo many great countries and prouinces in Aſia; that in plaine field and ſet battell ouerthrew many puiſſant kings and princes, and brought them vnder his ſubiection: who hauing D ſlain Vladiſlaus the King of Polonia and Hungarie, and more than once chaſed out of the field Huniades that famous and redoubted warriour; had in his proud and ambitious heart, promiſed vnto himſelfe the conqueſt of a great part of Chriſtendome. But ô, how far was he now changed from the man he then was! how far did theſe his laſt ſpeeches differ from the courſe of his fore paſſed life! ful of ſuch baſe paſſionat complaints and lamentations, as beſeemed not a man of his place and ſpirit; but ſome vile wretch ouertaken with deſpaire; and yet afraid to die. Where were now thoſe haughtie thoughts, thoſe loftie lookes, thoſe thundering & commanding ſpeeches; whereat ſo many great commanders, ſo many troupes and legions, ſo many thouſands of armed ſouldiers were wont to tremble and quake? Where is that head, before adorned with ſo many trophies and triumphs? where is that victorious hand that ſwaied E ſo many ſcepters? where is the maieſtie of his power and ſtrength, that commanded ouer ſo many nations and kingdomes? O how is the caſe now altered; he lieth now dead, a gaſtly filthie ſtinking carkas, a clod of clay vnregarded, his hands cloſed, his eyes ſhut, and his feete ſtretched out, which erſt proudly traced the countries by him ſubdued and conquered. And now of ſuch infinit riches, ſuch vnmeaſurable wealth, ſuch huge treaſures, ſuch ſtately honors and vaine glorious praiſes as hee in his life time enioyed; his fraile bodie enioyeth nothing, but left all behind it. O the weake condition of mans nature! O the vaine glorie of mortall creatures! O the blind and peruerſe thoughts of fooliſh men! Why do we ſo magnifie our ſelues? why are we ſo puft vp with pride? why do we ſo much ſet our minds vpon riches, au-F thoritie, & other vanities of this life? wherof neuer man had yet one days aſſurance, and at our moſt need, and when we leaſt think, quite forſake vs; leauing euen them that moſt ſought after them, and moſt abounded in them; ſhrowded oft times in the ſheet of diſhonour and ſhame.

Amurath an example of the vanitie of worldly honor.

That his death is otherwiſe by ſome reported, I am not ignorant: The Turks ſaying, that he died maraculouſly forewarned of his death at Hadrianople: and ſome others, That hee died in Aſia,ſtrucken with an Aploplexie proceeding of a ſurfet taken of the immoderat drinking of wine. But Marinus Barleſius,who liued in his time in Scodra faſt by Epirus,whoſe authoritie, in report of the warres betwixt him and Scanderbeg wee follow, ſetteth it downe in ſuch manner as is aforeſaid.

Preſently after his death, Mahomet his ſonne, for feare of ſome innouation to bee made at home,raiſed the ſiege and returned to Hadrianople : and afterward with great ſolemnitie buried his dead body at the Weſt ſide of Pruſa,in the ſuburbs of the citie,where he now lieth in a Chappell without any roofe, his graue nothing differing from the manner of the common Turks : which(they ſay)he commanded to bee done in his laſt will ; that the mercie and bleſſing of God (as he tearmed it) might come vnto him by the ſhining of the Sunne and Moone, and falling of the raine and dew of heauen vpon his graue.

He whileſt he liued,mightily enlarged the Turkiſh kingdome,and with greater wiſedome and policie than his predeceſſors,eſtabliſhed the ſame:inſomuch that ſome attribute vnto him the firſt inſtitution of the Ianizaries, and other ſouldiers of the court (the greateſt ſtrength of the Turkiſh empire) before indeed begun in the time of Amurath the firſt, his great grandfather (as is before declared)but by him greatly augmented,& the policy of that ſtate ,wherby it had euer ſince in his poſterity flouriſhed,euen by himſelfe plotted. For the better eſtabliſhing wherof in his owne houſe, and to cut off all occaſion of feare, as alſo to leaue all ſuch as might haue the heart to ariſe againſt him, naked & bare of forces to reſiſt ; but eſpecially the other antient and noble families of the Turks,ſtill ſecretly repining at the great honor of the Othoman Kings:he as a man of great wiſedome and iudgement, to keep them vnder in the beginning of his raign,by manifold fauors began to bind vnto himſelf men of ſtrange & forrain countries,his ſeruants,& by ordering of his moſt weightie affaires by their authoritie, ſo by little and little to caſt off the ſeruice of his naturall Turks : they in the mean time little or nothing at all looking into this his practiſe. And wheras the Othoman kings his predeceſſors,had for the moſt part, or rather altogether raiſed their Ianizaries & other ſoldiers of the court, of ſuch children of the Chriſtians as were taken in the warres;he,ſeeing by experience how ſeruiceable thoſe new kind of ſouldiers were, began forthwith to plot in his head,how to make himſelfe an army altogether of ſuch able perſons,his owne creatures, & ſo to bring in a new kind of warfare,wholly depending of himſelf. And to that end,by his officers appointed for that purpoſe, took from the Chriſtians throughout his dominions,euery fift child : the faireſt and apteſt of whom,he placed in his own Seraglio at Hadrianople , and the reſt in other like places by him built for ſuch purpoſe : where they were by ſufficient teachers, firſt inſtructed in the principles of the Mahometan religion,& then in all maner of actiuity and feats of arms. Of theſe,when they were grown to mans ſtate,he made horſemen, gaue them great penſions, and ſorting them into diuers orders,appointed them alſo to guard his perſon ; honouring the better ſort of them with the name of Spahi-Oglani, that is to ſay,his ſons the Knights ; and of theſe he began to make his Baſſaes,his generals of his armies,& the gouernors of his prouinces & cities, with all the great offices of the ſtate. The reſt,and far the greateſt part of theſe tribute children,taken from their Chriſtian parents,& not brought vp in the Seraglios,he cauſed to be diſperſed into euery city and country of his dominion in Aſia,there for certain yeres to be brought vp in all hardnes & painful labor,neuer taſting of eaſe or pleaſure:out of which hard brood ſo enured to pains,he made choice of ſo many of the moſt luſty & able bodies fitteſt for ſeruice,as he thought good ; who kept in continual exerciſe,& by skilful men taught to handle all manner of weapons,but eſpecially the bow, the peece,and the ſcimitar, were by him as occaſion ſerued added to the other Ianizaries, and appointed for the guarding of his perſon : calling them commonly by the names of his ſonnes. The remainder of theſe tribute children,as vnfit for the wars, he put vnto other baſe occupations and miniſteries. But vnto thoſe martiall men of all ſorts ſo by him ordained,he appointed a continual pay,according to their degrees and places : and by great benefits & liberties beſtowed vpon them,bound them ſo faſt vnto him,as that he might now account himſelfe to haue of them ſo many ſons, as hee had ſoldiers : For they together with the Chriſtian religion, hauing forgot their parents and countrey,and knowing no other lord and maſter but him,& acknowledging all that they had to come and proceed of his free grace only,remained euer bound and fathful vnto him;and ſo kept others alſo,as wel the natural Turkes themſelues,as the other oppreſſed Chriſtians with-

in

A in the bounds of obedience and loyaltie. A great policie proceeding from a deep iudgement, firſt to weaken the Chriſtians by taking from them their beſt children, and of greateſt hope; and then by them depending wholly of himſelf, to keep in awe and dutifull obedience his naturall ſubiects alſo: hauing them alwaies as a ſcourge ready to chaſtiſe the rebellious or diſloyal. Now the other Othoman Kings and Emperours, the ſucceſſors of Amurath, keeping this cuſtome, and alſo increaſing it one after another, haue thereby not only kept the empire ſtil in their houſe and family, where it was firſt gotten: but alſo ſo maintained the maieſtie of their ſtate, as that they are of their ſubiects feared, obeyed, and honored, not as Kings, but as Gods.
For the naturall Turks their ſubiects loſing courage continually, & daily growing more baſe and daſtardly, by reaſon they are not ſuffered to practiſe the knowledge of armes; and the ſol-B diers in whoſe power all things are, knowing nothing of their owne, but holding and acknowledging all that they haue to come of their Lord, account them as Lords and Kings of all: ruling much after the manner of the Pharaohs the ancient Kings of Ægypt; who were abſolute Lords and maſters, both of the publicke and priuate wealth of their ſubiects, whom they kept vnder as ſlaues and villaines. And hereof commeth it to paſſe, that the better part of them whom we call Turks, (but are indeed the children of Chriſtians, and ſeduced by their falſe inſtructors) deſire to be called Muſulmans (that is to ſay, right beleeuers) holding it a reprochfull and diſhonorable thing to be called Turks, as it were peculiarly and aboue other people: For that they knowing right well, that there is not one naturall Turke among all thoſe that beare authoritie and rule, and are had in greater honor and reputation than the reſt (ſuch as are C the men of war and courtiers) but he is borne a Chriſtian either of father, or at the leaſt of his grandfather: auouch thoſe onely to bee Turks which liue in Natolia, all of them either mar-chants, or of baſe and mechanicall crafts, or poore labourers with the ſpade and pickaxe, and ſuch like people vnfit for the wars, the reſt (as I ſay) holding it for a title of honor to bee de-ſcended of Chriſtian parents. Yea the Grand Seignior himſelfe, although by the fathers ſide he be come of progenitors ſuch as were naturall Turks borne, yet many of them had Chriſtian mothers, which they accounted in the greateſt part of their nobilitie and honor. Thus by the wiſedome of Amurath was the order of the Ianizaries, and other ſouldiers of the court greatly aduanced, though not by him begun, and the politick ſtate of the Turks kingdome (to ſay the truth) quite altered; the naturall Turks (more than the Sultan himſelfe) now bearing D therein no ſway: but onely theſe new ſouldiers, all of them deſcended from Chriſtian parents and by adoption as it were become the ſons of the Turkiſh Sultans, and vnder them commanding all: by whom they haue euer ſince managed their eſtate, and by their good ſeruice wonderfully, euen to the aſtoniſhment of the world, increaſed and extended their empire. But of them more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

A great policie.

This great King was whileſt he liued, of his ſubiects wonderfully beloued, and no leſſe of them after his death lamented. Hee was more faithfull of his word than any of the Turkiſh kings either before or after him: by nature melancholy & ſad, and accounted rather politicke than valiant, yet was indeed both: a great diſſembler, and painful in trauell, but wayward and E teſtie aboue meaſure, which many imputed vnto his great age. He had iſſue ſix ſonnes, Achme-tes, Aladin, Mahomet, Haſan (otherwiſe called Chaſan) Vrchan, and Achmetes the yonger, of ſome called Calepinus: three of whom died before; but the two youngeſt were by their vnnaturall brother Mahomet, who ſucceeded him in the Turkiſh kingdome, euen in their infancie, in the beginning of his raigne moſt cruelly murdered.

I that ſo many nations, townes, and kingdomes, haue brought low;
And haue alone diſmaied the world, and fill'd the earth with woe: Am now by death (which all deuoures) brought downe from high degree: Yet doth the glorie of my name ſurmount the ſtarrie skie.
The great King Alexanders fame, the world no better fil'd: Nor worthie Hannibal, whoſe force ſo many Romans kil'd.
I vanquiſht the victorious Greekes, and tam'd with mightie hand, The warlike people of Epire, and fierce Tartaria land.
My force in field Hungaria felt, my greatneſſe is there knowne: Which of late time through Italie, to their great ruth is blowne.
Th'Aſſyrians felt my heauie hand:
  ſo did th'Arabians wild:
The Perſian King with all his force, I driue out of the field.
I purpoſed to win the Rhodes, and Italie t'vndoe;
If that the fatall Deſtinies had granted leaue thereto.
But woe is me, for griſly death hath brought all this to nought: And in the twinckling of an eye is periſht all I thought.
So periſheth the pride of man, his honour, wealth, and power, His gold, and whatſoeuer elſe, it fadeth as a flower.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, SECOND OF THAT NAME, SEVENTH KING AND FIRST EMPEROR OF THE TVRKS, FOR HIS MANY VICTORIES SYRNAMED THE GREAT.

THE report of the death of old Amurath the late king, was in ſhort time blown thorow moſt part of Chriſtendome, to the great joy of many; but eſpecially of the Greeks and other poore Chriſti- C ans which bordered vpon the tyrants kingdome; who were now in hope, together with the change of the Turkiſh King, to make exchange alſo of their bad eſtate and fortune: and the rather, for that it was thought, that his eldeſt ſonne Mahomet, after the death of his father, would haue imbraced the Chriſtian Religion, being in his childhood inſtructed therein (as was ſuppoſed) by his mother the daughter of the Prince of Seruia, a Chriſtian. But vaine was this hope, and the joy thereof but ſhort, as afterward by proofe it appeared: For Mahomet being about the age of one and twentie yeares, ſucceeding his father in the kingdome in the yeare of our Lord 1450, embraced in ſhew the Mahometan D Religion, abhorring the Chriſtian; but indeed making no great reckoning either of the one or of the other, but as a meere Atheiſt, deuoyd of all Religion, and worſhipping no other god but good Fortune, derided the ſimplicitie of all ſuch as thought that God had any care or regard of worldly men, or of their actions: which graceleſſe reſolution ſo wrought in him, that he thought all things lawfull that agreed with his luſt, and making conſcience of nothing, kept no league, promiſe, or oath, longer than ſtood with his profit or pleaſure.

Mahomet of no Religion.

Now in the Court men ſtood diuerſly affected towards the preſent ſtate: the mighty Baſſa's, and others of great authoritie, vnto whom the old Kings gouernment was neuer grieuous, inwardly lamented his death; doubting leſt the fierce nature of the yong King ſhould turn to the hurt of ſome of them in particular, and the ſhortning of their authoritie in generall, as indeed it ſhortly after it fell out. But the luſtie gallants of the Court weary of the old king, who in hope of preferment had long wiſhed for the gouernment of the yong Prince, were glad to E ſee him ſet vpon his fathers ſeat. And the vulgar people (neuer conſtant but in vnconſtancie, and always fawning vpon the preſent) exceedingly rejoyced in their yong King. The Ianizaries alſo at the ſame time (according to their accuſtomed manner) took the ſpoile of the Chriſtians and Iews that dwelt amongſt them, and eaſily obtained pardon for the ſame: whereupon he was by the ſame Ianizaries and other ſouldiers of the Court, with great triumph ſaluted King. Which approbation of theſe men of war, is vnto the Turkiſh Kings a greater aſſurance for the poſſeſſion of their Kingdome, than to be borne the eldeſt ſon of the King, as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtorie ſhall appeare: ſo great is the power of theſe maſterfull ſlaues, in promo- F ting to the kingdome whichſoeuer of the Kings ſons they moſt fauour, without much regard whether they be the eldeſt or not.

This yong tyrant was no ſooner poſſeſſed his fathers kingdome, but that he forgetting the lawes of nature, was preſently in perſon himſelfe about to haue murthered with his owne hands,his youngeſt brother , then but eighteene moneths old , begotten on the daughter of G Sponderbeius. Which vnnaturall part, Moſes one of his Baſſaes,and a man greatly in his fauour, perceiuing,requeſted him,not to embrue his own hands in the bloud of his brother,but rather to commit the execution thereof to ſome other : which thing Mahomet commanded him the author of that counſell forthwith to do. So Moſes taking the child from the nurſe,ſtrangled it, with pouring water downe the throat thereof. The young lady vnderſtanding of the death of her child(as a woman whom furie had made paſt feare)came,and in her rage reuiled the tirant to his face, ſhamefully vpbraiding him for his inhumane cruelty. When Mahomet to appeaſe her furie,requeſted her to be content,for that it ſtood with the policie of his ſtate : and willed her for her better contentment,to aske whatſoeuer ſhe pleaſed,and ſhe ſhould forthwith haue it. But ſhe deſiring nothing more than in ſome ſort to be reuenged, deſired to haue Moſes(the H executioner of her ſonne) deliuered vnto her, bound : which when ſhe had obtained,ſhe preſently ſtruck him into the breaſt with a knife (crying in vaine vpon his vnthankful maſter for helpe :) and proceeding in her cruell execution, cut an hole in his right ſide, and by peecemeale cut out his liuer,and caſt it to the dogs to eat. At the ſame time alſo he cauſed another of his brethren,committed by his father to the keeping of Caly Baſſa,and now by him betraid into his hands,to be likewiſe murthered.

Mahomet reformeth the Turkiſh commonweale.

Thus beginning his tyrannous raign with the bloudy execution of them that were in bloud neereſt vnto him,& whom of all others he ought to haue defended, he preſently after began to frame a new form of a common weale,by abrogating & altering the old laws and cuſtoms, and publiſhing of new, better fitting his owne humor, and more commodious for himſelfe : I impoſing alſo new taxes and ſubſidies vpon his ſubiects, neuer before heard off: thereby to increaſe his treaſures,and ſatisfie his auaritious deſire : which amongſt many other his vices,ſo much raigned in him,as that he was thought ouer-ſparing vnto himſelfe,as wel in his apparel as in his diet. And proceeding further,he called vnto ſtrait account all the great officers of his kingdome : of whom ſome hee put to death, and confiſcated their goods : others hee put to great fines,or quite remoued them from their offices. In like maner he dealt alſo with his great Baſſaes,admitting many falſe and ſurmiſed accuſations againſt them : whereby to bring them within his danger,where little mercie was to be looked for. By which meanes he became no leſſe terrible vnto his ſubiects,than he was afterwards vnto his enemies: & ſo was of them exceedingly K feared,but more hated. Among other things,he much miſliked in his court the exceſſiue number of faulconers and huntſmen ; which was grown ſo great by the immoderate delight which his predeceſſors tooke in the pleaſures of the field,that there were continually maintained of the Kings charge,ſeuen thouſand faulconers, and not many fewer hunteſmen, ſaying,that he would not be ſo much a foole,as to maintain ſuch a multitude of men to attend vpon ſo meere a vanity. And therefore tooke order,that from thenceforth there ſhould be allowance made for 500 faulconers only,and 100 hunntſmen : the reſt he appointed to ſerue as ſoldiers in his wars. At the ſame time alſo he entred into league with Conſtantinus Palaologus the Emperor of Conſtantinople, and the other Princes of Grecia : as alſo with the Deſpot of Seruia, his grand father by the mothers ſide,as ſome wil haue it;howbeit,ſome others write, L that the Deſpot his daughter, Amurath his wife, was but his mother in law, whom he, vnder the colour of friendſhip ſent backe againe vnto her father after the death of Amurath, ſtill allowing her a princely dowre. But if ſhe were not his mother (as like enough it is that ſhe was not)much more happie was ſhe that ſhe neuer groned for ſo graceleſſe a ſonne.

Mahomet goeth againſt the king of Caramania.

Whileſt Mahomet was thus occupied about his ciuill affaires,Ibrahim King of Caramania, who long before had maried Amuraths ſiſter,and yet for all that, had (as his anceſtors had before him) alwaies enuied the proſperous ſucceſſe of the Othoman Kings,tooke occaſion in the firſt yeare of Mahomet his raigne,with fire and ſword to inuade his dominions in Aſia. Which thing when Mahomet vnderſtood,he diſplaced Iſa his lieutenant in Aſia, as a man not ſufficient to mannage ſo great warres,and appointed Iſaac Baſſa in his roome,a moſt valiant man of M war,vpon whom not long before hee had vpon ſpeciall fauour beſtowed in marriage the faire daughter of Sponderbeius,one of his fathers wiues,of whom we haue ſpake before. This great Baſſa paſſing ouer into Aſia, raiſed a great army. After whom followed Mahomet in perſon himſelfe with a greater, out of Europe : and hauing all his forces together,entered with great hoſtilitie into Caramania. But the Caramanian King perceiuing himſelfe vnable to withſtand

A ſo puiſſant an enemie, fled into the ſtrength of the great mountaines, and by his embaſſadours offered vnto Mahomet ſuch reaſonable conditions of peace, as that hee was content to accept thereof. Which after they had by ſolemne oath on both parts confirmed, Mahomet returned with his armie to Pruſa: but when hee was come thither, the Ianizaries preſuming that they might be bold with the young King: putting themſelues in order of battell, came and with great inſolencie demanded of him a donatiue or largious, as a reward of their good ſeruice done. With which ſo great preſumption, Mahomet was inwardly chafed: but for ſo much as they were his beſt ſoldiers, and alreadie in armes, he wiſely diſſembled his anger for the preſent, hauing a little before had warning thereof by Abedin Baſſa, and Turachan beg, two of his great captains, who had got ſome ſuſpition of the matter: wherefore to content them, he cauſed ten great bags of aſpers to be ſcattered among them, and ſo pacified the matter. But within B few dais after, he cauſed Doganes (the Aga or chiefe captain of the Ianizaries) to be brought before him, and to be ſhamefully whipt and ſo preſently diſcharging him of his office, placed one Muſtapha in the ſame. The like ſeuerity he vſed againſt the reſt of the vnder-captains, cauſing them to be cruelly ſcourged and beaten like ſlaues: which in that tyrannical gouernment is an vſuall puniſhment, vpon the leaſt diſpleaſure of the king to bee inflicted vpon any man, without reſpect of degree or calling, if he be not a natural Turke born. Preſently after he ſent Iſaack his lieutenant againſt Elias Prince of Menteſia or Caria, by whom the poore Prince was driuen out of his countrey: euer ſince which time it hath remained in ſubiection to the Turkiſh Kings, as part of their Kingdome and Empire.

Menteſia ſubdued by the Turkes.

When Mahomet had thus ended the Caramanian war, and was determined with his army to C returne to Hadrianople, he was aduertiſed, That the ſtraits of Helleſpontus were ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſed by the Chriſtian fleet, that he could not there poſſibly paſſe ouer but with moſt manifeſt danger: wherefore he tooke his way through that part of Bythinia which lyeth aboue Conſtantinople, and came to the caſtle which the Turkes call Acca-Chiſar, and the Grecians ἀσπρόκαστρον, or white caſtle, ſtanding vpon the narrow ſtrait of Boſphorus on Aſia ſide, and there paſſed ouer into Europe at the ſame place where his father Amurath had not many yeares before in like manner found paſſage. Where when he was ſafely got ouer with his armie, he by the aduice of his Baſſaes encamped faſt by the ſea ſide, and there preſently began to build a great ſtrong caſtle cloſe vnto the ſtraits of Boſphorus, neere vnto Propontis, on Europe ſide, directly ouer againſt the other caſtle in Aſia. For the ſpeedie accompliſhment of which work, D he aſſembled thither all the workmen he could poſſibly get out of Europe and Aſia, apportioning vnto his captaines and ſouldiers of his armie part of the worke alſo: by whoſe induſtrie and labour, that great building was in ſhorter time brought to perfection, than was by any man at the firſt expected. This caſtle which for the greatneſſe thereof is of moſt writers reputed for a citie, was by the Turks named Genichiſar, and of the Grecians Neocaſtron, or New caſtle, and alſo Lamocaſtron, or caſtle vpon the ſtraits; and was there by the Turkes built, as well for the ſafetie of their owne paſſage too and fro, as for to hinder the paſſage of the Chriſtians through thoſe narrow ſtraits, they now poſſeſſing the ſtrong forts on both ſides: and therby alſo to diſtreſſe the citie of Conſtantinople, from whence this caſtle was not aboue fiue miles diſtant. When Mahomet in the ſecond yere of his raign had finiſht this great caſtle, with ſome E other ſmall forts about the ſame, and alſo repaired the other caſtle in Aſia ouer againſt it, hee placed therein ſtrong garriſons, and furniſhed the ſame with artillerie; in ſuch ſort, that no ſhip could paſſe through the ſtrait of Boſphorus into the great Euxine, or blacke ſea, but ſhee was in danger to be ſunke: whereby the rich trade which the marchants of Venice, Genua, & Conſtantinople, had to Caffa, and other places lying vpon the Euxine, were almoſt quite cut off, to the great hinderance of thoſe eſtates. Now Mahomet by nature ambitious, and withall deſirous to doe ſome ſuch thing as the glorie whereof might farre paſſe the fame of his predeceſſors, thoght nothing more anſwerable to his high conceits, than to attempt the winning of Conſtantinople, and the vtter ſubuerſion of the Greeke empire: Whereupon his father Amurath, F and his great grandfather Baiazet, had before in vaine ſpent their forces. Beſides that, it grieued him to ſee that goodly citie, the antient ſeat of the Chriſtian empire, to bee ſo commodiouſly ſcituated, as it were in the middeſt of his kingdome, and not to bee at his command. Hereunto the ſmall power of the Greeke Emperour himſelſe, and the other Chriſtian Princes at the ſame time at mortall diſcord amongſt themſelues, miniſtred vnto his greedie Mahomet maketh preparation for the beſieging of Conſtantinople.

deſire no ſmall hope of ſucceſſe, and ſerued as ſpurs to prick him forward vnto ſo great an enterpriſe. G Wherfore al the Winter he cauſed great preparation to be made of ſhipping & other warlike prouiſion both for ſea and land: and gaue out commiſſions for the leuying of a mightie army, to be in readineſſe againſt the next Spring. But whither he would imploy the ſame, no man could certainly tel: ſome gheſſing one thing and ſome another, as the manner of men is, when ſuch extraordinarie preparation is at hand.

Conſtantinus the Emperor in vaine craueth aid of the Chriſtian Princes.

Conſtantinus the eight of that name, then Emperor of Conſtantinople, a Prince of a mild and ſoft ſpirit, fitter for the Church than for the field, hearing of the great preparation made by the Turkiſh King, and fearing leaſt that tempeſt then growing, ſhould vpon the ſudden break forth vpon himſelfe, firſt made ſuch preparation as his owne ſmall abilitie would extend vnto. And then ſent his embaſſadours vnto other Chriſtian Princes, earneſtly crauing their aid and aſſiſtance in that his dangerous eſtate. H But that labour was loſt, and all his ſuit vaine: for they beeing at variance one with another, and hauing more care of priuate reuenge, than how to repulſe the common enemie of Chriſtianitie, could not, or would not affoord him any helpe at all. Nicholas the fifth of that name, then Biſhop of Rome, with Alphonſus King of Naples, and the State of Venice, promiſed to haue ſent him thirtie gallies, but none for all that came.

There were by chance at Conſtantinople certain ſhips and gallies of Venice, Genua, Crete and Chios, of whom the Emperour made ſtay: at which time alſo it chanced, that Ioannes Iuſtinianus, an aduenturer of Genua, who had beene ſcouring thoſe ſeas, came to Conſtantinople with two tall ſhips, and foure hundred ſouldiers: where he was entertained by the Emperour. I And foraſmuch as he was a man honorably deſcended, and ſuppoſed to be both of great courage and direction, was by the Emperour appointed Generall of all his forces next vnto himſelfe. He alſo entertained ſix thouſand Greekes: which, with three thouſand Venetians, Genowaies and others, whom he had made ſtay of, ioyned vnto the citizens, was al the weak ſtrength he had to relie vpon, for the defence of his ſtate and empire.

Vide Leonardi Chienſis Archiepiſcopi Mitylen. hiſt. de captiuitate Conſtantinopolitana.

Againſt the beginning of the Spring, the Turkiſh king had in readineſſe a great and puiſſant army of three hundred thouſand men, of whom, the greateſt part were taken out of Bulgaria, Seruia, Raſcia, Theſſalia, Macedonia, & Grecia, which as yet were called the Chriſtian countries, and were themſelues either indeed Chriſtians, or elſe ſuch renegates as had not long before forſaken the Chriſtian faith: vnto theſe alſo were ioyned diuers other Chriſtians which came out of Germanie, Bohemia, and Hungarie, to ſerue the Turke in his wars. K This hath bin none of the leaſt means, whereby the Turkiſh Kings haue growne ſo great, and their kingdome ſo mightily inlarged, by inforcing and alluring Chriſtians to fight againſt Chriſtians, to the vtter confuſion of themſelues. Among the great multitude of the Europeian Chriſtians, were mingled his effeminate ſouldiers of Aſia, and his naturall Turks and Ianizaries, which were in number feweſt, and yet commanded all the reſt.

Mahomet encampeth before Conſtantinople.

With this great army, well appointed with all warlike prouiſion, came Mahomet the Turkiſh King from Hadrianople: and the ninth day of Aprill, in the yeare 1453, encamped before Conſtantinople, and with the multitude of his armie filled all the maine land before the citie, from the ſeaſide of Boſphorus, vnto the place where the ſame ſea compaſſing in the city on two parts, and running far into the land betwixt Conſtantinople and Pera, maketh there a L goodly hauen betwixt them.

The ſcituation of Conſtantinople.

This citie of Conſtantinople (called in antient time Bizantium) is in forme of a Triangle, ſcituated in Europe in the pleaſant countrey of Thracia, vpon a point of the maine land ſhooting out towards Aſia, called of Plinie and Solinus, the promontorie Chryſoceras; where the ſea of Propontis ioyneth vnto that ſtrait of ſea, which diuideth Aſia from Europe, called in antient time Boſphorus Thracius; ſometime the ſtraite of Pontus; and the mouth of Pontus; and of the moderne writers, the ſtrait of Conſtantinople; and about two hundred yeares paſt, or more, S. George his arme. This point of the maine, whereon the citie ſtandeth, lyeth about two Italian miles more Northward than doth the auntient citie of Calcedon, on the other ſide of the ſtrait in Aſia: more than thirtie miles diſtant from the Euxine or blacke Sea, lying M from it Northward: And two hundred miles from the ſtrait of Helleſpontus or Calipolis, from thence South. Which noble Citie (of all others moſt fitly ſeated for the Empire of The World, and with great maieſtie ouerlooking both Europe and Aſia) is by the Coſmographers accounted to ſtand in the height of 43 degrees, vpon ſeuen little hils, of Conſtantinople built by Pauſanias, deſtroyed by Seuerus, reedified by Conſtantine the Great, & now taken by Mahomet the Turke.

A no great and eaſie aſcent : and was there firſt built by Pauſanias the Lacedemonian King, and called Bizantium, and ſo many yeares flouriſhed as a populous and rich citie, vntill the ciuill wars betwixt Seuerus the Emperor, and Niger : what time it indured the ſiege of the Romans vnder Seuerus, three yeres, with ſuch obſtinacie, that it yelded not vntil it was brought to ſuch extremitie, that the citizens did eat one another; and then yeelding, had the wals ouerthrown by Seuerus, and the citie it ſelfe deſtroyed, and brought to the low eſtate of a poore countrey village, and ſo by him giuen to the Perinthyans. In which baſe eſtate it continued vntill the time of Conſtantine the Great, the ſon of Helena (whom ſome will needs haue to haue beene an Engliſh woman) by whom it was new built, and beautified with buildings ſo ſtately and ſumptuous, that vnto the ſtrange beholders it ſeemed a dwelling place for heauenly wights, rather B rather than for earthly men. And to grace it the more, tranſlated his imperiall ſeat thither, and called it Noua Roma, or New Rome; and all that pleaſant part of Thracia alongſt the ſea coaſt of Helleſpontus, Propontis, and Boſphorus, by the name of Romania, of the faire Romane colonies there by him planted; which name it at this day retaineth, and is of the Turkes called Rumilia and Rum-Ili, that is to ſay, the Romane countrey. But as for the citie it ſelfe, the glorious name of the founder ſo preuailed, that the citie was and yet is of him called Conſtantinople, or Conſtantine his citie : and now of the barbarous Turks commonly, but corruptly, Stamboli. It is (as we ſaid) built in the forme of a Triangle, whereof the longeſt ſide, which runneth from Northeaſt to Southweſt, is on the South ſide waſhed with the Propontis; and towards the ending of the point, which is about the ſeuen towers, is ſomewhat indented; being commonly reputed to be eight miles long. The other ſide lieth Eaſt and Weſt fiue miles C in length, being waſhed with the hauen, which is ſomwhat more than eight miles long before it meet with the freſh water, and about a quarter of a mile broad : on the further ſide whereof ſtandeth the citie of Pera, commonly called Galata, ſometimes a colonie of the Genowaies. This hauen is very deepe, & by that reaſon as commodious as deep, bearing ſhips ful fraught cloſe to the ſhoare, ſo that they may diſcharge their burthens with the leaſt trouble that may be; and is of Strabo called Cornu Bizantij, or the Horne of Bizantium. The third ſide of this citie towards the Continent, lieth almoſt North and South fiue miles alſo in length : thoſe two ſides that lie vpon the ſea, and the hauen, are enuironed and girt in with a ſingle wal, built after the antique maner, with many high towers, which ſtrongly defend and flanke the ſame. Without which wals (eſpecially towards the hauen) there lieth a ſtreet between them and the ſhore. D But the other ſide, which is the third, & regardeth the maine land (beſide the ditch, which is alſo fenced) is defended with three wals : the firſt wal ſtanding vpon the ditch being but low; and the ſecond not far diſtant from the firſt, raiſed ſomwhat higher; but the third ouerlooketh and commandeth both the other; from whence as from an high fortreſſe both the other wals and al the ditch without may eaſily be defended. But the two vtter wals, with the whole ſpace betwixt them, are now by the Turks but ſlenderly maintained, lying full of earth and other rubbiſh, euen as they were in the time of the Grecians : ſom cauſe why they with leſſe heart & courage defended the ſame againſt their barbarous enemies. In the Eaſt part of the city, on that point which in the raigne of the Grecians was called the cape of S. Demetrio, diſtant from Aſia not much more than halfe a mile, ſtands the Seraglio or pallace of the great Turk, containing in it ſelfe a great part of an hil, encloſed round with a wall, as if it were it ſelfe a citie, in circuit more than two miles : wherein amongſt other ſtately buildings, neere vnto the ſea ſtandeth a E very faire and ſumptuous gallerie, built for pleaſure, with a priuy gate wel fortified and planted with great ordnance, and other munition, whereby the great Turke at certaine times paſſeth, when he is diſpoſed in his gally to take his pleaſure vpon the ſea, or to paſſe ouer the ſtrait vnto his houſes or gardens of delight, on the other ſide in Aſia. In this great city are alſo many other moſt ſtately and ſumptuous buildings, as well of late erected by the Turkiſh Sultans, ſince they became Lords therof, as before by the Greeke Emperours : amongſt all which the Temple of S. Sophia ſtanding on the Eaſt ſide of the citie, not far from the Seraglio (now reduced vnto the form of a Mahometan Moſchie, & whither the great Turke goeth oftentimes to F heare ſeruice, being indeed but the ſanctuarie or chancel only of the great, ſtately, & wonderful church built by Iuſtinian the Emperor) is moſt beautifull and admirable. That which ſtandeth of it now, is both round and very high, built after the faſhion of the Pantheon in Rome, but much greater, fairer, and not open in the top as is that : the wals thereof being of the fineſt marble,and the floore al paued with faire marble alſo. In the middeſt there is a very great and large circle,compaſſed in with high and huge pillars of moſt excellent marble of diuers ſorts; and theſe ſupport a mightie vault that beareth vp as many mo pillars aboue,ſtanding after the very ſame order,and in a downe-right line,almoſt of the like greatneſſe and goodneſſe of the marble with the other below: vpon which,aboue the ſecond vault in manner of a loouar,reſteth the great round roofe which couereth all that ſpace of the Church which is compaſſed with the aforeſaid pillars: being all enameled and fillited,with the pictures of Saints,after the antient manner of ſome great Churches in Chriſtendome: but that the Turks, who like not to haue any pictures in their churches,haue put out their eies only,as loth to ſpoile ſuch a rare peece of work,and vtterly to deface it. In like maner the wals of the vpper vault are wrought, painted,or portraied after the ſame order,though in ſome part decaied,by reaſon of their long continuance and ſtanding. About this church are eighteene or twentie doores of braſſe, right faire and coſtly,well declaring the magnificence and greatneſſe thereof in more antient times; when as it had (as is reported) more than two hundred doores of like making and greatneſſe: and beſide the hugeneſſe of the frame and building it ſelfe, had alſo diuers faire monaſteries and houſes of religion ioined vnto it: wherunto belonged ſix thouſand Prieſts,whoſe houſes and lodgings extended almoſt all ouer the place where now the Turkes pallace ſtandeth, and the other places adioining to this great church, which is now their chiefe Moſchie,& called by them by the proper name of S. Sophia,becauſe they hold euen as we doe,the wiſdome of God to be incomprehenſible & infinit. The next in magnificence vnto this,is the Moſchie of Solyman,wherin he lieth buried,& his welbeloued wife the faire Roxolana: a work wel beſeeming the maieſty of ſo mighty a Monarch. There are beſide theſe alſo many other faire Moſchies,Seraglioes for the Turke his wiues and concubins,Bezaſtanes or Burſes for marchants, Obeliſkes,Bathes,& other publick edifices and buildings of great maieſtie and ſtate, all well worth the beholding: wherin conſiſteth al the beauty of this ſo antient and renowned a city; far vnlike to that it was in the time of the firſt Greek Emperors, and before it was ſpoiled by the Latines. For the Turks priuat houſes in this ſo great and imperiall a citie,ſo much renowned through the world, are for the moſt part low & baſe,after the Turkiſh faſhion,built ſome of wood,ſome of ſtone,and ſome of vnburnt brick,laid with clay and dirt,which quickly decaieth again: they after their homely manner (by long cuſtome receiued) neuer building any thing ſumptuouſly for their own priuat vſe,but contenting themſelues with their ſimple cottages,how mean ſoeuer,commonly ſaying them to be good enough for the ſhort time of their pilgrimage: and yet not ſparing for any coſt vpon the publick buildings and ornaments of the common-weale,which they build with great maieſty & pomp; but ſpecially their Moſchies, wherein they excell. Neuertheleſſe,there yet are in Conſtantinople ſome other houſes alſo built high and comely enough; but theſe be few,and very old,all inhabited by the Chriſtians and Iewes,and not by the Turks; but of this enough. And ſo againe to our purpoſe.

The frugalitie of the Turks in their priuate buildings.

The Turks fleet

Mahomet with his puiſſant armie thus encamped before the citie, placing his Aſian ſoldiers on the right hand towards the Boſphorus; his Europeian ſoldiers on the left hand,toward the hauen; lay himſelfe with 15000 Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the court, in the middle betwixt both, againſt the heart of the citie. On the farther ſide of the hauen alſo by Pera,he placed Zoganus,one of his chiefe counſellors,with another part of his army. At which time alſo Pantologes his Admirall came to the ſiege,with a fleet of 30 gallies:and 200 other ſmall ſhips, and a number of other leſſer veſſels,which were rowed with three,or fiue oares a peece,ful of Turkiſh archers,fitter for ſhew than ſeruice. But for defence of the hauen,and ſo of the city on that ſide,the Emperor had cauſed the hauen to be ſtrongly chaind ouerthwart from the citie to Pera: and within the chaine had orderly placed his ſtrong fleet,the greateſt ſtrength wherof was ſeuen great ſhips of Genua, with three gallies, and two galliots of Venice, three of Creet,and a few others of the Iſland of Chios; all which were there, rather by chance vpon marchants affaires,then that they were prouided for any ſuch ſeruice: yet by this means the Turks fleet was ſhut out of the hauen,and ſo the citie put in good ſafetie on that ſide.

When Mahomet had thus conueniently encamped his armie,and ſurrounded the citie both by ſea & land: he firſt caſt vp great trenches as neere as he poſſibly could vnto the wals of the citie,& raiſed mounts in diuers places as high as the wals themſelues,from whence the Turks with their ſhot greatly annoied the defendants. After that,he placed his battery againſt one of the gates of the city called Calegaria, and terribly battered the ſame, ſpecially with one peece of ordnance of a wonderfull greatneſſe, which with much difficultie was brought from Hadrianople with an hundred and fiftie yoke of oxen, and carried a bullet of an hundred pound weight, made (as his other ſhot was) of a kind of hard blacke ſtone brought from the Euxine ſea: for as yet (as it ſeemeth) ſo ſoone after the inuention of that fatal engine, the vſe of bullets of mettall was vnknowne. There with continuall batterie, hee terribly ſhooke the wals, which although they were very ſtrong, yet were they not able to withſtand the furie of ſo great a batterie. The Chriſtians alſo out of the citie diſcharged their great artillerie vpon the Turks, but ſo ſparingly, as if they had bin afraid to ſhake their owne wals, or loth for good husbandrie, to ſpend ſhot & poulder, which was to the canoniers very ſparingly allowed: yet that which was ſpent, was ſo well beſtowed, that the Turks were therewith greeuouſly annoyed. The breach alſo which they had made at the aforeſaid gate, was by the defendants with great and dangerous labour againe repaired with faggots and earth, and ſuch like matter beſt ſeruing for that purpoſe, and ſo made ſtronger than before. In which moſt dangerous worke, they were altogether directed and greatly encouraged by Iuſtinianus the Genoway, the Emperors lieutenant generall for defence of the citie.

Conſtantinople vndermined by the Turks.

Yet for all this dilligence of the Chriſtians, Mahomet continued his batterie with no leſſe furie than before: but repoſing greater hope to finde a way into the citie, by the ſpade and mattocke, than by batterie; he employed his pioners, whereof he had great ſtore, to digge a mine: being altogether directed by Chriſtians skilfull in that kind of worke, whom hee had for that purpoſe entertained. By whoſe cunning direction, with the induſtrious labour of the poore pioners, the mine was brought to ſuch perfection, that part of the wal, with one of the ſtrong towers in the ſame, was quite vndermined, and ſtood ſupported, but with ſuch vntruſty ſtaies as the pioners had left for the bearing vp thereof til ſuch time as it ſhould be by the tyrants appointment blown vp. This dangerous work was neither perceiued, neither yet feared by the Conſtantinopolitans, as a thing not poſſible to haue bin done: foraſmuch as Baiazet & Amurath had both with great labour before in vaine attempted the ſame, at ſuch time as they hardly beſieged the city. But that which thoſe great kings had with much vaine labor by vnskilfull men made proofe of, Mahomet had now by men of greater deuice, brought to paſſe; although it took not ſuch effect as he wiſhed: for one Io. Grandis, a German captaine, and a man of great experience, ſuſpecting the matter, had cauſed a countermine to be made, whereby the labour of the Turks was in good time diſcouered, and they with fire and ſword driuen out of the mine, and the ſame ſtrongly filled vp againe, and ſo the citie for that time deliuered of a great feare and danger. Mahomet perceiuing that it auailed him not to continue his batterie againſt that place, which was againe ſo ſtrongly repaired, remoued the ſame, and planted it againſt a tower called Bactatina, neere vnto the gate called Porta-Romana, or, Romane gate. Which tower ſhaken with contiuuall batterie, at length fell downe, and filled the ditch before the vtter wall, euen with the ground. But this breach was alſo ſpeedily and with great courage made vp againe by the defendants, although the Turkes did what they could, with continuall ſhot, to haue driuen them from the ſame. At which time they alſo erected certaine high towers of timber, couered with raw hides to defend the ſame from fire, out of which they with their ſhot ſlew many of the Chriſtians vpon the wals, & in making good the aforeſaid breach: but Mahomet ſeeing this valiantneſſe of the defendants, openly ſaid, That it was neither the Grecians skill, nor courage, but the Frenchmen that defended the citie: for the Turks commonly call all the Chriſtians of the Weſt by the name of Frankes or Frenchmen.

Seuentie of the Turks galliots brought eight miles ouer land (by the deuice of a Chriſtian) into the hauen of Conſtantinople.

The cheerefulneſſe and induſtrie of the Chriſtians in defending and repairing the aforeſaid breach, was ſo great, that the Turkiſh King beganne almoſt to deſpaire of winning the citie, which he could no way aſſault but on one ſide. When as a bad Chriſtian in his camp, put him againe in good hope, by ſhewing vnto him a deuice how to bring a great part of his fleet ouer land into the heauen, & therby to aſſault that part of the city by water, which the citizens leſt feared: by which ingenious deuice, and by the great ſtrength of men, Zoganus Baſſa (to whom that charge was committed) brought ſeuentie of the leſſer ſhips & galliots, with al their ſailes abroad (to the great admiration of all that ſaw them) vp a great hil, and ſo by dry land, out of the Boſphorus behind Pera, the ſpace of eight miles, into the hauen of Conſtantinople, which running in betweene the citie and Pera, runneth into the maine Land (as we haue ſaid) about eight miles. The Chriſtian that diſcouered this deuice vnto the king, is ſuppoſed to haue learned it of the Venetians, who not long before had done the like at the lake of Bennacus. Glad was Mahomet to ſee ſo many of his ſhips and gallies in the hauen, and the Chriſtians with the ſight thereof no leſſe diſcouraged. Neuertheleſſe, they attempted to haue burnt thoſe veſſels as they were in launching, but the Turks had ſo commodiouſly placed certain pieces of great Ordnance for their defence, that the formoſt of the gallies of the Chriſtians, approching the Turks fleet, was preſently ſunke; wherewith the reſt diſmaied, returned backe from whence they came. Certaine of the Chriſtians of the loſt gallie, whom the Turks tooke vp ſwimming in the hauen, were the next day cruelly ſlain in the ſight of the Chriſtians: in reuenge whereof, certaine Turks before taken priſoners into Conſtantinople, were forthwith brought to the top of the wals, and there in the ſight of the campe with like crueltie put to death.

A wonderfull bridge made by the Turks ouer the hauen of Conſtantinople.

Mahomet thus poſſeſſed of the hauen, ſhortly after cauſed a wonderfull bridge to be made quite ouer the hauen, from Zoganus his campe which lay by Pera, vnto the wals of Conſtantinople: which bridge was built with timber and plankes, borne vp with ſmall boats and emptie caske, after a moſt ſtrange manner, and was in length more than halfe a mile: by which bridge his armie came ouer the hauen, to aſſault the citie on that ſide alſo.

A notable fight betweene foure of the Chriſtians ſhips, and the Turks fleet.

In the meane time, three tall Genoway ſhips laded with men and muniton from the Iſland of Chios, with one of the Emperours laded with corne from Sicilia, came with a faire winde for Conſtantinople. The Turks great fleet then lying not far off, within the ſight of the camp, ſet vpon them, and after a great fight, wherein an exceeding number of the Turks were ſlaine with ſhot, the gallies boorded the ſhips: but beeing much lower, were ſo far from doing any good, as that the Turks could not well looke out, but they were from aboue ſlaine or wounded. Mahomet from the ſhore beholding the vnequal fight, and ſlaughter of his men, cried out aloud, ſwearing and blaſpheming God, and in great rage rid into the ſea as far as he durſt; and comming backe againe rent his clothes, faring with himſelfe like a mad man. The whole army of the Turkes beholding the ſame fight at ſea, was filled with like indignation alſo, but could nothing remedie the matter. The great fleete aſhamed in the ſight of their King to be ouercome of ſo few ſhips, did what they might deſperatly to enter: but all in vaine, being continually ouerwhelmed with ſhot and ſtones from aboue, and valiantly beaten downe by the Chriſtian ſouldiers. At length wearie of their loſſe, they were glad with diſhonour to fal off again, and to get them farther off. The report of the loſſe the Turks ſuſtained in this fight, is almoſt incredible: ſome of the Turkes fugitiues reported, almoſt ten thouſand Turks to haue there periſhed: but certaine it is, that ſuch was the loſſe, as filled the whole armie with indignation and ſorrow, many hauing there loſt their kinſemen or friends. Three of theſe ſhips that had made this fight, arriued in ſafetie at Conſtantinople, the other was loſt. Mahomet vpon this ouerthrow conceiued ſuch diſpleaſure againſt Pantogles his Admirall, who in that fight had loſt one of his eyes, that he neuertheles thruſt him out of his office, confiſcated his goods, and was hardly by the great Baſſaes intreated to ſpare his life.

Whileſt Mahomet thus lay at the ſiege of Conſtantinople, and had thereunto giuen many great attempts, with more loſſe vnto himſelfe than to the defendants, a rumor was raiſed in his camp, of great aid that was comming out of Italie by ſea, and out of Hungarie by land, for the reliefe of the beſieged. This report (although indeed it was not true) with the due conſideration of the danger of the ſiege, filled the Turks camp with feare: ſo that the ſoldiers commonly murmured amongſt themſelues, ſaying, That to ſatisfie the ambitious humour of their young King, they were led to fight againſt impregnable wals & fortreſſes, yea againſt the bars of nature it ſelfe, without all reaſon: Whereupon Mahomet entered into conſultation with the three great Baſſaes his counſellors, Whether it were beſt for him to continue the ſiege or not. When Caly Baſſa, ſometime his tutor, a man of greateſt authority among the Turks, both for his long experience and high place, and withall ſecretly fauouring the diſtreſſed Emperour; after hee had with long & graue diſcourſe declared the difficulty or rather impoſſibilitie of the wiſhed ſucceſſe in that preſent war; & confirmed the ſame, by producing the examples of Baiazet his great grandfather, and of Amurath his father, who had both in vaine made proofe of their ſtrength againſt that city: at length concluded, that in his mind it were beſt for him to raiſe his ſiege, & to depart before he had ſuſtained any further loſſe or diſgrace: but Zoganus the ſecond Baſſa, in great fauor alſo with Mahomet, and ſecretly enuying the greatneſſe of Caly Baſſa, perſuaded the K.to proceed in his honorable enterpriſe:aſſuring him of the good ſucceſſe thereof,and with all the reaſons he could deuiſe,impugned that which Caly Baſſa had ſaid. And of the ſame opinion with Zoganus was alſo the third Baſſa,rather of purpoſe to croſſe Caly-Baſſa, and withal to fit the Kings humor,than for any great hope he had in the good ſucceſſe of that he ſo much deſired.Howbeit the ſpeech he & Zoganus deliuered,ſo wel agreed with the kings affection,that he reſolued to continue the ſiege:and thereupon gaue ful authority to Zoganus to appoint a day for a great and generall aſſault to bee giuen,reſoluing at once to gage all his forces vpon the winning of the city.Which charge Zoganus gladly took vpon him,& with his good liking, appointed the 29 day of May for the general aſſault,being then the tueſday next following.In the meane time he ſent one Iſmael,the ſon of Alexander Prince of Sinope,embaſſador vnto the Emperour,to offer him peace:but vpon ſuch hard conditions,as were no leſſe to be refuſed than death it ſelfe.Which thing he did, partly to ſatisfie the minds of his Turks (who are for moſt part of opinion,That God will not proſper them in their aſſaults, except they firſt make vnto their enemies ſome offer of peace, how vnreaſonable ſoeuer it forceth not)and partly to make proofe what confidence the enemy yet had in himſelf,for the holding out of the ſiege.But that diſhonorable peace ſo offered,together with the intolerable conditions,was by the emperor honorably refuſed:who no leſſe feared the Turks faith(if he ſhould haue accepted therof)than he did the hardnes of the conditions.Three daies before this fatal aſſault was to be giuen,the Turks(according to their maner)kept their ſolemne faſt,eating nothing al the day vntil night,and then making the greateſt cheare & ioy they could deuiſe,and in the winding vp of the ſame,took their leaue one of another,with ſuch kiſſing & imbracing as if they ſhould neuer haue met againe.At the ſame time Mahomet to encourage his ſoldiers, cauſed proclamation to be made thorow his camp,That he would freely giue all the ſpoile of the citie for three daies vnto his ſouldiers,if they could win it: and for confirmation thereof, ſolemnly ſwore the Turks great oath, By the immortall God,and by the foure hundred Prophets,by Mahomet,by his fathers ſoule,by his owne children,and by the ſword wherewith he was girt,faithfully to performe whatſoeuer he had to them in his proclamation promiſed.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing,Caly-Baſſa diſdaining that his counſel was reiected, and the opinion of his aduerſaries followed ; by ſecret letters aduertiſed the Emperour of the day appointed for the generall aſſault,together with all the preparation made againſt him:perſuading him not to be afraid of them, who were themſelues no leſſe afraid of him; but carefully to prouide to haue al things in readineſſe for the defence of his city,and valiantly to withſtand the raſh and laſt attempt of his enemies.

This wofull Emperour had already done what he could to the vttermoſt of his power for defence of the citie,all the time of the ſiege : but ſuch was the diſloyaltie of the citizens his ſubiects,that many times they could hardly be drawne from their priuate trades and occupations,vnto the wals to withſtand the enemie; fooliſhly affirming,That it was to no purpoſe for them to fight againſt the Turks at the breaches,& to ſtarue for food at home in their houſes.For which cauſe,the Emperor commanded a view to be taken of all the corne in the citie (which then began to grow very ſcarce ;)but vpon diligent ſearch made,ſuch ſtore was found in many mens hands,(which was by them either altogether kept in to ſel afterwards at vnreaſonable priſes;or els ſo ſparingly vttered, as if they had none to ſpare) as that it appeared, the dearth and ſcarcitie which then began to increaſe, to proceed rather of the couetouſneſſe of men,than of any true want of graine: this ſtore the Emperour cauſed to bee proportionably diuided vnto euery family at reaſonable priſes,according to their ſpending ; and ſo eaſed the great murmuring and grudging of the common people for bread. The Grecian mercinarie ſouldiers alſo,regarding more their owne priuat profit than the publicke ſeruice, refuſed any longer to go to the wals,than they were ſure of their daily pay : which the poore Emperour, otherwiſe vnable to giue them,was glad to conuert the church plate & jewels into money,to content them. For he had many times before with teares,in vaine requeſted to haue borrowed money of his couetous ſubiects, to haue beene employed in defence of the citie ; but they would ſtill ſweare,that they had it not, as men growne poore for want of trade:which in few daies after,their enemies found in ſuch abundance,that they wondered at their wealth,& derided their follie,that poſſeſſing ſo much,they would beſtow ſo litle in defence of themſelues and their countrey. But this had beene their vſuall manner of dealing with their Emperours,

The citizens of Conſtantinople without cauſe murmur againſt the Emperour.

A bare ſhift for money.

in that declining ſtate of the empire: as well appeared in the time of the Emperour Baldwin, G who for lack of money was glad firſt to ſell away many of the goodly ornaments of the citie, and afterwards to pawne his owne ſon vnto the Venetian marchants, for money to maintaine his ſtate, as in the former part of this Hiſtorie is declared.

But to returne againe to the courſe of our Hiſtorie. The Emperour certainly aduertiſed of the enemies purpoſe, for the generall aſſault ſhortly to be giuen, firſt commended the defence of himſelfe and the citie to the protection of the almightie, by general faſting and prayer: and afterwards appointed euery captaine and commander, to ſome certaine place of the wall for defence thereof: which was done by the direction of Io. Iuſtinianus his Generall, in whoſe valour the Conſtantinopolitans had repoſed their greateſt hope.

But the citie being on euery ſide now beſet with the Turks great armie, and the defendants H in number but few, for ſo great a citie (in compaſſe eight miles) the wals could but ſlenderly in many places be manned, and eſpecially on both ſides toward the ſea, where indeed leaſt danger was. The greateſt ſtrength and beſt ſouldiers, were placed for defence of the vtter wall, where the breach was, and the aſſault expected by land. Iuſtinianus the Generall himſelfe, with three hundered Genowayes well armed, and certaine choſen Greeks vndertook the defence of that part of the battered wal, neere vnto the Roman gate, where the fall of the tower Baccatina had filled the ditch as is aforeſaid: againſt which place Mahomet himſelfe lay encamped, with his Ianizaries and beſt men of war. Neere vnto Iuſtinianus lay the Emperor himſelf, for defence of another part of the wall: and ſo other captains orderly with their companies, all alongſt the vtter wal: and becauſe the defendants ſhould haue no hope to ſaue their liues, more I than their own valour, the Emperor cauſed all the gates of the inner wal to be faſt ſhut vp: and in this ſort they lay all the night, expecting continually when the aſſault ſhould be giuen: all which time they might heare great hurly burly and noiſe in the Turks campe, as they were putting things in readineſſe for the aſſault.

Conſtantinople aſſaulted by the Turks.

A little before day, the Turkes approched the wals, and begun the aſſault, where ſhot and ſtones were deliuered vpon them from the wals, as thicke as haile; whereof little fel in vain, by reaſon of the multitude of the Turks, who preſſing faſt vnto the wals, could not ſee in the darke how to defend themſelues, but were without number wounded or ſlain: but theſe were of the common and worſt ſoldiers, of whom the Turkiſh king made no more reckoning than to abate the firſt force of the defendants. Vpon the firſt appearance of the day, Mahomet gaue K the ſigne appointed for the generall aſſault, whereupon the citie was in a moment & at one inſtant on euery ſide moſt furiouſly aſſaulted by the Turks: for Mahomet, the more to diſtreſſe the defendants, and the better to ſee the forwardneſſe of the ſouldiers, had before appointed which part of the city euery Colonel with his regiment ſhould aſſaile. Which they valiantly performed, deliuering their arrows and ſhot vpon the defendants, ſo thicke, that the light of the day was therewith darkened: others in the mean time couragiouſly mounting the ſcaling ladders, and comming euen to handie ſtrokes with the defendants vpon the wall; where the formoſt were for moſt part violently borne forward by them which followed after. On the other ſide, the Chriſtians with no leſſe courage withſtood the Turkiſh furie, beating them down again with great ſtones and weighty peeces of timber, and ſo ouerwhelmed them with L ſhot, darts, and arrowes, and other hurtfull and deadly deuices from aboue; that the Turkes diſmaied with the terrour thereof, were readie to retire.

Mahomet renueth the aſſault.

Mahomet ſeeing the great ſlaughter and diſcomfiture of his men, ſent in freſh ſupplies of his Ianizaries and beſt men of war, whom he had for that purpoſe reſerued as his laſt hope and refuge: by whoſe comming on his fainting ſouldiers were againe encouraged, and the terrible aſſault begun afreſh. At which time the barbarous King ceaſed not to vſe all poſſible meanes to maintaine the aſſault: by name calling vpon this and that captaine, promiſing vnto ſome whom he ſaw forward, golden mountains; and vnto others in whom he ſaw any ſigne of cowardiſe, threatning moſt terrible death: by which means the aſſault became moſt dreadfull, death there raging in the middeſt of many thouſands. And albeit that the Turks lay dead by M heapes vpon the ground, yet other freſh men preſſed on ſtil in their places, ouer their dead bodies, and with diuers euent either ſlew, or were ſlaine by their enemies.

In this ſo terrible a conflict, it chanced Iuſtinianus the General to be wounded in the arme; who loſing much bloud, cowardly withdrew himſelf frō the place of his charge, not leauing any

A any to ſupplie his roome, and ſo got into the citie by the gate called Romana, which he had cauſed to be opened in the inner wal: pretending the cauſe of his departure to be for the binding vp of his wound, but being indeed a man now altogether diſcouraged.

The ſoldiers there preſent, diſmaied with the departure of their Generall, and ſore charged by the Ianizaries, forſooke their ſtations, and in haſte fled to the ſame gate wherby Iuſtinianus was entered; with the ſight whereof, the other ſouldiers diſmaied, ran thither by heaps alſo. But whileſt they violently ſtriue, al together to get in at once, they ſo wedged one another in the entrance of the gate, that few of ſo great a multitude got in: in which ſo great a preſſe & confuſion of mindes, 800 perſons were there by them that followed, trodden vnder foot, or thruſt to death. The Emperor himſelf, for ſafegard of his life flying with the reſt, in that preſſe B as a man not regarded, miſerably ended his daies, together with the Greeke empire. His dead body was ſhortly after found by the Turks among the ſlaine, and knowne by his rich apparel; whoſe head being cut off, was forthwith preſented to the Turkiſh tyrant: by whoſe commandement it was afterward thruſt vpon the point of a lance, and in great deriſion carried about as a trophie of his victorie, firſt in the campe, and afterwards vp and downe the citie.

The Chriſtians forſake the wals.

The Turks encouraged with the flight of the Chriſtians, preſently aduanced their enſignes vpon the top of the vttermoſt wall, crying victorie; and by the breach entered as if it had bin a great floud, which hauing once found a breach in the banke, ouerfloweth, and beareth down all before it: ſo the Turks when they had won the vtter wal, entered the city by the ſame gate that was opened for Iuſtinianus, and by a breach which they had before made with their great artillerie; and without mercy cutting in pieces all that came in their way, without further C reſiſtance became lords of that moſt famous & imperial city. Some few there were of the Chriſtians, who preferring death before the Turkiſh ſlauerie, with their ſwords in their hands ſold their liues deare vnto their enemies: amongſt whom, the two brethren Paulus and Troilus Bochiardi Italians, with Theophilus Palæologus a Greeke, and Ioannes Stiauus a Dalmatian, for their great valour and courage, deſerue to be had in eternal remembrance: who after they had like lions made ſlaughter of their enemies, died in the midſt of them, embrued with their bloud, rather oppreſſed by multitnde, than by true valor ouercome. In this fury of the Barbarians, periſhed many thouſands of men, women, and children, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition. Many for ſafegard of their liues, fled into the Temple of Sophia; where they were al without pitty ſlain, except ſome few reſerued by the barbarous victors, to purpoſes more grieuous D than death it ſelfe. The rich and beautiful ornaments and iewels of that moſt ſumptuous and magnificent Church (the ſtately building of Iuſtinianus the Emperor) were in the turning of a hand, pluckt down and caried away by the Turks: and the Church it ſelfe built for God to be honored in, for the preſent conuerted into a ſtable for their horſes, or a place for the execution of their abhominable and vnſpeakable filthineſſe: the Image of the crucifix was alſo by them taken downe, and a Turks cap put vpon the head thereof, and ſo ſet vp and ſhot at with their arrows, and afterwards in great deriſion carried about in their campe, as it had beene in proceſſion, with drums playing before it, railing and ſpitting at it, & calling it the God of the Chriſtians. Which I note not ſo much done in contempt of the Image, as in the deſpight of Chriſt and the Chriſtian religion.

Conſtantinople woon by the Turks.

But whileſt ſome were thus ſpoiling of the Churches, others were as buſie in ranſacking of priuat houſes, where the miſerable Chriſtians were enforced to endure in their perſons E whatſoeuer pleaſed the inſolent victors: vnto whom all things were now lawfull that ſtood with their luſt, euery common ſouldier hauing power of life and death, at his pleaſure to ſpare or ſpill. At which time riches were no better than pouertie; and beautie worſe than deformitie. What tongue were able to expreſſe the miſerie of that time? or the proud inſolencie of thoſe barbarous conquerours? where of ſo many thouſands, euery man with greedineſſe fitted his own vnreaſonable deſire: all which the poore Chriſtians were inforced to indure. But to ſpeake of the hidden treaſure, mony, plate, iewels, & other riches there found, paſſeth credit, the Turks themſelues wondered thereat, and were therwith ſo enriched, that it is a F prouerbe amongſt them at this day, if any of them grow ſuddenly rich, to ſay, He hath beene at the ſacking of Conſtantinople: whereof if ſome reaſonable part had in time beene beſtowed vpon defence of the citie, the Turkiſh King had not ſo eaſily taken both it and the citie. But euery man was carefull how to encreaſe his own priuat wealth, few or none regarding the publicke ſtate; vntill in fine, euery man with his priuat aboundance was wrapped vp together with his G needy neighbor in the ſelfe-ſame common miſerie. Yea the ſecurity of the Conſtantinopolitans was ſuch, that being alwaies enuironed with their mortall enemies, yet had they no care of fortifying of ſo much as the inner wal of the city (which for beauty and ſtrength was comparable with the wals of any citie in the world, if it had been kept well repaired) but ſuffered the officers which had the charge to ſee to the fortifying of the citie, to conuert the greateſt part of the mony into their owne purſes: as appeared by Manuel Giagerus, a little before a very poore man; and likewiſe by Neophitus, who then hauing that office to ſee vnto the fortification of the citie, had in ſhort time gathered together ſeuenty thouſand florens, which became all a worthy prey vnto the greedy Turkes

After that the barbarous common ſoldier had thus by the ſpace of three daies without controlment taken his pleaſure in the citie (as Mahomet had before promiſed) and throughly ranſackt euery corner thereof; they then returned into the camp, with their rich ſpoiles, driuing the poore Chriſtian captiues before them, as if they had bin droues of cattell, or flocks of ſheep: a ſpectacle no leſſe lamentable, than was the ſacking of the citie. It would haue grieued any ſtonie heart to haue ſeene the noble gentlewomen and great ladies, with their beautifull children, and many other faire perſonages, who lately flowed in all worldly wealth and pleaſure, to be now become the poore and miſerable bondſlaues of moſt baſe and contemptible raſcals; who were ſo far from ſhewing them any pitie, as that they delighted in nothing more than to heape more and more miſerie vpon them, making no more reckoning of them than of I dogs. There might the parents ſee the wofull miſerie of their beloued children, and the children of the parents; the husband might ſee the ſhameful abuſe of his wife, and the wife of her husband, and generally one friend of another: and yet not able to mourne together (the leaſt part of heauie comfort) being in the thraldome of diuers cruel maſters, by whom they were kept in ſunder, like in few daies to be diſperſed into diuers farre countries, without hope that they ſhould euer find releaſe, or one ſee another againe.

Mahomet ſolemniſeth his feaſts in Conſtantinople with the bloud of the Grecian nobilitie.

The ſoldiers being all retired into the campe, Mahomet as a proud conquerour, with great triumph entered into the citie of Conſtantinople, then deſolate and void of al Chriſtian inhabitants; and there after the manner of the Turkiſh Kings, made a ſumptuous & royal feaſt vnto his Baſſaes and other great captains: where after he had ſurcharged himſelfe with exceſſe of K meat and drinke, he cauſed diuers of the chiefe Chriſtian captiues, both men and women (of whom many were of the late Emperors line and race) to be in his preſence put to death, as he with his Turkes ſate banquetting; deeming his feaſt much more ſtately by ſuch effuſion of Chriſtian bloud. Which manner of exceeding crueltie he daily vſed, vntil ſuch time as he had deſtroied al the Grecian nobilitie that was in his power, with the chiefe of the late Conſtantinopolitan citizens. At which time alſo diuers of the Venetian Senators, with Baiulus their Gouernour, & many rich marchants of Genua and other places of Italie, were in like manner murthered: ſo that of ſeuen and fortie Senators of Venice which were there taken (whereof moſt part came thither by chance, bound for other places, but there vnluckily ſhut vp) ſome few found the fauour, with exceeding great ranſomes to redeeme themſelues. L

Amongſt theſe noblemen thus lamentably executed, was one Lucas Leontares, or Notaras commonly called Kyr-Lucas, or lord Lucas, but of late great Chancellor of Conſtantinople, a man of greateſt account next vnto the Emperor himſelfe: whom the Turkiſh tyrant ſeemed greatly to blame, that he being a man in ſo great credit with the late Emperor, perſuaded him not in time to haue ſought for peace vpon any condition, or els to haue yelded vp the city, rather than to haue run that extreme courſe of wilful miſery. He to excuſe the matter, ſaid, That the late Emperor his maſter was encouraged to hold out the ſiege, by the Venetians & citizens of Pera, from whom he receiued ſecret aid: as alſo by ſome of the greateſt men about his own perſon: for proofe wherof, he drew out of his boſome the letters which Caly-Baſſa had to that purpoſe written vnto the Emperor, & deliuered them to Mahomet, hoping therby to haue M found ſome fauour. But when he had ſaid what he could, the eldeſt of his ſons then liuing (for he had loſt two elder in the time of the ſiege) was cruelly executed before his face, & the yongeſt reſerued for the tyrants luſt: and after al this miſerie, had his own head ſtruck off with the reſt appointed for that daies ſacrifice. Out of this generall calamitie eſcaped Io. Iuſtinianus the General, who with al ſpeed fled at firſt to Pera, and from thence to Chios, where in few daies after

A after he died, of griefe of mind(as was thought) rather than of his wound, being happie if hee had honorably before ended his daies vpon the wals of Conſtantinople. Iſidorus alſo the Cardinal & Legat from the Pope, diſguiſed in ſimple apparel, and being of the Turks vnknowne, redeemed himſelfe for a ſmal ranſome, as if he had bin a man of none account, and ſo eſcaped:
whom if Mahomet had knowne, he had vndoubtedly beene made ſhorter by the head.

The glorie of this famous citie of Conſtantinople continued many hundred yeares, commanding a great part of the world, vntill that by ciuill diſcord and priuate gaine, it was by little and little ſo weakened, that the Emperours of latter times, for the maintenance of their eſtate, were glad to relie ſometime vpon one, and ſometime vpon another, yet ſtill holding the title and ſtate of an empire, by the ſpace of 1121 yeres, when as(God his iudgement ſet apart, B wonderfull and ſhameful it is to conſider how)it was by this Turkiſh King Mahomet ſo quickly taken, and the Chriſtian empire of the Eaſt there vtterly ouerthrowne: which happened on the nine and twentieth day of May, in the yeare of our Lord 1453. Conſtantinus Palæologus, the ſonne of Helena, and laſt Chriſtian Emperour, beeing then ſlaine, when he had raigned about eight yeares. Since which time it hath continued the imperiall ſeat of the Turkiſh Emperors, and ſo remaineth at this day.

The poteſtates and citizens of Pera, otherwiſe called Galata, a citie ſtanding oppoſit againſt Conſtantinople, on the other ſide of the hauen, and then vnder the gouernment of the Geno-wayes, doubting to run the ſame courſe of miſerie with their neighbours, ſent their Orators vnto Mahomet (the ſame day that Conſtantinople was taken) offering to him the keies of their C gates, and ſo to become his ſubiects. Of which their offer Mahomet accepted, and ſent Zoga-nus with his regiment to take poſſeſſion of the city. Who comming thither, according to Mahomet his commandement, there eſtabliſhed the Turkiſh gouernment, confiſcated the goods of all ſuch as were fled, and vſed the reſt of the citizens which ſtaid, with ſuch inſolencie and oppreſſion, as that their miſerie was not much leſſe than theirs of Conſtantinople: and becauſe it was doubted, that the Genowayes might by ſea giue aid vnto the citizens, if they ſhould at any time ſeeke to reuolt, he cauſed all the wals and fortreſſes of the citie which were toward the land, to bee caſt downe and laid euen with the ground. Thus is the fatall period of the Greeke empire run, and Mahomet in one day become Lord of the two famous cities of Conſtantinople and Pera: the one taken by force, the other by compoſition. At which time the D miſerie of Pera was great, but that of Conſtantinople iuſtly to be accounted amongſt the greateſt calamities that euer happened to any Chriſtian citie in the world.

Pera yeelded to the Turke.

Mahomet had of long time borne a ſecret grudge againſt Caly-Baſſa, ſometime his tutor, for that by his meanes Amurath his father, in the dangerous time of the Hungarian warres, had again reſumed vnto himſelfe the gouernment of the Turkiſh kingdome, which he had before reſigned vnto him, then but yong. But foraſmuch as he was the chiefe Baſſa, and had for many yeares ruled all things at his pleaſure, to the generall good liking of the people, during the raigne of old Amurath, and was thereby growne to be of ſuch wealth, credit, and authoritie, as no man had at any time obtained greater vnder any of the Othoman Kings: Mahomet in the be-E ginning of his raigne, before he was eſtabliſhed in his kingdome, durſt not to take reuenge of that iniurie(as he deemed it)but yet ſtill kept it in remembrance, warily diſſembling his deep conceiued hatred, as if he had quite forgot it. Neuertheleſſe ſometime (for all his warineſſe) words fell from him, whereby the warie courtiers (which as curiouſly weigh their Princes words, as the cunning goldſmith doth his fineſt gold) eaſily perceiued the ſecret grudge that ſtuck in his ſtomack againſt the Baſſa: and thereby diuined his fall to be at hand. So it hapned one day that as Mahomet was walking in the court, he ſaw a fox of the Baſſa's tied in a chaine, which after he had a while earneſtly looked vpon, he ſuddenly brake into this ſpeech: Alas poore beaſt, haſt thou no mony to giue thy maſter to ſet thee at libertie? Out of which words, curious heads gathered much matter concerning the Kings diſpoſition towards the Baſſa. This omi-F nous ſurmiſing of the courtiers (which oftimes proueth too true) was not vnknown vnto the Baſſa himſelfe, but troubled him much: wherfore to get himſelfe out of the way for a ſeaſon, more than for any deuotion, he took vpon him to go in pilgrimage to viſit the temple of the great Prophet(as they terme him)at Mecha, which amongſt the Turks is holden for a right religious and meritorious worke: hoping, that the young Kings diſpleaſure might in time bee mittigated, and his malice aſſwaged. But Mahomet perceiuing the diſtruſt of the Baſſa, and Mahomet notably diſſembleth his hatred againſt Caly Baſſa.

whereof it proceeded, ſeemed to take knowledge thereof, and with good wordes comforted G him vp,willing him to be of good cheere, and not to miſdoubt any thing; neither to regard the vaine ſpeech of fooliſh people,aſſuring him of his vndoubted fauour: and the more to put him out of al ſuſpition,continually ſent him rich gifts,& heaped vpon him new honours,as if of al others he had eſteemed him moſt. Vntil that now at the taking of Conſtantinople,it was diſcouered by Lucas Leontares, that he had intelligence with the late Emperour of Conſtantinople, and his letters produced. For which cauſe,or as the common report went,for the old grudge that the tirant bare againſt him,as alſo for his great wealth,he was by Mahomets commandement apprehended and carried in bonds to Hadrianople: where after he had with exquiſite torments bin enforced to confeſſe where all his treaſures lay, he was moſt cruelly in his extreame old age executed. After whoſe death, his friends and ſeruants (which were many, H for he was a man greatly beloued in court) in token of their griefe,put on mourning apparel: ſo that in the court appeared a great ſhew of common ſorrow; wherwith Mahomet being offended,cauſed proclamation to be made, That all ſuch as did weare ſuch mourning apparel, ſhould the next day appeare before him: at which time there was not one to be ſeene about the court in that heauie attire,for feare of the tyrants diſpleaſure.

Mahomet placeth his Imperial ſeat at Conſtantinople, and is worthily accounted firſt Emperor of the Turks.

After that Mahomet was thus become Lord of the imperial citie of Conſtantinople,as is aforeſaid, and had fully reſolued there to place his imperiall ſeat, he firſt repaired the wals and other buildings ſpoiled in the late ſiege, and by proclamations ſent forth into all parts of his dominions,gaue great priuiledges & immnnities to all ſuch as ſhould come to dwell at Conſtantinople, with free libertie to exerciſe what religion or trade they pleaſed. Whereby in I ſhort time that great & deſolate citie was again well peopled,with ſuch as out of diuers countries reſorted thither: but ſpecially with the Iewiſh nation,which driuen out of other places, came thither in great numbers,and were of the Turks gladly receiued. So when he had there eſtabliſht all things according to his hearts deſire, he took vpon him the name and title of an Emperour: and is from that time not vnworthily reputed for the firſt Emperor of the Turks.

Now among many faire virgins taken priſoners by the Turks at the winning of Conſtantinople, was one Irene a Greeke borne,of ſuch incomparable beautie & rare perfection, both of bodie & mind,as if nature had in her,to the admiration of the world, laboured to haue ſhewn her greateſt skil; ſo prodigally ſhe had beſtowed vpon her, all the graces that might beautifie K or commend that her ſo curious a worke. This paragon was by him that by chance had taken her,preſented vnto the great Sultan Mahomet himſelfe, as a iewell ſo fit for no mans wearing as his owne: by the beautie and ſecret vertues whereof,he found himſelfe euen vpon the firſt view not a little moued. Neuertheleſſe,hauing as then his head full of troubles, and aboue all things carefull for the aſſuring of the imperiall citie of Conſtantinople, by him but euen then won,he for the preſent committed her to the charge of his Eunuch,and ſent her away, ſo to be in ſafetie kept vntill his better leiſure. But thoſe his troubles ouerblowne, & his new conqueſts well aſſured, he then began forthwith to thinke of the faire Irene: and for his pleaſure ſending for her,took in her perfections ſuch delight and contentment,as that in ſhort time he had changed ſtate with her, ſhee being become the miſtreſſe & commander of him ſo great a L conqueror; & he in nothing more delighted,than in doing her the greateſt honor & ſeruice he could. Al the day he ſpent with her in diſcourſe,and the night in dallianceal time ſpent in her company,ſeemed to him ſhort; & without her nothing pleaſed: his fierce nature was now by her well tamed and his wonted care of arms quite neglected: Mars ſlept in Venus lap,and now the ſoldiers might go play. Yea the very gouernment of his eſtate and empire ſeemed to be of him,in compariſon of her, little or not at all regarded; the care therof being by him careleſly committed to others,that ſo he might wholy himſelf attend vpon her,in whom more than in himſelf the people ſaid he delighted. Such is the power of diſordered affections,where reaſon ruleth not the rein. But whilſt he thus forgetfull of himſelfe,ſpends in pleaſure not ſome few daies or months,but euen one whole yere or two,to the lighting of his credit,& the great diſcontentment M of his ſubiects in general: the Ianizaries & other ſoldiers of the court (men deſirous of imploiment, & grieued to ſee him ſo giuen to his affections,& to make no end thereof) began at firſt in ſecret to murmur therat,& to ſpeak hardly of him; and at length (after their inſolent manner) ſpared not openly to ſay, That it were well done to depriue him of his gouernment and ſtate, as vnworthie thereof,and to ſet vp one of his ſonnes in his ſtead. Which

A ſpeeches were now growne ſo rife, and the diſcontentment of the men of war ſo great, that it was not without cauſe by ſome of the great Baſſaes feared, whereunto this their ſo great inſolencie would grow. But who ſhould tel the tyrant therof; whoſe frowne was in it ſelfe death? or who durſt take in hand to cure that his ſicke mind? which diſtraught with the ſweet, but poiſoned potions of loue, was not like to liſten to any good counſell, were it neuer ſo wiſely giuen: but as a man metamorphoſed, to turne his furie vpon him which ſhould preſume ſo wholeſomly (but contrary to his good liking) to aduiſe him. Vnhappy man, whoſe great eſtate & fierce nature was not without danger to be medled or tempered with, no, not by them who of all others ought in ſo great a perill to haue bin thereof moſt carefull; but were now for feare all become ſilent and dumb. Now amongſt other great men in the court, was one Muſtapha Baſſa, a man for his good ſeruice (for that he was of a child brought vp with him) of Mahomet B greatly fauoured, and by him alſo highly promoted; and hee againe by him as his Soueraigne no leſſe honoured than feared: who no leſſe than the reſt, greeued to ſee ſo great a change in the great Sultan, of whome they had conceiued no ſmall hope of greater matters than were by him as yet performed; and mooued alſo with the danger threatned vnto him, by the diſcontented Ianizaries and men of war: eſpying him at conuenient leiſure to be ſpoken vnto, and preſuming of the former credit he had with him, aduentured thus to break with him, and to giue him warning thereof.

How dangerous a thing it is for a ſubiect or vaſſale, without leaue, preſumptuouſly to enter into the ſecrets of his dread Lord and Soueraigne, the wofull examples of others (moſt mightie Mahomet*) haue* C ſo ſufficiently warned me, as that were it not for the dutifull loyaltie I owe vnto your greatneſſe, farre dearer vnto me than mine owne life, I would not at this time aduenture my ſelfe vnto the hazard of your doubtfull acceptance of my faithfull ſpeech and meaning, but with others keepe ſilence, and in ſecret mourne together with my heauie thoughts: which if I ſhould in ſo great a danger both of your life and empire now doe, without warning you thereof, I were not to be accounted vnworthie onely thoſe your great fauours and honours, moſt bountifully on me beſtowed; but as a moſt vile traitor both vnto your ſtate and perſon, to be of all men deteſted and abhorred. The life you haue of late led, euer ſince the taking of Conſtantinople, as a man carelеſſe of his eſtate, and wholly wedded vnto his owne pleaſure, hath giuen occaſion not vnto the vulgar people onely (alwayes readie to ſay the worſt) and ſouldiers of the Court, the guarders of your perſon, but euen vnto the greateſt commanders of your armies and empire, to D murmure and grudge, I dare not ſay, to conſpire againſt you. Yet pardon me dread Soueraigne, if I ſhould ſo ſay, for that there is no man which with great diſcontentment maruelleth not much to ſee ſo great an alteration in your heroicall diſpoſition and nature: whereby you are become farre vnlike that noble Mahomet, which hauing ouerthrowne the Greeke Empire, and taken the great citie of Conſtantinople, promiſed both vnto himſelfe and others, the conqueſt of Italie, & the ſacking of Rome, the ſtately ſeat of the antient Roman conquerors. You haue giuen your ſelfe ouer (as they ſay) for a ſpoile and prey vnto a poore ſimple woman, your ſlaue and vaſſale, who with her beautie and allurements hath ſo bewitched your vnderſtanding and reaſon, as that you can attend nothing but her ſeruice, and the ſatisfying of your moſt paſſionat and inordinat deſires; which how much the more you cheriſh them, ſo much the more they torment and vex you. Enter but a little into your ſelfe (I pray you) and compare the life you now lead with E the like time heretofore by you ſpent in treading honours ſteps, and you ſhall find a notable difference betwixt the one and the other. Had the noble Othoman, the firſt raiſer of your houſe and family ſo giuen himſelfe ouer vnto pleaſure, you had not now inhabited the countries of Bythinia and Galatia, with others moe alongſt the Euxine, by him conquered. Neither had his ſonne Orchanes (the liuely image of his father, and follower of his vertues) by leading this kind of life, triumphed ouer Licaonia, Phrygia, and Caria, or extended the bounds of his empire ſo farre as vnto the ſtraits of Helleſpontus. What ſhould I ſpeake of Amurath his ſonne, and ſucceſſour in the empire? who in perſon himſelfe, firſt of the Othoman Kings, paſſed ouer into Europe, placed his imperiall ſeat at Hadrianople, conquered Thracia, Bulgaria, and Raſcia. Yea Baiazet your great grandfather is in his misfortune to be more than F you commended, as vanquiſhed in field by the mightie Tamerlane with foure hundred thouſand horſemen and ſix hundred thouſand foot, and not by a ſillie woman: comforting his miſhap with the honour and greatneſſe of him by whom he was ſo ouercome. Neither may I with ſilence paſſe ouer your worthie grandfather the Noble Mahomet, who not contented to haue reſtored the ſhaking empire, conquered alſo a great part of Macedonia, euen to the Ionian ſea, and carrying the terrour of his armes ouer into Aſia, did great matters againſt the Caramanians and others. As for your father Amurath (of worthie memorie) I cannot but to my great griefe and ſorrow ſpeake of him, who by the ſpace of thirtie yeares made both the ſea and earth to quake vnder his feete, and with ſtrong hand more than once vanquiſhed the Hungarians, and brought vnder his ſubiection the countries of Phocis, Beotia, Ætolia, with a great part of Morea; and to ſpeake of him truely, brake euen the very heart and ſtrength of the Grecians, and other his fierce enemies. Let all theſe moſt famous conqueſts of your noble progenitors, whoſe worthie praiſes (as eternall trophies of their honour) are diſperſed into euery corner of the world, awake you out of this heauie Lythargie wherein you haue too long ſlept, yea, let the remembrance of the conqueſt of this imperiall Citie by you to your immortall glorie woon, ſtirre you vp to greater things: and let it neuer be ſaid of you, That you were able with your ſword to ouercome your greateſt enemies, and not with reaſon to ſubdue your inordinate affections: Thinke that your greateſt conqueſt, and ſuffer not your ſelfe, ſo great a conquerour, to be led in triumph by your ſlaue. What auaileth it you to haue woon Conſtantinople, and to haue loſt your ſelfe? Shake off theſe golden fetters wherein the wilie Greeke hath ſo faſt bound you: which at the firſt though it ſeeme vnto you hard and painfull, yet ſhall time diſgeſt it, and make you to thinke it both good and neceſſarie for your ſtate. Weane your ſelfe from your deſires, and giue reſt vnto your troubled thoughts: which if you cannot do at once, ſtriue by little and little to doe it: pleaſure groweth greater by the ſeldome vſe thereof, and ſatietie bringeth loathſomneſſe. Moderate your ſelfe therefore, and againe take vp armes. Your ſouldiers if they bee not employed abroad, wil to your farther trouble ſet themſelues to worke at home: Idleneſſe maketh them inſolent, and want of martiall diſcipline corrupteth their manners. Hereof proceedeth their intemperate and diſloyall ſpeeches, That if you will not lead them forth for the honour and inlargement of the Othoman empire, as did all your moſt noble progenitors, they will ſet vp another that ſhall euen one of your owne children. And what the common ſouldier fooliſhly ſaith, their great commanders maliciouſly purpoſe: which what a confuſion it would bring vnto the whole ſtate of your empire, together with the danger of your royall perſon, I abhorre to thinke. Wherefore it is time, it is now high time for you to ſhew your ſelfe, and with the maieſtie of your preſence to repreſſe their tumultuous inſolencie, before it breake farther out. Rebellions are by farre, more eaſily preuented, than in their heat appeaſed. The diſcontented multitude is a wild beaſt with many heads, which once enraged, is not a little to be feared, or without danger to be tamed: yet doe you but ſhew your ſelfe maſter of your owne affections, and you ſhall eaſily maſter them alſo. But what is fit for you to doe, beſeemeth me not for to ſay: yea, pardon mee I beſeech you, that I haue thus much (contrary perhaps to your good liking) alreadie ſaid: prouoked (by what diuine inſpiration I know not) euen halfe againſt my will, to diſcouer vnto you the ſecret of my heart, and to lay open vnto you thoſe things, which others knowing as well as I, do yet for feare keep the ſame from you. And if I haue gon too far, or in any thing that I haue ſaid forgot my ſelfe, impute the ſame (my dread Soueraigne) vnto the zeale of my loue and loyaltie towards you, or vnto my fidelitie ſo often by you tried, or to our antient education (the ground of your affection towards me) or to what elſe ſhall pleaſe you, rather than to my preſumption, from which, how farre I haue alwaies been, I appeale euen to your maiſties owne knowledge.

Hauing thus ſaid, he fell down at his feet, as there to receiue his heauie doome of his ſo free ſpeech, if it ſhould be otherwiſe than well taken of the angrie Sultan: who all this while with great attention and many a ſterne looke had hearkned vnto all that the Baſſa had ſaid: for well he knew it to be all true; and that in ſo ſaying, he had but diſcharged the part of a truſtie and faithfull ſeruant, carefull of his maiſters honour. But yet the beautie of the Greeke was ſtill ſo fixed in his heart, and the pleaſure he tooke in her, ſo great, as that to thinke of the leauing of her, bred him many a troubled thought. He was at war with himſelfe, as in his often changed countenance well appeared: reaſon calling vnto him, for his honour; and his amarous affections, ſtill ſuggeſting vnto him new delights. Thus toſſed too and fro (as a ſhip with contrary winds) and withall conſidering the danger threatned to his eſtate, if he ſhould longer follow thoſe his pleaſures, ſo much diſpleaſing to his men of war, he reſolued vpon a ſtrange point whereby at once to cut off all thoſe his troubled paſſions, and withall to ſtrike a terrour euen into the ſtouteſt of them that had before condemned him, as vnable to gouerne his owne ſo paſſionate affections. Whereupon with countenance well declaring his inward diſcontentment, he ſaid vnto the Baſſa, yet proſtrate at his feet.

Although thou haſt vnreuerently ſpoken, as a ſlaue preſuming to enter into the greateſt ſecrets of

A thy Soueraigne (not without offence to be of thee once thought vpon) and therefore deſerueſt well to die; yet for that thou waſt a child brought vp together with me, and haſt euer bin vnto me faithfull, I for this time pardon thee: and before to morrow the Sunne goe downe, will make it knowne both to thee, and others of the ſame opinion with thee, whether I be able to bridle mine affections or not. Take order in the meane time that all the Baſſaes, and the chiefe commanders of my men of warre be aſſembled together to morrow, there to know my farther pleaſure: whereof faile you not.

So the Baſſa being departed, he after his wonted manner went in vnto the Greeke, and ſolacing himſelfe all that day and the night following with her, made more of her than euer before: and the more to pleaſe her, dined with her; commanding, that after dinner ſhe ſhould be attired with more ſumptuous apparrell than euer ſhe had before worne: and for the further gracing of her, to be deckt with many moſt precious iewels of ineſtimable value. Whereunto B the poore ſoule gladly obeyed, little thinking that it was her funerall apparrell. Now in the mean while, Muſtapha (altogether ignorant of the Sultans mind) had as hee was commanded, cauſed all the nobility, and commanders of the men of war, to be aſſembled into the great hal: euery man much maruelling, what ſhould be the Emperors meaning therein, who had not of long ſo publikly ſhewed himſelfe. But being thus together aſſembled, and euery man according as their minds gaue them, talking diuerſly of the matter; behold the Sultan entered into the pallace leading the faire Greeke by the hand; who beſide her incomparable beautie and other the greateſt graces of nature, adorned alſo with all that curioſitie could deuiſe, ſeemed not now to the beholders a mortall wight, but ſome of the ſtately goddeſſes, whom Poets in their extaſies deſcribe. Thus comming together into the midſt of the hal, & due reuerence to C them done by all them there preſent; he ſtood ſtill with the faire Lady in his left hand, & ſo furiouſly looking round about him, ſaid vnto them: I vnderſtand of your great diſcontentment, & that you all murmur & grudge, for that I, ouercome with mine affection toward this ſo faire a paragon, cannot withdraw my ſelfe from her preſence: but I would fain know which of you is ſo temperat, that if he had in his poſſeſſion a thing ſo rare and precious, ſo louely and ſo faire, would not be thrice aduiſed before he would forgo the ſame? Say what you think: in the word of a prince I giue you free liberty ſo to do. But they all rapt with an incredible admiration to ſee ſo faire a thing, the like wherof they had neuer before beheld, ſaid all with one conſent, That he had with greater reaſon ſo paſſed the time with her, than any man had to find fault therwith: wherunto the barbarous prince anſwered; Well but now I will make you to vnderſtand how far you haue bin deceiued in me, & that there is no D earthly thing that can ſo much blind my ſenſes, or bereaue me of reaſon, as not to ſee and vnderſtand what beſeemeth my high place and calling: yea I would you ſhould all know, that the honor & conqueſts of the Othoman Kings my noble progenitors, is ſo fixed in my breaſt, with ſuch a deſire in my ſelfe to exceed the ſame, as that nothing but death is able to put it out of my remembrance. And hauing ſo ſaid, preſently with one of his hands catching the faire Greeke by the haire of the head, and drawing his falchion with the other, at one blow ſtruck off her head, to the great terror of them al: and hauing ſo done, ſaid vnto them: Now by this iudge whether your Emperor is able to bridle his affections or not. And within a while after, meaning to diſcharge the reſt of his choler, cauſed great preparation to be made for the conqueſt of Peloponeſus, and the beſieging of Belgrade.

E At the ſame time that the barbarous Turkes tooke the imperiall citie of Conſtantinople, Thomas and Demetrius Palæologi, brethren to the late vnfortunat Emperor Conſtantinus, gouerned a great part of Peloponeſus, one of the moſt famous prouinces of Grecia, which in forme of a leafe of a Plane tree, is almoſt in manner of an Iſland, enuironed with the ſeas Ionium and Ægeum, which running farre into the land on either ſide therof, ſeperateth the ſame from the reſt of Grecia, by two great bayes; leauing but a ſtrait necke of land, called of the Greekes Iſtmos, in breadth about fiue miles, which was ſometimes by the Grecians, and afterward by the Venetians, fortified by a ſtrong wall, and fiue great caſtles: neere vnto which place ſtood the great and famous citie of Corinth. This Prouince is in length 175 miles, and almoſt as much in breadth; wherein are contained the countries of Achaia, Meſſenia, Lacedemonia, F Argolica, and Archadia, with many famous cities and goodly hauens, wherein it farre exceedeth all the other prouinces of Grecia. Theſe two Princes Thomas and Demetrius, diſmaied with their brothers diſaſter fortune, began now ſo farre to deſpaire of their owne eſtate, that vpon the firſt bruit thereof, they were about preſently to haue fled by ſea into Italy. And as it commonly falleth out, That one euill happeneth not alone; ſo at the ſame time it fortuned, that the Albanians riſe in arms againſt the ſaid two Princes their Soueraignes : and vnder the G leading of their rebellious captaine Emanuel Catecuzenus, grieuouſly troubled both the poore Princes. Theſe Albanians were a rough and hardy kind of people, which liuing after the manner of the rude Scithian heardſmen, by feeding of cattel, had of long time planted themſelues in Peloponeſus; differing from the naturall Greekes, both in their manner of liuing and language: which diuerſitie was no ſmall cauſe that they oftentimes ſpurned, as now, againſt the gouernment of the Grecian Princes. In this extremitie, the two diſtreſſed Princes (not well 1454 knowing which way to turne themſelues) ſought for peace at Mahomets hands, offering to become his tributaries. Of which their offer he willingly accepted, as an induction to the full conqueſt of that country; & ſent Turachan Gouernor of Theſſalia, one of his greateſt men of war, with an armie into Peloponeſus, to aid thoſe princes againſt the Albanians: by whoſe in- H ſtire the maſterful rebels were in ſhort time diſcomfited, and the country of Peloponeſus quieted; yet ſo, that it was now become tributarie to the Turkiſh King.

Thomas & Demetrius rebell againſt Mahomet, and are by him ſpoiled of part of their dominion.

Theſe two princes Demetrius and Thomas, the laſt of all the Chriſtian princes that raigned in Peloponeſus, hauing thus loſt their libertie, liued for a few yeares as the Turks vaſſals; paying ſuch yearely tribute as they had before promiſed. During which time many diſpleaſures aroſe betwixt the two brothers, being both iealous of their eſtate, and deſirous by all plauſible meanes to win the hearts of their ſubiects one from another: whereby it came ſo to paſſe, that whiles they both deſired to become popular, they weakned their owne credit, and had not their ſubiects at ſuch command as beſt ſtood with the ſafetie of their eſtate. Neuertheles, as ſoone as they vnderſtood that the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt were making great prepa- I ration againſt the Turke; and that Calixtus the third of that name (then the Biſhop of Rome) had already put a fleet of gallies to ſea, which did great ſpoile vpon the borders of the Turks dominions, they vainly perſuading themſelues that the Turks would in ſhort time be againe driuen out of Grecia, refuſed to pay any more tribute to the Turkiſh King, or to keepe league any longer with him. Vpon which occaſion, Mahomet with a puiſſant armie came downe and firſt beſieged Corinth, and afterwards entering into Peloponeſus, tooke diuers ſtrong townes, and deſtroied the country before him : and forced the two princes for ſafegard of their liues to flie, the one to Mantinia, and the other into the ſtrong citie of Epidaurus, now called Raguſium. The poore princes deſtitute of ſuch aid as they expected, and altogether vnable to withſtand the power of the mightie tyrant, began againe to ſue for peace: which he, hauing now K ſpoiled their country, granted vpon condition, That all ſuch places as he had alreadie taken, ſhould be ſtill his own; and alſo that the citie of Patras with the country adioyning, ſhould be deliuered vnto him; and that for the reſt, the ſaid princes ſhould pay vnto him a yerely tribute: which hard conditions the poore princes, now in danger to loſe all, were glad to accept of; whereupon a peace was for that time againe concluded.

In his returne he tooke the citie of Athens in his way, which he not long before had taken from Francus Accianoll by compoſition (by meanes of Omares the ſon of Turachan, one of his great captaines) promiſing to giue him the country of Beotia with the citie of Thebes, in lieu thereof. This Francus was nephew to Nerius, ſometime prince of Athens, and had of long time beene brought vp in the Turks court, as one of Mahomet his minions; and was of him L (as was ſuppoſed) entirely beloued. But when he had receiued the dukedom of Thebes, in exchange for his princely ſtate of Athens, he was ſhortly after, as if it had beene in great friendſhip ſent by Mahomet to Zoganus, his lieutenant in Peloponeſus: by whom he was at firſt courteouſly entertained, but afterward being about to depart, he was (according as Mahomet had before commanded) ſuddenly ſtaied, and when he leaſt feared, cruelly murdered.

Mahomet commeth againe into Peloponeſus.

About three yeres after the peace before concluded betwixt Mahomet & the two brethren, Mahomet vnderſtanding that the Chriſtian kings and princes had combined themſelues againſt him, with a purpoſe to driue him againe out of Grecia; thought it now high time, and much for the aſſurance of his eſtate, to root out the ſmall reliques of the Grecian empire, which yet M remained in Peloponeſus in the two princes of the imperiall bloud, Thomas and Demetrius: whereunto hee ſaw a faire occaſion preſented. Foraſmuch as thoſe two brethren were at that time at great variance betwixt themſelues, neither paied him ſuch tribute as they had before promiſed : hereupon hee with a ſtrong army came to Corinth, where Arſanes a noble man of great authoritie and power in that country, whoſe ſiſter Demetrius had maried, came to him

A from the Prince his brother in law,attended vpon with many gallant gentlemen his followers, of purpoſe to aid him againſt the other Prince Thomas,nothing fearing any harme to haue bin by the Turke intended againſt himſelfe or his brother in law Demetrius,whom they both reckoned of as of a friend.But when Mahomet was entred into Peloponeſus,and come to Tegea, he cauſed the the ſame Arſanes,with all his chiefe followers,to be laid hold vpon,and caſt into bonds: knowing (as it ſhould ſeeme) no man for friend, which might any way hinder his ambitious deſignes.

Demetrius ſubmitteth himſelf to Mahomet.

Demetrius hearing what was happened vnto Arſanes, fled to Sparta, now called Mizithra: whither Mahomet in few dais after came and laid ſiege to the citie. But the poore prince conſidering,that he muſt needs at length fall into his hands, went out of the citie, and humbly ſub-B mitted himſelfe with all that he had into his power. Which ſo wel pleaſed the Turkiſh tyrant, that he courteouſly receiued him,comforted him,and promiſed him in ſtead of Sparta to giue him other lands and poſſeſſions of like value elſewhere: neuertheleſſe he committed him to ſafe cuſtodie,and carried him about with him as his priſoner,vntil he had finiſhed thoſe wars.
After he had taken Sparta,he beſieged Caſtria; where hee loſt diuers of his Ianizaries: for which cauſe,when he had taken the citie,he put all the ſouldiers therein to the ſword,and cut the captaines ouerthwart in two peeces. From thence he marched to Leontarium, called in antient time Megalopolis,which he tooke; with another citie called Cardicea,whither they of Leontarium had before conueied their wiues and children, as to a place of more ſafetie: There he cruelly put to death all the inhabitants of thoſe cities,men, women,and children,in C number about ſix thouſand,of whom he left not one aliue:and yet not ſo ſatisfied,commanded the very beaſts and cattell of thoſe places to be killed. Many cities of Peloponeſus terrified with the dreadfull example of their neighbours,forthwith yeelded themſelues: and amongſt others Saluarium, a great and ſtrong citie of Archadia; where he cauſed all the inhabitants, men,women,and children, to the number of ten thouſand to be caſt into bonds, looking for nothing but preſent death: all which afterwards he commanded to be ſent captiues to Conſtantinople, and with them peopled the ſuburbs of that citie. After that,he by the counſell of Demetrius,ſent one of his captaines called Ioſua, with certaine companies of Greeke ſouldi-ers,vnto the ſtrong citie of Epidaurus,to command them in the name of the Prince,to deliuer vnto him the citie,with the Prince his wife and daughter,which lay there. But the Gouernor D truſting vnto the ſtrength of the citie, refuſed to deliuer the ſame: yet ſuffered the Princeſſe with her daughter to depart out of the citie,beeing willing to goe to her husband; whom the captaine hauing receiued,returned, and preſented them to Mahomet. By whoſe commandement they were preſently ſent into Beotia,there to attend his returne to Conſtantinople, and an Eunuch appointed to take charge of the yong Ladie,who had ſo warmed Mahomets affection, that he tooke her afterwards to his wife. At the ſame time he alſo ſubdued the moſt part of Achaia and Elis,by Zoganus Baſſa his lieutenant: whither he came not long after himſelfe, and laied ſiege to the citie of Salmenica, which for lacke of water was at length yeelded vnto him: but the caſtle was by the ſpace of a whole yeare after valiantly defended againſt the E Turks left to beſiege it,by Thomas the prince: of whom Mahomet afterwards gaue this commendation, That in the country of Peloponeſus he had found many ſlaues, but neuer a man but him. This valiant Prince ſeeing the miſerable ruine of his country, and the ſtate thereof vtterly forlorne, after he had moſt notably endured a yeares ſiege in the caſtle of Salmenica, got to ſea,and ſo arriued in Italie: where trauelling to Rome,hee was honorably receiued by Pius Secundus,then Biſhop there: who during his life, allowed him a large penſion for the maintenance of his ſtate. Thus Mahomet hauing thruſt both the Grecian Princes out of their dominions,and ſubdued all Peloponeſus (excepting ſuch ſtrong townes and caſtles,as bordering vpon the ſea coaſt were yet holden by the Venetians) left Zoganus Baſſa his lieutenant to gouern that new conquered prouince,& with great triumph returned himſelfe towards Con-F ſtantinople,carrying away with him Demetrius the Prince, with his wife and daughter,& many other noble priſoners. But after he was come to Hadrianople,and placed in his royall ſeat, he remoued the Eunuch from the faire yong Lady, and tooke charge of her himſelfe. As for Demetrius her father, hee gaue to him the citie Ænum, with the cuſtome ariſing of the ſalt there made,as a penſion for him to liue vpon. Thus this moſt famous and populous countrey of Peloponeſus fel into the Turkiſh thraldome,about the yere of our Lord 1460,ſeuen yeres after the taking of Conſtantinople. Which I haue here together ſet downe, as it is reported G by them who liued in that time, and in the ſame countries: omitting of purpoſe other great occurrents of the ſame time (which ſhall in conuenient place be hereafter declared) to the intent that the fall of that great empire, with the common miſerie of the delicate Grecians, might appeare vnder one view, which otherwiſe being deliuered by peece-meale, as it did concurre with other great accidents according to the courſe of the time, would but breed confuſion, and require the Readers great attention.

The death of George Deſpot of Seruia.

Seruia yeelded to the Turke.

The Chriſtian Princes, eſpecially ſuch as bordered vpon the dominions of the Turkiſh tyrant, were no leſſe terrified than troubled with the ſubuerſion of the Conſtantinopolitan empire: for they ſaw by the continuall preparation of the Turke, that his ambitious deſires were rather increaſed than in any part ſatisfied with ſo great & late victories. Wherfore they with H all carefulnes fortified their frontier townes, and prouided all things neceſſary for defence of themſelues, & for the repulſing of ſo mightie an enemie. Among the reſt, George the old Deſpot, or Prince of Seruia (whoſe dominions of al other lay moſt in danger of that tempeſt) ſpeedily muſtred his men of war, fortified his ſtrong cities, placed his gariſons, & left nothing vndon that he thought needful for the defence of the country: for he had many times before to his great loſſe, indured the fury of the Turkiſh kings, although he were ioined to them in the bonds of neereſt alliance. And hauing thus politickly ſet all things in order at home, in perſon himſelfe tooke his iourney into Hungarie, from thence to procure aid againſt ſuch time as he ſhould haue need. But the Hungarians, & eſpecially Huniades (who at that time bare greateſt ſway in that kingdom) hauing before had ſufficient trial of the vncertainty & light faith of that I aged Prince, who had ſo often faſhioned himſelf according to the occurrents of the time, that he was counted neither right Turke nor good Chriſtian: refuſed to promiſe him any aid, but left him to his own fortunes: wherwith he returned diſcontented, & ful of indignation. But ſhortly after he was come home, he died of a hurt receiued in a skirmiſh with Michael Zilugo, gouernor of Belgrade: whoſe brother Ladiſlaus he had but a little before trecherouſly murdered, as he was trauelling by wagon to Belgrade with his ſaid brother Michael, who at the ſame time hardly eſcaped. This was the end of the Deſpot of Seruia, when he had liued 90 yeres: in which time of his long life, he had plentifully taſted of both fortunes. A man aſſuredly of great courage, but of a maruellous vnquiet nature: by profeſſion a Chriſtian, yet a great friend vnto the Turks, whom he many times ſtood in great ſtead: a deep diſſembler, and double in all K his dealings; wherby he purchaſed vnto himſelf that credit, that he was not of any his neighbor Princes whileſt he liued, either beloued or truſted; & after his death, of his ſubiects ſo deteſted, that the people of that country euen at this day in their country ſongs, ſtil term him, the faithleſſe & graceleſſe Deſpot. Lazarus his yongeſt ſon, after his death ſucceeded in his place, hauing depriued both his elder brethren Stephen and George) of the gouernment: for Amurath the Turkiſh king had long time before put out their eys, of purpoſe to make them vnfit for the gouernment of ſo great a country: yet theſe blind princes found means to flie away from him to Mahomet, carrying with them a great maſſe of money; and ſo incited him againſt Lazarus their yonger brother, that to keep friendſhip with the tyrant, he was glad to promiſe vnto him a great yerely tribute, and ſo to become his tributarie. But within few months after, Lazarus L died, the laſt Chriſtian prince that raigned in Seruia: after whoſe death, great troubles aroſe in Seruia for the Soueraigntie: the blind brethren ſtil crauing aid of Mahomet, with whom they then liued; & the deſolate widow of Lazarus, putting her ſelfe with her three ſons, Iohn, Peter, and Martin, into the protection of the Hungarians: by which meanes ſhe with much trouble, held her ſtate for a ſeaſon. Vntill ſuch time as that the Seruians, ſeeing ſmall aſſurance in that manner of gouernment, and wearie of the harmes they daily receiued of the Turks; yeelded themſelues with their country, vnto the obedience of the Turkiſh Emperour Mahomet, who for euer vnited the ſame vnto his empire as a prouince thereof, and ſo it remaineth at this day.

Now was Mahomet by the continual courſe of his victories, grown to that height of mind, that he thought no prince able to abide his force; neither any enterpriſe ſo great, which he was M not of power to bring to paſſe; wherfore hee ceaſed not on euery ſide continally to vex and trouble the Princes, whoſe countries bordered vpon his. But aboue others, his heart was greateſt againſt the Hungarians: for that by them the Turkiſh Kings his anceſtors, had been more troubled, & their ſtate more endangered, than by any or al other the Chriſtian princes. Wherfore

A ſore he reſolued now to take them in hand; which thing he had from the beginning of his raigne greatly deſired. And becauſe the citie of Belgrade ſtanding vpon the great riuer of Danubius, was accounted the key of that country, he determined there to begin his wars, and by taking thereof to make an entrance into the heart of Hungarie. Hereupon he leuied a great armie of an hundred and fiftie thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers, in whom he repoſed ſuch an aſſured truſt and confidence, that he accounted the citie alreadie as good as taken, and a faire way made into Hungarie: ſo readie are we to promiſe vnto our ſelues, the things we earneſtly deſire. For the better accompliſhment of theſe his deſignes, he had prouided in readineſſe a fleet of 200 ſhips and galies, which he ſent vp the riuer of Danubius from Vidina to Belgrade to the intent that no reliefe or aid ſhould be brought vnto the city out of Hungarie, by the B great riuers of Danubius and Savus, whereupon the city of Belgrade ſtandeth. With this fleet he kept both thoſe riuers ſo ſtraitly, that nothing could be poſſibly conueied into the citie by water: and not ſo contented, ſent part of his ſaid fleet farther vp the riuer of Danubius, and ſo landing his ſouldiers in many places, ſpoiled the countries all alongſt the riuers ſide. Shortly after he came with all his forces by land, & encamped before the citie: whereunto at his firſt comming he gaue a moſt fierce aſſault, thinking to haue taken them vnprouided: but finding greater reſiſtance than he had before imagined, & that the Hungarians were readie to skirmiſh with them without the wals, he begun to proceed more warily, & entrenched his armie: and to prouide for the ſaferie therof, by caſting vp of deep trenches & ſtrong rampiers againſt the ſudden ſallies of his enemies: & after, planting his batterie, began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the C wals with his great artillerie. By the fury wherof, he ouerthrew a part thereof, and laid it flat with the ground: which the defendants with great induſtrie and labour ſpeedily repaired, by caſting vp of new fortifications & rampiers, in ſuch ſort, that it was rather ſtronger than before Belgrade beſieged.

In the mean time Huniades (not to be named without the addition of a moſt worthie captain) being then Generall for the Hungarians, ſent a fleet of ſhips and gallies, well appointed with all warlike prouiſion, downe the riuer of Danubius from Buda: which encountring with the Turks fleet, tooke twentie ſaile of them, and ſo diſcomfited the reſt, that they were glad to run themſelues on ground neere vnto the Kings camp. All which were by Mahomets commandement preſently ſet on fire, becauſe they ſhould not come into the power of the Hungarians.
By this meanes the Chriſtians became maſters of both the riuers of Danubius and Savus; and D ſo at their pleaſure, by water conueied into the citie all things needfull for the defence thereof.
Huniades alſo himſelfe, with fiue thouſand valiant ſouldiers, and Io. Capiſtranus a Minorate Frier (by whoſe perſuaſion fortie thouſand voluntary Chriſtians out of Germanie, Bohemia, and Hungarie, were come to that warre) entered into the citie that way with their ſouldiers and followers.

The Turks fleet ouerthrowne by the Chriſtians Mahomet reſolutely ſet downe for the winning of the citie, had with continuall batterie made the ſame at length ſaultable; and ſo determined the next day to giue a generall aſſault, appointing which part of the wal euery Colonel with his regiment ſhould aſſaile. But as they were with great dilligence and greater ſtir, preparing all things needfull for the next daies ſeruice, E it fortuned, that Carazias Baſſa, Mahomets lieutenant general in Europe, and his beſt man of war, was by chance ſlaine with a great ſhot out of the towne. With whoſe death Mahomet was exceedingly troubled, as with an ominous token of the euill which afterwards enſued vnto him and his whole armie. For all that, proſecuting his former determination, the next day, early in the morning hee commanded the aſſault to be giuen; & with the dreadfull ſound of trumpets, drums, cornets, & other inſtruments of war, brought on his Ianizaries to the breach, who as couragious ſoldiers fiercely aſſailed the ſame, and without any great reſiſtance, entered both there and in diuers other places of the citie; reckoning the ſame to be now their owne.

For Huniades hauing before ſtored euery corner of the citie with his moſt valiant and expert ſoldiers, had taken order that the defendants, vpon the firſt charge of the Ianizaries, ſhould F forſake their ſtations, and as men diſcouraged, retire towards the citie, of purpoſe to draw the fierce enemies faſter on, to their farther deſtruction, & vpon a ſigne giuen to ſet vpon them on freſh, & to repaire to their former places of defence; which was accordingly done: ſo that as ſoon as the Ianizaries, with other of the Turks moſt forward ſoldiers, were in great numbers entred, vpon the retiring of the defendants; & the ſigne before appointed in the city giuen, the defendants, as men quickly changd, turning again, fiercely charged the Turks which were entred; tred contrary to their expectation : and the valiant Huniades, at the ſame time iſſuing out on G euery ſide with his moſt reſolute ſouldiers, ſo oppreſſed the Turks, that few of them that were entred eſcaped with life, but were there in the citie either ſlaine or taken priſoners ; and the reſt with exceeding ſlaughter beaten from the wals. Preſently after, Huniades in this confuſion of the Turks, ſtrengthened with the ſouldiers which came with Capiſtranus the Friar, made a ſallie out of the town, and ſet vpon the Turks appointed for the defence of the great ordnance; which was with ſuch reſolution performed, that the Turks were glad with great ſlaughter to forſake their charge, and to leaue the ordnance to their enemies.

The Turkiſh tyrant ſore troubled and throughly chafed with the loſſe of his great ordnance, couragiouſly charged the Hungarians afreſh, to haue recouered the ſame againe : but was ſo valiantly repulſed by Huniades, and ſo beaten with the murthering ſhot out of the citie, that he H was glad when he had got him out of the danger thereof into his trenches. Huniades alſo retiring turned the ordnance hee had lately won, vpon the Turks campe, and with the ſame did them no ſmall harme.

In this hurle, a great part of the Ghriſtian armie (which then lay on the other ſide of Danubius) was ſpeedily tranſported ouer the riuer ; and making no ſtay in the citie, ioyned themſelues with Huniades, then lying without the wals of the citie. Who notably ſtrengthned with this new ſupplie, aſſailed the Turkes trenches, as if he would euen preſently haue entred their campe : at which his preſumption, the proud tyrant (neuer before ſo braued) diſdaining, went out of his trenches, and valiantly encountering him, beat him backe againe to the great ordnance ; from whence he was againe by the Chriſtians driuen to his trenches. Which manner I of doubtfull and dreadfull fight, was on both ſides notably maintained, vntill the day was almoſt ſpent : Victorie with indifferent wings, houering now ouer the one ſide, now ouer the other.

Mahomet wounded, and carried away for dead.

In theſe hot skirmiſhes and conflicts, Chaſanes captaine of the Ianizaries, with many other valiant men were ſlaine. And Mahomet himſelfe performing the part as well of a couragious ſouldier, as of a worthie chiefetaine, was ſore wounded vnder his left pap ; ſo that he was taken vp for dead, and ſo carried into his pauillion, to the great diſcomfiture of his whole army.
But comming againe vnto himſelfe, and conſidering that he had in that ſiege loſt his whole fleet, his great ordnance, with moſt part of his beſt ſouldiers, and yet in no poſſibilitie of the towne : ſecretly in the night aroſe with his armie, and with great ſilence ſhamefully departed; K ſtill looking behind him when the Hungarians ſhould haue purſued him into Seruia, or haue troubled him vpon his way towards Conſtantinople. At this ſiege (beſide many of his beſt captaines and chiefe commanders) were ſlaine fortie thouſand of his beſt ſouldiers. The loſſe that hee there ſuſtained was ſo great, and ſo ſtucke in his mind, that euer after during his life, when he had occaſion to ſpeake of that ſiege, he would ſhake his head and ſigh deepely, and many times wiſh, That he had neuer ſeene that citie, whereat both he and his father had receiued ſo great diſhonor. Many were of opinion, that if Huniades had there had his horſemen on that ſide of Danubius to haue preſently purſued the fearefull enemie, that the whole army of the Turks might haue there bin ouerthrowne. This notable victorie was obtained againſt the Turke the ſixth of Aguſt in the yeare of our Lord 1456. L

The death of the moſt famous captaine Huniades.

Shortly after, this moſt valiant and renowned captain Huniades, worthie of immortal praiſe, died of a hurt taken in theſe wars ; or as ſome others write, of the plague, which was then rife in Hungarie : who when hee felt himſelfe in danger of death, deſired to receiue the ſacrament before his departure, and would in any caſe (ſicke as hee was) be carried to the Church to receiue the ſame ; ſaying, That it is not fit, that the Lord ſhould come to the houſe of his ſeruant, but the ſeruant rather to goe to the houſe of his Lord and maſter. He was the firſt Chriſtian captain that ſhewed the Turks were to be ouercome ; and obtained more great victories againſt them than any one of the Chriſtian Princes before him. He was vnto that barbarous people a great terror, and with the ſpoile of them beautified his country : and now dying, was by the Hungarians honourably buried at Alba Iulia, in S. Stephens Church : his death beeing M greatly lamented of all good men of that age.

Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour, no leſſe deſirous to extend his empire with the glorie of his name, by ſea than by land ; ſhortly after the taking of Conſtantinople, put a great fleet to ſea, wherwith he ſurpriſed diuers Iſlands in the Ægeum, and hardly beſieged the Citie of the

A Rhodes. At which time, Calixtus the third, then Biſhop of Rome, aided by the Genowayes (for the grudge they bare againſt the Turks for the taking of Pera) put to ſea a fleet of ſixteen tall ſhips and gallies well appointed, vnder the conduct of Lodouicus, Patriarch of Aquilla; who with that fleet ſcoured the ſeas, & recouered again from the Turks the Iland of Lemnos, with diuers other ſmal Iſlands thereabout: and encountering with the Turks fleet neere vnto the Iſland of the Rhodes, at a place called the Burrow of S. Paul, diſcomfited them, ſunke and tooke diuers of their gallies, and forced them to forſake the Rhodes. After which victorie at ſea, he for the ſpace of three yeares, with his gallies, at his pleaſure ſpoyled the frontiers of the Turks dominions all alongſt the ſea coaſt of the leſſer Aſia, and wonderfully terrified the effeminate people of thoſe countries: and ſo at length returned home, carrying away with B him many priſoners and much rich ſpoyle.

Vſun Caſſan the Perſian King ſendeth embaſſadors with preſents to Mahomet.

After that Mahomet was thus ſhamefully driuen from the ſiege of Belgrade, and his fleet at ſea diſcomfited (as is before declared) he began with great diligence to make new preparation againſt the next Spring to ſubdue the Iſles of the Ægeum, ſpecially thoſe which lay neere vnto Peloponeſus. But whileſt hee was buſie in thoſe cogitations, in the meane time embaſſadours from Vſun-Caſſanes the great Perſian King, arriued at Conſtantinople, with diuers rich preſents ſent to him from the ſaid King. Where among other things, they preſented vnto him a paire of playing tables, wherin the men & dice were of great and rich precious ſtones of ineſtimable worth, and the workmanſhip nothing inferiour to the matter: which the embaſſadors for oſtentation ſaid, That Vſun-Caſſanes found in the treaſures of the Perſian King, whom he had but a little before ſlain and bereft of his kingdome, and had there bin left long C before by the mightie conquerour Tamerlane. Together with theſe Preſents, they deliuered their embaſſage; the effect whereof was, That thoſe two mightie Princes might ioine & liue together in amitie: and that whereas Dauid the Emperor of Trapezond, had promiſed to pay vnto Mahomet a yerely tribute, enforced thereunto by George his lieutenant in Aſia; he ſhould not now looke for any ſuch thing: foraſmuch as that empire after the death of the Emperour then liuing, ſhould of right belong vnto Vſun-Caſſanes, in right of his wife, who was the daughter of Calo-Ioannes, the elder brother of Dauid the Emperor, then liuing: and further required him, from that time not to trouble or moleſt the ſaid Emperor his friend & neere alliance, ſo ſhould he find him his faithful & kind confederat: otherwiſe it was (as they ſaid) in his choice D to draw vpon himſelf the heauie diſpleaſure of a moſt mightie enemie. Mahomet before enuiing at the riſing of the Perſian King, and now diſdaining ſuch peremptorie requeſts, little differing from proud commands, in great choller diſmiſſed the embaſſadors with this ſhort anſwer, That he would ere long be in Aſia himſelfe in perſon, to teach Vſun-Caſſanes what to requeſt of a greater than himſelfe. This vnkindnes was the beginning & ground of the mortall wars which afterwards enſued betwixt theſe two, then the greateſt princes of the Eaſt, as ſhall be hereafter more at large declared. The embaſſadors being departed, and Mahomets fleet of an hundred and fifty ſaile readie to put to ſea, he altered his former determination for the Iſlands of the Ægeum (which after the loſſe of Conſtantinople had for the moſt part put themſelues vnder the protection of the Venetians) and commanded his Admirall with that fleet to take his courſe through the ſtraits of Boſphorus into the great Euxine ſea, (now called the blacke ſea) and ſo ſailing along the coaſt to come to anker before Sinope, the chiefe citie of Paphlagonia, & there to expect his comming thither with his army by land. This great city of Sinope E ſtands pleaſantly on a point of the main which runs a great way into the Euxine, ſomtime the metrapolitical citie of that prouince: but as then, with Caſtamona and all the country thereabout, was vnder the gouernment of Iſmael, a Mahometane prince: vpon whom Mahomet had now bent his forces, for no other cauſe than that he was in league with Vſun-Caſſan, the Perſian king. Now with great expedition had Mahomet leuied a ſtrong army, and paſſing therewith ouer into Aſia, was come before he was looked for, to Sinope. Iſmael ſeeing himſelfe ſo ſuddenly beſet both by ſea & land in his ſtrongeſt citie, although he wanted nothing needful for his defence, hauing in the citie foure hundred peeces of great artillerie, and ten thouſand ſoldiers: F yet doubting to be able with that ſtrength to indure the ſiege, offered to yeeld vp the city to Mahomet, with all the reſt of his dominion, vpon condition, That hee ſhould freely giue him in lieu therof the city of Philippopolis in Thracia, with the country thereto adioining. Of which his offer Mahomet accepted: and ſo taking poſſeſſion of Sinope, with the ſtrong citie of Mahomet inuadeth Iſhmael, prince of Sinop.

Caſtamona,

mona, and all the reſt of the Princes territorie, ſent him away with all his things to Philippopolis, G as he had promiſed. This Iſmael was the laſt of the honourable houſe of the Iſfendiars, who had long time raigned at Heraclea and Caſtamona in Pontus. From Sinope he marched on forward with his army to Trapezond. This famous citie ſtandeth alſo vpon the ſide of the Euxine or blacke ſea in the countrey of Pontus, where the Emperors of Conſtantinople had alwaies their deputies, whileſt that empire flouriſhed and commanded the Eaſt part of the world, as farre as Parthia: but after it began againe to decline (as all worldy things haue but their time) one Iſaac (whoſe father, Emperour of Conſtantinople, the Conſtantinopolitanes had for his euill gouernment ſlaine) flying to Trapezond, tooke vpon him the gouernment of that citie, with the countries of Pontus and Capadocia, and many other great prouinces, and was at firſt called the King of Trapezond: but after he was well eſtabliſhed in that gouernement, H both he and his ſucceſſors took vpon them the name and title of Emperors; which they maintained equally, if not better, than the late Conſtantinopolitan Emperours, and therefore are of moſt accounted for Emperors. He that then raigned, was called Dauid Comnenus: which moſt honourable family of the Comneni had long time before raigned in Conſtantinople; and out of the ſame were many other great Princes deſcended, which ruled in diuers places of Macedonia, Epirus, and Græcia. Mahomet comming to Trapezond, laied hard ſiege vnto the ſame by the ſpace of thirtie daies both by ſea and land, and burnt the ſuburbes thereof, as hee had before at Sinope. The fearfull Emperour diſmaied with the preſence of ſo mightie an enemie, and the ſight of ſo puiſſant an army, offered to yeeld vnto him the city with his whole empire, vpon condition, That he ſhould take his daughter to wife, and deliuer vnto him ſome I other prouince, which might yeeld him ſuch yearly profit as might ſuffice for the honorable maintenance of his ſtate. Mahomet perceiuing the weakeneſſe of his enemie by his large offers, refuſed to accept thereof, and attempted by force to haue taken the citie: which not ſorting to his deſire, the matter was againe brought to parle: where after long debating too and fro, it was at laſt agreed vpon, That the Emperour vpon the faith of the Turkiſh King for his ſafe returne, ſhould in perſon meet him without the citie, if happily ſo ſome good attonement might be made betwixt them. Whereupon the Emperour following the Turks faith before ſolemnly giuen for his ſafe returne, as was before agreed, went out of the citie to meet him, in hope to haue made ſome good agreement with him: but as ſoone as he was come out, Mahomet according to the damnable and helliſh doctrine of his falſe prophet (That faith is not to K be kept with Chriſtians) preſently cauſed the Emperour to be caſt into bonds, and ſo to bee detained as priſoner. Which when it was bruted in the citie, the citizens vtterly diſcouraged, without farther reſiſtance yeelded themſelues with the citie into his power.

Trapezond beſieged by Mahomet.

Trapezond yeelded vnto the Turks.

Mahomet now Lord of Trapezond, entring the citie, tooke priſoners the Emperors daughter, with all the reſt of his children and kindred, and all ſuch of the nobility as he found in the citie: whom hee cauſed forthwith, together with the Emperor, to be ſent by ſea as it were in triumph to Conſtantinople. Of the reſt of the citizens he choſe out ſo many as he pleaſed for his owne ſeruice, and appointed eight hundred of the Chriſtian children, in whom appeared moſt towardlineſſe, to be brought vp for Ianizaries, many alſo of the other citizens were ſent into captiuitie to Conſtantinople: the beautifull women and virgins he diuided amongſt his L friends and men of war, certain choſen paragons of whom, he ſent as preſents to his ſons. After he had thus taken his pleaſure in the citie, and left none there but the baſeſt of the people, hee put a ſtrong gariſon of his Ianizaries into the caſtle, & a great garriſon of common ſoldiers into the citie, appointing his Admirall to gouerne the ſame. The reſt of the Emperours ſtrong townes, diſcouraged with the taking of Trapezond, and the miſeries therof, in ſhort time ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Turkiſh thraldome, wherein they haue euer ſince moſt miſerably liued. So Mahomet in the ſpace of few months hauing reduced that empire into the forme of a prouince, returned in great triumph to Conſtantinople; when hee had in this expedition ſubdued Paphlagonia, Pontus, and a great part of Capadocia, with ſome other prouinces neere M vnto the Euxine ſea. When he was come to Conſtantinople, he ſent the Emperour with his children priſoners to Hadrianople. But afterwards, vnderſtanding that the Perſian Queene, the wife of Vſun-Caſſan, ſought meanes to get ſome one of her vncles children, whom by the power of her husband ſhee might, if it were poſſibly aduance vnto her fathers empire: hee ſent for Dauid the wofull Emperour to Conſtantinople, and there cruelly cauſed him, with all

A all his ſonnes and kinſmen, to be put to death; and to the vttermoſt of his power rooted out al that moſt honourable familie of the Comneni, excepting George the Emperours youngeſt ſon, who at his firſt comming to Hadrianople turned Turke: whoſe ſiſter (the Emperours daughter) Mahomet afterwards tooke to be one of his concubines. This Chriſtian empire was by the Turkiſh tyrant Mahomet thus miſerably ſubuerted and brought to nought in the yeare of our Lord 1461.

The ruine of the empire of Trapezond.

Mahomet ſeeketh to entrap Wladus Prince of Valachia.

The yeare following, which was the yere 1462, Mahomet hauing intelligence, that Wladus Dracula Prince of Valachia, his tributary, was reſolued to caſt from him his obedience, and to ioyne himſelfe vnto the Hungarians, his mortall enemies; thought it beſt to proue if he could by policy circumuent him, before he were altogether fallen from him. For which purpoſe he B ſent Catabolinus his principall ſecretarie vnto him to bring him vnto the court, promiſing him greater fauors and promotions from the Emperor, than he had as yet at any time inioyed. And by the ſame truſtie meſſenger, he commanded Chamuzes Baſſa, Gouernor of Bidina and the country lying ouer againſt Valachia, on the other ſide of Danubius, to do his vttermoſt deuoir for the entrapping of Wladus: promiſing him great rewards if he could bring the matter to effect. Whereupon Chamuzes deuiſed with the ſecretarie, that when he had done his meſſage to the Prince, and with all his cunning perſuaded him to take that iourney vpon him, hee ſhould ſecretly before hand giue notice vnto him of the certain day of his returne back againe from the prince: at which time it was like, that Wladus would in courteſie of himſelf bring the ſecret arie wel on his way, being a man of ſo great account in the court, or at leſtwiſe not refuſe ſo to do, being therto requeſted by the ſecretary: at which time the Baſſa ſecretly paſſing ouer C Danubius with certain troupes of horſemen, and lying cloſe in ambuſh vpon the way, ſhould ſuddenly ſet vpon the prince, & ſo either take him, or els kil him. The plot thus laid, and euery circumſtance agreed vpon, the ſecretarie held on his way; and comming to the prince, forced his wit to perſuade him to goe to the court: ſometime cunningly extolling the great opinion that Mahomet had of his fidelitie and valor; and otherwhiles feeding him with the hope of greater honors & princely preferments he was to receiue at the Emperors hands. But when he had ſaid what he could, he obtained no more of the wary prince, but good words againe, and that he would in courteſie conduct him on his way to the ſide of Danubins: wherof the ſecretarie by ſpeedy meſſengers gaue Chamuzes intelligence: who ſecretly paſſing ouer Danubius with certain troups of horſemen, and riding a good way into the country, lay in ambuſh vpon D the way wherby the prince & the ſecretarie muſt needs paſſe: according as was before appointed, the ſecretary accompanied with the prince, put himſelf vpon the way, and at the very prefixed time came to the place where Chamuzes lay in ambuſh with his horſmen: who ſuddenly ariſing, & on euery ſide aſſailing the prince, ſlew diuers of his men before they were well aware of his comming. But Wladus being a man of great courage, and better appointed than the Baſſa had ſuppoſed (for he went alwaies attended vpon with a ſtrong guard of valiant & ſtout men) ſo receiued Chamuzes & his Turkes, that he ſlew many of them, & at length after a hard conflict took him with the reſt priſoners: whoſe hands and feet he cauſed to be cut off, & their bodies afterwards to be thruſt vpon ſharpe ſtakes ſet faſt in the ground, to the terror of all that ſaw them: and did the Baſſa ſo much honour, as to hang him and the ſecretarie vpon a gibbet a E great deale higher than the other Turks. And not ſatisfied with this reuenge, preſently gathred his forces, & paſſing ouer Danubius into the Turkes dominions, burnt all the country before him along the ſea ſide, killing man, woman, & child, without mercy: after which great ſpoile and ſlaughter made, he returned again to Valachia. The report of this news being brought to Mahomet, ſet him in ſuch a choler & rage, that he commanded the great Baſſa Mahomets, which firſt told him therof, to be cruelly whipt: which ſeruile puniſhment in that tyrannical gouernment hath vſully bin inflicted euen vpon the greateſt princes of the court, vpon the leaſt diſpleaſure of the tyrants, eſpecially if they be not naturall Turks borne; accounting the reſt in their anger but as their baſe & contemptible ſlaues, as wel appeareth by the woful end of maF ny, euen of the greateſt of them. But when he vnderſtood by moſt ſure aduertiſements that all was as the Baſſa had before reported, or rather worſe, it is not to be in words expreſſed into what a rage he fell: the ſpoile of his country grieued him much, but the ſhameful death of the ſecretary his embaſſador, and of Chamuzes the Baſſa, tormented his heart, and filled him with indignation & deſire of reuenge. Wherefore with all ſpeed poſſible he aſſembled his ſoldiers Chamuzes Baſſa and the Turks ſecretary hanged.

and men of war, out of all parts of his dominions to Philippopolis: and had in ſhort time raiſed ſuch an armie, as the like he had not at any time imploied ſince the winning of Conſtantinople. At the ſame time alſo, he ſent his Admiral with 25 gallies, and 150 ſaile of other ſmall veſſels by the Euxine, to enter the riuer Danubius, and there landing his men, to ioyne his forces with the Prince of Podolia: who for a grudge he bare againſt Wladus, had promiſed to aid the Turke againſt him. When all things were now in readineſſe, he marched with his army from Philippopolis, and paſſing ouer Danubius, entered into Valachia; before which time, the Admirall had landed his men, and with the helpe of the Podolian, had burnt the Citie of Prailaba, the greateſt Towne of trade in all Valachia; and was beſieging Cebinm, called in antient time Lycoſtomos: where after they had lien a while and receiued ſome loſſe, they left the ſiege and departed, the Podolian backe again into his country, and the Admirall to his fleet.

Mahomet himſelfe in perſon inuadeth Valachia.

Mahomet being got ouer Danubius, burnt the villages, draue away the cattell, and made hauocke of all that came in his way. As for priſoners, he tooke but few; for the Valachies before his comming, had retired their wiues and children, and all that were vnfit for wars, either into their ſtrong cities, or into the refuge of great and thicke woods (whereof there is in that countrey plentie) or elſe into the high and rough mountaines where they were in more ſafety than in any their ſtrongeſt holds: and all ſuch as were able to beare arms, followed the Prince, who euer kept the woods and mountaines, ſtill following the Turkes armie ſo neere as he poſſibly could with ſafety; and many times cut off ſuch as ſtragled any thing far abroad from the armie, into the country: yet neuer durſt ſhew himſelfe in plaine field, being indeed but a handfull, in compariſon of the Turks multitude. Mahomet to ſmall purpoſe roaming vp and downe the country at his pleaſure, ſtaid neuer long in one place; and making no reckoning of ſuch a weake enemie as durſt neuer ſhew himſelfe, pitcht his tents ſtill in the open plaines, and ſo lay with his armie in great ſecuritie, not entrenched at all. Wladus by his eſpials vnderſtanding of this the manner of Mahomets encamping, came in the dead time of the night, and with al his power furiouſly aſſailed that quarter of the Turks camp where the Aſian ſoldiers lay, & ſlew many of them in their tents; the reſt terrified with the ſuddenneſſe of the alarum, fled out of their tents for refuge vnto the Europeian ſouldiers: the prince following them at the heeles, and entring into that quarter of the campe alſo, did there great harme, and ſtruck ſuch a generall terror & feare into all the Turks army, that they were euen vpon the point to haue wholly forſaken their tents and betaken themſelues to flight. Yea Mahomet himſelfe, diſmaid with the terrour of the night and tumult of his campe, and fearing leſt the Hungarians had ioyned their forces with the prince; not knowing which way to turn himſelfe, had vndoubtedly fled, had not Mahomet Baſſa a man of great experience in martial affaires, perſuaded him otherwiſe, and by generall proclamation made thorow the campe, That no man ſhould vpon paine of death, forſake the place wherein he was encamped, ſtaid the flight; and with much ado enforced them to make head againſt the prince. Wladus perceiuing the Turks now to begin to ſtand vpon their guard, and to make reſiſtance; after great ſlaughter made, returning, tooke the ſpoile of the tents forſaken by the Aſian ſouldiers, and vpon the approch of the day, againe retired with victorie into the woods. As ſoone as it was day, Mahomet appointed Haly-Beg with certain companies of ſelect ſouldiers, to purſue the Valachies: who ouertaking part of the Princes army, tooke a thouſand of them priſoners, and put the reſt to flight: all which priſoners were by the tyrants command, preſently put to the ſword. From that time Mahomet euerie night entrenched his armie, and cauſed better watch and ward to bee kept in euery quarter of his campe, than before.

A moſt horrible ſpectacle.

As he marched along the country, he came to the place where the Baſſa and the Secretary were hanging vpon two high gibbets, and the diſmembred Turks impailed vpon ſtakes about them: with which ſight he was grieuouſly offended. And paſſing on farther, came to a plaine containing in breadth almoſt a mile, & in length two miles, ſet ful of gallows, gibbets, wheles, ſtakes, and other inſtruments of terror, death, and torture; all hanging full of the dead carkaſes of men, women, and children, thereupon executed, in number (as was deemed) about twentie thouſand. There was to be ſeene the father, with his wife, children, & whole family, hanging together vpon one gallowes; and the bodies of ſucking babes, ſticking vpon ſharpe ſtakes; others withal their limbs broken vpon wheeles, with many other ſtrange & horrible kinds of death.

ſmall armie paſſed ouer into Aſia, and came by land to Poſſidium a citie of Ionia ouer againſt Mitylene. From whence he embarked himſelfe ouer the narrow ſtrait into the Iſland, where after he had once landed his armie, he in ſhort time ouerran the whole Iſland, and miſerably ſpoiled the ſame, leading away all the inhabitants thereof into captiuitie; who ſhortly after were ſold at Conſtantinople like flocks of ſheepe, and from thence diſperſed into all parts of his dominions. After he had thus harried the countrie, and left nothing therein vnſpoiled, he beſieged the Prince in the citie of Mitylene, whereof the Iſland now taketh name: and with his great ordnance continually battered the ſame by the ſpace of 27 dayes (in which time many ſharpe aſſaults were alſo giuen by the Turks, whereby the defendants were greatly diminiſhed and waſted. The Prince perceiuing himſelfe not able long to hold out, offered to yeeld vp the citie, with all the ſtrong holds in the Iſle, vpon condition that Mahomet ſhould therefore giue vnto him ſome other prouince, of like value to the Iſland: which his offer Mahomet accepted, and by ſolemne oath bound himſelfe for performance of that hee had promiſed. Whereupon the Prince came out of the citie, and humbled himſelfe before him, excuſing himſelfe for the receiuing of the men of war (wherewith he was charged) as done for no other purpoſe, but that they ſhould forbeare to ſpoile his owne country, much ſubiect to their fury: vtterly denying that hee had at any time bought, or ſhared, any part of ſuch prizes as had by thoſe pirats by ſea or land bin taken from the Turks. With which his excuſe, Mahomet ſeemed to be reaſonably well contented, and with good words cheered him vp: neuertheleſſe as ſoon as the citie, with all the other ſtrong holds in the Iſle, were by the Princes meanes deliuered into his hands, he no longer made reckoning of his Turkiſh faith, but cruelly cauſed many of the chiefe citizens of Mitylene to be put to death; and three hundred pirats, whom he found in the citie, to be cut in two peeces in the middle, ſo to die with more paine. And when he had placed conuenient garriſons in euery ſtrong hold in the Iſle, hee returned to Conſtantinople, carrying away with him the Prince, and all the better ſort of the inhabitants of Mitylene, that were left aliue, together with all the wealth of that moſt rich and pleaſant Iſland, leauing it almoſt deſolate, none remaining therein more than his owne garriſons, with a few of the pooreſt and baſeſt people. Mahomet after he was arriued at Conſtantinople, caſt the Prince Nicholaus, with Lucius his coſin (whoſe helpe he had before vſed in killing of his elder brother) into cloſe priſon: where they ſeeing themſelues euery houre in danger of their liues, to winne fauour in the tyrants ſight, wickedly offered to renounce the Chriſtian Religion, and to turn Turke. Which Mahomet vnderſtanding, cauſed them both to be richly apparelled, and with great triumph to be circumciſed, and preſently ſet at libertie: yet ſtill bearing in mind his old grudge, he ſhortly after, when they leaſt feared any ſuch matter, clapt them both faſt againe in priſon, and there cauſed them to bee moſt cruelly put to death. A iuſt reward for the bloudie murtherers, and Apoſtacie, who to gaine a little longer life, were content to forſake God.

Mitylene beſieged.

Mitylene yeelded to the Turke.

1464 Shortly after it fortuned, that Stephen King of Boſna (in antient time called Mæſia Superior) who ſupported by the Turkiſh Emperor, had wrongfully obtained that kingdome againſt his owne brethren, refuſed now to pay ſuch yearely tribute as hee had before promiſed: for which cauſe Mahomet with a ſtrong armie entered into Boſna, and laied ſiege vnto the city of Dorobiza: which when hee had with much adoe taken, he diuided the people thereof into three parts; one part whereof he gaue as ſlaues vnto his men of war, another part he ſent vnto Conſtantinople, and the third he left to inhabit the citie. From Dorobiza hee marched to Iaziga, now called Iaica, the chiefe citie of that kingdome, which after foure moneths ſiege was deliuered vnto him by compoſition: in this citie he took the Kings brother and ſiſter priſoners, with moſt of the nobilitie of that kingdome, whom he ſent as it were in triumph vnto Conſtantinople. The other leſſer cities of Boſna following the example of the greater, yeelded themſelues alſo. But Mahomet vnderſtanding that the King of Boſna had retired himſelfe into the fartheſt part of his kingdom, ſent Mahometes his chiefe Baſſa with his Europeian ſoldiers to purſue him: wherin the Baſſa vſed ſuch diligence, that he had on euery ſide ſo incloſed him, before he was aware, that hee could by no meanes eſcape, which was before thought a thing impoſſible. So the King for ſafegard of his life was faine to take the citie of Clyſſa for his refuge: where he was ſo hardly laid to by the Baſſa, that ſeeing no other remedie, he offered to yeeld himſelf vpon the Baſſaes faithful promiſe by oath confirmed, that he ſhould be honorably death: ſo that a man would haue thought, that all the torments the Poets ſeigne to be in hell had beene there put in execution. All theſe were ſuch as the notable, but cruell prince, iealous of his eſtate, had either for iuſt deſert, or ſome probable ſuſpition, put to death, and with their goods rewarded his ſouldiers: whoſe cruell manner was, together with the offender to execute the whole familie, yea ſometimes the whole kindred. Mahomet, although he was by nature of a fierce and cruell diſpoſition, wondred to ſee ſo ſtrange a ſpectacle of extreme crueltie: yet ſaid no more but that Wladus knew how to haue his ſubiects at command. After that, Mahomet ſent Ioſephus, one of his great captaines, to skirmiſh with the Valachies; who was by them put to the worſe: but by the comming in of Omares the ſonne of Turachan, they were againe in a great skirmiſh ouerthrowne, and two thouſand of their heads brought by the Turks vpon their launces, into the Kings campe: for which good ſeruice Omares was by the King preferred to be Gouernour of Theſſalia.

Two thouſand of the Valachies ſlaine.

When Mahomet had thus traced Valachia, and hauing done what harme hee could, ſaw it to be to no purpoſe, with ſuch a multitude of men to hunt after his flying enemie, which ſtil kept the thicke woods or rough mountaines: he returned againe to Conſtantinople, leauing behind him Haly beg with part of his armie, to proſecute that warre; and with him Dracula the younger brother of Wladus, who was alſo called Wladus, as a ſtale to draw the Valachies into rebellion againſt the Prince. This Dracula the younger, was of a little youth brought vp in Mahomets court, and for his comely ſeature of him moſt paſſionatly affected: which inordinat perturbation, ſo preuailed in the intemperat nature of the laſciuious prince, that he ſought firſt by faire words and great gifts to corrupt the youth, and not ſo preuailing, attempted at laſt to haue forced him: wherewith the noble youth being enraged, drew his rapier, and ſtriking at him to haue ſlain him, grieuouſly wounded him in the thigh, and thereupon fled. Neuertheleſſe being drawne back againe to the court, and pardoned, he was afterwards reconciled to the King, and ſo became his Ganimede; and was of him long time wonderfully both beloued and honoured, and now ſet vp for a ſtale (as is before ſaid) for the Valachies his countreymen to gaſe vpon.

It fortuned, that after the departure of the King, diuers Valachies came to Haly-beg the Turkiſh Generall, to ranſome ſuch friends of theirs as had bin taken priſoners in thoſe wars, and were yet by him detained: to whom the younger Dracula by way of diſcourſe declaring the great power of the Turkiſh Emperour, and as it were lamenting the manifold and endleſſe miſeries of his natiue country, cunningly imputed the ſame vnto the diſordered gouernment of his cruell brother, as the ground of all their woes: aſſuring them of moſt happie and ſpeedie redreſſe, if the Valachies, forſaking his fierce brother, would cleaue vnto him as their Soueraigne, in ſpeciall fauor with the great Emperour. Which ſpeech he deliuered vnto them with ſuch liuely reaſons, and in ſuch effectuall tearmes, that they there preſent, perſuaded by him, and others by them, in ſhort time all, as if it had been by a ſecret conſent, forſooke Wladus the elder brother, and choſe Dracula the younger brother to be their prince and ſoueraigne. Who ioyning vnto him the Turks forces, by the conſent of Mahomet tooke vpon him the gouernement of that warlike countrey and people; yet holding the ſame as the Turkiſh tyrants vaſſaile, the readieſt way to infidelitie. Wladus ſeeing himſelfe thus forſaken of all his ſubiects, and his yonger brother poſſeſſed of his dominion, fled into Tranſiluania, where he was by the appointment of the Hungarian King, apprehended and laid faſt in ſtrait priſon at Belgrade, for that he had without iuſt cauſe (as it was laid to his charge) moſt cruelly executed diuers Hungarians in Valachia: yet ſuch was his fortune, after ten yeres hard impriſonment, to be againe enlarged, and honourably to die in battaile againſt his antient enemies the Turks.

The death of Wladus.

Mahomet returning out of Valachia to Conſtantinople, ſent the ſame fleet which hee had vſed in his late warres, into the Ægeum, to take in ſuch Iſlands as being before vnder the Conſtantinopolitan empire, had vpon the loſſe of the citie put themſelues vnder the protection of the Venetians; but eſpecially the Iſle of Mitylene, called in antient time Lesbos: pretending that Nicholaus Catelusius prince thereof, did harbour the pyrats of Italy and other places, and alſo bought of them ſuch priſoners, and other bootie, as they continually tooke from the Turkes at ſea, or alongſt the ſea coaſt, out of many places of his dominions: pretending alſo the chaſtiſing of the ſayd prince, for that he had by treacherie ſlaine his eldeſt brother, and ſo vniuſtly taken vpon him the gouernment. His fleet thus ſet forward, hee himſelfe with a bly vſed, and not to receiue in his perſon any harme from the Turkiſh Emperor. Whereupon the Baſſaes oath to the ſame purpoſe was with great ſolemnitie taken; and for the more aſſurance conceiued in writing, firmed by the Baſſa, and ſo deliuered to the king: which done, the king came out of the citie and yeelded himſelfe. The Baſſa hauing thus taken the king priſoner, carried him about with him from place to place, & from citie to city, vntill he had taken poſſeſſion of all the kingdome of Boſna; and ſo returning vnto his maſter, preſented vnto him the captiue king: who was not a little offended with him, for that he had vnto him ſo far engaged his Turkiſh faith. But when the poore King thought to haue departed, not greatly fearing further harm, he was ſuddenly ſent for by Mahomet: at which time, he doubting the worſt, caried with him in his hand the writing wherin the Baſſaes oath for his ſafety was compriſed: neuertheleſſe, the faithleſſe tyrant without any regard therof, or of his faith therin giuen, cauſed him preſently to be moſt cruelly put to death, or as ſome write, to be ſlaine quicke. Thus was the Chriſtian kingdome of Boſna, ſubuerted by Mahomet in the yere 1464: who after he had at his pleaſure diſpoſed thereof, & reduced it to the forme of a prouince, to bee (as it is at this day) gouerned by one of his Baſſaes; in great triumph returned to Conſtantinople, carriing away with him many a woful Chriſtian captiue, and the whole wealth of that kingdom.

Mahomet following the example of his father Amurath, had from the beginning of his raigne by one or other of his great Baſſaes or expert captains ſtill maintained wars againſt Scanderbeg the moſt valiant and fortunat King of Eiprus: the greateſt part wherof, although it did in the courſe of time concurre with the things before declared, and might by peecemeale haue bin amongſt the ſame in their due time and place inſerted; yet I haue of purpoſe for diuers reaſons wholly reſerued them for this place: firſt, for that I would not interrupt the courſe of the hiſtorie before rehearſed, with the particular accidents of this war: And then, for that the greateſt heat of this hereditarie war, deliuered as it were from hand to hand, from the father to the ſon, hapned not long after this time; when as Mahomet hauing conquered the kingdom of Boſna, had ſurrounded a great part of Scanderbegs dominion: wherein I had reſpect alſo vnto the Readers eaſe, who may with greater pleaſure and content, and leſſe paines alſo, view the ſame together, than if it had bin diſperſedly ſcattered & intermedled with the other greater occurrents of the ſame time. In which diſcourſe I will but briefly touch many things wel worthie of a larger treatiſe. And if forgetting my ſelfe, I ſhall in ſome places happen to ſtay ſomething longer than the Readers haſt would require, yet I hope, that the zeale and loue he beares vnto the worthy memorie of moſt famous Chriſtian Princes, together with the ſhortneſſe of the hiſtorie, in compariſon of that which is therof written in iuſt volumes by others, ſhall eaſily excuſe a larger diſcourſe than this: But againe to our purpoſe.

The great wars betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, are at large written by Marinus Barletius, in 13. Bookes, De vita, & geſtis Scanderbegi, from whence this hiſtorie is taken: & were done betwixt the yeres 1450 and 1467.

Mahomet in the beginning of his raigne ſent embaſſadors to Scanderbeg, offering him peace, ſo that he would grant to pay vnto him ſuch yearely tribute as his father Amurath had in his life time demanded. Which embaſſage the craftie tyrant ſent rather to proue what confidence Scanderbeg had in himſelfe, than for any hope he had to haue his demand granted. This diſhonorable offered peace Scanderbeg ſcornfully reiected, and ſo returned the embaſſadors as they came: and preſently vpon their departure entered with his horſemen into that part of the Turks dominion which bordereth vpon Epirus: and when he had waſted the country, returned home laded with the ſpoile thereof. In reuenge of which deſpight, Mahomet ſhortly after ſent Ameſa one of his beſt men of war, with 12000 horſemen into Epirus, to requite Scanderbeg with the like ſpoile of his people and country. But Scanderbeg vnderſtanding by his eſpials of the Turks comming, lay cloſe in ambuſh with 6000 ſouldiers vpon the great mountaine Modriſſa, ouer which the Turks muſt of neceſſitie take their way: and as they were about by night to haue paſſed ouer that rough and ſteepe mountaine, and were with much difficulty almoſt got vp to the top thereof, they were ſuddenly charged by Scanderbeg his footmen, who hauing the aduantage of the place, made great ſlaughter of the Turks, & draue them down the mountaine amaine; at which time their horſes ſtood them in no ſtead at all, but were rather vnto them an hinderance in that vneuen and troubleſome ground. Now when the Turks were come to the foot of the mountaine, they were in that great feare and diſorder againe fiercely aſſailed on the one ſide by Scanderbeg, & on the other ſide by his nephew, called alſo Ameſa, who before the Turks comming had placed themſelues with their horſmen in places of moſt aduantage: ſo that the Turkes hardly beſet and forced on euery ſide, were in ſhort time ouerthrowne and put to flight. In this conflict ſeuen thouſand of the Turks were ſlaine, and Ameſa Generall of the Turks armie with diuers other captains taken, whom Scanderbeg ſent priſoners to Croia. For ioy of this victorie at Scanderbegs returne, great triumph and feaſting was made at Croia: during which time, Scanderbeg cauſed Ameſa the Turke, with the reſt of the Turkiſh captains, to be enlarged, to be partakers of that ioy, wherof they againſt their wils had giuen the occaſion; and afterwards vſed them with all kinde of courteſie during the time of their abode. This Ameſa requeſted of Scanderbeg, that he might ſend a meſſenger to Conſtantinople, to certifie Mahomet how the caſe ſtood with him and the reſt, whom happily he might thinke to haue bin ſlaine in the battell; and to procure from him their ranſom. Which his requeſt Scanderbeg eaſily granted, and ſet downe their ranſome at thirteen thouſand duckats. The newes of this ouerthrow ſore greeued the Turkiſh tyrant, but afterwards when he ſaw the remainder of his army without their Generall & leaders, hauing for moſt part loſt their enſignes and armour, and alſo the meſſenger that was ſent from Ameſa; he fell into ſuch a rage, that he denied to giue any thing at all for his ranſome: imputing all the loſſe to his treacherie, follie, or cowardiſe. Howbeit he was afterwards perſuaded by his Baſſaes and other great courtiers, Ameſa his friends, to thinke better of the Generall, of whoſe faithfulneſſe and valour he had of long time had great experience, and alſo to ſend his ranſome: by denying whereof, he ſhould (as they ſaid) diſcourage his other Generals and captains, who by chance of war might hap to fall into the like danger. By whoſe perſuaſion Mahomet ſent an embaſſador to Scanderbeg, with the ranſome demanded, and other great preſents alſo. Vpon receit whereof, Ameſa with the other captaines were ſet at libertie, and ſent with ſafe conuoy out of Epirus. All the mony ſent for the Turks ranſome, Scanderbeg diuided amongſt his captaines and ſouldiers.

Debreas ſent with 14000 horſemen to inuade Epirus.

A skirmiſh betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks.

This late receiued ouerthrow filled the proud tyrant with deſire of reuenge, ſo that he determined forthwith to ſend another armie into Epirus: the leading whereof, diuers of his great and moſt expert captaines ambitiouſly ſought for. For Mahomet had promiſed great rewards and moſt honorable preferments to him whoſe hap it ſhould be to vanquiſh Scanderbeg. Among the reſt, one Debreas (a man for his forwardneſſe & courage, in great fauor with his ſoueraigne) by great ſuit obtained to haue that charge: promiſing with exceeding confidencie vnto Mahomet, to make a beginning of better ſucceſſe in his wars of Epirus, than others thither by him before ſent: for the accompliſhment whereof, he required to haue no greater power than was ſent the yere before. But after that Ameſa was returned to the court, & had with long diſcourſe ſet forth the vertues and valour of Scanderbeg, with the inuincible courage of his ſouldiers, Debreas became more temperate in his ſpeech, and was contented to receiue a new ſupplie; ſo that he had vnder his charge fourteene thouſand ſouldiers: with which armie he marched towards Epirus, and was come to a place called Pologus, where he lay with his army encamped in a plaine in great ſecuritie, fearing no danger, for that he was not as yet in the enemies country, neither as he ſuppoſed, neere the enemie. Of all this preparation, and of the comming of Debreas, Scanderbeg had intelligence; and being reſolued not to expect the comming of the Turks into Epirus, made choice of ſix thouſand of his beſt horſemen; with whom he marched with as much ſpeed as was poſſible into the enemies country, and came by night vnto the plaine where the Turks lay, hoping to haue bin vpon them before they were aware, and ſo to haue ouerthrowne them; wherein he was much deceiued: for by the light of the Moone (which then ſhined all night) he was by the Turks in time deſcried, yet the ſuddennes of his approch with the ſtrangeneſſe of the attempt, exceedingly diſmaied the whole army of the Turks. But Debreas mindfull of the promiſe he had made vnto his Lord and maſter, with cheerfull words encouraged his ſouldiers, and preſently ſent out certain troups of light horſemen, to receiue the firſt charge of the enemie, vntill he might ſet his whole armie in order of battell. Betwixt theſe troups, and others ſent out by Scanderbeg, began a ſharpe skirmiſh; both the armies ſtanding faſt, as beholders, carefully expecting the euent thereof. But Scanderbeg doubting, that if his ſouldiers ſhould in his firſt encounter be put to the worſt, it might tend to the great diſcouraging of the reſt of his armie; ſeconded his men with other freſh troups vnder the leading of Moſes and Ameſa: by whoſe comming in, the Turks were forthwith beaten back, and chaſed euen to their maine battell. In the heat of which chaſe, Moſes forgetting himſelfe, had with great danger in following on too faſt, bin incloſed by the Turks, had not his furie bin in good time ſtaid by Ameſa: for which ouerſight, he was afterward blamed by Scanderbeg, The battell betwixt Scanderbeg & Debreas.

Debreas ſlaine by Scanderbeg, and his armie ouerthrowne.

A pleaſant contention betwext Muſachius and a Turke for his ranſome.

A derbeg, that he could not with greater moderation vſe his good fortune, commending ſuch forwardneſſe in a priuat ſouldier, but not in ſo great a commander. When Moſes and Ameſa had thus put the Turks to flight, Scanderbeg brought on his whole armie, and fiercely aſſailed the Turks, yet troubled with the diſcomfiture of their fellowes. Debreas on the other ſide, with cheerfull ſpeech, & his own valor, ſo encouraged his ſoldiers, that Scanderbeg was there notably reſiſted, and his fortune as it were at a ſtand: vntill that Muſachius, with certain troupes of reſolute men, drawne out of the left wing of Scanderbegs armie, gaue ſuch a fierce charge vpon the ſide of the Turks armie, that he brake their rankes, and ſore diſordered that part of the armie: which when Debreas perceiued, he withdrew himſelfe out of the front of the battell wherin he had valiantly ſtood againſt Scanderbeg, and came to the place where Muſachius had diſordered the battell, and with ſuch courage cheared vp his troubled ſoldiers, that his onely B preſence and valour ſeemed to be the very life and heart of his whole armie. Whileſt Debreas was thus buſied againſt Muſachius, Scanderbeg in the mean time with might and main ſtil charged the front of the enemies armie: who now in the abſence of the Generall began to looſe their order & to giue ground, making no ſuch reſiſtance as before. At which time, Moſes forcibly breaking into the thickeſt of them, tooke one of their enſignes, which hee threw backe among his followers: wherwith they encouraged, ſo preſſed vpon their enemies, without regard of danger, that the Turks being therewith diſcouraged, and their battell diſordred, were almoſt ready to turne their backs and to flie. Debreas ſeeing all in danger to be loſt, haſted with all ſpeed vnto the place where he ſaw moſt perill, and did what was poſſible to haue reſtored the battell, and encouraged his ſoldiers: where preſſing in among the formoſt, he was by Scan- C derbeg himſelfe encountered hand to hand, and ſo by him ſlaine: with whoſe fall the whole armie diſcouraged, without further reſiſtance fled. Moſes purſuing them on the one ſide, and Muſachius on the other, with furious hand ſlew more in that chaſe than were ſlaine in the battell. Of the Turks were ſlaine in this battell 4120, and ſome priſoners taken, but of the Chriſtians few or none: ſo that for the good fortune thereof, Scanderbeg accounted it a victory gi-uen. All the ſpoile taken from the enemie, together with the priſoners, was by Scanderbeg equally diuided among the ſoldiers. Vnto Moſes he gaue Debreas his horſe and armor: and vnto Muſachius a priſoner, which by his port and behauiour ſeemed to bee a man of ſome account.
This Turke agreed with Muſachius vpon a ranſome of 200 duckats, and preſently vpon agreement made, drew forth the mony out of a little bag which he had kept ſecretly about him, and D offered it to Muſachius for his ranſom: who receiuing the mony, told the Turke, that he muſt prouide another ranſome, foraſmuch as that mony was his owne before by law of armes, as taken with his perſon. The Turke on the other ſide alledged for himſelfe, the agreement alreadie made, with the paiment of the full ſum agreed vpon. This controuerſie was brought before Scanderbeg: who with great pleaſure heard them both what they could ſay: Muſachius laying in hard for another ranſome, and the Turke for his liberty vrging the agreement. Who when they had both ſaid what they could for themſelues, Scanderbeg ſmiling, told them, that they both contended for that which was in right his, and neither of theirs: for the priſoner with the mony were both mine (ſaid he) at the firſt taking of him, ſince which time I haue gi-E uen to you Muſachius the priſoner, which I knew, but not the mony which I knew not of: neither doth the concealing thereof make it yours (ſaid he to the Turke) who had by law of arms loſt your ſelfe, together with al that you had about you. After he had thus pleaſantly diſcourſed of the matter, and brought them both in doubt, he awarded to Muſachius the mony he agreed for, & to the Turke his deſired liberty: who glad thereof, and hauing alſo receiued his horſe and armor of the gift of Scanderbeg, departed, ſpeaking all the honor he could of ſo noble a conqueror. After this victorie Scanderbeg with great triumph returned againe to Croia.

When Mahomet vnderſtood that Debreas was ſlaine, and his armie ouerthrowne, he became exceeding melancholie: but after he ſaw ſo many of his ſoldiers returned as had bin ſufficient to haue reſtored a loſt battell, he was ſo highly diſpleaſed with that cowardiſe, as that he F could not endure the ſight of them. The death of Debreas greeued none more than the King himſelfe: for the captains generally either enuied at his hardineſſe, or els hated his inſolencie.
Ameſa among the reſt tooke no ſmall pleaſure, that his proud ſucceſſour had taken part of his euill fortune, and ſo in part eaſed his former infamie. The great Baſſaes and men of war ſeeing their ſoueraigne ſo deſirous of reuenge, offered to ſpend their liues in that ſeruice: whoſe forwardneſſe he ſeemed not to refuſe: howbeit he had in his mind already plotted another man- G ner of reuenge. Hee was not ignorant, what great matters his father Amurath had brought to paſſe, by ſowing diſcord among the Princes of Græcia: which foule practiſe he purpoſed now to put in practiſe himſelfe. There were at that time many famous chiefetaines in Epirus, of Scanderbeg both beloued and truſted; among whom, he was in hope to find ſome one who for deſire of wealth or promotion, might be allured to giue ſome deſperat attempt againſt the life or ſtate of Scanderbeg. Of all others, Moſes Golemus of Dibra (a man honorably deſcended) was moſt inward with Scanderbeg, and for his proweſſe and experience in martiall affaires, of all men accounted the beſt captaine in all Epirus, next vnto Scanderbeg himſelfe: him, the craftie tyrant moſt deſired to alienate from Scanderbeg, as one fitteſt to ſerue his purpoſe, and eaſieſt without ſuſpition to be dealt withall, becauſe he commonly lay with a ſtrong garriſon in Di- H bra, vpon the very frontiers of Epirus. Wherefore he directed his letters vnto the Gouernor of Sfetigrade, commanding him by al means he could poſſibly deuiſe to withdraw Moſes from Scanderbeg; and not to ſpare for any gold or golden promiſes whereby to allure him: promi-ſing alſo vnto the Gouernor himſelfe great preferments, if he could win him. Vpon receit of which letters, the Gouernor began forthwith carefully to deuiſe, how he might beſt attempt the matter he had in charge: where after many deuiſes, he at laſt thought vpon a ſhrewd-headed fellow, one of the Chriſtians which dwelt in Sfetigrade; whom for that he was a Chriſtian, hee might without ſuſpect vſe as an inſtrument in ſo dangerous and important an action.

This Chriſtian the Gouernor called vnto him, and after he had with great gifts and large promiſes won him to vndertake the matter, he ſent him away, fully before armed with plenteous I inſtructions, full of treaſon and deceit. When this ſubtill meſſenger was come vnto Moſes, and vnder pretence of great and ſecret matters of importance, had obtained to ſpeake with him in priuat; he after ſome diſcourſe had of matters well worth the hearing, began at length vnder the couert of faire glozing words, to vtter his poyſon: ſhewing vnto him (as a meſſengr from the Gouernor) the great and good opinion the Turkiſh Emperor had of long time conceiued of his valor and proweſſe: for which cauſe his heroicall nature could not but honor him, although he were his enemie; and therewith alſo maruell, that hee being a man of that worth, could be contented to be commanded by Scanderbeg, whoſe ſtate was by him chiefly vphol-den: wheras if he would do wiſely, and changing his affection, follow Mahomet, an Emperor of greateſt magnificence and power, he ſhould quickly in his court find ſuch honorable enter- K tainment, as were to be preferred before the ſtate of Scanderbeg: or if the ſoueraigntie of Epirus his natiue country did better pleaſe him, he might eaſily be therunto aduanced, by ioining his owne endeuor vnto Mahomets great power. It pleaſed Moſes well to heare his owne praiſes (a thing incident vnto hautie minds) and he liked well that he was ſo fauoured of the Turkiſh Emperor: but the hope of the kingdome of Epirus, began to worke in him new conceits, and moued him more than all the reſt. Such is the force of ambitious thoughts, that they make a man forget all things, ſaue themſelues: ſo glorious a thing it is, to ſtand in the higheſt place: for all that, Moſes neither in word or countenance made any ſemblant of liking, or diſliking the meſſage. Which the wily meſſenger taking for a ſecret conſent, and heartily glad that he had bin ſo well heard, not deſiring as then any further anſwer, craued leaue to depart, promiſing in L ſhort time to returne to him againe. After the departure of this meſſenger, many troubled thoughts began to ariſe in the mind of Moſes: his mirth was changed into melancholy, & the cheerfulneſſe of his countenance was abated; his hautie thoughts were his ſolitarie companions, and the imagined kingdome the Idol he in ſecret worſhipped; ſo that in ſhort time, he ſeemed to the wiſer ſort as a man altogether metamorphoſed. Some were ſo bold, as for to aske the cauſe of the meſſengers comming: vnto whom he anſwered, That he was one, from whom he receiued intelligence of matters concerning the good of the ſtate: which his anſwer was holden for true; for who durſt once miſtruſt Moſes? Whilſt he thus was toſſed vp and downe with his owne thoughts, as a ſhip with the billowes of a wrought ſea, the ſame ſlie meſſenger, M according to his promiſe came againe; and for his more credit, in ſecret brought with him ſuch preſents as well might ſeeme to haue bin ſent from the Great Turke; with his meſſage better framed than before. Of all which that was ſent, Moſes is reported to haue receiued nothing but the worſt, which was, the very treaſon it ſelfe. And ſo returned the meſſenger, with anſwer, that he could not but in good part accept of the Turkiſh Emperors great fauors; and

The craftie proceeding of the Turks meſſenger.

Moſes corrupted.

A for the reſt of his requeſts, whatſoeuer he ſhould chance to doe therein, he ſhould not from thenceforth find him any great enemie: commanding the meſſenger at his departure, no more to repaire vnto him about that matter, for feare of ſuſpition.

After that, it chanced that Scanderbeg came into Dibra, to ſee how all things ſtood there, and to conſult with Moſes for the beſieging of Sfetigrade; which citie it grieued him to ſee in the poſſeſſion of the Turks. Moſes to auert Scanderbeg from that enterpriſe, wherein he muſt of force be driuen to ſhew himſelfe, told him, That he vnderſtood of late by a certaine meſſenger which came to him out of Sfetigrade, that the citie was ſo well ſtored by the Turks, of all things neceſſarie for the defence thereof, that it were but loſt labor to attempt any thing againſt the ſame: wherefore hee aduiſed him rather to beſiege Belgrade (not that Belgrade B which is ſcituated vpon the riuer of Danubius, but another of the ſame name) in the confines of Epirus, then holden by the Turks, but diſtant from Sfetigrade about an hundred and fortie miles; of the taking whereof, there ſeemed to be more hope. By this perſuaſion, Scanderbeg reſolued with himſelfe to make prouiſion for the beſieging of Belgrade. And foraſmuch as his ſouldiers of Epirus alwaies vſed to the field, were not ſo fit for the beſieging of townes, he thought it good to pray aid out of Italy, from his old friend Alphonſus King of Naples, with whom he had beene of long time acquainted, and vnto him much beholden. Wherefore he ſent two of his noblemen embaſſadors vnto him, with certaine rich Preſents, and familiar letters of this purport.

Scanderbeg craueth aid of Alphonſus king of Naples.

Our ſouldiers of Epirus, know onely how to fight with men, and them to vanquiſh: with wals they C know not how to deale. You Italians (as I vnderſtand) haue skill in that kind of ſeruice, and take pleaſure therein: wherefore now at this preſent, I haue neede of your helpe and cunning. There be certaine townes of our enemies in Epirus, yea almoſt in the heart of our kingdome, which eye ſore I haue of long deſired (if it pleaſed God) to take out of my ſight: but being occupied with continuall wars, had no leiſure vntill now, happily to attempt any thing againſt them. This time I haue choſen as moſt fit, to ſatisfy my deſire, both for the ſeaſonableneſſe of the time of the yeare, and for that Mahomet ſpareth me leiſure; whoſe furie I haue twice calmed. You vnderſtand in few words, what I haue need of: all other things are almoſt in readineſſe, and we onely looke for your helpe. Lend me ſuch ſouldiers as know how to fight a far off, I meane harquebuſiers and canoniers, for of others we haue ſtore plentie. But happie is Apulia, my Alphonſus, vnder thy gouernment, from whence men fit for all ſeruices may bee drawne as out D of a moſt plentifull treaſurie. Whenſoeuer we haue requeſted men fit for ſeruice, either in peace or warre, you haue beautified both our court and campe. By you the kingdome of Epirus hath beene ſupported with ciuill policie, and warlike ſtrength: all ſort of people, of what condition ſoeuer: yea euery corner of Epirus ſoundeth forth thy praiſe, both at home and abroad. But for mine own part, I doe ſo louingly embrace your kindneſſe, and ſo firmly retaine the remembrance of your deſerts towards me, that ſometime I wiſh you that fortune (although in ſo doing I may ſeeme vnkind) which (as the common ſaying is) proueth, but getteth not friends: to the intent, that you might by ſome more certaine proofe know, how much I am to you deuoted.

When Scanderbeg had ſent away his embaſſadours, he with all diligence began to prouide E things neceſſarie for the ſiege of Belgrade: wherein he had purpoſed alſo to haue vſed the ſeruice of Moſes. But he now in heart a traitor both to his Prince and countrey, and a friend to Mahomet, found many excuſes to ſtay at home in Dibra; alleging firſt, that it was to be thought that ſo ſoone as the Turkiſh King ſhould heare of the ſiege of Belgrade, hee would inuade ſome part of Epirus, thereby to withdraw his enemies from the ſiege: and then, that no part of all Epirus lay neerer vnto the Turks, or more in danger than Dibra; and that therefore hee could not doe any better ſeruice, than to ſee vnto the ſaftie of that country, long before committed to his charge, and in which alſo moſt part of his liuing lay. Theſe his excuſes, proceeding indeed from deep treaſon, were yet neuertheleſſe thought reaſonable, and he for his pro- F uident care highly commended: and authoritie giuen him with new ſupplies to augment the garriſon vnder his command, as time and occaſion ſhould require.

By that time that Scanderbeg had fully made his preparation for the intended ſiege, the embaſſadors before ſent to Alphonſus, were returned into Epirus, and with them ſuch aid as Scanderbeg had before requeſted, and a great deale more: For Alphonſus fearing the greatneſſe of the Turkiſh Emperor, in what he could furthered Scanderbeg his actions, reckoning Epirus G not aboue 60 miles diſtant from his dominions, to be the ſtrongeſt wals of his kingdome in Apulia (as not many yeres after, it by proofe appeared, when as the Turks hauing taken Otranto put all Italy in no ſmall feare.) With this aid he alſo wrote louing letters vnto Scanderbeg, thanking him for his preſents, and for the good opinion he had of him, willing him to make as bold of all his things, as of his owne. But when he came to make mention of the ſouldiers he had ſent, Alphonſus, after the manner of his pleaſant nature, merrily wrote vnto Scanderbeg, That he had ſent him Italian ſouldiers which could according to his deſire, fight well both with men and wals, but better with women: and that therefore the Epirots were beſt to take heed, that they whoſe helpe they required for fight a far off, proued not alſo good warriours at hand at home in their houſes. The great commendation Scanderbeg had giuen of the King, H was by him referred vnto the exceſſe of his loue, and by the King requited with like.

Scanderbeg beſiegeth and diſtreſſeth Belgrade.

Scanderbeg now furniſhed with all things needfull, ſet forward, and according to his former determination, came and encamped before Belgrade, with an armie of fourteene thouſand good ſouldiers: and in ſhort time had ſo diſtreſſed the citie, that the Turkes were glad to take truce with him for ſixteene dayes, which time expired, they promiſed to deliuer vp the town, if they were not before relieued. Vpon concluſion of this truce, Scanderbeg encamped himſelfe vpon an high hil, neere vnto the citie, with three thouſand horſe, and a thouſand foot: and appointed Muſachius and Tanuſius, with the reſt of his armie, to remoue farther off into a large plaine, where they might encampe themſelues in a more wholſome and freſh aire, in that hot ſeaſon of the yeare, during the time of the truce. At which time he appointed alſo 25 ſcouts to I keepe continuall watch vpon the top of the higheſt mountaine, to diſcouer a far off the comming of the enemie, and to giue warning thereof vnto the campe by making a fire vpon the mountaine: by the negligence of which watch, Scanderbeg receiued a great ouerthrow, as hereafter followeth.

The news of the ſiege of Belgrade was brought vnto Mahomet, at ſuch time as he was readie to haue paſſed into Aſia againſt the Emperour of Trapezond: which great enterpriſe hee was loath to giue ouer, for the releefe of Belgrade; and yet to loſe that citie vnto Scanderbeg, grieued him much: wherefore he reſolued with himſelfe ſo to doe the one, as that he would not altogether neglect the other. And ſo holding on his intended iourney into Aſia himſelfe, with ſuch fortune as is aforeſaid, he ſent Sebalias one of his great Baſſaes, with fortie thouſand horſ- K men to releeue Belgrade, promiſing him great rewards if he could bring him Scanderbeg eyther aliue or dead. This Baſſa was of the Turks accounted for a warie captaine, but not ſo couragious, alwaies more politick than forward: he hauing receiued his charge, ſet forward with all ſpeed poſſible, no leſſe carefull of that he was commanded, than was Mahomet himſelfe, and by great iournies came on ſo faſt, that he ſtill preuented the fame of his comming; and by his forerunners intercepted, or rather (as ſome write) corrupted the watch which Scanderbeg had before placed vpon the mountains; ſo that no ſigne was giuen vnto the campe, of the enemies, as was expected. By means whereof, Sebalias with all his power were vpon that part of Scanderbegs armie, which lay in the plaines, before they were well aware of his comming: ſo that moſt part of them had not ſo much leiſure as to bridle their horſes, or to put on their armour. L In which ſo ſudden a feare, Muſachius armed himſelf, and put his ſoldiers in ſuch order, as the ſhortneſſe of the time and the enemies approach would permit; doubting much, whether it were better to fight or to flie: but ſeeing no leſſe danger in flight than in fight, he reſolutely receiued the enemies charge, as a man deſirous beforehand to reuenge his owne death. And at length (ſeeing his men ſlain about him by heaps, and that courage muſt needs giue place vnto fortune) fiercely attempted to haue broken thorow the midſt of his enemies, and ſo to haue fled vnto the mountain where Scanderbeg lay: but he was ſo beſet, that no way was poſſible to be made; wherfore reſoluing there to die, he deſperatly fought, to the great admiration of his enemies, vntill that he, with all there with him, were euery man ſlaine.

Muſachius ſlain and the Epirots put to flight.

Tanuſius on the other ſide, after he had giuen diuers braue attempts to haue reſcued his coſin Muſachius, finding by M proofe, that he could do him no more good therein but to become the wofull companion of his death, exhorted al the reſt yet left, for ſafegard of their liues to flie: in which doing, moſt of them were ſlain, for the Baſſaes great armie ſo filled all places thereabout, and ſo eagerly purſued the victorie, that it was almoſt impoſſible any way to eſcape. Scanderbeg lying vpon the moun-

A mountaine, and ſeeing the ouerthrow of moſt part of his armie, was about many times to haue deſcended from the hil, to haue holpen them in what he might, or els to haue there died with them: but yet ſtaied, being thereto earneſtly requeſted by his other moſt expert captaines; and perſuaded, not deſperatly to thruſt both himſelfe and them all into the manifeſt perill of aſſured death.

Scanderbeg ſeeth his men ſlain, and is not able to releeue them.

Sebalias hauing ſlaine Muſachius, and put Tanuſius to flight, followed th chaſe with the greateſt part of his army, ſo that few were left in the great plaine, except ſuch as ſtaied or rifle the dead. Scanderbeg taking that opportunitie, came downe from the hill whereon he ſtood, with his foure thouſand ſoldiers, and in a moment ſlew all ſuch Turkes as he found in his way: and after following in the taile of the Turks army, cut off a great number of them, and brought a B generall feare vpon the whole armie: inſomuch, that Sebalias perceiuing that he gained not ſo much in chaſing of Tanuſius, but that he loſt more in the rereward of his armie, by the purſuit of Scanderbeg, left the chaſe, and turned vpon his fierce enemy: where after a ſharpe skirmiſh begun, the warie Baſſa fearing in the maintaining of that diſordered fight to haue the victory wrung out of his hands by Scanderbeg, cauſed a retrait to be ſounded, ſo to cal together his diſperſed ſoldiers, and in better order to encounter his dangerous enemy. Scanderbeg in the mean time hauing aſſembled the remainder of his armie, valiantly again encountred the Turks, who thought in this battel to haue made an end of the wars in Epirus: and with his own hand ſlew Achmat and Barach, two valiant ſoldiers of the Turks; which like ſtout champions had before ſworne vnto Mahomet the death of Scanderbeg, if they ſhould chance to meet with him. In this laſt skirmiſh a great number of the Turkes were ſlaine: but night drawing on, Sebalias retired C with his armie to a mountaine neere vnto the citie, and Scanderbeg likewiſe to another almoſt two miles off: and in the dead time of the night riſing with his army, returned in ſafety into Epirus, leauing ſtrong gariſons vpon all the ſtrait paſſages as he went, for feare leaſt the Baſſa proud of this victorie, ſhould forthwith breake into Epirus. This was the onely and greateſt ouerthrow that Scanderbeg had hitherto receiued of the Turks: wherein he loſt two thouſand horſemen and three thouſand foot (moſt part whereof were of the Italians ſent from king Alphonſus) together with his tents and great artillerie, and about eightie of his men taken priſoners. And of the Turks were alſo ſlaine three thouſand.

Scanderbeg flieth by night into Epirus.

The next day Sebalias perceiuing that Scanderbeg was retired, commanded the bodies of the ſlaine Turks to be ſought out and buried: but of ſuch Chriſtians as they yet found breathing, D the Turks cut off their hands and feet, and ſo left them among the dead. The head of Muſachius and of many other the ſlaine Chriſtians, which by their armour or apparell were thought to be of the better ſort, were by the commandement of Sebalias cut off; which becauſe hee could not for the diſtance of the place, and heat ~~of the weather~~, without great annoiance carry with him to Conſtantinople, as the barbarous manner of the Turks is; he cauſed them to bee flaine, and ſtuffed with chaffe, and ſo to be carried as the vaine trophies of his victorie. Afterwards, when he had repaired the battered wals of Belgrade, & put a new ſupplie of ſeuen hundred freſh ſouldiers into the citie, beſide the old garriſon therein before, and ſet all things in good order, he returned with great triumph to Conſtantinople. And the more to ſet out the glory of his victory, at ſuch time as he entred the city, he firſt cauſed the captiue Chriſtians to E be led in chains before him; after whom were borne the enſignes taken from the Chriſtians, with the aforeſaid heads thruſt vpon lances, and after them all the ſpoile: laſt of all came Sebalias himſelfe with his ſouldiers, as great conquerours, and was of the people receiued with ſuch applauſe and ioy, as if he had conquered ſome great kingdome. No man was now ſpoken of but Sebalias, his praiſes were in euery mans mouth, he was the onely man (as they ſaid) that did ſhew that Scanderbeg was to be ouercome: no preferment was now thought too great for him, or reward ſufficient to counteruaile his deſert. The poore Chriſtian captiues were afterwards for the moſt part ſould: of the reſt, ſome were aliue thruſt vpon ſharpe ſtakes, ſome hanged vpon yron hookes, ſome otherwiſe cruelly at the victors pleaſure tortured to death.

F Moſes lately before corrupted by the practiſe of the Gouernour of Sfetigrade, hearing of the great loſſe Scanderbeg had receiued at Belgrade, thought it now a moſt fit time for his reuolt. But foraſmuch as the fact, in the nature of it ſelf foule, ſeemed euen to himſelfe the doer thereof, a great deale fouler and more diſhonorable, for that he had therein no complices: he thought it good, if it were poſſible, to alure ſom others into the fellowſhip of his treaſon, ſo to diminiſh the infamy of himſelfe, in communicating the ſame with many, and to appeare with G greater credit before the Turkiſh tyrant, than if he ſhould as a contemptible fugitiue come all alone. Wherefore vpon the bad news from Belgrade, he ſeemed at the firſt very penſiue, and much to lament the misfortune of Scanderbeg, and the common miſerie of the country of Epirus, with many words amplifying the ſame: and then on the contrary part, ſetting forth to the vttermoſt the force and power of the Turkiſh Emperour Mahomet, thereby to ſtrike a greater terrour and diſtruſt into the minds of them with whom he was conuerſant: but vnto ſuch as were more ſecret and inward with him, he diſcouered the great affection and fauour the great Emperor Mahomet had of long born him, with the large offer of his gifts and preferments, aſſuring them of the like alſo, if they would conform themſelues vnto his appetite; ſeeking herby H ſo much as he could, to allure them into the participation of his moſt execrable treaſon; yet when he had ſaid what he could, he found none but a few of the baſer ſort of the common ſouldiers, which were willing to hearken vnto him or to follow him. When Moſes ſaw how much he had laboured, and how little preuailed, fearing to be diſcouered, he fled by night to Sfetigrade, accompanied with a few baſe fellowes, and eaſily obtained the Gouernours paſſe, with ſafe conduct to Conſtantinople: where he arriued a little before the returne of Sebalias from Belgrade, and was of Mahomet both ioyfully receiued and honourably entertained.

When Scanderbeg vnderſtood that Moſes was thus reuolted, at the firſt report thereof he was ſo troubled with the ſtrangenes of the fact, that he ſtood ſpeechleſſe as a man aſtonied: but after he had pauſed a while, & vpon further enquirie had found it out to be true, he according to I his heroicall diſpoſition, ſaid no more, but that he could eaſily haue Moſes excuſed, for that he was carried away with the violence of ſuch fortune as might haue alienated the mind of a right conſtant man. And when diuers of his friends (according to the manner of the world) with hard ſpeeches ſeemed to aggraute his offence: he could not abide to heare the ſame, but commanded them to hold their peace, & no more to vſe ſuch ſpeeches: wiſhing that all treaſon & euil fortune were together with Moſes gon out of Epirus. Vpon this news Scanderbeg accompanied with Ameſa his nephew, & a troup of horſmen, preſently entred into the country of Dibra, & there with al care cauſed moſt diligent inquirie to be made, if any could be found partakers of the conſpiracie with Moſes. But finding none, he much reioiced in the fidelity of his ſubiects: & hauing ſet al things in good order in that prouince, returned himſelf to Croia. K

Mahomet ſendeth Moſes with fifteene thouſand ſelect men to inuade Epirus.

Moſes remaining in the Turks court, ceaſed not to ſolicit Mahomet to proceed in his warres againſt Scanderbeg, promiſingto do therin great matters, euen to the ſpending of his life in that ſeruice. But the craftie tyrant thinking it not good to truſt him too farre before he had further triall of him, delaied him off to the next Spring, pretending that the yeare was too far ſpent to bigin wars. In the mean time he cauſed al Moſes talke, his behauior and actions, to be diligently obſerued and noted; and oftentimes himſelfe diſcourſed with him concerning the managing of that war: all which he did eſpecially to ſound the depth of Moſes his thoughts. And finding nothing in him but the moſt aſſured & vndoubted ſignes of a mind deuoted to his ſeruice, & altogether eſtranged from Scanderbeg: in the beginning of the Spring he committed to his charge the leading of fifteene thouſand horſemen for the inuading of Epirus, ſuch men as L Moſes himſelf ſhould make choice of: for a greater number he required not for the vanquiſhing of Scanderbeg. Theſe ſouldiers although they deteſted (ſo few in number) to enter that fatal country of Epirus, as men faire warned by other mens harms, yet heartened on by the opinion they had conceiued of their new Generall, and the hope they had by his meanes to find friends in that country to ioyne with them, were the willinger to go. So Moſes furniſhed with a notable army, and all warlike prouiſion he could deſire for the deſtruction of his country; and blinded with the imagination of a kingdome, ſet forward, and marching through Thracia and Macedonia, forgetting the loialtie due vnto his Soueraigne, and the loue he ought to haue borne vnto his natiue countrey, came and entered into Dibra.

Scanderbeg by his eſpials vnderſtanding of the comming of Moſes, as alſo what ſtrength he was of, ſtood not now vpon any policie againſt him who had of long bin priuie to all his ſtratagems, M but was ready euen at his firſt entrance with true valor to incounter him. As both the armies ſtood ranged in order of battell, a meſſenger came from the the Turks campe, to know of Scanderbeg, if any one of his army durſt to proue his fortune hand to hand againſt one of the Turks, before the beginning of the generall battel. By which meſſenger anſwer was returned, A combat betwixt a Turke and a Chriſtian.

A That the challenge ſhould be accepted. The name of the Turke which made this braue challenge was Abemaze, a man for his valour and courage of great name amongſt the Turks. Vpon this proud challenge, Zacharias Groppa, a gentleman of no leſſe reputation among the Chriſtians, haſtily ſtept forth before Scanderbeg (as if he had bin afraid to haue beene preuented by ſome other) and requeſted, that he might be the man to abate the Turks pride. Scanderbeg embracing him, commended his noble mind, and wiſhing him good fortune, gaue him leaue to carrie with him into the field the firſt honour of the Chriſtian armie. As he was arming himſelfe, his companions and fellowes in armes ſtanding about him, wiſhed vnto him not more courage or ſtrength than he had, but onely the fortune of Maneſſi. Vpon his armor he put on many rich iewels and ornaments, the allurements or rather the rewards of the enemie, if hee B could vanquiſh him. The Turkiſh champion was no ſooner come into the plaine betwixt both armies and made ſhew of himſelfe in great brauery, as if his match had yet bin ſcarcely found, but he ſaw Zacharias come forth brauely mounted, and readie to charge him: to whom Abemaze calling aloud, ſaid there would be time enough for him to haſten to his death, & therefore requeſted to talke with him before. So when he had learned of him both his name and place, he propounded ſuch like conditions of the combat, as had bin long before derided by Maneſſi: whereof Zacharias in no better ſort accepted. In few wordes it was agreed vpon betwixt them, That each of them ſhould abide his owne fortune, without any helpe or ayd of others; and that the victor ſhould haue full power ouer the bodie & ſpoile of the vanquiſhed. Thus agreed, they withdrew themſelues one a good diſtance from another, and with their C Launces charged, ran together with ſuch force, that with the violence of the encounter they brake their Launces one vpon the other, and were both horſe and man ouerthrowne. But vnhorſed, they nimbly recouered themſelues, and with their ſcimitars fiercely aſſailed the one the other on foot. Fortune it ſhould ſeeme had determined to beautifie that combat with varietie, ſtanding a great while indifferent to both. After many ſturdie ſtrokes giuen, without any hurt don, by reaſon they were ſo ſtrongly armed, it fortuned that both their ſwords were beaten out of their hands: then grapling together with their bare hands, as if they had bin two vnarmed wreſtlers, after long ſtrugling till they were both almoſt out of breath, Zacharias ouerthrew the Turke, and lying vpon him, with his dagger, aboue the gorget thruſt him into the throat, & ſlew him: and ſo riſing vp, with the ſword that firſt came to his hands, cut off the D Turks head: at the ſight wherof the Chriſtian army gaue a great ſhout for ioy, to the great diſcomfiture of the Turks. To be ſhort, Zacharias deſpoiling the Turke of his armor, & what els he thought good, returned loded with the ſpoile of his enemie, and preſented vnto Scanderbeg the proud Turks head: for which he was of him afterwards moſt honorably rewarded.

Into this place yet reeking with the bloud of the late ſlaine Turke, came Moſes, and with a loud voice challenged Scanderbeg hand to hand, thinking indeed that he would not haue aduentured his perſon: but when he ſaw him readie to come forth, he ſhamefully forſooke the place, and returned with ſhame enough into his armie.

The battell betwixt Scanderbeg and Moſes.

Preſently after, both the armies vpon ſignall giuen ſet forward, and ſo began to ioine battell: where at the firſt onſet Scanderbeg ſo valiantly charged the vauward of the Turkes armie, that E they were glad to giue ground: which Moſes perceiuing, releeued them with new ſupplies, and riding now here, now there, with his preſence and courage reſtored the battel, in many places almoſt loſt. Howbeit, the Epirots encouraged with the beginning of their good fortune, ſtill preuailed vpon their enemies, & after great ſlaughter made, came to the ſtrength of their battell: where Moſes had placed moſt of his beſt ſoldiers, as his moſt aſſured and laſt refuge: in this place the Turks fought with exceeding courage, and Moſes warily obſeruing in what part of the battell Scanderbeg himſelfe was, directed his moſt forces againſt him, of purpoſe, if poſſibly he might, to haue ſlaine him; whereof he miſſed but a little: for a couragious ſoldier of the Turks by chance encountering with Scanderbeg, with his horſemans ſtaffe bare him quite F backeward vpon his horſe, in ſuch forcible manner, that the Turks for ioy gaue a great ſhout, thinking verily that he had bin ſlaine: but Scanderbeg recouering himſelfe again, & chafed with ſuch an vnwonted diſgrace, furiouſly aſſailed the ſame Turke with his ſword, and after a great fight ſlew him. A great part of the Turks armie being alreadie ouerthrown by them that had the leading of the wings of Scanderbegs armie, diuers of the common ſoldiers thruſt the heads of the ſlaine Turks vpon the points of their ſpeares, in token of victorie, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Turks: and now ioining themſelues with Scanderbeg, more fiercely charged the maine battell of the Turks than before. Neuertheles, Moſes encouraging his ſoldiers, did what was poſſible for a man to doe, and euen with his owne valour a great while ſtaid the courſe of the victorie: vntil he ſeeing the ground about him couered with the dead bodies of his beſt ſoldiers, & that there was no remedie but that he muſt either flie, or there die; turned his back and fled. In which flight, many of the hindermoſt of the Turks were ſlaine: as for Moſes himſelfe, he eſcaped by waies to him wel knowne, onely with foure thouſand men, the poore remainder of ſo great an armie: the reſt, to the number of about eleuen thouſand, all choiſe men, were ſlaine: whereas of the Chriſtians were not paſt an hundred loſt, and about eightie wounded. Of all the Turks that were taken, only one was ſaued; who being a man of good account, had yeelded himſelfe to Zacharias, and was afterward ranſomed; the reſt were all by the common ſouldiers, without pittie tortured to death, in reuenge of the crueltie by them ſhewed at Belgrade: Scanderbeg himſelfe either not knowing thereof, or winking thereat.

Moſes with the reſt of his diſcomfited armie, lay ſtill a while vpon the borders of Epirus, and would faine haue perſuaded them, after the departure of Scanderbeg, to haue followed him againe into Epirus, to haue ſurpriſed the garriſon left in Dibra, in number not aboue 2000; promiſing to bring them vpon the ſame garriſon, before they ſhould bee aware of their comming. But the Turks hauing him now in contempt, were about by generall conſent to forſake him, and to returne home. And ſo Moſes ſeeing no remedie, returned with them to Conſtantinople, with countenance as heauie as if he had bin a condemned man now carried to the place of execution: and the Turkes which had not long before had him in great admiration, expecting that he ſhould haue ended the warres in Epirus, began now to diſgrace him as faſt, and to ſpeake all the euill of him they could deuiſe. Yea the tyrant himſelfe (although hee could blame nothing in the man, but his fortune) was ſo highly offended with him for the loſſe of his armie, that he had vndoubtedly put him to moſt cruell death, had not the great Baſſaes, & others neere about him, perſuaded him otherwiſe, ſaying, That in ſo doing, he ſhould alienate the minds of al others from reuolting vnto him, or attempting any great thing for his ſeruice. So was he by their mediation pardoned his life; but withall, ſo diſgraced, that he had little or nothing allowed him afterwards for his neceſſarie maintenance: all which deſpightfull contumelies he outwardly ſeemed patiently to beare; but was inwardly ſo tormented with melancholy and griefe, that he could not neither eat nor drinke: the remembrance of the foule treaſon committed againſt his prince and country, was day and night before his eies; and the diſgraces of the Turks court inwardly tormented him with intollerable griefe: the ſight of the tyrant (who meaſured all things by the euent) filled his heart with ſecret indignation; and to return again to his naturall prince, of whom he had ſo euill deſerued, he was aſhamed: ſometime the clemencie and princely nature of Scanderbeg, whom he knew of old, ſlow to reuenge, and eaſie to be intreated to forgiue, heartned him on to thinke of return; and by & by, the conſideration of his foule treaſon ouerwhelmed him with deſpaire. Thus with contrarie thoughts plunged too and fro, tormented with the vnſpeakable griefs of a troubled conſcience, not knowing what to do, purpoſing now one thing, and by & by another, at laſt he reſolued to forſake the inſolent tyrant, & to ſubmit himſelfe to the mercie of Scanderbeg; wiſhing rather to die in his countrey for his due deſert, than to liue with infamie, derided in the Turks court. Reſting himſelfe vpon this reſolution, one euening he got ſecretly out of the gates of Conſtantinople, and trauelling all that night and the day following before he reſted, by long and weary iournies, came at laſt vnto his natiue country of Dibra. The gariſon ſoldiers beholding their old Gouernor all alone, full of heauineſſe, as a man eaten vp with cares, moued with compaſſion, and forgetting the euils he had bin the occaſion of, receiued him with many tears and friendly embracings, and brought him to Scanderbeg, who by chance then lay not far off. Moſes comming vnto him with his girdle about his neck, in token that he had deſerued death (as the manner of that country was) found him walking before his tent, and there with heauie cheere falling downe vpon his knees at his feet, ſubmitted himſelfe vnto his mercie, and with great humilitie and ſignes of repentance, craued his moſt gracious pardon. Which his requeſt Scanderbeg preſently granted, and taking him vp by the hand embraced and kiſſed him, in token he had from his heart forgiuen him: and within a few daies after, cauſed all ſuch things of his as were before confiſcat, to be again reſtored vnto him; with all ſuch offices & promotions

Moſes contemned of the Turks.

Moſes flieth from Conſtantinople.

A tions as he had before inioyed: and by open proclamation commanded, That from thenceforth no man ſhould either publikely or priuatly ſpeake of that Moſes had treſpaſſed. Mahomet vn-derſtanding that Moſes was returned againe into Epirus, and honoured of Scanderbeg as in former time, was much greeued thereat, and fumed exceedingly: firſt, for that he had at all truſted him; and then, that he had ſo let him ſlip out of his hands: being verily perſuaded, that all that Moſes had done, was but a fineneſſe of Scanderbeg to deceiue him.

Shortly after that Moſes was returned into Epirus, Mahomet by like practiſe allured vnto him Ameſa, Scanderbeg his nephew, promiſing to make him king of Epirus in his vnckles ſtead.
For by that meanes, the craftie tyrant thought it a more eaſie way to draw the mindes of the people of Epirus from Scanderbeg vnto him deſcended of the princes bloud, than to Moſes, or B to any other ſtranger he ſhould ſet vp. Ameſa vpon this hope of a kingdome, fled to Conſtantinople: and becauſe he would cleere the mind of the tyrant of all ſuſpition and diſtruſt, he carried with him his wife and children, as the moſt ſure pledges of his fidelitie. This Ameſa was of ſtature low, and the feature of his bodie not ſo perfect as might ſufficiently expreſſe the hidden vertues of his mind: hee was of courage hautie aboue meaſure, ſubtill, and of a pregnant wit, wonderfull painfull, and thereto courteous and bountifull (the chiefe meanes whereby aſpiring minds ſteale away the hearts of men) whatſoeuer he got of himſelfe, or had by the gift of his vnckle, he diuided it amongſt his ſouldiers or friends: he was very affable, and could notably both couer and diſſemble his affections: for which things, he was aboue all others both beloued and honored of all the people of Epirus, next to Scanderbeg himſelfe.
At his firſt comming to Mahomet, he filled not his eares with great promiſes and vaine praiſes C of himſelfe as had Moſes; but onely excuſing his owne reuolt, labored to perſuade him, That he had for iuſt cauſes left his vnckle, with a deſire now faithfully to ſerue him. And to that purpoſe ſpake vnto him as followeth.

Ameſa his firſt ſpeech vnto Mahomet.

If it ſhould pleaſe thee (moſt noble Mahomet*) to call to remembrance the old iniuries, and antient* diſpleaſures by vs committed againſt thine imperiall Maieſtie: we might ſeeme now rather to haue come hither to receiue the iuſt guerdon of our euill deſerts, than vpon any hope of honour or preferment.
For what could haue bin done more in diſgrace of the Othoman Empire, than that you haue ſeene long ſince done by vs, in the moſt dangerous time of the Hungarian warre; rather of a malitious and ſet purpoſe, than for that we were iuſt enemies? Whenas in the ſame perfidious courſe, I my ſelfe being a D helper and partaker therein (for now no excuſe is to be pretended for our doings, more than repentance) your fathers armie was betrayed at Moraua, and the kingdome of Epirus by great treacherie wreſted out of your fathers hands; the onely cauſe of ſo many calamities, and of ſo much bloudſhed. But vaine is this feare, and our ſuſpition needleſſe, with ſo wiſe and mercifull a Prince; eſpecially for that my yeares then greene, and youth prone vnto the harme of it ſefe, and a mind not reſting vpon his owne reſolutions, deceiued me. I beleeued mine vnckle (for the ignorant beleeue many things) and allured with the deſire of ſoueraigntie (the proper diſeaſe of that age) and too much credulous, I forſooke you and followed his promiſes, but diſcretion growing with yeares, I haue by little and little perceiued both the ſlie perfidious dealing of mine vnckle, as alſo that my reuolt from you was more hurtfull vnto my ſelfe than to any other. Scanderbeg recouered, and alſo enlarged the kingdome of Epirus; but not without my E great labour and helpe. I expected long time, that he ſhould haue giuen me, if not my fathers whole inheritance, yet at leaſt ſome part thereof, as a ſmall reward of my ſo great trauell and danger.
Not long after he married a wife, and hath begot a young heire, a new ſucceſſour in his kingdome: vnto me for ſhame of the world, becauſe I ſhould not altogether leade a priuate life, he hath aſſigned a baſe corner of Epirus; where he enioying the reſt, I might lead a poore and contemptible life. In this caſe I had much adoe to bridle my affections, and could neuer diſgeſt that iniurie: yet the iniquitie of the time, with the inſolent diſpoſition of the man, compelled me to ſmother vp my thoughts, and to make faire weather, leaſt finding ſome ſuſpition, he ſhould craftily haue intrapped me, as he did of late George Streſie his ſiſters ſonne; whom wrongfully charged with fained ſurmiſes, he hath almoſt depriued of all F his poſſeſſions. I would willingly haue fled vnto the feet of your highneſſe, I would gladly haue forſaken my ingratefull vnckle with the ſtaines of his infamous kingdome; but that the remembrance of the old rebellion, and many iniuries ſithence done, did make me afraid: vntill that now (God I thinke ſo appointing it) I came moſt gladly, following your moſt royall faith and promiſe. You had ſcarcely beck-ned vnto me, you had ſcarcely inuited me, hauing of long intentiuely waited euery occaſion, but ſtraight way I came with ſuch ſpeed, as if I would haue flowne: I lingred not, I expected not either Scanderbeg G or his euill hap, or your more proſperous ſucceſſe, as of late did Moſes; leaſt I might thereby iuſtly ſeeme either for feare or regard of ſome eminent danger, rather to haue prouided for mine owne ſafetie than to haue embraced your magnificence. Neither haue I left any thing for you in me to ſuſpect, nor any cauſe wherefore I ſhould deſire to returne againe into Epirus: here are preſent moſt ſure bonds of my loue, and faithfull pledges of my loyaltie. Behold (worthie Mahomet) you haue whatſoeuer is deare vnto me, yea whatſoeuer nature could giue, pleaſing vnto men in the courſe of mans life. Theſe haue I brought vnto thee, which ſhould with violence haue beene taken from an enemie: ſuch pawnes as might aſſure thee of the faith of a moſt doubtfull man. More than this, haue I brought nothing: for in ſo great ſpeed and ſecret departure, I could not haue regard of my ſubſtance. And if I might haue had time to H haue truſſed vp my traſh at leiſure; yet I know not how, I ſhould haue thought it a kind of baſeneſſe, to haue brought with me any part of the poore reliques of mine old fortune: eſpecially vnto thee, of all other the richeſt. Onely my fidelitie I lay downe before thee, for any thing greater I haue not: and if thou deſire of me any other bond for more aſſurance, I refuſe not whatſoeuer your highneſſe ſhall appoint: for I come not hither to ſet downe couenants and agreements of my ſelfe, but to receiue them from you. I dare not promiſe to vanquiſh mine vnckle, and to ſubdue Epirus with an armie of fifteen thouſand men: the misfortune of Haly-Baſſa and other your Generals; yea and the late and rare victorie of Sebalias, with great bloudſhed gained, may ſerue for examples. In me you ſhall neither want diligence nor faithfull ſeruice: as for other things concerning the euent of this warre, and for the reuenge of the iniuries by you receiued; you being a Prince of power inuincible, and of a moſt deepe iudgement, are not to be aduiſed I by me your vnskilfull vaſſaile.

Ameſa honorably entertained by Mahomet.

This ſpeech of Ameſa, ſeemed vnto Mahomet free from all diſſimulation, foraſmuch as he knew moſt part thereof to be true; and his wife and children brought vnto his preſence, confirmed the reſt. Wherefore commending his good affection, he appointed him honourable entertainment, referring other matters vnto a further time.

Vpon the approch of the Spring, Mahomet deſiring nothing more than to be reuenged vpon Scanderbeg, entred into conſultation with his great Baſſaes, concerning the inuaſion of Epirus: vnto which counſell Ameſa was by Mahomet admitted, and his wicked deuiſe for the deſtruction of his countrey, of all others beſt liked. After the matter had bin long too and fro debated, it was concluded, That Iſaac the great Baſſa of Conſtantinople, ſhould with an armie of fifteen thouſand be ſent againſt Scanderbeg, and Ameſa with him, hauing the charge of fiue thouſand horſemen: and the Baſſa to proclame Ameſa King of Epirus; thereby to perſuade the Epirots, that Mahomet inuaded Epirus rather for the diſpleaſure hee bare againſt Scanderbeg, and for the aduancement of Ameſa, than for any ambitious deſire he had to take vnto himſelfe that kingdome. K

Great was the preparation for this warre, and the expectarion thereof greater. Flying fame had in ſhort time filled euery corner of Epirus with the report of theſe newes; adding thereunto (as the manner is) a great deale more than was true. Whereupon Scanderbeg without delay, ſent for his great captaines and men of war into D bra, where that tempeſt was firſt to be L expected: and when they were all aſſembled, he declared vnto them the greatneſſe of the danger, and what he thought thereof himſelfe as followeth.

A notable ſpeech of Scanderbeg vnto his captaines, how the Turks were to be withſtood at their comming to Epirus.

Amongſt all other things which God hath left to vex and greeue the minds of men in ſo great varietie of worldly affaires, we ſee (right worthie ſouldiers) theſe two the greateſt, Hope, and Feare. The firſt a more comfortable thing, and proper to couragious minds (I may not ſay) of light beleefe: the other a thing of more diſcretion and ſafetie, which although it vſe to deferre the deſires of men, yet hath it power at length excellently to cure and ſeaſon the ſame. Hereupon is it eaſily to be gathered, That the great cheefetaines of former times haue gained more honour and greater victories, by fearing all that was to be feared, than others in ſhew more hardie, which feared nothing. Hereupon the great Carthaginentian captaine vſed to call Q. Fabius (whome the Romanes euer thought too ſlow and too fearefull) his great enemie: But Terentius Varro he called a greater enemie vnto his owne countrey and the M people of Rome, than to himſelfe. But wherefore do I wrongfully call that Feare, which might more truly be called Diſcretion, or wholeſome Policy? Call it as you will, it is not much materiall: but this one thing no man can deny, That thereof hath riſen the antient diſcipline of warre, and the old and ſeuere gouernment

A gouernment of martiall affaires. This aduiſed carefulneſſe cheriſheth and nouriſheth Hope it ſelfe, it doth nothing raſhly, it hath eyes before, behind, and on both ſides; it weigheth in indifferent ballance things paſt, preſent, and to come. You may now perceiue to what end my ſpeech tendeth. I would firſt conferre with you, ond know your opinions, before I determine any thing of the order of this warre; that either I might yeeld vnto your opinion, or elſe you (as you haue alwaies hitherto done) to mine. You heare now with your eares, what preparation, what warlike prouiſion is daily made againſt vs. Loe the great Baſſa of Conſtantinople, all the flower of Europe, and whole ſtrength of the Othoman Kingdome knocketh at our gates. I want not courage (neither euer did) to proeue my fortune againſt him, not without your honour: But I thinke it better to vſe policie and warie heed againſt ſo great an enemy, than our woonted force and courage. That notable ouerthrow of Haly-Baſſa, ſo many great victories by B vs atchieued, our minds by ſo many good haps confirmed, perſuade me to thinke that we haue both courage and ſtrength to encounter him in plaine battell: but the vncertaine euents of warre, and fortune neuer ſufficiently knowne, maketh wiſe men to forget what is paſt, and to feare that is to come. It was neuer proper to any man, it was neuer giuen by inheritance, alwaies to ouercome; new occurrents require new correſpondents: neither may you, for that you conquered yeſterday, preſume to aſſure your ſelfe to diuide the ſpoile of your enemies to day. Victorie is like a trauellour, and goeth hither and thither, not reſting long in a place: and although it be for moſt part both gotten and kept by courage and diſcretion, yet oftentimes, when you haue moſt carefully and politiquely diſpoſed of all things, the fortune and chance of warre haue therein a great ſway. I was woont to require (I remember it well) onely valour and courage in my ſouldiers, contemning all externall accidents and fortunes haps; if you did C promiſe vnto me couragious minds, I aſſured you of all good hap and proſperous ſucceſſe: but that loſſe we receiued at Belgrade (the remembrance whereof my mind feareth, and alwaies abhorreth to thinke vpon) hath much changed my former cogitations, and made me to deeme farre otherwiſe of worldly matters, and the vncertaintie of fortune. What if that day had bin longer? or Sebalias of more courage? might not the ſtate of Epirus haue that day bin vtterly ouerthrowne? We were then rather by God preſerued, than by any thing that was in our ſelues: What remained more, but that we ſhould like cowaras haue yeelded our ſelues to haue bin bound of the conquerours? The night defendea vs, yea euen God himſelfe defended vs; who tooke from them both policie and force, and gaue vs time to breath and eſcape away. We were then but as a prey, expecting but the comming of the victor: Howbeit he tooke nothing from vs, he carried little or nothing away with him, being too much carefull to keepe the D honour he had alreadie gained, and peraduenture in feare of them of whom he was not without cauſe moſt feared. I ſpeake not this of purpoſe to terrifie any of you, but rather to admoniſh you, and to conſult with you, how ſo great preparations may be fruſtrated and ouerthrowne, and ſome notable victory by vs atchieued, without the price of our bloud, or the loſſe of ſuch things as we haue. The number of our enemies is great, and ſo great, as vntill this day we neuer ſaw in Epirus greater, except at ſuch times as they came to beſiege our cities, and to deuoure vs all. Now if wee ſhall meet them in the plaine fields in a ſet battell, the euent thereof will be doubtfull, many of vs muſt needs fall, many of vs muſt die (I would I might be a falſe Prophet) before ſo great on armie will either flie or be ouercome, your victorie ſhall be mingled with teares, and the heauineſſe of the conqueror not much vnlike the ſorrow of the conquered.
E Was it but a few that we loſt at Belgrade? is that loſſe ſo to be recouered? What flower of Chiualrie, hardly to be in many yeares reſtored? How many worthie men were there ſlaine? Epirus muſt needs in ſhort time be vnpeopled, if we ſhall ſo deſperatly onely ſeeke for ſuch glorious victories.
Wherefore if we will do well, we muſt ſo fight to day, as that we may fight to morrow alſo. Neither are our enemies and we in like caſe. The loſſe of fortie or fiftie thouſand is leſſe vnto the Turkiſh tyrant, than the loſſe of an hundred of you is to me. We are in all but a few; and therefore carefully to be kept: which if we regard not for our own ſakes, yet let vs doe it for our wiues and childrens, whoſe welfare and libertie dependeth of our liues: I know the number of you, I know your faces and countenances, and almoſt euery one of your names, which maketh me alſo more carefull of your health. And yet I would not refuſe to try the whole fortune of this battell in plaine field, if we might thereby end all the warres againſt F the Turks for euer; if I were in hope ſo to find an end of our labours and trauels hereafter, I would gladly aduenture my life with yours, for the perpetuall quiet and peace of our poſterity: but a new enemy alwayes ariſeth, and we muſt ſtill looke for new warres. When this Iſaac is gone, another Iſaac will ere long come in his place: we ſhall be alwaies exerciſed with new warres, and incloſed with new dangers: It is the deſtinie of Epirus (as farre as I can ſee) and we our ſelues are borne thereto. Wherefore we muſt gather our wits together, we muſt well husband our forces, and ſo diuide our patrimonie, as that we may alwayes haue ſomething to content our creditors, when they ſhall chance to come vpon vs. Yet ſhall God (no doubt) giue an end alſo vnto theſe troubles: for extremities cannot be of long continuance, and you your ſelues ſhall at length take reſt: yea the ſtrong and puiſſant enemie, wearied with ſo many vaine attempts, will at laſt haue enough thereof, and leaue off his perpetuall hatred againſt vs: then ſhall it be to you no ſmall pleaſure to remember ſo many labours and dangers paſt. Thus haue I declared vnto you the commodities and incommodities enſuing the victorie in plaine battell: But what if we be vanquiſhed? where haue we any hope of reliefe left? From whence may we expect help? Will the bloudie enemie, inflate with victorie, expect whileſt we againe recouer our ſtrength and encounter him againe with new forces? No, he will purſue vs and chaſe vs ſo long as any of vs are left: and hauing ouercome vs, will poure out the reſt of his furie vpon our townes and countrey, then ſubiect to his iniurie. But ſome of you peraduenture will ſay, that they are by policie to be ouertaken, and not to be met in open field: of which opinion I alſo am my ſelfe; yet happily differ from you in the time of doing the ſame. Then I thinke it beſt to deceiue them, when they thinke they cannot be deceiued: when as they being as it were in poſſeßion of a ſuppoſed victorie, like men ouerioyed, ſhall caſt no perill. Now they come euen from the gates of Conſtantinople, full of diſtruſt, prying into euery corner, as men before warned by others harmes, and ſo many dreadfull examples of their fellowes: Beſides that, they haue with them my graceleſſe nephew and domeſticall foe Ameſa, who will teach them to foreſee and ſhun ſuch ſnares as in times paſt he with vs was woont to lay for them. Wherefore wee muſt now tower vp vnto the height of ſome notable and ſtrange policie, whereby both our countrey may be from danger preſerued, and alſo ſome great victorie, without our owne bloudſhed (which ſeldome chanceth) obtained: which to the maintenance of our antient glorie and renowne, we haue to this day by many moſt notable victories gained: But time and ſpace, and the ſight of the enemie, ſhall furniſh vs with this deuiſe. Now (that my diſcourſe may come to the purpoſed end) firſt of all, all things ſubiect either to the furie or victorie of the enemie, are to be remooued out of the way; all people, of what age, ſex, or condition ſoeuer, are to be brought out of the countrey into places of ſafetie; and then, our townes are to be furniſhed with ſtrong garriſons and all other neceſſarie prouiſion, againſt all the chances of fortune. Beſides, who knoweth the ſecret deſignes of the tyrant? or whether he himſelfe (of long time deſirous of reuenge, and thirſting after our bloud) will follow the Baſſa at the heeles, or no? Perhaps I may beleeue and feare more than is needfull; but it is good to feare all that may be feared, that we may indeed feare nothing. If all things ſhall thus be ſet in order, if there ſhall nothing be left in the fields or in the villages, that may enrich, feed, or feare our enemies, and which may withdraw our care and thoughts from our enemies, vndoubtedly we ſhall be victors. And if you will be ruled by me, and follow my direction in theſe wars, I will aſſuredly deliuer your enemies into your hands to be ſlaine at your pleaſure; and (by the leaue of God) will make the name and valour of the Eperots more terrible vnto the Turke, than euer it hath beene in the time of our anceſtors. I flatter not my ſelfe, I deceiue you not: if any thing may be promiſed in worldly actions, this I aſſure you of, and this will I take vpon me. But theſe things are better done than ſaid. In the meane while, to ſpend no more time in longer talke and diſcourſe (than which, no greater loſſe can be to ſouldiers) let euery one of vs take a part in this charge, for the good diſpoſing of all things, and how to withſtand the enemie. I will not command any thing to others which I will not my ſelfe doe: I will refuſe nothing, or reckon any thing baſe, which may tend to the common honour or profit of vs all.

This ſpeech of Scanderbeg was well liked and ioyfully receiued of all the hearers, ſo that many beſought him to manifeſt to them how he purpoſed to proceed in thoſe wars: whereunto he with cheerfull countenance anſwered, That it was enough for him, if they did but beleeue him, promiſing himſelfe in perſon to bee in the moſt dangerous actions as far as any of them, wherewith they reſted contented. And preſently diſpatching his lieutenants into diuers parts of his kingdome, as he thought moſt conuenient, prouided, that all things were in ſhort time conueied out of the country into the ſtrong townes and other places of refuge. No corne, no cattell, or other things of any worth was left in the country; but all left deſolate, in like manner as was before at the comming of the great King Amurath to the ſiege of Croia.

The Epirots remoue all their things out of the country into the ſtrōg towns before the comming of the Turks.

By this time Iſaac the great Baſſa was come into Epirus, accompanied with Ameſa: and as he marched, ſtill ſent before him his ſcouts aud eſpials, carefully to view euery corner of the countrey, for feare to be entrapped as others before him had bin; directed in his iourney for moſt part by Ameſa. Scanderbeg had in readines ſuch an armie as he had purpoſed to vſe againſt his

A his mightie enemie, but lay with ſix thouſand horſemen only in ſhew, as if he had determined with them to haue giuen them battell, but meaning indeed nothing leſſe. For as ſoone as the Baſſa was come in ſight, he with thoſe horſemen, according as he had before appointed, as if he had bin diſcouraged with the very ſight of the Turks, turned his backe and fled. And becauſe he would not giue them any occaſion to ſuſpect it to bee done for ſome policie or fineneſſe, and ſo to make them more carefull, he fled not into the mountains or woods, as his wonted maner was, but directly toward Lyſſa, a town of the Venetians ſtanding vpon the ſea coaſt, as if he had quite deſpaired of the keeping of Epirus, and fled thither for refuge. The Baſſa ſeeing him flie, was glad therof, & ſent certaine troupes of horſemen to purſue him, and diligently to marke which way he tooke: but encamped himſelfe with his armie in the plaines of Dibra, B neere vnto Oronychium, where Scanderbeg lay before: and there reſted his armie, wearie of long trauell, expecting the returne of his horſemen, ſent after Scanderbeg. But vpon their returne, when it was for a certaintie reported by them, That Scanderbeg with an handfull of men was fled out of Epirus, and not an enemie to be ſeene, the Turks began to reioyce, and proudly to triumph, that they had without any loſſe driuen the enemie out of the countrey; yet much greeued, that they could no where find any thing to ſatisfie their greedie deſires: for why, al things were ſo clen gon, as if the country had bin ſwept againſt their comming, which might haue beene a ſufficient cauſe for them to haue diſtruſted ſome great matter; but they flattering themſelues, ſuppoſed all this to be done for feare of them, vpon extreme deſperation: ſuch is the fraile condition of men, to loſe ſtrength of bodie, common ſenſe, yea, their reaC ſon & vnderſtanding, when ſome great miſchiefe is appointed for their ouerthrow or deſtruction. The Baſſa ſeeing the enemie fled, and now no cauſe of feare, conſulted with his chiefe captains, what were now beſt to be done: Ameſa ſtill perſuading him not to remoue, but there to ſtay a time, and to expect the farther euent of matters. But the greater number, whoſe opinion preuailed, ſaid it was better to go farther into the country, and to take the ſpoile thereof before the country people ſhould conuey away al their ſubſtance into places of ſafety, as they had done there in Dibra, and leaue them nothing but the bare ground and emptie cottages. By this perſuaſion, the Baſſa earely next morning in good order ſet forward: commanding by generall proclamation, That no man vpon pain of death ſhould breake his array or ſtraggle from the armie. Yet before hee ſet forward, he called Ameſa vnto him; whom after he had highly D commended, & with great vehemencie inuayed againſt Scanderbeg, he with the great applauſe of the whole army in the name of Mahomet created him king of Epirus. That day he marched not far, by reaſon of the great heat: for it was then about the midſt of Iuly. Yet when he had well wearied himſelfe with that dayes trauell, finding neither enemie nor any thing elſe worthie to be accounted in any part of a victorie, he encamped at night, keeping diligent watch, and ſending forth his ſcouts euery way, but eſpecially towards Lyſſa. The next day, which was the third day after the Baſſaes comming into Epirus, he ſet forward againe, and came at length into Æmathia, and there encamped that night.

Ameſa is by the Baſſa created king of Epirus.

When Scanderbeg (flying for feare, as the Turks ſuppoſed) was gone a great way out of their E ſight towards Lyſſa, and come euen to the borders of his kingdome, he there ſtaid all the reſt of that day. And a little before the going downe of the Sun, he with a few ſelect horſmen departed from the armie, and with painfull trauell got vp to the top of the high mountains, from whence a man might by day well diſcouer all the plains of Æmathia. There he appointed one Peieus Emanuel, a politicke and valiant gentleman, with certaine horſemen to marke diligently which way the enemie held, and by certain ſecret and appointed waſtings and ſignes, to giue knowledge thereof to the armie. After ſuch order taken, he returned himſelfe, and came again to the campe after midnight. And preſently riſing with his armie, and fetching a compaſſe about, came vndiſcouered, and ſecretly encamped himſelf as neere as he could vnto the mountains where his ſcouts lay, with eagles eis waiting for the leſt mouing of the enemie. The Baſ- F ſa deſirous to get as far as he could into the country, before the heat of the day, began early in the morning to ſet forward, and came to the plains of Pharſalia, through the world ſpoken of for the great battell in them long time before fought, between the two moſt famous chiefetaines Cæſar and Pompeius: and now once more to bee made famous, by the ſlaughter of the Turks. Here the enemy finding ſome ſtragling cattel, & other ſmall things which the country people had in their haſty flight left behind them, fel to ſeeking after booty, &, as men without feare, ſpent that day in roaming vp and downe the country, in hope to find ſomething: and at night encamped without any great watch, but towards Lyſſum, from whence they (in great ſecuritie) looked for the comming of Scanderbeg; & as it were in diſgrace of him, carried Ameſa in triumph vp and downe the campe, as if he had bin alreadie poſſeſſed of the kingdome of Epirus. Scanderbeg lying on the other ſide of the mountaines, perceiued by his eſpials, which way the enemie lay: and with great ſilence vnder the couert of the mountains and woods, ſecretly bent his courſe the ſame way, vntil he came to a mountaine called Tumeniſt, at the foot wherof he encamped that night. The next morning the Baſſa holding on his way, came & encamped not far from the ſame mountain, and there ſtaid himſelfe with halfe his army, and ſent Ameſa with the other halfe to burne & ſpoile the countrey: who about noone returned to the campe with ſuch prey as he had got, with his ſoldiers wel wearied with trauel, and the heat of the day. Scanderbeg like a carefull houſholder, who being about to entertaine and feaſt ſome honorable perſonages, truſteth not to his wife and ſeruants, but looketh to the beſtowing of his prouiſion himſelfe, carefully ordering and diſpoſing and ſetting forth all things, eſpecially if his prouiſion (for want of abilitie) be ſhort, to welcome ſo great gueſts; and ſetting al things forth to the greateſt ſhew, ſeeketh at leaſt to fil the eies of his gueſts, although he doubt to ſatiſfie their appetites: ſo he carefully viewing all the mountaines and thicke woods thereabouts without reſting, ſet Moſes in one place, Tanuſius in another, & all the reſt in places moſt conuenient. He appointeth euery man what to do, and inſtructeth them, & conſidereth of euery particular circumſtance himſelfe: and ſo diuideth his forces, as might beſt ſerue his purpoſe, and make the moſt terrible ſhew to the enemie: for which purpoſe he in euery companie placed moe trumpets, drums, and other inſtruments of war, than he had before at any time vſed. When he had ſo to his moſt aduantage beſtowed ſo many of his captaines and ſoldiers as he thought good, & as the nature of the places would giue leaue, he with 4000 horſmen and the like number of foot, ſpeedily marching vp the rough mountaine of Tumeniſt, from thence plainly beheld in what order the Turks campe lay in the plaines below. The Turks, eſpecially they which were lately returned with Ameſa from the ſpoile of the countrey, lay ſcattered abroad in the fields, with their horſes vnbridled & vnſadled, reſting their weary bodies: ſome got vnder the ſhadows of trees were victualling themſelues; ſome hauing filled their bellies, lay faſt aſleep on the green graſſe; the reſt were paſſing the time, ſome with one kind of ſport, ſome with another, as ſoldiers do in field when they haue little or nothing to do: for it was then the hotteſt time both of the yere, & of the day, being about the midſt of Iuly, and the noonetime of the day. The like negligence was alſo in that part of the camp where the Baſſa himſelf lay; euery man taking his eaſe and pleaſure, with ſmal regard of horſe or armour; for being out of feare of Scanderbeg, whom they thought to haue bin a great way off at Lyſſum, they lay as men without care wrapt vp in ſecuritie, the common deſtruction of great armies and common wealths. Ameſa with the great captaines, were at the ſame time all together in the Baſſa's pauilion, conſulting what courſe they were beſt to take, to do ſomthing to the contentment of Mahomet, and their own commendation: ſome ſaid it were beſt with fire and ſword to deſtroy al they could in Epirus; and ſo hauing laid the country waſt, to returne. Others thought it better to march directly to Croia, to proue if the citizens could be perſuaded to yeeld themſelues & receiue Ameſa for their king; otherſome to threaten them with a continual ſiege, and vtter ruine of the country, if vpon the vaine expectation of helpe from Scanderbeg they ſhould refuſe to ſubmit themſelues. As for Scanderbeg himſelfe, who then lay houering ouer their heads, he was in all that conſultation leaſt feared: who from the top of the mountain, beholding the ſecuritie & diſorder of the Turks campe, & delighted with the ſight therof, encouraged his ſoldiers, & martialed them in ſuch order as they were to follow him, for the charging and terrifying of the enemie. But firſt of all he determined to oppreſſe the Turks ſcouts, which lay at the foot of the mountain: for which purpoſe he himſelf with a few horſmen firſt ſecretly deſcended the mountain, the reſt of his army following ſhortly after, & ſo ſuddenly came on the ſcouts, that he ſlew them all except one, who eſcaping by the ſwiftnes of his horſe, came running to the camp as one half affrighted, crying out that Scanderbeg was comming. The Turks ſuſpecting nothing leſſe than the comming of him that way, at the preſent inſtant hardly beleeued that he was ſo nie: when as he following him at the heels as faſt as he could, with his horſmen & his footmen after them, was in a moment as if it had bin a ſudden tempeſt, broken in amongſt

Scanderbeg ſuddenly aſſaileth the Turks.

A amongſt the vnarmed Turks, and there making great ſlaughter of them, filled all the campe with ſudden tumult and feare. Ameſa who at the firſt noiſe had ſpeedily got him to his charge, with his ſouldiers ſome halfe armed, ſome on foot, hauing no leiſure, to bridle their horſes, was the firſt that made head againſt Scanderbeg. The Baſſa alſo did what he might in that ſudden feare and ſhortneſſe of time, to arme his men, and to put them in order: but whileſt thoſe things were in doing, the ſouldiers which lay in ambuſh in the woods, came downe the mountaine with ſuch horrible ſhouts and noiſe of inſtruments of war, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue preſently gone together; the hils and vallies with their hollow ecchoes, encreaſing the terror of the alarum. Inſomuch, that the Turks diſmaied, and fearing that all the force of Epirus with the countries adioyning had come vpon them, began to flie on euery ſide, before that B Moſes and the reſt that lay in ambuſh were come into the plaines. Ameſa acquainted with his vnckles ſtratagems, as much as he could encouraged the Turks, crying aloud and telling them, That ſuch vaine tumults and terrors were not to be feared, being but the bare ſhifts and deuiſes of their enemies to couer their owne weakeneſſe: and by his owne valour ſtaied many which before were about to haue fled. In this while, the Baſſa hauing put his men in beſt order he could, was comming to the aid of Ameſa, hardly charged by Scanderbeg: but in his ſetting forward, he was ſo valiantly encountered on the one ſide by Moſes with his horſemen, and on the other by Tanuſius and Emanuel with their footmen, that he was enforced, not without great loſſe, againe to retire vnto his trenches.

All the hope of the battell depended vpon Ameſa, who ſtill with great courage withſtood his vnckle; exhorting his ſouldiers valiantly as men to endure that firſt aſſault, which ſhould C afterwards bring them moſt aſſured victorie: heartening them on with hope of ſpeedie helpe from their fellows if they would but a while endure the furie of their enemies, whoſe hearts (as he ſaid) would preſently be diſcouraged, if they preuailed not in that their firſt and deſperat attempt, hauing nothing elſe to truſt vnto. By which perſuaſion the Turkes were againe encouraged, accounting it a great diſhonour to flie and leaue their Chiefetaine in the field. But when they ſaw Scanderbeg ſtill to preuaile vpon them, and that no helpe came as they hoped (for many were by Scanderbegs horſmen ſlaine as they were arming themſelues, many were by the way cut off as they were comming, & the reſt put to flight) they which before fought valiantly with Ameſa, turned their backs and fled alſo. Scanderbegs horſemen purſuing the chaſe, made great ſlaughter of the Turks, and in the ſame chaſe tooke Ameſa priſoner. Scanderbeg, ha- D uing ouerthrowne that part of the Turks battell, was comming with a thouſand footmen and ſome horſemen, to haue ayded Moſes againſt the Baſſa: but before his comming, Moſes to blot out his former infamie, had with inuincible courage put the great Baſſa with all his armie to flight: and Scanderbeg following the chaſe, gaue him not leaue to looke behind him, vntill he was got out of Epirus. Many were in this chaſe taken priſoners, and amongſt the reſt one Meſites a Sanzacke, a man of great account amongſt the Turks. In this battell beſide the priſoners, were taken twentie of the Turkes faireſt enſignes. As for horſes, armor, and other ſpoiles taken in the field, and in the campe, all which fell to the ſouldiers ſhare, it is almoſt incredible to be told. The number of the ſlaine Turks is of diuers diuerſly reported; they which write of the moſt, reckon vp thirtie thouſand; and they which ſpeake of the leaſt, account twentie thou- E ſand. Of the Chriſtians were loſt but ſixty. Now if any account it ſtrange, that ſo great a victorie ſhould be gained with ſo little loſſe; not to ſpeake of that is written in holy writ, let him but read the antient hiſtories of the Romans, or the Chronicles of our own Countrey, and he ſhall in them find victories no leſſe ſtrange. There was to be ſeene the ſudden and ſtrange alteration of theſe worldly things, no more indeed (whatſoeuer we account of them) to be reckoned of, than of things we haue not. Scanderbeg poſſeſſeth the rich pauillion, erſt belonging to the great Baſſa; and other of his captaines enioy tents, with much other rich furniture neuer prepared for their vſe. Ameſa which the ſame day as a victorious conquerour ouerran a great part of Æmathia with his horſemen, and was carried in triumph with the generall acclama- F tion of many thouſands of valiant ſouldiers, and honoured as a king, and of them ſo called; is now led through the Chriſtian army to his vnckle, with his hands bound behind him as a ſlaue, ſpeechleſſe and confounded, vnable to hold vp his head for ſhame: whoſe miſerie moued moſt of the beholders to compaſſion, and forced teares out of the eyes of many.

A notable victorie of the Chriſtians.

The next day after this great victorie, Scanderbeg cauſed the bodies of the ſlaine Turkes to be buried, together with their horſes; which he did not for any regard of them, but that their loathſome carkaſes ſhould not infect the country: and after that, returned in great triumph to Croia. By the way as he went, the country people, which were before for feare of the Turks fled into the woods and mountaines in great multitudes met him, as he did others alſo out of the cities, whoſe mouthes were all full of his worthie praiſes. Before him went the captiue Turkes with their hands bound behind them, excepting ſuch as were enforced to carrie the Turks enſignes. Next vnto them followed the great Baſſaes rich pauillion, in ſuch maner ſupported by the ſouldiers, as if it had bin in the field. Then came Scanderbeg himſelfe with the Turkiſh Sanzacke, and Ameſa following him; for Ameſa had with great and humble ſuit obtained of his vnckle, that he might not as he well deſerued, be carried bound among the other captiues. Laſt of all came Scanderbeg his victorious ſouldiers in goodly order, euery man leading a ſpare horſe taken from the enemie, and loaded with ſpoile. So when he was come to Croia, and there of his ſubiects ioyfully receiued, he brake vp his armie, and gaue euerie man leaue at his pleaſure to depart. The Sanzacke, and Ameſa, were committed to ſafe keeping, vntill farther order was taken for them. Ameſa afterwards was for his treaſon worthily condemned to perpetuall priſon, and by an Embaſſadour from Scanderbeg ſent vnto king Alphonſus to Naples, there to be kept in durance; and with him was alſo ſent an honourable Preſent of part of the ſpoile taken from the Turkes, in token of the victorie. What became afterward of this Ameſa, concerneth not much the courſe of our hiſtorie; yet to ſatisfie the deſirous, I thinke it not amiſſe with him to ſtray a little out of the way.

When Ameſa had remained a yeare in priſon at Naples, Scanderbeg vnderſtanding of the death of Alphonſus, by his embaſſador requeſted of Ferdinand his ſonne, to haue Ameſa reſtored to him againe. By which meanes he was brought backe againe into Epirus, and caſt in priſon at Croia; but not in ſuch ſtraight manner as before: for Scanderbeg according to his accuſtomed clemencie, began now to forget the iniurie to him before done; and at laſt ouercome with the continuall ſupplication aud tears of his nephew, pardoned him his life; and reſtoring him to his former libertie, receiued him alſo into his former fauour. But Ameſa remembring what pledges of his loyaltie hee had left with Mahomet at Conſtantinople, and fearing what would become of his wife and children, if he ſhould haſtily vſe that his liberty, giuing his vnckle moſt humble thanks, brake vnto him his mind concerning that matter, as followeth,

The ſpeech of Ameſa to Scanderbeg.

Whereas you of your owne gracious goodneſſe onely, without any deſert of mine, haue regarded my life and welfare, it behoueth me alſo to be carefull for the life of others: leaſt whileſt I receiue your exceeding bounty with too much deſire of mine owne health and honour, I doe at this preſent, by this ſame benefit of yours, caſt away them, whom I haue long ſithence by mine owne treacherie vndone. Mine vnfortunate and guiltleſſe Wife is with Mahomet, my little and innocent Childaen are with him alſo: theſe yet liue, and ſhall liue, ſo long as the tyrant ſhall thinke, that I liue in heart his; but when he ſhall once perceiue by this your gracious dealing that I am fallen from him, the cruell creditor will forthwith cut and rend in peeces the pledges of my faith, and their innocent bloud ſhall pay the guilt of their Fathers offence. Wherefore the Othoman tyrant is of me by ſome deuice to be deceiued, that I may in the meane time preſerue thoſe pledges, vntill I may by ſome fit occaſion afterwards redeeme the ſame. I will by your leaue this night take my flight out of Croia, as if I had broken priſon, and eſcaped againſt your will, and ſo flie vnto Mahomet, making the greateſt ſhew I can of my woonted loue and loyaltie towards him: not omitting to heare, or ſpeake vnto that credulous King ſuch things concerning your eſtate, as I was woont in my better fortune: that hauing ſo cleared my ſelfe of all ſuſpition, which he perhaps hath conceiued by reaſon of my captiuitie and long ſtay with you, I may at length, with my Wife and Children, ſo eſcape from him: Wherein you may helpe me much, if you ſhall openly make ſhew as if you were greeued with my eſcape, and ſeeme to be highly offended with the keepers of the priſon for the ſame. In the meane time, whileſt I ſhall ſtay in the tyrants court expecting ſome fit time for my eſcape; I will ſtand you in ſtead of an intelligencer, ſo that your enemie ſhall not to my knowledge either attempt or goe about any thing againſt you, which ſhal be kept from your hearing or knowledge.

Scanderbeg refuſed not to graunt whatſoeuer he had requeſted, but ſaid vnto him:

Ameſa, ſithence we haue granted you life, with all the good things thereunto belonging, we will not A prohibit you to vſe that our gift to your moſt good, and to the preſeruation of them who for euer may moſt iuſtly call vpon you, as debtor vnto them, for their wilfare and libertie. Goe thy waies, proceed, take thy time and occaſion as it ſeemeth vnto thee beſt; and at length reforme thy ſelfe, whileſt thou yet haſt ſufficient time and ſpace. We now beleeue you in all things, and well like of this your deuiſe: Ameſa you ſhall herein deceiue no man but your ſelfe, if you ſhall longer follow the faith and court of the barbarous King, whereas like danger is both of body and ſoule both to thee and thine. Whenſoeuer thou ſhalt returne vnto vs thou canſt not doe vs a greater pleaſure: and in what regard thou haſt heretofore beene with vs in the ſame thou ſhalt be with vs againe.

The anſwer of Scanderbeg to Ameſa.

The ſame night Ameſa by ſecret order from Scanderbeg, eſcaped both out of priſon and out B of Croia: and in the morning it was all ouer the citie, that hee was gone, and the keepers ſharply rebuked for their negligence. He comming to Conſtantinople, eaſily perſuaded Mahomet, that he was by chance eſcaped, with all things elſe that he told him: yet was he not for all that, ſo well graced of him as before; not for any diſtruſt he had in the man, but for the euill ſucceſſe hee had in the former warres. Now whether Ameſa neglected his promiſed returne, or could find no opportunity to performe the ſame, is vncertaine: but certaine it is, that ſhortly after hee died at Conſtantinople, poiſoned as was thought by the commandement of Mahomet, who could no longer indure the ſight of him, whom hee reckoned the author of the notable ouerthrow receiued in Æmathia. This was the wofull end of this noble and valiant man, well worthie of remembrance, had not his haughtie thoughts ſoared too high with the C deſire of Soueraigntie.

The death of Ameſa.

When Mahomet vnderſtood in what manner Iſaac Baſſa was ouerthrowne, and his armie diſcomfited, hee was therewith much greeued, and iuſtly blamed the Baſſaes ſecuritie: yet ſuch was his credit with his Soueraigne, that the matter was in better ſort paſſed ouer than was ſuppoſed it would haue been. Neuertheleſſe, Mahomet in reuenge thereof would willingly haue imployed all his forces vpon Scanderbeg, if his more vrgent affaires would haue ſo permitted. For at the ſame time, beſides that great warres began to riſe betwixt him and the Venetians (which continued for many yeres after) he was certainly informed, That the Chriſtian Princes were making a ſtrong confederation againſt him. At which time Mahomet diſdaining openly to ſue for a peace at Scanderbegs hands, cunningly practiſed by ſuch as were ſent to re- D deem the priſoners, & alſo by the Sanzack himſelf, to perſuade Scanderbeg to require peace of him, aſſuring him, that if he did but aske it, it would for a long time be eaſily obtained. Which thing Scanderbeg, well acquainted with the Turkiſh policie, vtterly refuſed to doe. Wherefore Mahomet for the defence of his countries bordering vpon Epirus, ſent two of his moſt expert captains, Sinam and Hamur, with each of them 14000 ſoldiers into Macedonia, expreſly charging them not to enter at any time or vpon any occaſion, into Epirus, or by any meanes to prouoke Scanderbeg: which his commandement they ſo well obſerued, that the Epirots by the ſpace of almoſt two yeres enioyed the fruits of peace, although there was no peace at all concluded. So that the remembrance of old iniuries wearing out with time, at length by the E mediation of the ſame captains, a peace for a yere was agreed on betwixt Mahomet & Scanderbeg. In which time he paſſed ouer into Apulia, and there notably aided King Ferdinand againſt the French, the proceeding wherein, as not pertinent to our hiſtorie, I of purpoſe paſſe ouer.

A peace for a yeare concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

After that the time of the peace before concluded was expired, all things now going well with Mahomet as he deſired, he reſolued according to his wonted manner to trouble the quiet eſtate of Scanderbeg: and ſo ſending a new ſupplie of ſoldiers to Synam-beg, who then lay with a ſtrong garriſon vpon the frontiers of Epirus, commanded him with all his power to make wars vpon Scanderbeg. Synam accordingly, with an armie of 20000 men entered into Epirus, where he was forthwith encountered by Scanderbeg, and his army vtterly ouerthrown, ſo that but few eſcaped by flight with Synam himſelf. Preſently after he ſent Aſam-beg, another of his F captaines, into the ſame ſeruice, with an armie of thirtie thouſand, whom Scanderbeg alſo in plaine battell vanquiſhed at Ocrida; in which battell Aſam himſelfe was ſore wounded, and finding no way to eſcape, was glad to yeeld himſelfe priſoner to Scanderbeg, by whom he was courteouſly vſed, and afterwards ſet at libertie. Iuſſum-beg following Aſam with eighteene thouſand into Epirus, was ſet vpon by Scanderbeg alſo, and hauing loſt part of his armie, was glad by ſpeedie flight to ſaue himſelfe with the reſt. After all this, Caraza-beg, an old captaine G and a man of great experience (who had bin a great commander, and a companion with Scanderbeg in the time of old Amurath) requeſted of Mahomet, that he might proue his fortune againſt his old acquaintance Scanderbeg, aſſuring him of better ſucceſſe than before. The long and approued experience of this old leader put Mahomet in ſuch hope of good ſpeed, that he gaue preſent order for the leuying of ſuch an armie as Caraza had requeſted, and for ten thouſand mo than he had at the firſt required. With this ſtrong armie, in number almoſt forty thouſand, Caraza ſet forward, hauing before filled the minds of men with the expectation of ſome greater matter to haue bin by him done. Scanderbeg vnderſtanding certainly that Caraza was comming, ſtood more in doubt of the man than of his power: and therefore aſſembled greater forces than he had vſually done before: and to welcome him, ſent two thouſand of his beſt and H moſt expert ſouldiers ſecretly into the enemies countrey; who lying in ambuſh amongſt the woods and mountaines, whereby Caraza muſt needs paſſe, ſuddenly ſet vpon foure thouſand horſemen (the forerunners of Caraza his armie) who marching diſorderedly, and fearing no ſuch matter, were in a trice ouerthrowne, and moſt part of them ſlaine: thoſe few that eſcaped fled backe againe to the army, as if they had come in poſt to bring tidings of ſome haſtie news to the Generall. With which ſo vnfortunat a beginning, Caraza was ſo diſcomfited, that if hee might for ſhame, he could haue bin content to haue returned againe and gone no farther: yet for his honours ſake holding on his way, he came into Epirus; where whileſt he was (after the manner of old men) long in reſoluing what courſe to take, he was vpon the ſudden aſſailed by Scanderbeg, before he could well put his men in order of battell. At which time there fell ſuch I a vehement ſhower of raine, that both the armies were glad to retire before any great hurt was done. Three daies together it rained continually (for it was about the latter end of Autumne) all which time Scanderbeg ceaſed not in one place or other to trouble the Turks camp: ſo that the old Generall, partly diſtempered with the extremitie of the weather, which for the violence thereof he tooke to be ominous; and more diſcouraged with the reſtleſſe attempts of Scanderbeg, roſe with his armie, and retiring back by the ſame way he came, returned to Conſtantinople. Where he was well derided of Mahomet, that hauing promiſed ſo much, had performed ſo little: yet afterwards was againe by him in ſome ſort commended, for that he had with leſſe loſſe looked vpon Scanderbeg than other his Generals before ſent againſt him.

Mahomet perceiuing that Scanderbeg was not to be ſubdued but with ſuch forces as he was K not then at leiſure to imploy on him, thought it not amiſſe to proue if he could by faire ſpeeches & glorious ſhews of fained friendſhip get within him, and ſo bring him to confuſion: for which purpoſe he ſent vnto him an Embaſſador with rich preſents, and letters of this purport.

Sultan Mahomet, Lord and Emperour of the East and of the Weſt, and of all parts of the world, vnto Scanderbeg, Prince of Albania and Epirus, ſendeth greeting.

The letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg.

I thinke friend Scanderbeg, that no acquaintance can be greater, or friendſhip more firme, than that L which hath growne of long and mutuall conuerſing and liuing together and, eſpecially if the ſame haue taken beginning from childhood and tender yeares, as you know it hath done betwixt vs two; who haue of long time, euen from our childhood, liued together in great loue and friendſhip, when as you firſt lay as hoſtage in my fathers court. Wherfore beloued Scanderbeg, when as I call to remembrance all thoſe things, with others, wherewith our youthfull yeares were then delighted; and being mindfull alſo of all thoſe things which you haue oftentimes done for the aduancement of our Empire and kingdome, and for the glorie of the Othoman familie, I cannot chuſe but embrace thee with ſingular zeale and affection. For I take God to witneſſe, that nothing could chance more welcome or pleaſing vnto me in my life, than to haue thee with me, and for a while to enioy thy company. Neither needeſt thou to feare any thing to come vnto me, for that my ſouldiers without my knowledge or commandement haue of late broken in M and ſpoiled thy kingdome: which thing as reaſon required, was vnto me exceedingly diſpleaſing: neither did it any whit offend me, that they were by thy forces vanquiſhed and ouercome, and ſo receiued the iuſt reward of ther euill deſerts, and that all things fell out with thee according to the equitie of thy cauſe, and as thy heart could haue deſired But to let theſe things paſſe, the remembrance of our old loue and friendſhip perſuadeth me to come to agreement, and to ioine together with thee in a perpetull league

A of amitie: to the intent that our antient acquaintance and familiaritie, which by reaſon of long abſence is almoſt worne out, may againe take life, increaſe, and be confirmed. Of which peace, let theſe be the capitulations, if they ſhall ſeeme vnto you reaſonable: for I know it belongeth vnto him that requireth not the peace, to appoint the conditions of the ſame. Firſt, we require of you freely and peaceably to ſuffer our armies to paſſe through your kingdome, for the beſieging of the cities and inuading of the countries ſubiect to the Venetians our enemies: Then, to deliuer vnto vs your ſonne Iohn in hoſtage, whom we will alwaies vſe as one of our owne naturall children: And afterwards, that our Marchants and men of trade, may peaceably come and trauell into all parts of your kingdome with their marchandiſe, and there freely and ſafely vſe their negotiation: Laſt of all, that your ſelfe in perſon may at your pleaſure ſafely and without all feare repaire vnto vs, and in like manner returne againe. In which things if you will yeeld vnto vs, I promiſe in the faith of a King, to grant vnto you and your kingdome ſincere B peace, with perpetuall tranquilitie; and that there ſhall not be any more deerer vnto me than your ſelfe; and will neuer to the vttermoſt of our power permit your kingdome to be infeſted or moleſted by any of our ſubiects, or others. Whatſoeuer you ſhall further receiue from vs by the mouth of our Embaſſadour Muſtapha, you may thereto giue full credence. Fare you well. From our imperiall palace at Conſtantinople the 10 of May 1461.

Scanderbeg hauing receiued theſe Letters, and well conſidered of the ſame, returned him anſwer by the ſame meſſenger as followeth.

The ſouldier of Chriſt Ieſus, George Caſtriot, otherwiſe called Scanderbeg, C Prince of the Albanenſes and Epirots, vnto Mahomet Prince of the Turkes, greeting.

Your Letters (moſt magnificent) are deliuered vnto vs, wherein you write of your exceeding loue and ſingular affection towards vs, confirmed as you ſay by old acquaintance: which being growne vp betwixt vs, and by tract of time firmely rooted and as it were into nature conuerted, ſhall alwaies retaine his force and ſtrength. But foraſmuch as it ſeemeth vnto you good to awake the ſame, hauing of long time and many yeares lien as it were aſleepe; and to make a motion that we ſhould enter into a certaine new league and confederation, whereof amongſt other conditions of the league by you propounded, this is one, That your forces may freely paſſe through my kingdome, to inuade the Venetians; Vnto this your requeſt, worthie Mahomet, it ſtandeth neither with equitie nor with mine honour to conſent, for D ſo much as the Venetians are my eſpeciall good friends and confederates. As for that you deſire to haue my ſonne Iohn with you in hoſtage for the better aſſurance of the peace betwixt vs, I ſhould peraduenture do it (moſt noble Mahomet) if fatherly affection would giue me leaue: but ſithence I haue no moe but him, and he as yet a tender child, it is not for the good either of him or vs, to haue him now taken from vs, whenas he ought of vs to be moſt tenderly cheriſhed, and carefully inſtructed. As for that you requeſted concerning your marchants, That they may freely and ſafely traffique into my kingdome at their pleaſure, I can be content to yeeld therunto, and wiſh heartily that there might be a free entercourſe for our marchants indifferently with their commodities into both our kingdomes. Further, whereas you earneſtly perſuade me boldly and without feare to come vnto you, that by ſuch enteruiew and perſonall E preſence, our great deſire, growne of long abſence, might be the better ſatisfied: in this thing moſt excellent Prince, I cannot but praiſe your moſt honourable diſpoſition, and commend your good nature; and would therefore boldly follow your perſuaſion, if my other vrgent affaires, with the gouernment of my kingdome, would ſo permit. But what ſhall I doe? My ſonne Iohn (as I ſaid before) but little, and as yet vnfit to gouerne; and my people (as you know) loue alwaies to haue ſomething to doe; being by nature a fierce and reſtleſſe nation, whom I my ſelfe haue much adoe to rule and gouerne: For all that I wil come vnto you acccording to your deſire, expecting onely a more commodious time. So fare you well, and loue me ſtill. From our Campe the 30 of May, 1461.

The anſwer of Scanderbeg to the former letters of Mahomet.

When Mahomet had receiued theſe Letters, and well peruſed the ſame, hee writ to him againe in manner following.

F

Sultan Mahomet, Empetour of all the parts of the World, vnto Scanderbeg Prince of the Albanenſes and Epirots, greeting.

The letters of Mahomet to Scanderbeg for the concluding of a perpetuall peace betwixt them.

Your Letters we haue receiued by our embaſſdor Muſtapha, wherein you giue vs to vnderſtand, that you like of none of the conditions of peace by vs proponnded, but onely that concerning our marchants and men of ttade, that they might freely and at their pleaſure vſe their traffique and trades with their marchandiſe too and fro, and vpon this condition onely you grant vs peace. This your offer we accept of, and all the reſt of your excuſes we willingly admit: wherefore I promiſe vnto thee (my louing Scanderbeg) and wil performe all that thou doeſt require, and vpon that reſolution reſt: and will ſo long as I liue obſerue and keepe a ſincere and inuiolable peace with thee for euer, except thou firſt giue cauſe of violating the ſame. And for that purpoſe haue we with our vſuall and imperiall ſeale ſigned theſe our Letters, which we by our Embaſſadour Muſtapha haue ſent vnto thee, as thereby confirming vnto thee this perpetuall peace. Wherefore you alſo (if you be ſo content) may ſubſcribe, and with your Seale confirme this of ours, that I in like manner may haue alſo your like conſent and agreement. And would farther, that you would command knowledge thereof to be made by open proclamation through all your kingdom, as I will in like manner cauſe to be done through mine. And for the more manifeſtation of this my loue towards you, I would alſo that you ſhould vnderſtand, That of mine owne meere motion and bountie, I doe freely giue vnto you all thoſe things, which you by force of armes haue taken from my father in Albania and Epirus, ſo that you may poſſeſſe and enioy the ſame, as if they had alwayes beene yours and your anceſtors: Wherefore I giue, grant, and confirme vnto thee and thy heires, all the right, title, or intereſt, which I heretofore had therein, and from henceforth will alwaies account and repute thee as prince of Albania and Epirus, and ſo call thee. And as I haue promiſed thee in the faith of a King, will neuer hereafter with warres moleſt thee or thine, except thou thy ſelfe giue cauſe thereof. Wherefore after you haue with your ſeale confirmed theſe things, you may commend them to our faithfull Embaſſadour Muſtapha, to be by him brought vnto vs; vnto whom I would you ſhould in all things giue full credit. So fare you well, and render vs loue for loue. From our Imperiall Palace at Couſtantinople, the 22 of Iune, 1461.

A peace concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg.

Vpon receit of theſe Letters, a peace was concluded betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, and the ſame by publique proclamations ſolemnly publiſhed through both their kingdomes, to the great reioycing of many. Which peace was for a ſeaſon faithfully kept on both ſides, vntill that the Turks lying in gariſon vpon the frontiers of Epirus, began after their wonted manner againe to fetch preyes and booties out of the countrey. Of which iniuries, Scanderbeg by Letters complained to Mahomet: who anſwered that he was altogether ignorant thereof, and ſeemed in ſhew to be much offended with the inſolencie of the doers thereof: and forthwith cauſed many things to be againe reſtored. By which meanes the peace before concluded, was ſtill as before continued.

A little before the concluſion of the aforeſaid peace, great warres began to ariſe betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians, who all this while being in league with the Turke, peaceably followed their traffique and trades of marchandiſe, little or nothing at all regarding their neighbours harmes and miſeries, vntill that now the flame and fire began to take hold vpon their owne houſes, and as it were to awaken them out of a dead ſleepe. For Mahomet after he had ſubuerted the Empire of Conſtantinople, and driuen Thomas and Demetrius the Emperours brethren out of Peloponeſus (now called Morea) reſted not ſo contented, but by his lieutenants and other great captaines began to diſturbe the quiet of the Venetians, who then held in their poſſeſſion Methone, Corone, Neapolis, Argos, with diuers other ſtrong townes in Peloponeſus, ſtanding vpon the ſea coaſt. And now it chanced, that about this time, Ioſue, Mahomet his Lieutenant in Peloponeſus, had by the treaſon of a Greeke Prieſt, vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed the citie of Argos: and Omares another of his great Captaines, hauing firſt ſpoyled the countrey about Naupactum (now Lepanto) entered farther into the territorie of the Venetians about Methone and Corone, making hauocke of whatſoeuer came in his way. With which iniuries plainly tending to open warre, the Venetian Senators being much troubled, ſate oftentimes in counſell, deliberating with much care what courſe to take in a matter of ſo great importance. Some being of opinion, that it were beſt to ſend Embaſſadours to Mahomet, ſo to make proofe if the matter might by faire meanes be redreſſed: others on the contrary part deeming it to be to no purpoſe ſo to do; foraſmuch as ſuch great and manifeſt outrages, nothing differing from plain hoſtilitie, could not poſſibly be done without the tyrants knowledge and expreſſe command. After the Senatours had oftentimes met together, and with many great reaſons debated the matter too & fro, and yet for all that concluded nothing

A (as in conſultations of great matters with a multitude, it moſt commonly falleth out to be a harder matter, and to require longer time, to bring the multitude to ſome certaine reſolution, than it is afterwards to performe the ſame in action.) In this ſo great a diuerſitie of opinions concerning ſo weightie a cauſe, at length one Victor Capella, a noble gentleman and graue Senator, ſtept vp in the middeſt of the Senate, and there franckly deliuered this notable ſpeech vnto the reſt, concerning the matter propounded, as followeth.

The notable ſpeech of Victor Capella to perſuade the Venetians to take vp armes againſt Mahomet.

I haue before this at other times by long experience often noted (moſt noble Senatours) that in all our greateſt conſultations of matters moſt concerning our common ſtate, ſome are alwaies ſo addicted or rather wedded vnto their owne conceits, that they can hardly with patience endure to heare the B reaſonable opinion of others contrarie to their owne, the chiefe cauſe of our ſlow reſolutions. Wherefore I haue thought it good, briefly at this time to call vpon you for reſolution: foraſmuch as I ſee we muſt of neceſsitie take vp armes, be we neuer ſo loath or vnwilling: For to my vnderſtanding, you doe but betray the ſtate, in delaying the time to make preſent warre vpon the barbarous enemie. Yet many principall men amongſt vs, aduiſe vs to beware, that we doe not raſhly or vnaduiſedly determine of matters of ſo great conſequence; and thinke it requiſite, that we ſhould ſend Embaſſadours vnto the tyrant, to expoſtulate with him his vniuſt dealing in breaking his faith and league; and withall to requeſt him to obſerue the conditions of the peace before agreed vpon, if happily he may rather by perſuaſion than by armes be mooued to change his purpoſe: and if by this meanes nothing may be obtained, then at length they thinke it neceſſarie to reſolue to make warre vpon him. They alledge further, That if wee ſhall attempt warre, our cities in the continent bordering vpon the Ionian in Peloponeſus, with diuerſe others of C ours in the firme land, will not be able to hold out very long, but for want of neceſſaries muſt needes periſh with the firſt of the trouble; beſides that, if thoſe places ſhall be waſted and ſpoiled, great loſſe (as they ſay) ſhall enſue thereby vnto moſt of vs in priuat: The greateſt motiue (perhaps) wherefore they thinke it moſt conuenient to deferre the warres, and for that purpoſe to ſend our embaſſadors vnto him. Of which embaſſage, firſt by your leaue a few words. At ſuch time as theſe our Embaſſadours, men of great wiſedome and reach, not long ſince came vnto him, he had them in no regard; but dallying off the time with fraudulent, deceitfull, and gloſing ſpeeches, did indeed ſuch things to the contrarie as we leaſt hoped: wherefore I cannot well deuiſe (if we ſhould ſend them, or ſuch others againe) what eſpeciall thing of all that we then gaue them in charge, they ſhould now propound vnto D him, hauing already ſaid what is to be ſaid; except they ſhould ſay, That whereas we are not of ſufficient ſtrength and power to wage war againſt him, we would be glad to decide the matter by talke, and by that ſimple meanes to redreſſe our iniuries; and vpon the matter, to ſhew our ſelues preſt and ready to fall to agreement with him, according as ſhall ſtand with his good pleaſure and liking. Truely this were good plaine dealing, but it will not ſerue our turne. Argos is alreadie taken from vs, and hee maketh open warre vpon vs: wherein he doth but prooue our courage, and trie how long we will put vp theſe iniuries. If we will quietly digeſt theſe, he will then confidently and without feare proceed further: but if we ſhall as beſt beſeemeth vs, valiantly reſiſt him, he ſhall be glad of ſuch reſt as we ſhall giue him; and when he knoweth not well which way to turne himſelfe, ſhall be as glad as we to lay downe armes, and to ſeeke for peace: whereas if we ſhall doe otherwiſe, I feare we ſhall E repent our ſelues when it will be too late. It is reported, that as ſoone as he was come into Peloponeſus, he went himſelfe in perſon vnto Eubœa, to view the citie of Chalcis: And going a ſecond time out of Peloponeſus, ſounded the depth of the paſſage, and came within the ſight of the Citie, of purpoſe to haue aſſaulted it, if he had found opportunitie: At which time he himſelfe rid ouer that ſtrait of the ſea betwixt Bœtia and Eubœa with his horſe, and curiouſly viewed in what place he might moſt conueniently paſſe ouer with his armie to beſiege the Citie. Verily theſe are the moſt manifeſt ſignes of warre, whereby any man may ſufficiently prooue, that he hath long ſince reſolued (ſo ſoone as he is readie) to make warre vpon vs. Whileſt we are yet dreaming in the middeſt of our long conſultations; he will proceed in the warres he hath begun; and cutting vs ſhort, augment his owne dominions.
F Then will he blame his Lieutenants and Captaines, as authours thereof: but ſtill be doing that beſt ſerueth his purpoſe. And whileſt no man oppoſeth himſelfe againſt him, his power dayly increaſing, he will doe the beſt he can, ſuddenly to ſwallow vs vp, beeing vnprouided. For he may eaſily raiſe great forces, that by ſufferance of others, maketh himſelfe of great ſtrength there where he had before no footing. Shall we then ſay that we haue no warres with this encroching tyrant? Some I know feed themſelues and others alſo, with vaine hopes, ſaying, That he will neuer turne his forces vpon vs, nor ruinate our eſtate, although he might at eaſe doe it : Wherefore (ſay they) let vs refraine from G warres, and vſe our peace and quietneſſe; yet omitting nothing in the meane time that ſhall be needfull for our ſafetie. But foraſmuch as it plainely appeareth vnto all men, by the which is before ſaid, That he hath already indeed proclaimed warre againſt vs, inuading our countries, ſurpriſing our cities, and killing our people : Whether thinke you it more expedient or profitable for vs, to ſit ſtill and ſuffer our dominions to be taken from vs, or rather by open warre to make the barbarous King know the greatneſſe of our power and ſtrength ? For if we ſhall enter into open warre, wee being in armes ſufficiently prouided for all euents, and with carefull eye attending all his attempts, ſhall eaſily auoid both himſelfe and all his deuiſes : who if he be ſuffered to runne ſtill on forward with his proſperous ſucceſſe, people wil daily more and more fall vnto him, in hope to liue the better, as his friends. For which cauſe, I thinke it better to preferre an honourable warre, before a doubtfull peace. As for delay, it hath hurt many great States, and our ſelues moſt of all : whereby we haue in ſome ſort betrayed the Empire of Grecia, with the woful Emperor himſelf, when as this tyrant battered the wals of Conſtantinople; for our traffique was much holpen by the Grecians, whom we then H left to themſelues. After that, we deſpiſed and reiected the pittifull complaints of the Princes of Peloponeſus, who with teares craued our aid : and now we ſee that famous countrey loſt, and fallen into his hands, through our ſloath and negligence. Of late, when as the King of Boſna humbly requeſted our aid, and promiſed fully to requite our courteſie, and whatſoeuer elſe we ſhould doe in his behalfe; we ſuffered his kingdome to be loſt, and himſelfe to be cruelly murthered of the Turks. For all theſe things by vs thus neglected, we cannot eſcape the imfamous report of all the reſt of the nations in Europe but that they will ſay, That we for the greedie deſire of trade and filthie gaine, haue forſaken, I and for our parts betraied whole Kingdomes and Nations, agreeing with vs both in manners and Religion; and to haue ſtood ſtill looking on, vntill they were ſubdued and brought into thraldome by the Turkes. Wherefore in few wordes to ſhut vp the matter, if we ſhould ioyne in league with the Hungarians, and enter into armes, we ſhould ſo be able to keepe our owne: whereas if we ſhall vſe delayes, and hunt after peace, we ſhall in ſhort time ſee, that he will ſuddenly deuoure vs, being vnprouided, and wreſt from vs all our prouinces and territories which border vpon him. And therefore it is (in my opinion) beſt to ſend our Embaſſadours into Hungarie, with a great maſſe of money, to ſtirre vp that warlike Nation into the fellowſhip of this warre. And beſide the Nauie we now haue in readineſſe, to put to Sea as many more ſhips and gallies as we are able. The great Biſhop alſo is not to be forgotten, but by all meanes to be drawne as a chiefe man into this warre. Beſides all this, we K muſt doe what we can to raiſe vp rebellion aganſt the Turke in Peloponeſus : which will be no hard matter to bring to paſſe. For if the Peloponeſians riſe in armes with one of their poore Princes which reuolted from the Turkiſh King, and forſaking all that they had, aduentured themſelues into all manner of peril and danger: what thinke you they will doe, if they ſhall ſee ſo great forces comming both by ſea and land againſt the Turkiſh king? It were good alſo, that we ſhould ſend two thouſand Italian horſemen into Peloponeſus, to animate the people : who when they ſhall ſee vs thus to proceede, will vndoubtedly preſently reuolt from the Turks, and yeeld themſelues with their countrey vnto vs, from whence we may moſt commodiouſly vex and moleſt this tyrant : For there is no where better entrance into his kingdome, than by the way of Peloponeſus. So that ioyning in league with the Hungarians, we ſhall beſet him on euery ſide: they all along the riuer of Danubius, and we out of Peloponeſus. Let vs L not therefore ſit ſtill with our hands in our boſomes, ſuffering our countries to be taken from vs, and our ſubiects made bondſlaues to the Turks : but encouraging them by our example, animate them to take vp armes, and valiantly to reſiſt the cruell and barbarous tyrant.

The Venetians take vp armes againſt the Turke.

The greater part of the Senate mooued with this graue Senatours ſpeech, decreed without delay to make warres, and to ſend their Embaſſadours to the Pope, the king of Hungarie, and other the Chriſtian Princes their neighbours, to pray aid of them in theſe warres againſt the Turkes. According to this decree, the Venetians for defence of their territorie ſent one Bertholdus Eſte, a valiant captaine, with an armie into Peloponeſus: where at his firſt comming, M he in ſhort time recouered the citie of Argos, before loſt. And departing thence, marched through the countrey with his armie of fifteene thouſand men, vnto the ſtrait of Corinth, called Iſthmus. At which place Alouiſius Lauretanus, Admirall for the Venetians (by appointment before made) met him: and there ioyning their forces together, with great labour

A in the ſpace of fifteene days fortified all that ſtrait from the Ionian, to the ſea Ægeum, with a continuall rampier and double ditch in length about fiue miles. In which work they vſed the helpe of thirtie thouſand men; and in doing thereof were much furthered by the ruins of the old wall before deſtroyed by Amurath. The Venetian Commanders hauing fortified this ſtrait, incamped before Corinth, and layd ſtrait ſiege vnto it: where at the ſecond aſſault, Bartholdus the General deſirous by his owne forwardneſſe to encourage his ſouldiers, was in that aſſault grieuouſly wounded with a ſtone caſt downe vpon him from the wall, of which hurt he ſhortly after died. Neuertheleſſe the ſiege was ſtill continued by Betinus Calcinatius, who ſucceeded in Bartholdus his place. But whileſt the Venetians lay thus at the ſiege of Corinth, ſuddenly newes was brought vnto the campe, That Mahomet was comming with a great army B himſelfe in perſon, to raiſe the ſiege, and to deſtroy the new fortifications at Iſthmus. Whereupon the Venetians left the ſiege, with purpoſe to haue defended the late fortified ſtrait: but after that it was certainly knowne, that Mahomet was euen now at hand with an armie of fourſcore thouſand Turks, Betinus diſtruſting with his ſmall number to be able to defend the ſtrait againſt ſo puiſſant an armie, left the place ſo lately before fortified, and with all his armie retired to Neapolis to keepe the ſea coaſt.

Shortly after, Mahomet without any reſiſtance at all entered with a world of men by the ſtrait into Peloponeſus; and when he had with the great ſlaughter of the country people roamed vp and downe about Argos, he came to Neapolis, and in moſt terrible manner aſſaulted the citie twice; both which times he was notably repulſed by the Venetians, and many of his C men ſlaine. Departing thence, he deſtroyed and waſted the countrey about Methone (now Modon) and Corone, and aſſaulted the citie of Iuncum, but with no better ſucceſſe than he had before Neapolis. Wherefore Winter now drawing on, he returned with his Armie to Conſtantinople.
